McCain, Giuliani Yet To Sign Tax Cut Pledge. Under the headline, "GOP 'Darlings' Slow To Sign Tax-cut Pledge," the Washington Times (2/22, Lambro, 88K) reports Sen. John McCain and Rudy Giuliani "have not signed an anti-tax-increase pledge that has been embraced by several of their rivals." The "reluctance of the party's two leading candidates to sign the pledge, which has been signed by every Republican presidential nominee since 1988, raised concerns among conservative tax cutters about Mr. McCain's and Mr. Giuliani's commitment to reduce tax rates at a time when all of the Democratic presidential contenders have vowed to raise income taxes if they are elected." Jack Kemp said, "I can't imagine that McCain wouldn't sign it or that Giuliani wouldn't sign it. I can't imagine any Republican not signing that." The Times adds the pledge, "which asks the candidates to sign a statement declaring they will 'oppose any and all efforts to increase the marginal income tax rates,' could become an issue for both men as they vie for the support of their party's economic conservatives -- especially for Mr. McCain who was a foe of President Bush's tax cuts until he began actively running for president last year."

GOP Candidates Advised To Seek The "Big Mo." In his New York Times column (2/22), David Brooks offers advice for Republican presidential candidates, suggesting, "First: Be the Snowball. The conventional view is that Feb. 5 is going to be the decisive day of the race, when California, New Jersey, Illinois and a bunch of other states will probably have their primaries. That's wrong." Because "so many states will be voting then, the candidates will be stretched thin in all of them. As a result, the Republican candidate who does best in the first three states — Iowa, New Hampshire and, on Feb. 2, South Carolina — will sweep on Feb. 5 through sheer momentum." Other advice includes "the Rule of Three. When three big candidates go up against one another, two of them often get into a mutually destructive grudge match and the third skates through to victory. (Right now, the McCain and Romney camps seem set to brawl, leaving Giuliani alone.)" Another suggestion is that if "your last name is Giuliani, McCain or Romney, social conservatives are never going to love you. Don't try to pander to gain their devotion. Instead, offer them a deal," telling them "I'm the guy who can deliver on four programs you want. Then pick out four programs you and they can agree on and repeat them in every speech for the next year."

DOJ_NMG_0135411

Clinton, Obama Camps Trade Jabs Over Geffen Comments. The fallout from comments made by Hollywood mogul David Geffen, a supporter of Sen. Barack Obama's presidential campaign, that appeared in Wednesday's Maureen Dowd column in the New York Times dominates the political news today, with two broadcast networks and several major newspapers reporting on the back-and-forth between the Obama and Sen. Hillary Clinton campaigns. The story eclipses coverage of a forum for Democratic candidates in Nevada that was attended by eight candidates, with only Obama absent.

ABC World News (2/21, story 5, 2:30, Gibson, 8.78M) said that though "there are more than 10 months to go until we even get to the presidential election year," Clinton and Obama "were sniping at one another, as if the campaign were in midstream." ABC (Tapper) said that in the Dowd column, Geffen "lashed out at both Clintons, saying, 'Everybody in politics lies. But they do it with such ease, it's troubling.' Geffen also alluded to the former 'president's personal life, calling him 'a reckless guy,' and insinuating he has not changed since the Monica Lewinsky days. … Geffen has no official role with the Obama campaign. But almost immediately the Clinton campaign went after Obama, saying he was hypocritical for tolerating Geffen's comments, given Obama's pitch against negative campaigning."

The CBS Evening News (2/21, story 10, 2:20, Couric, 7.66M) said Clinton and Obama "are trading jabs in their first public spat." CBS (Borger) added, "It's 21 months before the election at the first feel-good Democratic candidate forum, yet the campaigns of the two most famous Democrats were already hissing at each other." Clinton: "I sure don't want Democrats or the supporters of Democrats to be engaging in the politics of personal destruction." Borger: "Geffen, a movie mogul and former Clintonite, has deserted his one-time friends for Obama. … The Clinton campaign used the comments to try and recast Obama into another pol who preached against nasty politics while his supporters practice it."

The AP (2/21, Pickler, Riley) said the Clinton and Obama camps "traded accusations of nasty politics" over the Geffen comments. While the Clinton campaign "demanded that Obama denounce comments made by the DreamWorks movie studio founder," Obama, campaigning in Iowa, refused, saying, "It's not clear to me why I'd be apologizing for someone else's remark." Clinton, in Nevada, "sidestepped questions, leaving the issue to her aides to discuss. 'I'm just going to stay focused on my campaign and I'm going to run a positive campaign about the issues that affect the people in our country,'" she said. The Des Moines Register (2/22, 160K) says Obama "said he 'can't be responsible for the statements of every individual' and said voters and candidates alike have more pressing issues that deserve focus."

The Washington Post (2/22, Cillizza, Balz, 690K) headlines its front-page report "Clinton, Obama Camps' Feud Is Out In The Open," and leads by saying "an increasingly acrimonious competition" between Clinton and Obama "to enlist the Democratic Party's leading fundraisers and operatives burst into the open yesterday, overshadowing what was billed as the presidential campaign's first gathering of candidates in Nevada." The Chicago Tribune (2/22, Dorning, Zuckman, 617K) says the Clinton camp was "perhaps stung by Obama's successful incursion into Hollywood, which at one time was unchallenged Clinton country," and "hit back hard, saying Geffen's comments contrasted poorly with the Illinois senator's self-promotion as a new breed of politician, unifying and optimistic."

Newsday (2/22, Thrush) headlines its report "Barack, Hillary Trade Body Blows," saying the "fight was waged through a series of heated e-mails from both campaigns Wednesday -- in which Clinton's top spokesman accused Obama of being a 'slash & burn' politician and Obama's staff slammed the Clintons for using the Lincoln Bedroom as a cash register in the 1990s." McClatchy (2/22, Thomma) calls it the "first full-scale fight of the fledgling 2008 presidential campaign between the front-runners" on the Democratic side, and "perhaps enough to kill talk of a new, less hostile politics - and maybe even speculation about a Clinton-Obama or Obama-Clinton ticket."

On its front page, the New York Times (2/22, Healy, Rutenberg, 1.16M) calls it a "remarkably caustic exchange between the Clinton and Obama campaigns that highlighted the sensitivity in the Clinton camp to Mr. Obama's rapid rise as a rival and his positioning as a fresh face unburdened by the baggage borne by Mrs. Clinton." The Clinton camp "seemed also to be sending a warning to mudslinging critics that they would be dealt with fiercely." The Wall Street Journal (2/22, A8, Calmes, 2.04M) writes, "Forget President Bush." The Clinton and Obama campaigns "have gone after each other in an unusually early and nasty exchange. … An email fusillade yesterday left many Democrats shaking their heads that party infighting -- like everything else about the 2008 presidential campaign -- is starting so soon, nearly a year before the first nominating votes."

DOJ_NMG_0135412

The Los Angeles Times (2/22, Daunt, Wallsten, 850K) says that Clinton "eventually was going to face the legacy of the more unsavory episodes of her husband's two terms as president. But in a surprise Wednesday, the first person to draw wide attention to some of the old controversies was not a Republican candidate or the 'vast, right-wing conspiracy' that the Clintons have assailed, but a leading liberal at the heart of Hollywood." USA Today (2/22, 6A, Lawrence, 2.27M) reports that at the Nevada forum, another candidate, Gov. Bill Richardson, "said Democrats should pledge not to attack one another. Asked whether Obama should denounce the Geffen comments, he replied: 'Yes. If we're going to win, we have to be positive.'" The Financial Times (2/22, Luce) and the Washington Times (2/22, Bellantoni, 88K) also report on the flap.

Clinton campaign communications director Howard Wolfson said on MSNBC's Hardball (2/21, Matthews), "Our expectation was that Sen. Obama, who was running a campaign premised on changing our politics, who has decried the politics of slash and burn, would denounce the comments, say that these comments don't represent his thinking or his campaign. We were, frankly, surprised that he didn't do that. It makes you wonder whether or not he agrees with them. It's a little ironic that the candidate on one day would say, 'I want to change America. I want to change politics. I want to lift us up. I want to stop the politics of slash and burn,' while at the same time his leading supporter in California is attacking [President Clinton] and Sen. Clinton in very personal terms. … I think that we can have differences of opinion over policy. I hope the Democrats will stay united and mostly focus on winning in November of '08, but obviously, there will be some differences on policy. But when you start getting into personal charges against people and you make personal insults against the candidate and the candidate's spouse, I think that's going too far. I think the American people will think that's going too far."

Eight Democrats Meet In Campaign's First Major Forum. Eight Democratic presidential hopefuls -- Sen. Joseph Biden, Sen. Hillary Clinton, Sen. Christopher Dodd, John Edwards, Mike Gravel, Rep. Dennis Kucinich, Gov. Bill Richardson, and Tom Vilsack -- "defended their histories on Iraq, offered their ideas for ending the war and opened fault lines on taxes and health care Wednesday in the first major forum of the 2008 nomination race," USA Today (2/22, 6A, Lawrence, 2.27M) reports. Among major contenders, only Sen. Barack Obama, campaigning in Iowa, was missing from the Carson City, Nevada, forum, sponsored by the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees.

The New York Times (2/22, A18, Healy, 1.16M) says the "toughest words" came from Edwards, who "said Americans needed 'a different kind of leadership' than that provided by the current president who, Mr. Edwards said, had refused to admit error on Iraq." Asked about Clinton's "explanation that her vote was cast based on a sincere belief in military intelligence provided at the time, Mr. Edwards replied: 'Whether it's good enough I think is between her and her conscience. It's not for me to judge.'" Dodd, "who has also renounced his 2002 vote, said there was 'nothing wrong' with admitting mistakes." The AP (2/21, Fouhy) says the "event format did not permit Clinton to respond to Edwards' swipe, which stood out on an afternoon in which Democrats launched serial attacks on President Bush's war policies."

Daschle Endorses Obama. The AP (2/21) reports former Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle endorsed Obama Wednesday, saying Obama "'personifies the future of Democratic leadership in our country.' Daschle said Obama has a 'great capacity to unify our country and inspire a new generation of young Americans, just as I was inspired by the Kennedys and Martin Luther King when I was young.'" Daschle served in the Senate with four of the Democratic candidates, but not Obama, who took office as Daschle departed.

Broder Says Nomination System "Has Become Truly Insane." In his Washington Post (2/22, A19, 690K) column, David Broder writes, "It's only February of 2007, but from the schedules these presidential hopefuls -- and their rivals -- are keeping, you would think the primaries were almost upon us. … What we have, friends, is a remarkably distinguished field of candidates vying in an election system that has become truly insane. I think the 16 men and one woman actively pursuing the presidency right now constitute a classy assemblage. The front-runners are people of substantial stature; the long shots include many who, in other years, would have been thought of as formidable challengers. But the process in which they are engaged is bizarre -- and getting more so, every time you look."

DOJ_NMG_0135413

Lobbying "Revolving Door" For Former Lawmakers Remains Open. USA Today (2/22, Kelley, 2.27M) reports the "cozy relationships between lawmakers and lobbyists that embarrassed Congress and cost some lawmakers re-election haven't stopped the revolving door between Capitol Hill and the lobbying industry that seeks to influence legislation." Five of "the 39 ex-lawmakers rejected by voters three months ago landed jobs at firms that seek to influence Congress. The hires include two Republicans — Curt Weldon of Pennsylvania and Conrad Burns of Montana — who lost in part because of allegations of ethical lapses." Federal law "requires lawmakers to wait a year after leaving office to lobby Congress, but lets former Congress members advise lobbyists and clients. The Senate passed a bill that would extend that 'cooling-off' period to two years and also ban ex-lawmakers from advising others during that time. The House of Representatives has not taken up that issue."

Rubin's Prescriptions For Fairer Trade Critiqued. In his Washington Post column (2/22, A19), Harold Meyerson says, "In reaction not just to November but to reams of economic data showing that the U.S. median income has flat-lined, such longtime champions of free-trade orthodoxy as former Clinton Treasury secretary Robert Rubin have changed their tune." To "compensate for whatever leveling effect trade may have on Americans' incomes, they now call for wage insurance to help workers who've been compelled to take lower-paying jobs than the ones they lost. As call centers relocate to India, the Rubinauts call for extending trade adjustment assistance to service as well as manufacturing workers. They call for a universal health-care system delinking insurance from employment, so that U.S. companies can compete globally without having to be the only corporations in an advanced economy that cover their workers' medical costs. They call for improving our education system so that American workers can be more competitive." But free-trade skeptics "such as I believe that these domestic reforms, while overdue, are not enough. We argue that there need to be rules for the global economy that protect workers no less than investors, that global minimum wage standards, say, are no less necessary in a global economy than national minimum wage standards are in a national economy."

NYTimes Says Weakness In Mortgage Market A Reason For Tax Hikes. The New York Times (2/22, 1.16M) says in an editorial that if the "bankers, investors and regulators who populate the global financial markets are not already anxious, they should be. The easy money that has buoyed the global economy for much of this decade is getting harder to come by." The "trigger" of a global economic crisis "could be the rapid erosion in the quality of American home mortgages — reflected in surging delinquencies and rising defaults." Mark Zandi and Juan Manuel Licari of Moody's Economy.com "detailed the dangers recently." The "odds of a global financial crisis are still low, according to Mr. Zandi and Mr. Licari, but they are rising. There is not a lot now that can be done about the risks in the mortgage market. But the growing possibility of hard times ahead is another argument for rolling back many of the recent excessive tax cuts, so the government will have more resources available to respond if a crisis comes."

WPost Criticizes Virginia Legislature's Handling Of Transportation Funding. The Washington Post (2/22, A18, 690K) says in an editorial, "The deck is stacked in Richmond this week as negotiators from Virginia's House of Delegates and Senate try to find the first new money for transportation in a generation. Specifically, it is stacked in favor of a flawed plan that would use unstable, unreliable funding sources to produce an anemic cash flow." Just "two of the 12 negotiators" on the conference committee "are Northern Virginians, despite the fact that the region accounts for one-third of the state's population, 40 percent of its economy and at least half its traffic headaches. Ten of the 12 negotiators are Republicans. And, thanks to some artful parliamentary maneuvering, 11 of the 12 negotiators named to the conference committee voted for the House-backed funding package, which is less responsible than the Senate's approach." The "chances of this group of lawmakers forging a genuine compromise are not promising."

Rice Renews Offer For Talks With Iran. In an exclusive interview with CNN's Situation Room (2/21, 7:13PM), Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "offered an olive branch" to Iran: "Take us up on talks, anytime, anyplace. But stop enriching uranium first." Rice told CNN, "We can talk about anything -- that's an offer I would renew today. We have, in fact, even under the circumstances, cooperated some in Afghanistan. And I think that was useful. So there is a different path." Asked if there is a danger that increased rhetoric from Washington "could trigger an accidental war," the Secretary said, "Let me just say here, publicly, the United States has no desire for confrontation with Iran -- none." Rice also "appeared to be signaling to Iran's leaders impatient with Mahmoud Ahmadinejad that she hears them," telling CNN, "The option that we have is to continue to try to convince those who are reasonable in Iran that the course that they're on is destructive."

DOJ_NMG_0135414

Meanwhile, AFP (2/22, Millikin) reports as Iran "ignored a U.N. deadline Wednesday to suspend its nuclear reprocessing activities," Rice urged Tehran "to reconsider its defiance and accept an offer of better relations with Washington." ." After meeting with German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier, Rice said, "The Iranians have unfortunately not acceded to the international community's demands." The Secretary was expected to discuss the issue of increasing the sanctions pressure against Iran with Steinmeier, Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov and EU foreign policy chief Javier Solana on the sideline of the Quartet meeting in Berlin.

Hadley Warns Iran Risks Further Isolation. The Financial Times (2/22, Dombey) reports national security advisor Stephen Hadley Wednesday warned that Iran "faced further isolation if it failed to meet United Nations demands to curb its nuclear programme." In Brussels, Hadley "argued that the Bush administration's concerns were shared by Russia, in spite of the split between Moscow and Washington on issues such as missile defence." Hadley added that Moscow's recent decision to delay work on Iran's light water reactor at Bushehr "indicated the Kremlin's worries about Iran's nuclear ambitions," saying, "They have been increasingly concerned about the proliferation risks associated with Bushehr," and "have entered into understandings with Iranians to mitigate some of those risks."

US, EU Weigh Additional Steps On Iran. The Wall Street Journal (2/22, A6, King, Solomon, 2.04M) reports, "Amid signs of economic unease in Iran, the US and its European partners are weighing another set of financial restrictions on Tehran, including the possibility of targeting companies run by the country's elite Revolutionary Guard Corps." US and European officials say that the move toward a second round of U.N. sanctions "reflects their cautious optimism that sustained pressure on Tehran might succeed in bringing the country to the negotiating table over its nuclear program." However, "Keeping up the pressure may not be easy. Of the five permanent members of the Security Council, France, Britain and the US are eager to push ahead on a second resolution and have already begun to consider some potential targets. But China and, above all, Russia are wary of pushing too hard."

Ahmadinejad Vows To Continue Enriching Uranium Despite U.N. Deadline. The CBS Evening News (2/21, story 5, 0:25, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "The President of Iran today defied a UN deadline and said his country will continue to pursue its nuclear energy program. Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said Iran will not retreat one iota from its position. The UN had given Iran 60 days to stop enriching uranium. The Iranians say they need it for nuclear power, but it can also be used to make nuclear weapons."

The New York Times (2/22, A14, Bowley, Knowlton, 1.16M) reports Ahmadinejad said Iran "had a right to pursue nuclear technology" and "will continue our work to reach our right in the shortest possible time," according to the ISNA news agency. Speaking in Siahkal in northern Iran, Ahmadinejad said, "Obtaining this technology is very important for our country's development and honor."

Expert Warns Beijing's Ties With Tehran Limit Impact Of Sanctions. Ilan Berman, author and vice president for policy at the American Foreign Policy Council, writes in the Wall Street Journal (2/22, A14, 2.04M), "Financial pressure by the U.S. and other Western governments in recent weeks is beginning to have a real impact, chilling investment into Iran's energy sector and ratcheting up the costs of the regime's atomic effort. But these gains are in danger of being erased, thanks to the growing economic partnership between Tehran and Beijing." While Berman concedes that "China's economic interests are understandable," he says "the failure of the Bush administration to take Beijing to task, however, is far less comprehensible."

Differences Emerge Between US, EU Over New Palestinian Government. The New York Times (2/22, A5, Cooper, 1.16M) reports, "Fractures between the United States and Europe began to appear Wednesday over whether the new Palestinian unity government was likely to receive international economic support even as the Middle East peace negotiators officially continued their wait-and-see approach." While Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "has said repeatedly that unless the new unity government meets those conditions, the United States will continue its economic boycott of the Palestinian government," European officials Wednesday at a meeting of the so-called Quartet in Berlin "appeared more willing to hold out the possibility of finding members of a new unity government with whom to work."

DOJ_NMG_0135415

Similarly, the Washington Post (2/22, A10, Kessler, 690K) reports EU and US officials "sought to play down emerging differences" over the new Palestinian unity government. US officials "say they were surprised that Abbas struck the deal," but European officials "have been much more receptive to the unity government, saying it might be a way to encourage Hamas to eventually accept a peace deal." In a statement "laden with diplomatic code words," the Quartet "welcomed Rice's efforts and reaffirmed that a Palestinian government must be committed to nonviolence, recognize Israel and honor previous agreements with Israel. But the group also said it was exploring an expansion of a European aid pipeline to the Palestinians."

AFP (2/22, Cole) says Wednesday's meeting "wrapped up with major powers saying they will await the formation of the new Palestinian unity government before deciding whether to lift aid and diplomatic embargoes." But the "two-hour talks left the diplomatic riddle posed by the power-sharing deal…unsolved."

In addition to EU officials, the Financial Times (2/22, Williamson) reports the US is also "at odds" with Russia over relations with a planned Palestinian national unity government, "revealing divisions that are likely to further hamper efforts to reinvigorate international backing for a Middle East peace initiative." Ahead of yesterday's Quartet meeting, Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov "said pressure on the Palestinian Authority should be eased by lifting an aid embargo imposed when Hamas won elections last year."

Blair Hints At Possible Deal With Hamas. The Financial Times (2/22, Williamson, Dombey) reports British Prime Minister Tony Blair "indicated [the UK] could be prepared to do business" with Hamas, "in comments that underlined the growing difference in approach between Europe and the US on how best to pursue peace in the Middle East." Speaking in London ahead of a meeting with Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, Blair said, "It's far easier to deal with the situation in Palestine if there is a national unity government. I hope we can make progress, including even with the more sensible elements of Hamas." By contrast, Secretary Rice said earlier this month that her efforts to achieve an Israeli-Palestinian agreement had "been made more complicated by the unity government".

German FM Warns Against Unrealistic Expectations. The AP (2/22, Gearan) reports Germany's foreign minister "warned Wednesday against building unrealistic expectations for a US-backed push toward peace between Israel and the Palestinians." Following a meeting Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier said, "We have to show a great deal of realism," and "not get ahead of what is still a tentative but hopeful process."

Israeli Arabs Reject Notion Of Jewish State. On its front page, the Los Angeles Times (2/22, A1, Boudreaux, 850K) reports, "A broadly representative elite of Israel's Arab minority has rejected the idea of Israel as a Jewish state and demanded a partnership in governing the country to ensure that Arab citizens get equal treatment and more control over their communities." In a manifesto "that is stirring anger and soul-searching among Jews," Arab leaders "have declared that Israel's 1.4 million Arab citizens are an indigenous group with collective rights, not just individual rights," and "argues that Arabs are entitled to share power in a binational state and block policies that discriminate against them."

The Wall Street Journal (2/22, A10, Simpson, 2.04M) says the "growing mistrust" between Israel's Jews and its Arab citizens is "testing a political and social fabric" of Israel. The "deepening divide has come into sharper focus" since Israeli-Arab cleric Radd Salah "sent chills across the nation last weekend" by calling for a new intifada in response to construction work near one of Jerusalem's most revered holy sites. Israeli Jews "find questions about the fundamental identity of their state jarring" and are "increasingly fearful of growing religiosity and radicalism among Arab citizens."

Rice Responds To Russian Campaign Against US Missile Plan. The Financial Times (2/22, Dombey, Williamson, Buckley) reports, "Tensions intensified on Wednesday over US plans for missile defence bases in Poland and the Czech Republic, as Washington called on Europe to take a tougher stance towards the Kremlin." Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and national security advisor Stephen Hadley separately "lashed out at Moscow's campaign against the bases." For her part, Rice "said the suggestion this week by Russia's head of strategic rocket forces that Russia could target the two central European countries if they agreed to host the bases" was "very unfortunate." She also "dismissed" comments by German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier, who "said this week Moscow should have been consulted more about the sites, given their proximity to Russia's borders." Separately in Brussels, Hadley "emphasised Washington's dismay" at a speech this month by Russian President Vladimir Putin during which he criticized the US's "unilateral" use of force. Hadley said US officials were "disappointed" by the Russian President's comments. He also noted that "a lot of Europeans were disappointed and dismayed. And one of the things that Europeans need to do is they need to make that clear to Russia and they need to make that clear to President Putin."

DOJ_NMG_0135416

The AP (2/22, McHugh) reports Rice told reporters in Berlin that the US has made clear to Russia that the system would be to counter any missile threat from Iran and would pose not threat to Russia. "Anyone who knows anything about this knows that there is no way that 10 interceptors...are a threat to Russia or that they are somehow going to diminish Russia's deterrent of thousands of warheads," Rice said.

In a more conciliatory tone, the New York Times (2/22, A6, Shanker, 1.16M) reports under the headline "US Tries To Ease Concerns In Russia On Antimissile Plan," that Bush administration officials tried Wednesday "to tamp down Russian concerns, voiced in strikingly harsh terms," over the plans. The Administration's concerned "about growing criticism of the program" has prompted officials to schedule a briefing by Lt. Gen. Henry A. Obering III, director of the Missile Defense Agency, on Thursday for foreign reporters based in Washington. Joining him will be Assistant Secretary of State Daniel Fried.

The Washington Times (2/22, Kralev, 88K) says the "war of words" between the US and Russia "escalated yesterday, with Western diplomats saying that Moscow's mistrust and suspicion of Washington -- and the West in general -- have changed little since the Cold War." Several senior US officials "said they have no idea where" the "belligerent outbursts" made by Gen. Nikolay Solovtsov Monday and by Putin "are coming from, given what they described as a businesslike and professional attitude the Russians have been displaying in private meetings."

Pyongyang To Reveal Details Of Uranium Enrichment Program. The Financial Times (2/22, Fifield) reports, "Suspicions over whether Pyongyang has been running a secret uranium enrichment program are back in the spotlight after last week's apparent breakthrough in the long-running North Korean nuclear crisis. Just as concerns about possible uranium enrichment triggered the current crisis, they are again threatening to undermine the agreement under which North Korea will receive step-by-step rewards in return for declaring and then disabling its nuclear weapons program." Former Defense Secretary William Perry, who traveled to North Korea Thursday, said the issue could be a '"deal breaker," and that "much more remains to be done. Two months from now, we will know whether we have a reasonable probability of completing the agreement."

Pyongyang Accuses US Of "Fabricating Lies" About Use Of Aid Money. The AP (2/22, Lederer) reports Pyongyang has accused the US "of fabricating lies that it was diverting U.N. aid money to develop nuclear weapons and said it would accept an outside audit of U.N. operations unless the aim was to politicize aid to the country," according to a letter circulated Wednesday. In the letter to Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon, North Korea's U.N. Ambassador Pak Gil Yon accused the United States of "hostile maneuvers" against his country" in seeking an audit of the alleged misuse of aid money" from the UNDP. Pak "also made clear that North Korea wants to continue cooperation with U.N. agencies," noting that Pyongyang has maintained "good relations and cooperation" with them for several decades.

US Seen As Turning To Diplomacy After Failure Of "Go-It-Alone" Approach. The Christian Science Monitor (2/22, LaFranchi, 59K) reports the Bush administration is now embracing "collective international action" following its "disenchantment with the results of its earlier go-it-alone approach." The shift "also suggests a growing sense within the White House that once-maligned multilateralism is getting results -- on issues ranging from Iran to North Korea." The Administration's "apparent conversion to multilateralism can also be seen in Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's efforts to revive the Middle East peace process."

Administration's Cuba Policy To Remain In Effect. McClatchy (2/22, Bachelet) reports, "Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez had some straight talk Wednesday for lawmakers and business groups pressing for a softer approach toward Cuba as the island prepares for a post-Fidel Castro era. The Bush administration won't waver from its tough stance toward Havana, he said." Gutierrez told a Council of the Americas event on Cuba that the "question is not when will the U.S. change its policy. The question is when will the Cuban regime change its policy." McClatchy adds, "Congress is expected to debate several bills that would relax travel and trade sanctions against Cuba."

DOJ_NMG_0135417

The Washington Times (2/22, Hirsch, 88K) reports Gutierrez "yesterday reiterated the Bush administration's steadfast belief in the U.S. embargo of Cuba, despite congressional moves to relax the policy. Cuban leader Fidel Castro's hospitalization last year and ceding of power to his brother, Raul, as well as the election of Democratic House and Senate majorities in Congress have helped fuel speculation that U.S. policies could be eased." The Times adds, "Legislation has been introduced in Congress to weaken the Cuba embargo," and Reps. Emerson and Flake, "two House members who are part of that effort," criticized the Administration's stance after Gutierrez's speech yesterday.

Cuba Poised For Offshore Drilling Near Florida. USA Today (2/22, 1B, Lynch, 2.27M) reports that soon "an oil rig will maneuver into position in waters less than 100 miles from the coast of Florida." But the "rig won't belong to an American company, and any petroleum it discovers won't do a thing to curb the USA's addiction to foreign oil. Instead, any new sub-sea gusher will belong to Cuba." The country "is poised for a significant expansion of its oil program into the waters that separate it from the United States. And thanks to U.S. law, Cuba's drilling partners will be working closer to Florida beaches than any American company ever could." The US Geological Survey "estimated Cuba can lay claim to 4.6 billion barrels of oil and 9.8 trillion cubic feet of natural gas. With oil prices hovering around $60 a barrel and global supplies persistently tight, any new supply source could benefit the USA. ... There's just one problem: politics."

US Urged To Reconsider Venezuela Ban On Jet Parts. The AP (2/22) reports Rep. Sheila Jackson Lee (D) called on the Bush administration Wednesday "to reconsider its ban on selling parts for US-made F-16 fighter jets to Venezuela, urging improved ties between the two nations." Jackson Lee told reporters that she was making the first US congressional visit to Venezuela since President Hugo Chavez's December re-election with the message of "an immediate repairing" of the relations between the US and Venezuela.

Death Squad Scandal Rocks Colombia. The Washington Post (2/22, A10, Forero, 690K) reports that "after disclosures that have astonished many Colombians," Col. Hernán Mejía, one of the nation's most decorated officers, "has been removed from his post, and the attorney general's office is investigating him for having worked with right-wing paramilitary groups to kill peasant farmers and guerrilla sympathizers." The allegations, announced by Defense Minister Juan Manuel Santos in January, "mark the first time the military has turned over one of its own to civilian prosecutors on suspicion of collaborating with the death squads." The case also comes as Columbia is "undergoing an imperfect but remarkable judicial process that has produced nearly daily disclosures of ties between death squad leaders and Colombia's political and military establishment."

China Launches Controversial Campaign To End Youth Internet Addiction. On its front page, the Washington Post (2/22, A1, Cha, 690K) reports, "Alarmed by a survey that found that nearly 14 percent of teens in China are vulnerable to becoming addicted to the Internet, the Chinese government has launched a nationwide campaign to stamp out what the Communist Youth League calls 'a grave social problem' that threatens the nation." The Chinese government in recent months "has joined South Korea, Thailand and Vietnam in taking measures to try to limit the time teens spend online," but "no country has gone quite as far as China." As part of the campaign, the government is "helping to fund eight in-patient rehabilitation clinics across the country" which use "a tough-love approach that includes counseling, military discipline, drugs, hypnosis and mild electric shocks."

Mandelson Says EU Farm Tariff Cuts Will Not Help Africa. In a letter to the editor of the Wall Street Journal (2/22, B6, 2.04M), EU Trade Commissioner Peter Mandelson writes, "Richard Holbrooke and Stuart Eizenstat ("Africa's Last Best Chance," Feb. 15) are absolutely right that Africa needs a successful conclusion to the Doha Round for a number of reasons, but steep EU farm tariff reductions cut both ways for developing countries depending on their level of competitiveness." EU farm tariff cuts, he argues, "will do little for most in the developing world for the simple reason that almost all their agricultural produce already enters the EU tariff free -- so tariff cuts won't help them." Instead, Mandelson says, "The real competitive gain for African farmers in the Doha Round will come from cutting trade-distorting farm subsidies and the elimination of export subsidies for farm goods -- both of which allow farmers in the rich world artificially to undercut farmers in developing countries."

DOJ_NMG_0135418

Canadian Ambassador Urges US To Proceed With Caution On Passport Rule. The Washington Times (2/22, Sands, 88K) reports Canadian Ambassador Michael Wilson said in an interview Wednesday that his country is "very concerned" about a planned US passport rule, and that it "must be implemented with 'clarity and flexibility' to avoid damaging the world's most dynamic bilateral trading relationship. … The State Department and the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) have until June 1, 2009, to implement tougher documentation rules for travelers crossing by land from Mexico and Canada. DHS officials are pressing for a quicker implementation schedule, citing the smooth adoption of similar rules for air travelers last month." However, Wilson said that the "huge surge" in passport applications that preceded the air travel change was likely to be far greater for the land crossing rule.

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"Law Would Bar Dumping Patients On The Street."
"The Conflict In Iraq: British Troop Drawdown."
"Virtual Loses Its Virtues."
"Arabs Say Israel Is Not Just For Jews."
"Gentle Jabs Turn To Punches For Clinton, Obama."
"The Trial Of The Sensory."

USA Today:
"Ex-Lawmakers Find Work With Lobbyists."
"Post-Katrina Baton Rouge Struggles With Its Identity."
"Older Seniors Return North."

New York Times:
"National Guard May Undertake Iraq Duty Early."
"Iraq Insurgents Employ Chlorine in Bomb Attacks."
"Korean Men Use Brokers to Find Brides in Vietnam."
"The Japanese Gyroball Mystery."
"In Both Parties, 2008 Politeness Falls To Infighting."
"Volunteer Group Lags In Replacing Gulf Houses."
"Settlement Lets Apple Use 'iPhone.'"

Washington Post:
"Blair Plans To Withdraw 1,600 Troops From Iraq."
"A Call To Confession, For It Is Fading."
"Va. House To Teens: 'Hang Up And Drive.'"
"In China, Stern Treatment For Young Internet 'Addicts.'"
"Clinton, Obama Camps' Feud Is Out In The Open."
"In Far North, Peril And Promise."

Washington Times:
"GOP 'Darlings' Slow To Sign Tax-Cut Pledge."
"Canada Cautions U.S. On Pending Passport Rule."
"Wages High In D.C., Counties."
"Rice Calls Iraq Coalition 'Intact.'"
"Senate Illegals Bill Near Complete."
"Hillary, Obama Producing Their Own Hollywood Drama."
"O'Malley Considers Extra Session To Sort Out Deficit."

Detroit Free Press:
"'I Am No. 1 Suspect.'"
"Mich. Teens To Get Six More Early Colleges."
"Farrakhan's Final Bow?"

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Would Feb. 5 Primary Put Georgia In Race?"
"Iran Ignores U.N. Nuclear Deadline."
"WWW.GAHOSPITALPRICECHECK.COM: Comparison Shop Hospitals With A Click."
"Delta Flies With Post-Takeover High."

Dallas Morning News:
"Priest Abuse Claims Led To Suspension."
"Parents Confront Deadly Heroin Mix."
"Senior Drivers May Face Vision Tests."
"Nuevo Laredo Handcuffed By Drug Trade."
"House Panel Fights HPV Vaccine Order.'
"Coal Hearings Delayed."

Houston Chronicle:
"Panel Votes To Block HPV Vaccine Requirement."
"Troops On Border Help Fuel Drop In Migrant Arrests."
"Biggio Hits Camp With Milestone On The Horizon."
"3-Point Barrage Carries Rockets Past Heat."
"Hellish 'Exoplanets' A Step Toward Earth-Like Find."
"Galveston Housing Costs Forcing Many From City."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Iraq-UK Troop Reduction; Iraq-Cheney Interview; Iraq-Violence Continues; Walter Reed Living Conditions; Clinton-Obama Campaign Accusations; Libby Trial Update;

DOJ_NMG_0135419

Tennessee Custody Battle; Miracle Baby Leaves Hospital; Dallas-Airplane Emergency Landing; Email Addicts.

CBS: Iraq-British Troops; Southern Iraq; Iraq Analysis; Iraq-Helicopter Shot Down; Iran-Nuclear Program; Healthcare Costs; ADHD Drugs; Elder Care; Libby Trial; Clinton-Obama Clash; Ballroom Dancing.

NBC: Iraq-UK Withdrawal; White House Response To UK Withdrawal; Iraq Violence Continues; Walter Reed Living Conditions; HPV Vaccination Debate; Vaccination Analysis; Economic Update; Thatcher Statue; Aging Parents; Internet-Buying Medication; Miracle Baby Leaves Hospital; New Orleans Firefighters.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:

CBS: University Of Illinois' Mascot Retired; Britain-Prince Harry Expected To Be Sent To Iraq; Iranian Nuclear Program-UN Deadline; Libby Trial; FL-Premature Baby; IKEA Bags-Conservation Efforts; Medical Marijuana Lawsuit Against Federal Government.

NPR: International Atomic Energy Agency-Iranian Nuclear Program; Rice-Iranian Nuclear Program; Java-Fire On Indonesian Ferry; Cisco, Apple-iPhone Trademark Agreement; Whole Foods To Purchase Wild Oats Market; Tokyo Stock Exchange; Consumer Price Index Up In January; British Minister For Africa-Sudan Sanctions.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Tours Novozymes North America plant, Franklinton, NC; participates in a panel discussion on cellulosic ethanol, Novozymes North America, Inc., Franklinton, NC.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

LAURA BUSH — Tours Katrina Cottages, Cusato Cottages, Ocean Springs, Miss.; attends luncheon, McElroy's on the Bayou Restaurant, Ocean Springs, Miss.; visits D'Iberville Elementary School, D'Iberville, Miss.

US Senate: No Scheduled Events.

US House: No Scheduled Events.

Other: US-INDIA _ Meeting of the US-India High Technology Cooperation Group. Highlights: 12:15 p.m. Commerce Secretary Gutierrez. Location: 1615 H St. NW.

BOSNIA-HERCEGOVINA _ 8:45 a.m. - 4 p.m. The Center for Strategic and International Studies and the Dayton Peace Accords Project host a conference, ``Bosnia-Hercegovina At An International Crossroads. Highlights: 1 p.m. Luncheon session, with Jozo Krizanovic, member of the BiH Parliament; Damir Arnaut, legal advisor to Haris Silajdzic, member of BiH Presidency; Nerkez Arifhodzic, foreign policy advisor to Zeljko Komsic, member of BiH Presidency; Igor Radojicic, Chairman of the National Assembly of Republika Srpska. Location: B-1 conference level, 1800 K St. NW.

PROSPERITY _ 8:15 a.m. - 12:30 p.m. The Economic Policy Institute holds a forum, ``Work that Works: An Agenda for Shared Prosperity," discussing proposals for removing obstacles that increasingly disconnect working Americans from the rewards of their work. Location: Room 345, Cannon.

CYBER SECURITY _ 8:30 a.m. Assistant Homeland Security Secretary Greg Garcia speaks at the Maryland Cyber Security Forum. Location: 3501 University Blvd. East, Adelphi.

FINANCIAL EDUCATION _ 9 a.m. Treasurer Anna Escobedo Cabral, Assistant Treasury Secretary Emil Henry, Jr., and Deputy Assistant Treasury Secretary Dan Iannicola, Jr. speaks at the Summit on K-Postsecondary Financial Education. Location: Cash Room, main Treasury.

HEALTH INSURANCE _ 9 a.m. The Federation of American Hospitals holds a briefing to release a new proposal to provide health coverage to all Americans, and a new survey of voter attitudes on health insurance coverage. Location: National Press Club.

PENTAGON-IRAQ BRIEFING _ 9 a.m. Army Lt. Gen. Ray Odierno, commander of the Multinational Corps-Iraq, will brief live from Iraq to provide an update on ongoing security operations in Iraq. Location: DOD Briefing Studio, Pentagon 2E579.

US-JAPAN _ 9 a.m. The Carnegie Endowment for International Peace holds a seminar, ``A Closer Japan-US Economic Relationship, with panels on ``The Strategic Context in Asia" at 9 a.m. and ``the Japan US-Economic Relationship" at 10:30 a.m. Location: 1779 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

VIETNAM MEMORIAL _ 9:30 a.m. Three veterans organizations hold a news conference to urge their members to come to Washington to protect the Vietnam War Memorial from harm during the March 17 anti-war rally. Location: National Press Club.

ICE CENTER _ 10 a.m. The National Ice Center, a partnership between NOAA, the Navy and the Coast Guard, marks its 30th anniversary. Location: NOAA Satellite Operations Facility, 4231 Suitland Rd., Suitland.

DOJ_NMG_0135420

IRAN _ 10:30 a.m. The Council on Foreign Relations holds an on-the-record telephone briefing on ``Iran: Time for Detente," with author Ray Takeyh. Contacts: Kate Zimmerman, 212-751-3375/

MEDICARE _ 10:30 a.m. Karen Ignagni, President of America's Health Insurance Plans, holds a telephone briefing on low-income and minority beneficiaries in MA plans. Contacts: Mohit Ghose, 202-778-8494. Notes: Callin number: 866-837-9787.

SIX PARTY TALKS _ 10:30 a.m. The Brookings Institution, Asia Society and the Korea Economic Institute hold a discussion with Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill on the Six Party Talks. Location: Falk Auditorium, 1775 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

OFF LABEL USES _ 9 p.m. The Washington Legal Foundation holds a briefing on legal and regulatory challenges to the sharing of information on ``off-label" uses of prescription drugs and devices. Location: 2009 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

OVERSIGHT VS. PRIVILEGE _ 12 p.m. The Federalist Society holds a panel discussion on congressional oversight vs. executive privilege with attorneys Chris Bartolomucci and Douglas Cox, former Interim Solicitor General Walter Dellinger, Louis Fisher of the Library of Congress, others. Location: National Press Club.

WAR POWERS _ 12 p.m. American University Washington College of Law holds a discussion on congressional authority to check presidentail war powers in Iraq, with former Associate Deputy Attorney General Patrick Philbin and former Justice Department Office of Legal Counsel advisor Martin Lederman. Location: 4801 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

SOMALIA _ 12:30 p.m. The Council on Foreign Relations holds an on-the-record meeting with Vicki Huddleston, former Charge d'Affairs in Ethiopia, and Terrence Lyons of George Mason University, others, discussing Somalia. Location: 1779 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

WALTER REED _ 12:30 p.m. Walter Reed Army Medical Center holds a media tour through various living quarters for outpatients, followed by a news conference. Location: Building 18, Mologne House, at Walter Reed.

CHILDREN'S HEALTH COVERAGE _ 1 p.m. The Center on Budget and Policy Priorities holds a conference call briefing to discuss the federal funding shortfalls states face in the State Children's Health Insurance Program and the possible consequences for children's health coverage. Contacts: Michelle Bazie, 202-408-1080.

INNOVATION _ 2 p.m. Commerce Secretary Gutierrez convenes the first meeting of his Measuring Innovation in the 21st Century Economy Advisory Committee. Location: Wyndham Hotel, 1400 M St. NW.

TAIWAN _ 2 p.m. The Center for Northeast Asian Policy Studies and the Formosan Association for Public Affairs hosts a discussion with leading experts to examine the importance of the ``228 Incident" in 1947 to the understanding of present-day Taiwan, and the process of reconciliation on the island. Location: Falk Auditorium, 1775 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

IRAQ-VIETNAM _ 6 p.m. George Washington University sponsors a discussion with professor Shawn McHale on the untold story of the Vietnamese guerrillas told from their perspective and the implications for Iraq. Location: Room 602, 1957 E St. NW.

Copyright 2007 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 22, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Chicago-Area Cousins Arrested In Alleged Toledo Terror Conspiracy ... 3
Supporters Ask Gonzales To Release Al-Arian ... 3
Judge Denies Bail For US Citizen Accused Of Aiding Al Qaeda In Somalia ... 3
Spanish Judge's Claims Said To Raise Questions About Wider 9/11 Plotting ... 4
WSJournal, NYTimes Differ On Court Ruling On Tribunals ... 4
WPost Calls For US To Drop "Los Angeles Eight" Case ... 4

Homeland Response:

Gonzales Says Supermax Prison Is Safe, With Room For Improvement ... 5
Habitat For Humanity Facing Criticism Over Pace Of Gulf Coast Homebuilding Effort ... 7

War News:

British Withdrawal From Iraq Seen As Blow To Bush Policies ... 7
Cheney Criticizes Democratic Efforts To Stop Iraq Troop Surge ... 9
Iraqi Insurgents Detonate Second Chemical Dirty Bomb ... 10
General Says Sadr "Clearly Not In Iraq." ... 10
Pentagon To Send National Guard Troops Back To Iraq Early ... 10
US Military To Investigate Controversial Iraq Rape Claim ... 11
Italian Prime Minister Resigns After Losing Afghanistan Vote ... 11
LATimes Says Afghanistan Should Reject War Crimes Amnesty 12

DOJ:

DOJ Probing Home Purchase By Former Attorney, Lobbyist ... 12
Columnist Criticizes DOJ Official Over Alleged Conflict ... 12

Corporate Scandals:

Judge Reverses Conviction Of Former NYSE Trading Specialist 13
US Will Not Try To Reinstate Former Westar Officials' Fraud Convictions ... 13
Veritas Software To Pay $30 Million In AOL Case ... 13
WSJournal Praises Fannie Mae For Withholding Bonuses ... 14

Criminal Law:

Libby Trial Jury Begins Deliberations ... 14
Former Florida Federal Prison Guard Sentenced In Sex Scandal 15
Former Civilian DOD Employee Pleads Guilty To Taking Bribes 15
1980 Corruption Case Said To Offer Insights On Fumo Defense 15
Suspected Software Pirate Arraigned On Federal Charges ... 16
Railroad Police Hunt Scoff-Law Snowmobilers ... 16
Prosecutors Pursuing Indictments In Nevada Health Care Fraud Probe ... 16
Massachusetts Financial Adviser Charged With Bilking Seniors 16
Michigan Man Sentenced To Nine Years In Prison For Child Porn ... 17
TJX Says Customer Data Breach Began In 2005 ... 17
California Sex Harassment Trial Goes To Jury ... 17
Maryand Governor Urges Lawmakers To Repeal Death Penalty 17

Civil Law:

SCOTUS Rules Concealment Of Assets Can Take Away Bankruptcy Right ... 18
Louisiana Hospital Settles Healthcare Fraud Charges With DOJ 18
Administration Stance Said To Have Edge In SCOTUS Faith-Based Case ... 18
LATimes Offers Qualified Praise For SCOTUS Tobacco Ruling 18

Civil Rights:

Initiative Will Strengthen Federal Enforcement Of Religious Freedom Rights ... 19
Ohio Man Sentenced To 27 Months In Prison For Racial Intimidation ... 19
Rhode Island AG Says State Should Recognize Massachusetts' Gay Marriages ... 19
Supreme Court Sidesteps "War On Christmas" Case ... 19
Novak Decries Elimination Of U Of Illinois Symbol ... 19

Antitrust:

EMI Seeks Suitors After Warner Bid ... 20
EU Fines Elevator Makers For Price-Fixing ... 20
US Revokes Genetech Patent ... 21
EU OKs Lukoil Purchase Of ConocoPhillips Stations ... 21
EU Gives Antitrust Nod To Japan Tobacco's Bid For Gallaher ... 22
Union Questions Steel Mill Sale Order ... 22
House Judiciary Committee Plans Hearing With Sirius Executive 22
Verizon, Vonage Patent Dispute Heads To Trial ... 23
Apple, Cisco Settle Differences Over iPhone Name ... 23
Justices Consider Patent Case ... 24

Environment:

Nine States Sue US Over Mercury Emissions ... 24
Study Says Southwest Droughts, Water Shortages Likely To Worsen ... 24

Scientists Fear Release Of Carbon From Northern Forests Could Set Off Vicious Cycle ... 24

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Group Sues US Over Medical Marijuana Policy ... 25
NBC Highlights Illegal Internet Drug Sales ... 26
Authorities Say Colombian Woman Is Highest Ranking FARC Member Convicted In US ... 26

Immigration:

Kennedy Set To Introduce Immigration Reform Bill ... 26
Immigration Raids Raise Concerns Among Advocate Groups ... 27

Tax:

Brother Of Alleged Chicago Mobster Gets Probation For Tax Fraud ... 27

Congress-Administration:

Bush Promotes Healthcare Plans In Visit To Tennessee ... 27
Army Rushes To Correct Poor Living Conditions At Walter Reed Hospital ... 29
AARP Backs Effort To Reform Social Security ... 29
Female Members Criticize Baca's Leadership Of Hispanic Caucus ... 30
Snow, Correspondents Meet For Friendly National Press Club Forum ... 30
District Of Columbia House Vote Bill "Cruising Along." ... 30
Cheney Says McCain Wrong On Rumsfeld ... 30
Davis Measure Would Extend Health Care Premium Savings Benefit To Retirees ... 31

Other News:

Inflation Gauge Rose More Than Expected In January ... 31
McCain Criticizes Bush On Global Warming, Iraq ... 32
McCain, Giuliani Yet To Sign Tax Cut Pledge ... 32
GOP Candidates Advised To Seek The "Big Mo." ... 32
Clinton, Obama Camps Trade Jabs Over Geffen Comments ... 32
Lobbying "Revolving Door" For Former Lawmakers Remains Open ... 34
Rubin's Prescriptions For Fairer Trade Critiqued ... 34
NYTimes Says Weakness In Mortgage Market A Reason For Tax Hikes ... 35
WPost Criticizes Virginia Legislature's Handling Of Transportation Funding ... 35
Rice Renews Offer For Talks With Iran ... 35
Differences Emerge Between US, EU Over New Palestinian Government ... 36
Israeli Arabs Reject Notion Of Jewish State ... 36
Rice Responds To Russian Campaign Against US Missile Plan 37
Pyongyang To Reveal Details Of Uranium Enrichment Program 37
US Seen As Turning To Diplomacy After Failure Of "Go-It-Alone" Approach ... 37
Administration's Cuba Policy To Remain In Effect ... 38
US Urged To Reconsider Venezuela Ban On Jet Parts ... 38
Death Squad Scandal Rocks Colombia ... 38
China Launches Controversial Campaign To End Youth Internet Addiction ... 38
Mandelson Says EU Farm Tariff Cuts Will Not Help Africa ... 38
Canadian Ambassador Urges US To Proceed With Caution On Passport Rule ... 39

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages ... 39

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington ... 40

Online Version

Visit www.bulletinnews.com/justice for searchable archive, interactive story index, and links to complete stories where appropriate.

DOJ_NMG_0135423

TERRORISM NEWS:

Chicago-Area Cousins Arrested In Alleged Toledo Terror Conspiracy. The AP (2/22, Robinson) reports, "Two Chicago-area cousins were arrested Wednesday on federal charges out of Cleveland accusing them of conspiring to wage holy war against Americans overseas, including U.S. military forces in Iraq." Zubair A. Ahmed and Khaleel Ahmed "were accused along with three other men from the Toledo, Ohio, area who already had been under indictment on charges of plotting acts of terrorism against Americans overseas. The fresh indictment returned by a grand jury in Cleveland added the two Chicago-area men to the roster of defendants and brought additional charges against the three men from Ohio."

The Chicago Tribune (2/22, Coen, Maxwell, 617K) notes that Toledo-area suspects "Mohammad Zaki Amawi, Marwan Othman El-Hindi and Wassim Mazloum have pleaded not guilty and are expected to go on trial in Cleveland in the spring. … El-Hindi allegedly took the cousins from Chicago to Cleveland in 2004 to meet a man described in the document as 'the Trainer,' a man with military experience who was associated with the group." US Attorney Bill Edwards "said the men discussed sniper tactics and were willing to travel to carry out terror plots."

The New York Times (2/22, Sander, 1.16M) reports, "Wednesday's indictment included new charges against" Amawi and Hindi "involving further counts of distributing information regarding the manufacture and use of explosives. In addition, a second new indictment charged Mr. Hindi and Ashraf Zaim, 39, of Ottawa Hills, another town in the Toledo area, with defrauding the government by claiming to have used $40,000 in federal grant money for charitable purposes when in fact, the government said, it actually went to their personal use. And yet another indictment charged Bilal Mazloum, 22, of Sylvania with making false statements to federal agents by denying knowledge that his brother Wassim had participated in firearms training."

Supporters Ask Gonzales To Release Al-Arian. The AP (2/22, Barakat) reports, "Supporters of former professor Sami al-Arian - now in the fifth week of a prison hunger strike as he refuses to testify in front of a federal grand jury - on Wednesday called on Attorney General Alberto Gonzales to deport al-Arian prior to his scheduled release from prison." The AP continues, "Al-Arian, a former computer science professor at the University of South Florida, was accused by prosecutors of being a leader of a terrorist group called Palestinian Islamic Jihad. He is being held at a medical prison in North Carolina. … After a six-month trial ended in an acquittal on some counts and a hung jury on others, al-Arian struck a plea bargain in May 2006 and admitted to conspiring to aid Palestinian Islamic Jihad, specifically by helping a family member with links to the group obtain immigration benefits and by lying to a reporter about another individual's ties to the group." The AP adds, "Al-Arian would be up for release in April, but his prison term is being extended indefinitely after a judge found him in civil contempt for refusing to testify in front of a grand jury in Alexandria, Va., investigating a cluster of Islamic charities in northern Virginia that has ties to al-Arian. … Al-Arian believes his plea deal specifically exempted him from cooperating with authorities. But two federal judges have ruled that al-Arian must testify. … Al-Arian's lawyer, Peter Erlinder, said it is only fair that Gonzales release al-Arian now because prosecutors initially recommended to the judge that al-Arian receive time served when he struck the May 2006 plea deal. A judge rejected that recommendation and sentenced al-Arian to an additional 11 months. … 'Mr. Gonzales, you have the power ... to release Dr. al-Arian for voluntary departure from the U.S. with the stroke of your pen,' Erlinder said in an open letter to Gonzales. … Justice Department spokesman Dean Boyd said the attorney general does not have the power to unilaterally free al-Arian. Deportations are handled by the Department of Homeland Security rather than the Justice Department."

Judge Denies Bail For US Citizen Accused Of Aiding Al Qaeda In Somalia. The AP (2/22, Lozano) reports, "A U.S. citizen accused of receiving training from al-Qaeda in his efforts to help overthrow the Somali government will remain behind bars until his trial, a federal judge ruled Wednesday. Daniel Joseph Maldonado was ordered held without bond. U.S. Magistrate Judge Calvin Botley also found federal authorities were justified in arresting Maldonado on charges related to his alleged training at an al-Qaeda camp in Somalia." The AP notes, "During a two-day probable cause and detention hearing, FBI agents and prosecutors painted a portrait of a violent young man who willingly trained alongside al-Qaeda operatives to learn firearms and bombmaking skills. … Botley said while the evidence showed Maldonado received weapons and bomb making training, it wasn't clear if al-Qaeda was in charge of the camp."

The New York Times (2/22, Blumenthal, 1.16M) adds that "Botley granted a defense request that Mr. Maldonado, 28, gaunt from malaria and malnutrition, be given extra rations in jail." The Times notes, "At a two-day detention hearing that was unusual for the explicitness of the evidence disclosed, Mr. Maldonado was said to have given the F.B.I.

DOJ_NMG_0135424

false information, then admitted that he 'wrote or told many dishonest statements' and revised his account while still falling short of the truth, an F.B.I. agent testified." Special Agent Lucille Eglen-Anderson "and other agents testified that Mr. Maldonado was at a terrorist training camp run by Al Qaeda, where he was learning to shoot an AK-47 and make bombs."

Spanish Judge's Claims Said To Raise Questions About Wider 9/11 Plotting. In a Wall Street Journal (2/22, 2.04M) op-ed, author Edward Jay Epstein writes that Spanish anti-terror Judge Baltazar Garzon claims a Spanish terror cell provided regular and extensive support to the 9/11 plotters, contradicting the accounts obtained by the CIA from Khalid Sheikh Mohammed and Ramzi Binalshibh. Epstein adds that "if Mr. Garzon is correct about the Spanish connection to 9/11, it is not only the effectiveness of the CIA's interrogation of its al Qaeda prisoners that is called into question. The information from Binalshibh, KSM and other detainees was used to fill in the missing pieces of the jigsaw, and those gaps concerned the contacts the 9/11 conspirators might have had with others wishing to harm America. By saying that no one else was involved -- not in Spain, Iran, Hezbollah, Malaysia, Iraq, the Czech Republic or Pakistan -- these detainees allowed the 9/11 Commission to complete its picture of al Qaeda as a solitary entity."

WSJournal, NYTimes Differ On Court Ruling On Tribunals. Two major newspapers take strikingly different positions on Tuesday's appeals court decision upholding the Military Commissions Act. The Wall Street Journal (2/22, A14, 2.04M) says the decision "is a welcome victory for common sense in the war on terror. Now we'll find out if the Supreme Court meant what it said last year about deferring to the two elected branches on the handling of enemy combatants. We never had a problem with the Bush Administration's plan to set up military commissions shortly after 9/11. It is the duty of the executive branch -- which can act with dispatch and be held accountable by voters -- to conduct wars. And military tribunals have been successfully employed by past Presidents, including Washington, Lincoln and FDR. … Critics in Congress of tribunals as Senate Judiciary Chairman Pat Leahy have every right to try to rewrite the Military Commissions Act, if they have the political nerve. But we're also sure that prosecuting a war on terror would be significantly more difficult as a result."

But the New York Times (2/22, A22, 1.16M) calls it "another low moment for American justice" that "relied on a shameful law that President Bush stampeded through Congress last fall that gives dangerously short shrift to the Constitution. The right of prisoners to challenge their confinement -- habeas corpus -- is enshrined in the Constitution and is central to American liberty. Congress and the Supreme Court should act quickly and forcefully to undo the grievous damage that last fall's law -- and this week's ruling -- have done to this basic freedom." The "frightening" Military Commissions Act "raises insurmountable obstacles for prisoners to challenge their detentions. And it gives the government the power to take away habeas rights from any noncitizen living in the United States who is unfortunate enough to be labeled an enemy combatant."

Ex-CIA General Counsel Calls For Reforms. In a Washington Post (2/22, A19, 690K) op-ed, Jeffrey Smith, former CIA general counsel and now a partner at a law firm that "provides Kuwaiti counsel for the families of the Kuwaiti detainees at Guantanamo," writes that last November, "voters rejected the president's swaggering, go-it-alone approach and the administration's contemptuous attitude toward the Geneva Conventions, which led to the abuses at Abu Ghraib, actions that so damaged our credibility that other nations are much less willing to cooperate in the war on terrorism. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, and her able legal adviser, John Bellinger, have pushed for reforms that have begun to reverse this trend -- but much more must be done." Last week, Sens. Christopher Dodd and Patrick Leahy introduced legislation "that will move us further in the right direction. But there are three things Congress should do. First, Congress should reconsider the detainee legislation passed last fall. Last-minute changes rammed through by the White House watered down many of the bill's key provisions. … Second, Congress should repeal the provisions that stripped detainees at Guantanamo Bay and elsewhere of the right of habeas corpus and that instead gave them an extremely limited right to challenge their detentions. … Third, Congress should also examine the practice of 'rendition,' or sending detainees to countries for trial or detention where, it is alleged, they can be mistreated or tortured."

WPost Calls For US To Drop "Los Angeles Eight" Case. The Washington Post (2/22, 690K) editorializes that the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine "is a loathsome group that has carried out terrorist activities. It was an important and legitimate policy change, after the Sept. 11 attacks, to tighten the law to make raising money here for terrorist groups a crime. But that law was not in place when" so-called "Los Angeles Eight" members Khader Hamide and Michel Shehadeh "were allegedly involved with the PFLP; they say they were never members but only distributed its magazine. At this point, if not from the outset, the pursuit of two law-abiding, middle-aged men with roots and families in this country is misplaced and even self-defeating on the part of the government." US District Judge

DOJ_NMG_0135425

Bruce Einhorn has ruled against the deportation proceedings against the men, and the "government has until the end of the month to appeal the judge's ruling. It should, instead, drop this case, as it should have done years ago."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Gonzales Says Supermax Prison Is Safe, With Room For Improvement. The AP (2/22, Squires) reports from Florence, CO, "Attorney General Alberto Gonzales toured a federal prison holding some of the nation's most violent and disruptive inmates on Wednesday and said the facility is secure, but he conceded that it could be improved. … 'Are there challenges? Yes,' said Gonzales, the nation's top law enforcement official. 'Can we do better? Yes.'" The AP continues, "Gonzales agreed to visit the prison, known as Supermax, after Colorado's two senators raised concerns about staffing and security. … He stopped short of promising to increase the number of guards or build an additional fence around the compound, as some state and local officials have advocated. Instead, he said he was willing to listen. … 'The question is reaching a general consensus on what is needed,' Gonzales said. 'There may be additional staffing that we can provide to the facilities here.'" The AP adds, "Supermax, 90 miles southwest of Denver, houses 474 of the nation's most notorious convicts, including Olympic bomber Eric Rudolph and Sept. 11 conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui. … Security at the 490-bed prison, built in 1994 for $60 million, has been under scrutiny for months. Last year, an arbitrator found that staffing levels had made the facility more dangerous, with some shifts going unfilled. In September, a Justice Department report criticized the prison for not properly screening mail. … The Justice Department says that all mail and phone calls to and from inmates labeled as terrorists have been monitored since October, and that perimeter security has been beefed up."

The Denver Post (2/22, Finley) reports, "A battle over how to run the nation's booming federal prison system intensified Wednesday as U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, guard-union leaders and lawmakers toured the ultra- high-security Supermax facility and held an unofficial summit." The Post continues, "Gonzales emerged two hours later and pronounced Supermax up to par, lauding recent efforts to make sure mail and phone calls from terrorist prisoners are monitored. … 'I'm comfortable with where we are at today on this issue,' he said after a Supermax tour that was off-limits to reporters. … But guard-union leaders bristled, warning that thin staffing has put prisons on the brink of disastrous riots as the nation's federal inmate population approaches 200,000." The Post adds, "Supermax union president Barbara Batulis, who accompanied Gonzales, said terrorists housed there still are able to communicate with followers in Spain and Iraq. … Union leaders have begun mobilizing a lobbying blitz to demand $500 million from Congress to hire more guards nationwide, said John Gage, president of the American Federation of Government Employees. … New surveillance technology at Supermax and other prisons ignores the core issue of inadequate staffing, Gage said. 'Those cameras will not replace correctional officers. And electric fences? We're not talking about escapes here. We're talking about safety within the walls,' he said." The Post notes, "U.S. Sen. Ken Salazar, who accompanied Gonzales along with U.S. Sen. Wayne Allard, also raised questions. … Federal prison chiefs 'have to do more. They have to recognize ... we need to have much more linguistic capability in Arabic' in order to understand and assess terrorist-prisoner communications, said Salazar, D-Colo. … Allard, R-Colo., praised Gonzales for being 'willing to sit down and listen' in what he and Salazar cast as a continuing dialogue about prison conditions."

The Pueblo (CO) Chieftain (2/22, Harmon) reports, "Gonzales toured the prison with U.S. Sens. Ken Salazar, D-Colo., and Wayne Allard, R-Colo., as well as Federal Bureau of Prisons chief Harley Lappin and U.S. Rep. Doug Lamborn, R-Colo. Gonzales is the second of the nation's chief law enforcement officers to visit the prison - former U.S. Attorney Janet Reno helped dedicate Supermax in January 1995. … 'I heard from Senators Salazar and Allard their concerns about the facility here in Florence and what we could do,' Gonzales said. 'We had good discussions with staff today and are committed to a safe facility here and at facilities throughout the nation.' … 'I want to ensure we are doing everything we can for the wonderful people who work here and the safety of the community,' Gonzales said." The Chieftain adds, "Salazar said since he and Allard took separate tours of Supermax late last year that additional staff have been added, technology has been improved and in lieu of perimeter fencing being added, a control tower has been enhanced to provide a 360 degree view of the complex and an armored vehicle has been added to patrols. … Since the Inspector General's office issued a report last year detailing relaxed inmate phone and mail monitoring, the Bureau of Prisons has monitored 100 percent of the general mail being sent to or from inmates designated as terrorist inmates since October of last year. Mail is not delivered to or sent from terrorist inmates until after it is read and translated if necessary. … Lappin said the bureau has added additional translator analysts. As a result, 100 percent of phone calls for terrorist inmates are monitored; however, because language translators may not always be available, the prison records the conversations for later translation."

The Rocky Mountain (CO) News (2/22, Foster) reports, "All the mail and telephone calls of terrorists housed at Supermax, the nation's highest-security prison, are being monitored under new tighter security procedures, U.S.

DOJ_NMG_0135426

Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said Wednesday after touring the prison. … Less certain are other security improvements sought by the prison's staff and the townspeople of Florence, including more corrections officers and a perimeter fence around the four-prison federal complex that includes Supermax." The News continues, "Supermax's 475 inmates are considered the most dangerous in the country's federal prison system and include a roster of international and domestic terrorists: Sept. 11 conspirator Zacarias Moussaoui, 1993 World Trade Center bomber Ramzi Yousef, shoe bomber Richard Reid, Unabomber Ted Kaczynski, and Olympic and abortion clinic bomber Eric Rudolph. … Security troubles cast the prison into the national spotlight last fall after a Justice Department inspector general's report found that a shortage of Arabic translators prevented the screening of dozens of letters from convicted terrorists to Islamic extremists between 2002 and 2004." The News adds, "That problem has been solved, said Gonzales, who toured the prison with Colorado's two U.S. senators, Wayne Allard and Ken Salazar, and Rep. Doug Lamborn, whose congressional district includes the prison. … 'I am confident that we're doing what we should be doing monitoring communications in and out of the facility,' Gonzales said."

The Colorado Springs (CO) Gazette (2/22, Rappold) reports, "Gonzales didn't pledge to hire more staff or build a perimeter fence — two of the concerns that have been voiced by local officials and the union representing Supermax employees — but said such measures are still options. … 'There has been additional staffing. We've got additional technology in place,' Gonzales said during a news conference after touring the prison. 'We've provided additional tools to deal with the concern about perimeter fencing.'" The Gazette adds, "Gonzales said a perimeter fence, estimated to cost $20 million, is still on the table, though it doesn't appear necessary. … 'The question is, is that a wise use of taxpayer dollars going forward?' Gonzales said. 'That's something the senators and I will be engaging in a dialogue about. … I am committed to ensuring that we have safe and secure facilities, not just here but throughout all of our federal facilities,' he said."

KXTU-TV, Fox 21, Colorado Springs/Pueblo (2/22, Salvo) reports, "US Attorney General Alberto Gonzales toured the Supermax Prison in Florence Wednesday along with Senators Ken Salazar and Wayne Allard to see what steps have been taken to improve the safety and security of the facility." KXTU-TV continues, "The prison has been criticized by state and federal officials because of staffing levels inadequate monitoring and security measures. Supermax houses some of the most harden criminals including both foreign and domestic terrorists, which is what raised so many eyebrows when a report came out last year faulting the facility for among other things not reading all incoming and outgoing mail from the highest-risk prisoners and not monitoring telephone calls. … 'I am confident were doing what should be doing to monitor communication both in and out of these faculties,' said Attorney General Gonzales." KXTU-TV adds, "Big words following big steps that have been taken in the last few months to address security and safety issues in what should be the nation's most secure penitentiary. … 'The issue of additional staffing: there are now some additional correctional officers that have been added to this facility,' said Sen. Salazar. … Presently the Department of Justice reports 92% of authorized positions are filled putting the inmate-to-staff ratio at 1.5:1, the lowest of its kind in comparison. … But is that enough for a prison housing some of the world's most dangerous criminals? … 'I think we have additional funding and one of the things we will look at is should there be additional staffing,' said the Attorney General."

KRDO-TV, ABC 13, Colorado Springs (2/22, Wurtz) reports, "It houses some of the most dangerous criminals in the world, but is Colorado's Supermax Prison secure? The nation's top law enforcement official toured the complex Wednesday. After his tour, US Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said he's confident in the security of the prison complex and is satisfied that steps have already been taken to address safety concerns. But he and Colorado's lawmakers agree: work at Supermax is not done. 'We all care, in a very united way, that we have safe and secure facilities,' says Sen. Ken Salazar, (D) Colorado, 'there are issues that have been raised and we have addressed some of those.'" KRDO-TV adds, "Addressing concerns by adding some staff and security cameras. … The complex has also employed translators and increased the monitoring of inmate mail and phone calls. 'Whether or not they have any terrorist connections, whether or not they've been ordered to subject to any administrative restrictions, will dictate the level of monitoring that does occur,' says Gonzales, 'but we've had some good discussions about that and I'm confident we're doing what we should be doing.' One item still unresolved--the question of whether the complex needs more perimeter fencing. 'We now have armed mobile patrols, we now have a tower that provides additional surveillance,' Gonzales says of increased perimeter security, 'so the question is whether or not [perimeter fencing] is a wise use of taxpayers' money going forward.'" KRDO-TV notes, "Lawmakers and law enforcement will continue to discuss that issue and any future changes may be needed at Supermax. … Gonzales says the tour was a step forward in what he calls an ongoing process. 'We're always evaluating what we do; not just in this area, but everything we do in fighting crime and fighting terrorism,' says Gonzales."

Unions Say BOP Playing Shell Game With Supermax Staffers. The Pueblo (CO) Chieftain (2/22, Harmon) reports, "Union officials on Wednesday accused the Federal Bureau of Prisons of taking correctional staff intended for other prisons to help staff the Supermax penitentiary." The Chieftain continues, "The Supermax, which is referred to by prison officials as the Administrative Maximum Security U.S. Penitentiary, houses the nation's most dangerous inmates, including convicted terrorists. … 'We got our 18 (additional officers), but they are taking staff from other institutions and funneling them to ours,' said Barb Batulis, American Federation of Government Employees Local 1302 president for the Supermax. 'It is like robbing Peter to pay Paul and they are trying to put it back on me because I told them they had to do something about the staffing.'" The Chieftain continues, "Union officials suspect that the 18 new officers put on staff at Supermax actually were supposed to go to work at the lower security Federal Correctional Complex prisons in Florence. The complex houses four prisons - Supermax, the high-security United States Penitentiary, the medium-security Federal Correctional Institution and a low-security camp. … 'Even with the additional staff, we are still below "mission critical" levels of at least 20 correctional officers,' Batulis said. 'And we haven't gotten any additional (Arabic) translators. We still have just three and that is not a lot to monitor all the calls and mail for the (terrorist) inmates.'" The Chieftain adds, "Holly Pruyne, who is the Local 1300 president representing the medium security and camp prisons, said five correctional officers intended for the Federal Correctional Institution were reassigned to Supermax. … 'The FCI has a maximum rated capacity of 794 inmates. We are at 1,174 inmates now and are going up to 1,300. We have 79 percent of the staff we need for the basic mission critical status,' Pruyne said. … Union officials said on Jan. 3 and Jan. 9, when disturbances were occurring at the high-security penitentiary, staff from both Supermax and the FCI responded to help. With a total of 42 staffers responding, the incidents left the FCI with few officers and inmates who were not on lock-down status. … John Gage, president of the American Federation of Government Employees national union of Washington, D.C., was among high-ranking union officials in town Wednesday to bring a voice to the short staffing problem, which he said exists across the nation."

Habitat For Humanity Facing Criticism Over Pace Of Gulf Coast Homebuilding Effort. The New York Times (2/22, Eaton, Strom, 1.16M) reports from Bay St. Louis, Mississippi, that despite having secured 50,000 volunteers, $127 million and backing from the likes of "President Bush and the New Orleans jazz luminaries Harry Connick Jr. and Branford Marsalis," Habitat for Humanity says that since Katrina "it has built just 10 houses for poor hurricane victims here, 36 in New Orleans, and a total of 416 along the entire coast, from Alabama to Texas. More are under construction, for a total of 702." The "slower pace" – Habitat "built or repaired 8,500 houses in Indonesia, Thailand, India and Sri Lanka" following the 2004 tsunami – "reflects, in part, the more complex houses that Habitat builds in the United States, as well as the mind-numbing issues — involving insurance costs and government regulations — that seem to have bogged down efforts to rebuild after Hurricanes Katrina and Rita. But Habitat International is starting to face criticism that its procedures are slow, rigid and perhaps unsuited to helping disaster victims, however rewarding its efforts are for its volunteers."

Baton Rouge Adjusting To Post-Katrina Surge In Population. In a front page article, USA Today (2/22, 1A, Johnson, 2.27M) reports from Baton Rouge, a city of 250,000 that became "an overwhelmed mass of about 500,000" in the wake of Hurricane Katrina. Many evacuees were just passing through, but city officials say that today, Baton Rouge's population remains 275,000-325,000. From the Los Angeles-style gridlock on Interstate 10 to the overcrowded schools and the escalating real estate prices that have fueled a housing crunch, Baton Rouge has the look and feel of a place grappling for control of its direction. And although the influx of new residents hasn't dramatically increased crime rates, many residents sense that Baton Rouge has lost some of the small-city civility it enjoyed during what they call 'Pre-K' — before Katrina."

WAR NEWS:

British Withdrawal From Iraq Seen As Blow To Bush Policies. Tony Blair's announcement that some of the British troops in Iraq will go back to the UK at the end of the summer is being portrayed as a setback for the Bush Administration. The Los Angeles Times, in a report typical of the tenor of much of the coverage, reports the British move "was widely seen Wednesday as a telling admission that the British military can no longer sustain simultaneous wars in Afghanistan and Iraq. The British military is approaching 'operational failure,' former Defense Staff chief Lord Charles Guthrie warned this week." The decision "to draw down forces by more than 20 percent in the southern city of Basra means that Britain will significantly shrink its military footprint at a time when the Pentagon is increasing U.S. forces to battle militants to the north, in Baghdad and Anbar province." The Bush Administration "hastened to present the British decision as an indication that the U.S.-led military operation was succeeding. … But the Pentagon, in its most recent quarterly report to Congress, listed Basra as one of five cities outside Baghdad where violence remained 'significant,' and said the region is one of only two that are 'not ready for transition' to Iraqi authorities."

DOJ_NMG_0135428

NBC Nightly News (2/21, story 2, 1:50, Gregory, 9.87M) also reported Administration "officials scrambled today to put the best face on the British withdrawal. In Berlin, Secretary of State Rice denied that the so-called 'coalition of the willing' in Iraq is falling apart. The Vice President, in Japan, insisted it is good news." Cheney was shown saying, "I look at it and what I see is an affirmation of the fact that parts of Iraq where things are going pretty well." But "the good spin," added NBC, "masks a darker reality. Just as the US is putting more troops into Iraq to secure Baghdad, America's staunchest ally in the war is beginning to pull up stakes."

The Washington Post (2/22, A12, Weisman, Baker, 690K) says today that "for an already besieged White House, the decision was doing a good job masquerading as a bad-news story. … To many back in Washington, though, what resonated was that Bush's main partner in Iraq is starting to get out just as the president is sending in more U.S. troops."

On the CBS Evening News (2/21, story 3, 1:20, 7.66M), Bob Schieffer said, "I think what we're seeing her…is what happened back during the Vietnam era: When things were going badly and the crusty old Senator from Vermont George Akins said, 'There's only one way out here, that's to declare victory and just leave.' That's what we're seeing." Blair's move "is going to make the President even more isolated than perhaps he is now. The Democrats have already pounced on this. They say it shows that the President's idea of putting more troops in is not the solution and that there is not a military solution, there has to be a diplomatic solution. Whether you're for the war or against the war, Katie, what this underlines tonight is that the coalition that the President put together to fight this war is now coming apart."

USA Today (2/22, Stinson, 2.27M) reports "presidential spokesman Tony Snow, on a trip with Bush to Tennessee, said Britain's decision was not made on a timeline of the sort the president has rejected for American troops. 'What you had is progress first, and then the removal,' Snow said. 'The president's made clear all along, we want to move as rapidly as we can to build capability on the part of the Iraqis so they can in fact assume, first, primary responsibility and then eventually sole responsibility,' he said." Pentagon spokesman Bryan Whitman "said there was no thought that the British were abandoning the United States."

Democrats pounced on the British move as a sign that Bush's plan to increase the US troop level in Iraq by 21,500 was the wrong strategy. The Financial Times (2/22, Blitz, Dombey, Sevastopulo) notes "prominent Democrats in Congress said the move was a sign that Britain was now giving up on the US in Iraq and contrasted it with the surge in US troop numbers deployed to contain the violence in Baghdad. … Edward Kennedy, a senior Democratic senator, said the British redeployment was a 'stunning rejection' of the president's decision to increase US troop numbers around Baghdad by 21,500. 'No matter how the White House tries to spin it, the British government has decided to split with President Bush and begin to move their troops out of Iraq,' Mr Kennedy said." Anthony Cordesman, a Middle East expert at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, "said the UK move 'weakens the image of the coalition and further isolates the US.'" The Washington Times (2/22, Behn, 88K) also quotes Cordesman saying "the British had long ago lost the political fight and ceded Basra and Maysan to Shi'ite Islamist factions. 'The British were not defeated in a military sense, but lost in the political sense if "victory" means securing the southeast for the central government and some form of national unity.'"

The Hill (2/22, Marre) notes "congressional Democrats…said Wednesday that the White House should take a cue from its closest ally and get U.S. soldiers out of Iraq instead of sending in more. 'Why are thousands of additional American troops being sent to Iraq at the same time that British troops are planning to leave?' asked House Speaker Nancy Pelosi." The Washington Times (2/22, Dinan, Ward, 88K) runs a similar story under the headline "Democrats Hail British Pullout," in which it says Democrats "cheered the news." Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid said, "The British government has acknowledged a reality that President Bush still stubbornly refuses to accept."

And in an editorial headlined "Britain Cuts Its Losses," the New York Times (2/22, 1.16M) writes, "Spin it any way you like, Prime Minister Tony Blair's announcement that Britain will be withdrawing up to 1,600 of its 7,100 remaining troops in Iraq can't be welcome military or political news for…Bush."

Blair's announcement led all three network newscasts, with ABC World News (2/21, lead story, 2:50, Gibson, 8.78M) reporting, "For years, the Bush Administration has called it the 'coalition of the willing.' Well, tonight, it appears as if some of the nations in that coalition are no longer as willing. That includes America's chief ally, Great Britain." ABC (Scuitto) added, "Politically, Mr. Blair had little choice. Public opposition to the war is strong. Six in ten here favor a quick withdrawal. And 72% say the war is unwinnable. Blair also faced enormous pressure from his own party to begin the pullout before he steps down as Prime Minister this year to avoid leaving his successor with a damaging political burden." The CBS Evening News (2/21, lead story, 2:50, Couric, 7.66M) noted "the shrinking US-led coalition in Iraq," and added "Denmark, a much smaller ally, announced today it will withdraw its entire contingent of just over 400. So the coalition, which at its peak included the United States and 38 other nations, is down to the US and 21 other nations." In addition, says the AP (2/22), "Lithuania is 'seriously considering' withdrawing its 53 troops from Iraq, a government spokeswoman said Wednesday." Defense Ministry spokeswoman Ruta Apeitkyte told the AP that "the Baltic country was considering not replacing the contingent when its mission ends in August."

DOJ_NMG_0135429

NBC Nightly News (2/21, lead story, 2:45, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "There are 7,100 British troops in Iraq. The first 1,600 will leave over the next few months." Blair was shown saying, "There is no Sunni insurgency. There is no Al Qaeda base." Blair was "in Parliament today making a case for a British troop draw down in southern Iraq. A few months ago, the British handed over partial control of Basra, the biggest city in the south and since then it has remained relatively calm. … Bottom-line, the British have done what they can, Blair's plan now, withdraw a quarter of British troops by summer, all could be out by the end of next year."

The Washington Post (2/22, A1, Jordan, Partlow, 690K) reports, "Blair's plans allow him in the final months of his administration to show a measure of independence from Washington on Iraq policy. Battered in public opinion polls because of his support of the war, Blair has said he will step down by September."

Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, chief spokesman of the multinational forces in Iraq, said on CNN's The Situation Room (2/21, Blitzer), "The British forces, just like us, have been thoroughly committed from the beginning. They're steadfast partners, been working hard, and as they have looked at their mission down there in Basra, and they see they can draw the force levels down by about 1,500 over this year, it makes logical sense to do that. … It makes sense for the British forces, at this point in time, to draw down their force levels here as they continue to commit themselves both here and in Afghanistan, supporting the efforts of both places."

British Pullout Could Empower Iran. The CBS Evening News (2/21, story 2, 1:55, Logan, 7.66M) reported, "The withdrawal comes as no surprise to US commanders here, one of whom told me the British haven't been in control of the south for some time. However, there is concern that this will give neighboring Iran free reign to continue its support of these powerful militias." USA Today (2/22, 4A, Jervis, 2.27M) runs a similar report under the headline "Iran, Militias Could Gain From British Pullout."

The New York Times (2/22, Cowell, 1.16M) reports that a "senior Defense Department official said that, if security conditions deteriorated in the south, American commanders might need to send in their own forces to help remaining British units and Iraqi troops. He noted that the United States also usually keeps reserve forces nearby in Kuwait that could be sent into Iraq as well. 'If something flares, we will react to it with the forces on the ground,' the official said."

In a similar report, the Christian Science Monitor (2/22, Rice-Oxley, Murphy, 59K) reports, "Blair's move isn't likely to help the Bush administration."

More Commentary. Bartle Brese Bull, the international editor of Prospect magazine, writes in an New York Times op-ed (2/22) titled "The End Of The Alliance," that "Blair's decision may have as much to do with strategic good sense as it does with domestic politics. The truth is that the British gave up trying to win their war in southern Iraq a long time ago, and they probably accomplished as much as they could. … The priority now is to give Iraqis the best possible conditions to achieve the best feasible Iraq: one that stays whole; suffers less internal violence than it has historically; is not a threat to its neighbors or the rest of us; and that through a few good internal examples and a modicum of representative government has hope and mechanisms for improving itself. This is an approach that will have to be adapted to suit each region. And in southern Iraq, it seems clear, it is time for the Iraqis to succeed or fail on their own."

Cheney Criticizes Democratic Efforts To Stop Iraq Troop Surge. The AP (2/21, Hunt) reports Vice President Cheney "harshly criticized Democrats' attempts to thwart President Bush's troop buildup in Iraq, saying their approach would 'validate the al-Qaida strategy.' House Speaker Nancy Pelosi fired back that Cheney was questioning critics' patriotism." Pelosi said, "I hope the President will repudiate and distance himself from the Vice President's remarks." Pelosi said she "tried to complain about Cheney to President Bush but could not reach him." The AP says Cheney, in Tokyo, "used an interview to criticize Pelosi and Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., over their plan to place restrictions on Bush's request for an additional $93 billion for the Iraq war to make it difficult or impossible to send 21,500 extra troops to Iraq."

During that ABC World News (2/21, story 2, 2:30, 8.78M) interview, Jonathan Karl asked Cheney, "You just made a very clear statement in your speech, saying the American people do not support a policy of retreat. … Is that policy that we hear from the Speaker of the House, Nancy Pelosi, from other Democrats, u that a policy of defeat?" Cheney: "Yes. … I think the American people want to see, first and foremost, success in Iraq. I think to do what Nancy Pelosi is suggesting -- and she made it very clear on many occasions, that she, in fact, wants to get out -- that that's exactly the wrong medicine. It's the wrong course of action. It will do nothing but encourage the terrorists, and it will have a devastating long-term consequences in the global war on terror." The Hill (2/22, Good) reports Cheney also said he "does not think Democratic congressional leaders will be able to stop President Bush from sending additional troops to Iraq. … Cheney said: 'I don't think so. The question is whether or not they have the votes.'"

GOP Lawmakers Defend Bush Strategy. Sen. Jon Kyl, just back from a one-day trip to Iraq, said on CNN's The Situation Room (2/21, Blitzer), "I can tell you that both among all of our military commanders [and] officials from the Iraqi leadership, all had what I would characterize as cautious optimism about the new strategy that's beginning to unfold. We already have one of the five new brigades in Iraq, the second is just about ready to go in, just in a matter of days, the third is being prepared. And the Iraqis are doing things a lot differently than they had done before, with the result that the Iraqis have said that there is a totally different view on the part of the people on the street about the potential for success here."

DOJ_NMG_0135430

House Minority Whip Roy Blunt said on Fox News' Your World (2/21, Cavuto), "I think what's confused here with some of my friends in the Congress is that they have misinterpreted dissatisfaction with what's been going on in Iraq to a belief that people are willing to lose that war. … Iraq is one very complicated piece of an even more complicated world where we have lots of enemies. Those enemies are ready for us to show weakness. Anytime we do this, it just helps them recruit, fund, find suicide bombers, whatever they're looking for at that moment, any weakness in the United States."

George Will writes in the Washington Post (2/22, 690K), "Indiscriminate criticism of…Bush is an infectious disease. Some conservatives seem to have caught it, but congressional Democrats might be crippled by it." Democrats "lack the will to exercise their clearly constitutional power to defund the war. And they lack the power to achieve that end by usurping the commander in chief's powers to conduct a war. They can spend this year fecklessly and cynically enacting restrictions that do not restrict. Or they can legislate decisive failure of the Iraq operation -- withdrawal -- thereby acquiring conspicuous complicity in a defeat that might be inevitable anyway. A Hobson's choice? No, Nancy Pelosi's and Harry Reid's."

Cheney To Face "Public Anger" In Australia. The Christian Science Monitor (2/22, Squires, 59K) says Cheney, "perhaps the most powerful vice president in United States history, arrives in Sydney Thursday for a four-day visit" to Australia, making him "the most senior American visitor to Australia since President Bush addressed the joint houses of Parliament in Canberra in 2003. But despite Australia's status as a steadfast US ally and broad public support for the country's troop deployment in Afghanistan, Cheney will encounter public anger over Australia's participation in the Iraq war and growing disquiet over the fate of the country's lone Guantánamo Bay detainee, David Hicks." Cheney's visit "comes at an awkward time for Prime Minister John Howard, who has been in power for more than a decade but this week slumped to his lowest opinion-poll rating in six years."

Iraqi Insurgents Detonate Second Chemical Dirty Bomb. ABC World News (2/21, story 3, :40, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Insurgents in Iraq are stepping up their use of a new and deadly weapon, chemical dirty bombs. A truck bomb, today, in Baghdad, combined explosives with chlorine gas. The chlorine burns and can kill when it explodes. It was the second such blast in as many days." NBC Nightly News (2/21, story 3, :40, Williams, 9.87M) noted two people were killed in yesterday's bombing.

The New York Times (2/22, Cave, Fadam, 1.16M) reports, "Iraqi and American officials said the use of chlorine seemed aimed at bringing a new level of fear and havoc to Iraq as a new security plan for Baghdad takes shape." Lt. Col. Christopher Garver, an American military spokesman, "said the attacks highlighted the fluidity of insurgent tactics in Iraq, dominated by militant groups that often notice and repeat attacks that attract the most attention and cause the most suffering."

The Los Angeles Times (2/22, Daragahi, 850K) reports, "The use of chlorine gas weapons in warfare dates to at least World War I, when Germans used them in April 1915 to dislodge French soldiers from trenches. The weapons caused far more injuries than deaths, though small airborne concentrations of the gas can kill within minutes." Also yesterday, "several roadside bomb attacks in southern Baghdad killed at least three Iraqis and injured two." Violence also "erupted in the country's predominantly Shiite south, where US and British-led forces have begun handing control to Iraqi authorities." The Washington Post (2/22, A12, Londono, 690K) also reports the story.

Another US Helicopter Shot Down. The CBS Evening News (2/21, story 4, :25, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "A US military Blackhawk helicopter was shot down north of Baghdad today. None of the nine people on board was seriously injured. At least eight American helicopters have crashed or been forced down by hostile fire in the past month." The Washington Times/AP (2/22, Salaheddin) reports "all aboard were safely evacuated by a second helicopter."

The AP (2/22, Murphy) reports, "Military officials worry extremists may have recently gained more access to firepower such as shoulder-fired anti-aircraft rockets and heavy machine guns -- and more expertise to use them. The Black Hawk would be at least the eighth U.S. helicopter to crash or be taken down by hostile fire in the past month."

General Says Sadr "Clearly Not In Iraq." Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, chief spokesman of the multinational forces in Iraq, said on CNN's The Situation Room (2/21, Blitzer) that Muqtada al-Sadr is "clearly not in Iraq and has not been for some time. And all indications are is that he is currently located in Iran."

Pentagon To Send National Guard Troops Back To Iraq Early. The New York Times (2/22, Cloud, 1.16M) reports on its front page that the Defense Department "is planning to send more than 14,000 National Guard troops back to Iraq next year, shortening their time between deployments to meet the demands of President Bush's buildup." National Guard officials "told state commanders in Arkansas, Indiana, Oklahoma and Ohio last month that while a final decision had not been made, units from their states that had done previous tours in Iraq and Afghanistan could be designated to return to Iraq next year between January and June," according to Pentagon officials.

DOJ_NMG_0135431

Commanders Seek Equipment, Reconstruction Funding. The Politico (2/21, Lowe) reports military commanders, "in a move sure to provide ammunition to congressional critics of the Iraq war," have given Congress "a long list of equipment and reconstruction needs totaling nearly $36 billion, denied earlier by the administration in its $481 billion defense appropriations request for the new fiscal year. The lists come as Democratic leaders, who control both the House and the Senate, consider a new legislative strategy to restrict President Bush's ability to prosecute the war and, eventually, force a U.S. withdrawal."

ROTC's Shift Away From Cities Hurts Efforts To Build Multiethnic Military. In a 2,200-word front-page feature, the Wall Street Journal (2/22, Jaffe, 2.04M) writes about the move of Reserve Officer Training Corps programs away from big cities, which is having a negative impact as the Army struggles "to build an officer corps that takes full advantage of America's multiethnic society." The Journal says that an officer's background "didn't matter so much when the U.S. was focused on fighting big armies in large conventional battles. These days, though, U.S. success in places like Iraq and Afghanistan hinges on the ability of Army officers to win the trust of a suspicious and often culturally alien population. … There are only about 1,500 Muslims in a force of about 500,000 soldiers," and "Arabic speakers are in critically short supply throughout the force."

US Military To Investigate Controversial Iraq Rape Claim. USA Today (2/22, 4A, Dorell, 2.27M) reports, "The U.S. military said Wednesday that it will launch its own investigation into an alleged rape that has created a furor among Iraq's Sunnis and bitterly split the country's government." Gen. David Petraeus "ordered an investigation into allegations by a 20-year-old Sunni woman who said she was raped last week by members of Iraq's Shiite-dominated police force." Earlier this week, Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki "cleared the three police officers…following an investigation that lasted less than a day. He announced an unspecified reward for the officers and said the rape charge was fabricated to discredit the U.S. and Iraqi security crackdown in Baghdad." Yesterday, Maliki "fired a leading Sunni official who had called for an international investigation."

The New York Times (2/22, A10, Santora, 1.16M) says it is "unclear if Mr. Maliki had the authority to fire the Sunni official, Sheik Ahmad Abdul Ghafur al-Samaraei, who runs the Sunni Endowment, an organization that cares for Sunni mosques and shrines in Iraq." Samaraei "said he was not surprised" to be dismissed. Samaraei said, "Maliki is fed up with me talking about all the terrible things that are happening to Iraqis, whether it is killing, kidnappings or illegal arrests."

The Christian Science Monitor (2/22, Peterson, 59K) says that "even before the details of the case could be determined, Iraqis heard competing claims by the alleged Sunni victim broadcast on TV and a Shiite premier who says the charges have been fabricated to undermine the US-Iraqi security plan in Baghdad." Maliki "states that medical tests show the woman 'had not been subjected to any sexual attack,' and that there are three outstanding arrest warrants against her." But the woman's claims "and Maliki's handling of the case are sparking outrage among Sunnis."

Italian Prime Minister Resigns After Losing Afghanistan Vote. The Financial Times (2/22, Barber) reports, "Romano Prodi resigned as prime minister of Italy on Wednesday night after a parliamentary defeat on foreign policy. His decision raised fears that Italy was returning to the days of short-lived governments and paralysis in policymaking. Mr Prodi, 67, handed in his resignation to Giorgio Napolitano, Italy's head of state, who planned to start talks on Thursday to see who, if anyone, has enough support to form a new government." Prodi's "nine-party, centre-left coalition took office in May, a month after he defeated Silvio Berlusconi, the former centre-right premier, in the closest election in modern Italian history." The Times adds, "The sudden crisis that overwhelmed Mr Prodi centred on his inability to persuade communists and other radical leftists in his coalition to support two cornerstones of Italian foreign and security policy. These were Mr Prodi's determination to keep Italian troops side by side with Nato forces in Afghanistan and his decision to permit the expansion of a US military base in the north-eastern city of Vicenza."

USA Today (2/22, 4A, For, 2.27M) reports, "Italy's 1,800 troops in Afghanistan are part of the NATO peacekeeping force there. Many members of the broad center-left Prodi coalition are pacifists who oppose sending Italian troops abroad." The constitution "did not require Prodi to step down, but Foreign Minister Massimo D'Alema -- a two-time prime minister and a potential candidate to succeed Prodi -- said before the vote that the government should step down if it failed to win enough support in the Senate."

The Los Angeles Times (2/22, Wilkinson, 850K) says "Prodi will continue as a caretaker prime minister until a new government takes power." The New York Times (2/22, Fisher, 1.16M), Wall Street Journal (2/22, A6, Kahn, Leo, 2.04M), Washington Times (2/22, Phillips, 88K) and Washington Post (2/22, A16, Delaney, 690K) also report the story.

DOJ_NMG_0135432

LATimes Says Afghanistan Should Reject War Crimes Amnesty. The Los Angeles Times (2/22, 850K) editorializes, "How does a government prosecute people for crimes against humanity when the suspects happen to be running the government? That's the question facing Afghanistan, where men suspected of horrifying acts of rape and murder sit in parliament and hold other high offices. … The ideal solution for Afghanistan would be to create a body similar to South Africa's Truth and Reconciliation Commission. … Yet South Africa, unlike Afghanistan, didn't have to contend with entrenched politicians who control large swaths of territory with armed militias. It also had the capacity to prosecute those who refused to step forward, while Afghan courts are a work in progress." President Hamid Karzai's "best course would be to reject" a pending war crimes amnesty law "until the country is ready to face the horrors of its recent past. The international community, especially NATO, should be doing more to help Afghanistan build the institutions and civil society necessary for it to do so."

DOJ:

DOJ Probing Home Purchase By Former Attorney, Lobbyist. The AP (2/22, Heilprin) reports, "House Speaker Nancy Pelosi called for tighter ethics rules in federal agencies Wednesday after government officials approved the purchase of a $980,000 vacation home by a top Justice Department lawyer with an oil company lobbyist." The AP continues, "Pelosi's criticism followed an Associated Press report last week that department ethics officials did not object when Sue Ellen Wooldridge, then head of the environment division, was buying a South Carolina beach house with Donald R. Duncan, the top Washington lobbyist for ConocoPhillips. … 'If in fact Ms. Wooldridge got such a pass from the ethics committee of the executive branch, then certainly the executive branch ethics process needs a look as well,' Pelosi, D-Calif., said when asked about the house purchase at a San Francisco news conference." The AP adds, "Nine months after the purchase, Wooldridge approved an agreement that allowed ConocoPhillips an extension of pollution cleanup requirements at some of the company's refineries. The company says Duncan was not part of those negotiations. … Department officials and a lawyer for Wooldridge, who resigned from the job in January, said the department's ethics office approved the arrangement and told her she did not need to withdraw from dealings with ConocoPhillips. … The third buyer of the Kiawah Island, S.C., home was Wooldridge's companion, former Deputy Interior Secretary J. Steven Griles. He is the highest-ranking Bush administration official facing possible criminal charges in the Jack Abramoff corruption probe." The AP notes, "The Justice Department's Office of Professional Responsibility is looking into the home purchase and consent decrees, Acting Assistant Attorney General Richard Hertling said in a letter Friday to Rep. John Conyers, D-Mich., chairman of the House Judiciary Committee."

Columnist Criticizes DOJ Official Over Alleged Conflict. In a column for the Chicago Tribune (2/21), John Kass writes, "Seeking to overturn former Gov. George Ryan's corruption convictions, lawyer Gene Schaerr on Tuesday told a federal appellate court panel that 'a pink rhinoceros' hung over the trial, making a fair jury verdict impossible, perhaps because the lone pro-Ryan holdout juror was bounced for failing to disclose her criminal record. … I thought that was why there were alternate jurors--if one or two are excused for cause, you've got a few on the B Team. … But the pink rhinoceros bit is so nice, I'll steal it and remind you of another pink rhinoceros." Kass continues, "Ed McNally is the pink rhinoceros of the U.S. Department of Justice. … He continues to work in the criminal division--though he had a whopping conflict of interest in the Ryan case--even as the Bush Department of Justice fires other prosecutors who actually hunt down political corruption. … 'I'm aware of the allegations [against McNally],' Atty. Gen. Alberto Gonzales told me when he appeared before the Tribune's editorial board a while ago. … 'They're very serious allegations,' Gonzales said. 'And the matter is being reviewed internally. I can say that.' … That was six months ago, on Aug. 14, 2006." Kass adds, "Recently, seven U.S. attorneys of other districts were forced to resign, even though most received positive Justice Department job evaluations prior to their dismissals. Included among those let go are Carol Lam, the U.S. attorney in San Diego who successfully prosecuted the phenomenally corrupt and vulgar Republican U.S. Rep. Randy 'Duke' Cunningham. … So they're gone. And Republican McNally is still very much employed." Kass concludes, "In the seven months since Gonzales said the allegations against McNally were serious, consider: … Chicago U.S. Atty. Patrick Fitzgerald--no friend of the bi-partisan political combine of insiders who run things in this state--got stuck spending his time on the Scooter Libby-CIA leak case in Washington, rather than spending it hunting Republican and Democratic public corruption in Illinois. … Sun-Times columnist Mark Brown revealed in a fine column that Rodger Heaton, the new U.S. attorney for the Central District of Illinois, had dinner in Springfield with two of the combine's cleanup hitters: Republicans Big Bill Cellini and Big Bob Kjellander, who haven't been indicted but are listed as Individual A and Individual K in the state pension fund scandal case. … That's just what a pink rhinoceros would do--publicly feed with Cellini and Kjellander, tell a few jokes and everybody in town gets the message. … And for all the bleating and wailing you'll hear and read by Ryan mouthpieces about justice and fairness, remember the one they won't mention, the pink rhinoceros named Ed McNally."

DOJ_NMG_0135433

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Judge Reverses Conviction Of Former NYSE Trading Specialist. The New York Law Journal (2/22, Bar) reports, "In a blow to the office of Southern District of New York U.S. Attorney Michael J. Garcia, a federal judge has taken the rare step of reversing a jury verdict convicting a former New York Stock Exchange trading specialist of securities fraud in a scheme known as 'interpositioning.'" The Journal continues, "Southern District Judge Denny Chin, in United States v. Finnerty, 05 cr. 393, agreed Wednesday to enter a judgment of acquittal, setting aside the Oct. 26, 2006, verdict. … Chin held that while federal prosecutors proved that defendant David Finnerty engaged in interpositioning, they failed to prove fraudulent or deceptive conduct within the meaning of the securities laws. … 'I hold that the government did not ... establish that Finnerty's customers were misled or defrauded or otherwise deceived,' he said in a 37-page opinion." The Journal adds, "In describing interpositioning, the judge said that instead of matching pending buy and sell orders, the specialists repeatedly trade for their company's proprietary account, making a profit from the slight differences in pricing. … Southern District prosecutors have had a difficult time proving criminal charges against Finnerty and 14 other floor specialist traders whom they accused of using their inside positions to earn an estimated $20 million illegally for themselves and their companies." The Journal notes, "Before Wednesday's ruling, the U.S. Attorney's Office for the Southern District had already dropped charges against seven of the defendants. Besides Finnerty, two former traders (Michael Stern and Michael Hayward of Van der Moolen Specialists USA) were convicted, two were acquitted and two pleaded guilty. One defendant remains at large. (NYLJ, Aug. 10, 2006) … 'he government [in these cases] provided no real evidence that customers were deceived,'said Jacob Zamansky, a plaintiffs attorney at Zamansky & Associates who specializes in securities litigation but did not represent any of the defendants in the interpositioning cases. 'his almost looks like a victimless crime.' … Assistant U.S. Attorneys Lauren Goldberg and Anirudh Bansal prosecuted the case. A spokesperson for the U.S. Attorney's Office declined to comment."

The New York Post (2/22, Boyd) reports, "A federal judge yesterday took the very rare step of throwing out a jury's conviction of former New York Stock Exchange specialist David Finnerty, citing a lack of evidence to support a guilty finding." The Post continues, "The ruling is a stinging rebuke for prosecutors, who have had little success in winning convictions in their high-profile and wide-ranging campaign against corrupt trading practices at the Big Board." The Post adds, "The April 2005 indictments filed against 15 specialists shook up Wall Street. … However, the pursuant collapse of many of the cases that prosecutors filed has stunned the legal world. … The Southern District's prosecutors, who generally achieve conviction rates of between 80 and 90 percent, managed to win just two partial convictions and two plea deals. … The partial convictions - of two partners at Van Der Moolen Specialists USA - are currently on appeal." The Post notes, "A spokeswoman for the Southern District of New York said, 'We are reviewing the opinion and considering our options.'" The AP (2/22) also reported on the ruling.

US Will Not Try To Reinstate Former Westar Officials' Fraud Convictions. Bloomberg (2/22) reports, "The government will not try to reinstate the fraud convictions of two former Westar Energy executives, prosecutors said yesterday." Bloomberg continues, "The United States attorney's office in Topeka, Kan., said it would not ask an appeals court in Denver to reconsider its decision in January to reverse the convictions of the executives, David C. Wittig and Douglas T. Lake. The appeals court said that evidence at the trial did not justify the guilty verdicts." Bloomberg adds, "Mr. Wittig, the former chief executive, and Mr. Lake, a former vice president, were accused of looting Westar, a public utility based in Topeka. They were convicted in 2005 of money laundering and wire fraud. … 'We had until Feb. 20 to notify the 10th Circuit whether we wanted to ask for a rehearing,' a government spokesman, Jim Cross, said, referring to the federal appeals court in Denver. 'We have allowed that deadline to pass.'" Bloomberg notes, "The court said prosecutors could not retry the wire fraud and money laundering counts, but could retry some lesser claims. Mr. Cross said that prosecutors had not decided on a retrial. … The remaining charges 'have to do with personal use of a corporate plane,' said Mr. Wittig's lawyer, Steven Alan Reiss, of Weil, Gotshal & Manges in New York."

Veritas Software To Pay $30 Million In AOL Case. The Washington Post (2/22, D4, Johnson) reports, "Veritas Software agreed to pay $30 million to resolve civil fraud charges connected to an improper advertising deal it signed with AOL during the Internet boom's waning days." The Post continues, "A Securities and Exchange Commission complaint accused Veritas and AOL of Dulles of simultaneously wiring payments to each other as part of an improper, unwritten "round-trip" agreement. Both companies used the deal to inflate revenue, the complaint said. For Veritas, the transaction added 2 cents per share to its fourth-quarter and annual earnings in 2000, allowing it to beat Wall Street expectations." The Post adds, "Court papers filed in the District late Tuesday also accused Veritas of engaging in a series of accounting maneuvers to smooth its financial results into 'museum quality' reports from 2000 through 2002. Among other things, the company used 'wish lists' prepared by employees in its finance and operations unit to build cushions of expenses to make its earnings appear steadier. … Veritas, which was acquired nearly two years ago by Symantec and is a wholly owned subsidiary, neither admitted nor denied the allegations. It has restated its financials twice: once to reverse $20 million it had booked as part of the AOL deal and again to correct problems with its profit-smoothing practices. … In a statement, a spokeswoman for Symantec said the company had set aside the settlement funds in reserve. The spokeswoman also pointed out that Symantec, one of the nation's largest providers of data security software, is not named in the complaint. … The case is a leftover from an era when technology companies struggled to meet the expectations of analysts and investors. AOL, which was then known as America Online and has since been absorbed by Time Warner, paid more than $500 million two years ago to settle related charges about its financial dealings."

DOJ_NMG_0135434

WSJournal Praises Fannie Mae For Withholding Bonuses. The Wall Street Journal (2/22, 2.04M) says in an editorial, "At a truly private company, withholding more than $40 million in bonuses tied to fraudulent earnings would be a no-brainer. But Fannie Mae is neither a normal business nor exactly private, even if its shares are in private hands. So this week's announcement that current and former top executives at the mortgage giant wouldn't be receiving $44.4 million in Fannie Mae shares has to count as progress." The "optimistic view of yesterday's news is that Fannie, chastened by the accounting fraud and a newly invigorated regulator under Ofheo Director James Lockhart is beginning to act more like an ordinary company and less like the local bully in Washington."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Libby Trial Jury Begins Deliberations. ABC World News (2/21, story 6, :20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The trial of a former top White House adviser went to the jury today. Lewis 'Scooter' Libby is accused of obstructing the investigation into who leaked the identity of a CIA agent during the run-up to the war in Iraq. Libby was Vice President Cheney's chief of staff at the time." The CBS Evening News (2/21, story 9, :15, Couric, 7.66M) also noted, "Vice President Cheney's former chief of staff is charged with perjury and obstruction of justice in the CIA leak case."

The AP (2/22, Sniffen) reports, "After 4 1/2 hours of deliberation, the jurors went home until Thursday. The jurors include a former Washington Post reporter, an MIT-trained economist, a retired math teacher, a former museum curator, a law firm accountant, a Web architect and several retired or current federal workers. There are 10 whites and two blacks -- unexpected in a city where blacks outnumber whites more than 2-to-1." The Washington Post (2/22, A4, Goldstein, Leonnig, 690K) notes that "the presiding judge urged jurors to rely on their 'life experiences' in deciding whether the vice president's former chief of staff lied to investigators -- or made an honest mistake -- about his role in a CIA leak. U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton's instructions to the jury of eight women and four men reinforced the issue of the fallibility of human memory that has been central to one of Washington's most celebrated trials in years."

The AP (2/22, Sniffen) reports that the jury received "more than an hour of instructions Wednesday from U.S. District Judge Reggie Walton before beginning their discussions. … Walton explained to the jurors that they must weigh the truth of several statements by Libby in the various counts." The AP continues, "On the obstruction count, Walton said they could find Libby guilty should they unanimously decide any one, or more, of three Libby statements were lies: that Russert asked Libby if Plame worked at CIA and said all the reporters knew it; that Libby was surprised to learn the Plame information from Russert; or that Libby told Cooper he had heard it from reporters but did not know it was true. … On one count of lying to the FBI, jurors could find Libby guilty if they found either or both of his statements about the Russert call were lies, Walton explained. The other count of lying to the FBI hinges on Libby's statement about the Cooper call. … On two counts of perjury, jurors would have to weigh various Libby statements to the grand jury about how he learned about Plame's job and whom he told, including four separate statements in one count, Walton said."

In addition to reporting on the start of jury deliberations, the AP and newspaper stories recount the arguments made by both sides at trial – and note, as the WPost reports, "Evidence and 14 days of testimony have shown that Cheney, Libby and other top administration officials sought to discredit Wilson." Under the headline "Libby Perjury Hearing Casts Cloud Over Cheney," the Financial Times (2/22, Daniels) reports, "Even if Mr Libby is convicted, questions will remain about Mr Cheney's role in directing his aide to rebut Mr Wilson, and his intervention to force" former White House spokesman Ari Fleischer "to make a public statement exonerating Mr Libby. But an acquittal would also carry risks for Mr Fitz-gerald. It could lead to criticism that he prosecuted what turned out to be a trivial case. It could also underline that he failed to prosecute anyone for the initial crime he was appointed to investigate: who it was who leaked the name of Ms Plame." The New York Times (2/22, 1.16M) and USA

DOJ_NMG_0135435

Today (2/22, Willing, 2.27M) also report on yesterday's proceedings.

Trial Fuels Debate Over Alleged Political Use Of Intelligence. Under the headline "Politics Meets Intelligence At Trial," the Wall Street Journal (2/22, A8, Perez, Solomon, 2.04M) reports that the Libby "case has added fuel to calls for a broader examination of how intelligence was used in political arguments in the past six years. Moreover, some current and former administration officials say, the trial's airing of the use of intelligence -- especially over the Iraq war -- threatens to further undermine confidence in American claims on other sensitive matters. That could be a particular problem in the U.S. campaign to convince the world to curb Iran's nuclear program." The Journal adds that "the trial has provided congressional intelligence officials with extensive information on how the vice president's office functioned semi-autonomously in pushing foreign-policy initiatives. These officials said the information could prove helpful in continuing investigations into how public statements made by the president and vice president differed from the underlying intelligence provided by the CIA and other intelligence agencies."

Henninger Blames DOJ For "Travesty" Of Libby Prosecution. In a Wall Street Journal (2/22, 2.04M) column, deputy editor Daniel Henninger writes that the Libby trial "is the closest version of a Red Queen trial this country has had in a long time. … Lewis G. Carroll's account of the Knave' s trial before the Red Queen and White Rabbit is famous for the Queen's dictum, 'Sentence first, verdict afterward.' But read the full transcript of the mock trial and one will see that the real subject is not justice, but the humiliation of the defendant." Henninger adds, "If found guilty, Mr. Libby goes to prison. … If acquitted, he loses only…his reputation. This, too, is ruin. … It is a travesty that the Valerie Plame bump-and-run case brought Lewis Libby to the edge of this cliff. Primary blame belongs to the Bush Justice Department's abdication of responsibility."

Former Florida Federal Prison Guard Sentenced In Sex Scandal. The AP (2/22) reports, "A former federal prison guard was sentenced Wednesday to a year of home detention and three years probation for his role in a sex-for-contraband scheme that ended in a deadly gun battle last summer." The AP continues, "E. Lavon Spence, who pleaded guilty to mail fraud in October, was sentenced by Chief Judge Robert L. Hinkle in federal court. … Prison time 'would affect the recovery' of Spence from his November stroke at the age of 40, Hinkle said." The AP adds, "A Justice Department special agent was killed and a prison officer was wounded in June when they came to arrest the six guards at the Tallahassee Federal Correctional Institution. One of the guards, Ralph Hill, was also killed in the gunfight Hill started. … Three of the guards have already been sentenced to a year in prison, with two also receiving three years of probation after their release. A fourth guard was sentenced to a year of probation."

Former Civilian DOD Employee Pleads Guilty To Taking Bribes. The Stars and Stripes (2/22, Coon) reports, "A former employee of U.S. Special Operations Command Europe in Stuttgart, Germany, pleaded guilty on Friday to accepting bribes in return for steering work to a Romania- and Iraq-based contractor." S&S continues, "Steven Merkes, who worked as a logistical planner, faces up to two years in prison and $250,000 in fines for performing acts for Philip Bloom in return for $24,000 in cash and future employment, according to a Justice Department news release. … Sentencing for Merkes is scheduled for June 1." S&S adds, "Bloom, one of the ringleaders in a wide-ranging scheme to defraud the former Coalition Provisional Authority of Iraq, was sentenced Friday to 46 months in prison and ordered to forfeit $3.6 million for committing bribery and money-laundering and conspiring to defraud. … Both cases were tried in U.S. District Court in Washington." S&S notes, "According to the Justice Department, Merkes worked at the special operations command, or SOCEUR, as an airman until January 2005, and afterward as a Defense Department civilian employee. … In both positions, Merkes' official duties consisted of planning military exercises for special operations forces in the European theater, according to the Justice Department. … Bloom, 67, of Bucharest, Romania, was at the center of a scandal that resulted in the arrests of at least four servicemembers and three civilians. One of the civilians, Robert Stein, was sentenced Jan. 29 to nine years in prison for charges including weapons possession. … Stein, a former comptroller with the Coalition Provisional Authority, was convicted of, among other crimes, stealing money from the Coalition Provisional Authority of Iraq that was funneled to Bloom for the purchase of assault rifles, silencers and grenade launchers, for personal use in the United States, according to the Justice Department."

1980 Corruption Case Said To Offer Insights On Fumo Defense. The Philadelphia Inquirer (2/22, Lounsberry, 385K) reports, "The case was federal, and one of the defendants was State Sen. Vincent J. Fumo. But the year was 1980, and that was another era in Philadelphia politics and in FBI corruption probes. … Though a jury found Fumo guilty, along with former city Democratic Party chief Peter J. Camiel and former State Sen. Thomas M. Nolan, a judge overturned the verdict and acquitted all three -- a giant victory for political figures who faced possible prison sentences." The Inquirer notes, "The old case offers insight about how Fumo, as a defendant, conducted himself on the witness stand. It lays out how some of the city's top defense lawyers fought at trial, and on appeal." Then-US Attorney Peter F. Vaira "said that if the 1980 federal case is any guide, Fumo and his current legal team will fight like tigers."

DOJ_NMG_0135436

Suspected Software Pirate Arraigned On Federal Charges. InformationWeek (2/22, Gaudin) reports, "A man, U.S. authorities describe as the leader of one of the oldest and most renowned Internet software piracy groups, was arraigned in U.S. District Court on Tuesday." IW continues, "Hew Raymond Griffiths, 44, a British national living in Bateau Bay, Australia, is being charged with one count of conspiracy to commit criminal copyright infringement and one count of criminal copyright infringement. If convicted on both counts, Griffiths faces a maximum sentence of 10 years in prison and a $500,000 fine. … Griffiths, known by the screen nickname 'Bandido,' was extradited from Australia in what the Department of Justice says is one of the first ever extraditions for an intellectual property offense. He had been held in Australia for three years while he fought the extradition. … 'Griffiths claimed to be beyond the reach of U.S. law, and today, we have proven otherwise,' said Assistant Attorney General Alice Fisher, in a written statement. 'This extradition represents the Department of Justice's commitment to protect intellectual property rights from those who violate our laws from the other side of the globe.'" IW adds, "The indictment, which was returned in March 2003, charges Griffiths with violating U.S. criminal copyright laws as the leader of an organized criminal group known as DrinkOrDie. The group was known as one of the oldest security-conscious piracy groups on the Internet. DrinkOrDie was founded in Russia in 1993, according to the DOJ, and expanded internationally throughout the '90s. … The group was dismantled by the team effort of the DOJ and U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement as part of Operation Buccaneer in December 2001. More than 70 raids reportedly were conducted in the U.S., as well as in the United Kingdom, Finland, Norway, Sweden, and Australia. Operation Buccaneer so far has resulted in 30 felony convictions and 10 convictions of foreign nationals overseas, according to the DOJ."

Railroad Police Hunt Scoff-Law Snowmobilers. The Wall Street Journal (2/22, A1, Machalaba) reports from Holland, NY, "Railroad policeman Matthew Galas eased his cruiser behind a snowbank near a Norfolk Southern Corp. train line. He'd seen what he was looking for: fresh snowmobile tracks on the right of way. Lawbreakers had been there that morning. … He settled in to await his prey. An hour later, a snowmobile slid to a stop at the edge of the woods. Its driver nosed toward the train track, as if about to follow alongside it through railroad property. Then he spotted Mr. Galas, and disappeared back into the snowy forest. … Mr. Galas is one of more than a thousand police officers employed by U.S. railroads. A couple hundred of them spend at least part of their winters on a unique mission: chasing snowmobilers illegally on the train tracks." The Journal continues, "Mr. Galas once ticketed a man whose snowmobile was demolished after it had gotten caught in a snow-covered track. The driver dismounted shortly before a freight train smashed into his snowmobile -- as well as a second snowmobile that was trying to tow his off the track. Another time, Mr. Galas says he was dragged perhaps 100 feet across the snow at 2 a.m. by a snowmobiler he stopped for trespassing and suspected of being under the influence. When the snowmobiler decided to run for it, his vehicle's handlebars caught on Mr. Galas's jacket and gun belt. … After a slow start this year, winter has hit the Northeast with a vengeance. Where Mr. Galas works, in the Buffalo suburbs, that has meant frigid temperatures, heavy snowfall and an escalation of the annual fight between railroad police and the area's legions of snowmobile fanatics. So far this month, Mr. Galas has issued warnings to eight snowmobilers on the right of way in Holland, just one of many freight lines crisscrossing the area. Police have given out tickets that can carry fines of $100." The Journal adds, "Snowmobiling is important to the region's economy and culture. The state government provides funds to local snowmobile clubs to groom and mark their trails. Local shops, gas stations, restaurants and bars rely on snowmobile business, both from tourists and locals. … Some aficionados resent the railroad getting aggressive about patrolling the right of way along its tracks, which can be as wide as 100 feet and tends to have some of the flattest, smoothest paths among the hilly and treacherous woods."

Prosecutors Pursuing Indictments In Nevada Health Care Fraud Probe. KLAS-TV Las Vegas (2/21) reported on its Web site from a broadcast story, "Federal authorities are moving forward with a conspiracy investigation targeting several of the valley's best-known doctors and lawyer. FBI agents began the probe back in 2003. Federal prosecutors turned up the heat in front of a grand jury putting some of the most successful doctors and lawyers in Las Vegas in the crosshairs of this investigation. They reportedly called themselves the 'Medical Mafia.' The FBI suspects them of conspiring to rip off patients, clients, and insurance companies for tens of millions of dollars." KLAS noted, "FBI agents have reportedly gathered so much information about more than a dozen attorneys and physicians that they weren't sure which cases and charges to pursue. Knowledgeable sources say prosecutors have narrowed their focus to concentrate on cases involving conspiracy."

Massachusetts Financial Adviser Charged With Bilking Seniors. The AP (2/22) reports, "A federal grand jury indicted an Andover financial adviser yesterday on charges he bilked senior citizens in Connecticut and Massachusetts out of nearly $2 million and spent the money on lavish trips to Las Vegas and $5,000-a-day visits to strip clubs." John A. Baldo "was arrested Jan. 25 as he got off a flight from Boston to Las Vegas." The AP notes, "An 88-year-old man in Storrs, Conn., gave Baldo $1.6 million, and his 85-year-old brother, who also lives in Connecticut, gave him $200,000, according to the indictment. Prosecutors say he also stole $200,000 from a 63-year-old Rockport woman. FBI agent Melissa Valera said in a court filing that Baldo spent about $300,000 for three luxury cars and almost that amount gambling."

DOJ_NMG_0135437

Michigan Man Sentenced To Nine Years In Prison For Child Porn. The AP (2/22) reports, "A suburban Detroit man was sentenced to 9 years in prison Wednesday for receiving more than 23,000 images and 94 movies depicting child pornography. Michael Timothy Long's conviction resulted from an investigation conducted by agents from the U.S. Department of Homeland Security's Bureau of Immigration and Customs Enforcement, according a news release from the U.S. Attorney's Detroit office." The AP notes, "The case is part of Project Safe Childhood, a nationwide effort launched in 2006 designed to protect children from online exploitation and abuse"

TJX Says Customer Data Breach Began In 2005. The Washington Post (2/22, D1, Nakashima) reports, "Retail giant TJX, whose stores include discount clothing chains T.J. Maxx and Marshalls, said yesterday that a computer-security breach stretched back 10 months earlier than the company originally thought, compromising credit and debit card data, drivers' license numbers, and names and addresses." The Post continues, "The announcement underscores a trend of security breaches involving sensitive credit card data and reflects failures to properly secure computer systems, to notify customers when breaches occur and to update laws for the cyber-crime age, lawmakers and analysts said. … TJX said that while it first thought the intrusion took place from May 2006 to January 2007, it now thinks its computer system was also hacked in July 2005 and on 'various subsequent dates' that year. The company, which reported the intrusion in January -- a month after it said it discovered the breach -- has not said how many customers may have been affected or how many customers it has notified." The Post adds, "Banks that issued the credit cards have not said how much they have had to cover in fraud-related losses. … More than 30 states have laws that require companies to notify customers as soon as possible when a breach has occurred, though most of the statutes let companies delay notification while law enforcement agencies investigate. A bipartisan group of senators has reintroduced legislation that would mandate customer notification and require companies that maintain personal information to establish internal policies to protect it."

California Sex Harassment Trial Goes To Jury. The Los Angeles Times (2/22, Garrison) reports, "For those who suspect that psychiatrists are at least as crazy as the rest of us, the sexual harassment trial that went to a jury Wednesday in Superior Court here has provided no end of material." The Times continues, "Jurors who listened to two weeks of testimony -- including psychiatrists testifying about their sex lives under code names to protect their reputations and descriptions of psychiatrists allegedly attending porn parties and having oral sex in cars. Now they must decide who is telling the truth." The Times adds, "Dr. David Martorano, a Columbia University-educated physician and a former psychiatric resident at UCLA's Neuropsychiatric Institute, claims he had an affair with his supervisor and that after he broke it off and rumors of it began to circulate, he lost a coveted post as chief resident, and his reputation was ruined. He sued the supervisor, Heather Krell, and UCLA. … Krell says there was no affair. Her lawyer accused Martorano of making the whole thing up to seduce yet another psychiatrist. Krell countersued Martorano for libel and slander. The jury considers both claims at the same time." The Times notes, "UCLA's lawyer, meanwhile, said it doesn't matter whether Martorano and Krell had an affair -- university administrators acted properly when they revoked the offer to become chief resident after rumors began to fly because it was unacceptable for there to be even the perception that he was getting a job based on a sexual affair at the institute, one of the top facilities of its kind in the country. … Testimony was so explicit that Judge Judith Chirlin allowed several women to testify under code names -- a decision she acknowledged was unusual but said was necessary."

Maryand Governor Urges Lawmakers To Repeal Death Penalty. The Washington Post (2/22, B6, Wagner, Wiggins, 690K) reports, "Gov. Martin O'Malley urged Maryland lawmakers yesterday to repeal the state's death penalty, saying the punishment is 'inherently unjust,' does not serve as a deterrent to murder and saps resources that could be better spent on law enforcement. Stepping forcefully into a debate taking place in Annapolis and across the nation, O'Malley (D) suggested that Maryland and other states will inevitably execute innocent people. Maryland has put to death five people since 1978." The Post adds, "The issue, one of the most divisive facing the General Assembly this year, drew pleas from people on both sides of the issue during separate hearings conducted by House and Senate panels. But far more people turned out to support repeal, with nearly 30 people signing up to testify in favor of the bill in the Senate."

DOJ_NMG_0135438

CIVIL LAW:

SCOTUS Rules Concealment Of Assets Can Take Away Bankruptcy Right. The AP (2/22, Yost) reports, "The Supreme Court ruled Wednesday that a financially troubled small-business man gave up an important right under the federal bankruptcy code because he failed to disclose all of his assets as the law requires." The AP continues, "In a 5-4 decision, the Court said Robert Marrama of Gloucester, Mass., could not convert his bankruptcy case from one chapter of the code to another, as the law ordinarily allows. … The reason, the Court said, stemmed from his failure to disclose a Maine vacation home placed in a trust. Marrama, who operated a flooring company, listed the value of his interest in the property as zero, according to papers in the case." The AP adds, "After finding out about the home, the bankruptcy trustee said he would recover the real estate for the benefit of Marrama's creditors. Marrama had attempted to convert his case from a Chapter 7 liquidation to Chapter 13, which allows a debtor to keep property and pay debts over time. … Writing for the majority, Justice John Paul Stevens said honest debtors possess an absolute right to convert their cases to Chapter 13, but that nothing in the law limits a court's right to take away that right for 'fraudulent conduct.' … In dissent, Justice Samuel Alito said the bankruptcy code 'unambiguously provides' that a debtor has a 'broad right' to convert to Chapter 13. Alito said Chapter 13 contains a number of requirements that protect creditors from any bad faith by a debtor. … In Marrama's case, a bankruptcy judge denied the conversion to Chapter 13, and a bankruptcy appellate panel agreed."

Louisiana Hospital Settles Healthcare Fraud Charges With DOJ. The Moultrie (LA) Observer (2/22, Glenn) reports, "Following a U.S. Department of Justice investigation, Colquitt Regional Medical Center (CRMC) agreed to pay the federal government $475,000 to settle fraud allegations." The Observer continues, "The federal whistleblower case, which was filed Aug. 17, 2004, remained sealed until Wednesday. It centered around a series of claims submitted for Medicaid and Medicare reimbursement by CRMC's Home Care Services office in Sylvester from 2001 to 2005." The Observer adds, "Plaintiff Joyce Dickerson, a registered nurse and former director of the Moultrie Home Care Services office, allegedly reported to the hospital administration and the hospital authority in 2004 what she believed to be years of illegal billing. While hospital officials say the settlement was based on an 'error rate,' Dickerson's attorney Robert Howell of Moultrie said in actuality CRMC owes the federal government double the compromise agreement. … In the complaint, CRMC was alleged to have received payment from Medicare for services that were not reasonable and necessary, upcoded certification diagnoses so that the hospital was overpaid by Medicare and underutilized services after being paid in advance by Medicare allowing defendants to receive payment from both Medicare and patients."

Administration Stance Said To Have Edge In SCOTUS Faith-Based Case. In a Los Angeles Times (2/22, 850K) op-ed, Stanford Law School fellow Andrew Coan writes, "On Wednesday, the U.S. Supreme Court will hear oral arguments in just such a case. Hein vs. Freedom From Religion Foundation is unlikely to make headlines, but it could deal a sharp blow to the wall of separation between church and state. The plaintiffs are ordinary citizens who object to their federal tax dollars being used to fund the president's program for 'faith-based and community initiatives.' In particular, they claim that several conferences sponsored by the program were propaganda vehicles for religion and therefore violated the establishment clause of the 1st Amendment, which forbids government promotion of religion. The government defendants -- 'Hein' is Jay F. Hein, director of the White House Office of Faith-Based and Community Initiatives -- dispute the plaintiffs' claim about the conferences. But at this stage, the Bush administration is asking the court to throw the case out on grounds that ordinary taxpayers have no legal interest in how the executive branch spends public money." Indicators "strongly suggest that the administration's position will prevail, despite the threat it poses to the separation of church and state."

LATimes Offers Qualified Praise For SCOTUS Tobacco Ruling. The Los Angeles Times (2/22, 850K) editorializes, "The US Supreme Court went further this week -- though not far enough -- in reining in juries in civil cases that award outlandish punitive damages. By a disappointingly narrow 5-4 vote, the justices overturned a jury's decision that Philip Morris should pay $79.5 million to the widow of a smoker who died of lung cancer. The value of her actual damages was only $821,000. The justices could -- and should -- have ruled clearly that the $79.5-million award violated previous rulings that punitive damages may not be 'grossly excessive' and should bear a reasonable relation to the harm actually experienced by the plaintiff. But in returning the case to the Oregon courts, the court did impose a sensible rule that should make it harder for juries to sock deep-pocket and easily demonized defendants. … Without proper guidance, jurors can leap to the conclusion that damages should reflect the harm experienced by everyone who might have tasted tainted water -- or smoked a cigarette. Though it could have gone further, this week's decision should make such leaps less likely."

DOJ_NMG_0135439

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Initiative Will Strengthen Federal Enforcement Of Religious Freedom Rights. UPI (2/22) reports, "With the Executive Committee of the Southern Baptist Convention as his audience, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales announced the launch of the First Freedom Project, a Justice Department effort to fight religious discrimination. 'Religious freedom is a fundamental part of our nation's history and one of its core principles,' Gonzales told Executive Committee members Tuesday." UPI continues, "The First Freedom Project will be spearheaded by the Justice Department's civil-rights division and will build on the department's efforts to strengthen and preserve religious liberty throughout the nation, according to Gonzales, who sought the meeting with SBC leaders, Associated Baptist Press reported Wednesday. … 'Throughout our history, nothing has defined us a nation more than our respect for religious freedom,' Gonzales said. 'It is not confined to members of one church or the followers of one set of beliefs. Through this initiative, the Justice Department continues its vigorous efforts to enforce protections against religious discrimination.'" UPI adds, "The attorney general stressed that religious liberty is 'a universal right and applies to people of all faiths.' … Later, in response to a question, Gonzales told reporters he chose an audience of Southern Baptists to announce the government's new effort because 'this is a group very interested in the protection of religious freedom.' He noted the 'timing worked out where this was a good venue to speak to a receptive audience.' … Baptists in America were early champions of religious liberty and influenced the development of the Constitution's First Amendment, which guarantees religious liberty and other freedoms." UPI notes, "The First Freedom Project will initiate a program of public education to make certain that people know their rights, Gonzales said. 'People do not understand fully what their rights are,' he explained. … The First Freedom Project will sponsor a series of regional training seminars for leaders interested in religious liberty. The first one will be March 29 in Kansas City, Mo., followed by seminars in Tampa, Fla., April 25 and Seattle, Wash., May 10. Other dates and locations will be announced later."

Ohio Man Sentenced To 27 Months In Prison For Racial Intimidation. The AP (2/22) reports, "A man accused of serving as a lookout in a scheme to use mercury to scare black families from his neighborhood was sentenced to two years and three months in federal prison, the Justice Department said. Joseph Kuzlik of Cleveland, who is white, pleaded guilty in November to conspiring to interfere with the housing rights of an interracial family because of their race and to making false statements to federal investigators." The AP adds, "Kuzlik also was ordered to three years of supervised release and to pay $23,000 restitution to the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency and $767 to the Ohio EPA for cleanup. He also must make payments to individual victims."

Rhode Island AG Says State Should Recognize Massachusetts' Gay Marriages. The New York Times (2/22, Zezima, 1.16M) reports, "The Rhode Island attorney general said Wednesday that same-sex marriages performed in Massachusetts, the sole state where they are legal, should be recognized in Rhode Island." Responding to "a request for a legal opinion from the commissioner of the Rhode Island Board of Governors for Higher Education," Attorney General Patrick C. Lynch "said the state prohibited discrimination based on sexual orientation and did not explicitly prohibit same-sex marriage. 'Rhode Island will recognize same-sex marriages lawfully performed in Massachusetts as marriages in Rhode Island,' the seven-page opinion said." A spokesman for Gov. Donald L. Carcieri, "a Republican who opposes same-sex marriage, said Mr. Carcieri and his legal counsel were studying the opinion."

Supreme Court Sidesteps "War On Christmas" Case. The Christian Science Monitor (2/22, Richey, 59K) reports, "The US Supreme Court has declined to enter the fracas over what some conservatives are calling the war on Christmas. Without elaboration, the court issued a one-line order on Tuesday refusing to take up a potentially important church-state case concerning the use of religious symbols in public school holiday displays." At issue in Skoros v. City of New York was "whether the city's public school system is impermissibly promoting Judaism and Islam while conveying a message of disapproval of Christianity. School rules allow the Jewish menorah and the Muslim star and crescent in multireligious holiday displays but not nativity scenes depicting the birth of Jesus."

Novak Decries Elimination Of U Of Illinois Symbol. In a column for the Washington Post (2/22, A19), Robert Novak writes about the University of Illinois' board of trustees decision to eliminate the (81-year-old symbol of my alma mater" Chief Illiniwek, "bowing to years of pressure from Native American activists, the National Collegiate Athletic Association and liberal politicians." Novak continues, "This is a melancholy moment for me and many other Illinois alumni and university officials, including President B. Joseph White. The university has been forced to yield to blackmail. The death of the Chief epitomizes some unsavory aspects of contemporary American public life: political correctness, hypocrisy and bureaucratic tyranny." Novak, adds, "Only a small minority of Native Americans is shown by polls to oppose Indian nicknames in sports. The campaign against them gained momentum only when the NCAA, which can hardly cope with policing athlete misconduct and illegal payments in college sports, crusaded against dozens of colleges in the name of political correctness. The NCAA, under President Myles Brand, labeled Chief Illiniwek one of the 'hostile and abusive racial/ethnic/national origin mascots.' … But the Chief is no mascot (the university calls him a symbol). The big-headed depiction of the father of this country at George Washington University, the turtle representing the University of Maryland and the Demon Deacon for Wake Forest are mascots. Such college mascots are comical figures who engage in sham battles with each other and go into the stands to hug children. Chief Illiniwek did not. He was always austere and dignified. … The accusation that Illinois and other schools degrade Native Americans is absurd. These schools picked Indian symbols in admiration of their valor, ferociousness and indomitable spirit in the face of overwhelming odds." Novak concludes, "Chief Illiniwek finally was done in by politicians jumping on the NCAA's political correctness bandwagon. Illinois State Senate President Emil Jones Jr., no friend of the university, warned that trustees might not be confirmed unless they dumped the Chief, and university officials feared their appropriations coming under attack. … While I can understand dumping the Chief, I don't like it. I could react by withdrawing from my long-range commitments to support the University of Illinois, but I won't. That would put me in the same class as the petty bureaucrats and politicians who killed Chief Illiniwek."

DOJ_NMG_0135440

ANTITRUST:

EMI Seeks Suitors After Warner Bid. The Financial Times (2/22, Reporters) reports, "EMI is in talks with several private equity groups including One Equity Partners, the US group affiliated with JPMorgan Chase, to sound out potential alternatives to Warner Music's $6bn approach for the British music group." The Times continues, "People familiar with the discussions cautioned that no firm offers appeared imminent, as Warner and would-be private equity suitors are demanding the right to conduct extensive due diligence on EMI's operations after it issued two profit warnings in quick succession since the start of the year. … EMI's board is still examining a possible securitisation of its publishing asset which remains its first choice unless a compelling offer is made." The Times adds, "The development comes less than three months after EMI's talks with Permira collapsed after the UK-based private equity group conducted due diligence, and four weeks after Warner's approach, which was disclosed only on Tuesday. … EMI, which would not comment on the discussions, rejected the January 24 approach from its closest rival, which is understood to have been pitched at an indicative price close to 300p. … Warner would not comment, but it is understood to have cut its valuation of EMI sharply since the latter's second profit warning. … Warner said yesterday any offer it made would be all in cash." The Times notes, "The US-listed group is understood to have decided against offering a stock alternative for financial reasons and because of the greater disclosure requirements offering shares would impose on its own investors. … Warner's statement came as EMI wrote to Warner, expressing doubts that the US group had significantly improved the chances of a deal being cleared by regulators. … Warner announced on Tuesday that it had secured the unexpected backing of Impala, an alliance of independent music companies which had opposed previous deals in the sector. … However, EMI's official response to Warner's approach argued it still saw significant regulatory risks."

EU Fines Elevator Makers For Price-Fixing. The Wall Street Journal (2/22, C12, Cohen) reports, "The European Commission Wednesday fined four elevator and escalator makers a total of €992 million ($1.3 billion) for fixing prices, Europe's largest-ever antitrust penalty." The Journal continues, "ThyssenKrupp AG was fined €479.7 million, United Technologies Corp.'s Otis unit was fined €224.9 million, Schindler Holding AG was hit with a €143.7 million penalty and Kone was fined €142.1 million. The sum of these fines, which topped a €750 million penalty levied last month against makers of power-grid components, reflects the commission's expanded powers to crack down on corporate cartels. … Under new antitrust guidelines established last year, the commission can levy larger fines and apply an automatic 50% increase for repeat cartel offenders. Since ThyssenKrupp had a previous cartel punishment -- a €3.2 million fine in 1998 for fixing stainless-steel prices -- its elevator penalty included this increase, bringing its fine close to the record €497 million Microsoft Corp. paid in 2004 for breaking monopoly laws." The Journal adds, "The commission launched its investigation into the elevator business in January 2004. Its probe showed that the four companies fixed prices and rigged bids in Belgium, Germany, the Netherlands and Luxembourg between 1995 and 2004. … The commission said Mitsubishi Elevator Europe BV, a division of Mitsubishi Electric Corp., participated in the Dutch cartel and it fined the company €1.8 million."

The Financial Times (2/22, Buck) reports, "It was the highest penalty imposed by the European Commission, topping a previous record set only last month. Brussels hopes that the recent increase in antitrust fines will deter companies from abusing the law and encourage people involved in cartels to blow the whistle on co-conspirators in exchange for immunity." The Times continues, "Neelie Kroes, the EU competition commissioner and the -official behind Brussels' get-tough approach, said the lift and escalator cartel had behaved 'outrageously', while her spokesman said taxpayers, public authorities and other customers had been 'ripped off big time' by the cartel." The Times adds, "ThyssenKrupp, the German engineering group, received the toughest penalty, €479.7m ($630m, £322.5m). Otis, a unit of US group United Technologies, was fined €224.9m, Schindler of Switzerland was given a €143.7m penalty and Finland's Kone was ordered to pay €142.1m. Mitsubishi's Dutch subsidiary was fined €1.8m. … Ms Kroes said: 'The damage caused by this cartel will last for many years because it covered not only the initial supply but also the subsequent maintenance of lifts and elevators. For these companies the memory of this fine should last just as long.' … The Commission said the lifts installed in its own headquarters as well as at the European Court of Justice in Luxembourg were covered by the cartel. It urged customers of the companies involved in the agreement to renegotiate their contracts, and said they might have the right to sue for damages."

DOJ_NMG_0135441

USA Today/AP (2/22, Brand) reports, "George David, chairman and chief executive of United Technologies, said in a statement that company officials are 'disappointed by the conduct revealed through the Commission's and UTC's own investigations.' … 'UTC will not tolerate unethical behaviors of any kind,' he said. 'The nine local Otis employees who violated our code of ethics and regulatory compliance programs were quickly identified and dismissed and we have reinvigorated our ethics and compliance programs worldwide.'" The AP adds, "Otis and United Technologies disclosed the investigation in 2004 and have cooperated with the European Commission, David said. Otis and UTC have received full or partial reductions in penalties for its cooperation and the outcome will have 'no material impact' on UTC's financial condition or Otis' competitive position. … United Technologies is waiting for the full text of the decision and will review it before reporting on its impact on its 2007 earnings guidance. In addition, David said Otis will appeal the decision to a European court."

Bloomberg (2/22, Newman) reports, "Kroes has made fighting cartels a priority for her five- year term. On Jan. 24, she fined Siemens AG, Areva SA and eight other companies that make electricity network gear 750 million euros. The commission fined seven cartels a total of 1.84 billion euros last year, an annual record. … 'oday we see the commission really going forward and really emphasizing its commitment not only to penalizing participants in cartels but also sending a very clear deterrent message to companies that might be tempted to get involved in those types of activities,' John Pheasant, a partner at Hogan & Hartson LLP, said in an interview. … The commission, the EU's antitrust regulator, said the companies set prices in Belgium, Germany, Luxembourg and the Netherlands between at least 1995 and 2004. The companies rigged contract bids, allocated projects to each other and shared confidential information, the regulator said."

AFP (2/22) reports, "The US parent company of elevator maker Otis said Wednesday it would appeal against a record EU antitrust fine imposed against a lift cartel." AFP adds, "United Technologies Corp. (UTC) said it had 'cooperated fully' with the European Union's executive commission during the investigation into the market-rigging cartel. … 'Otis will appeal the commission's decision to the European Court of the First Instance,' a UTC statement said."

US Revokes Genetech Patent. The New York Times (2/22, Pollack) reports, "The Patent and Trademark Office has decided to revoke a fundamental patent held by Genentech, the biotechnology company, that was at the center of a recent Supreme Court decision." The Times continues, "The patent office's decision could cost Genentech hundreds of millions of dollars in royalties over the next decade but would save a like amount for rivals that are paying the royalties, including MedImmune, Abbott Laboratories, Johnson & Johnson and ImClone Systems. … In a statement yesterday, Genentech said it would appeal the decision through the patent office and, if necessary, the courts. The company said the patent would remain 'valid and enforceable' through the appeals process." The Times adds, "The decision is the latest in a long controversy, and even mystery, surrounding the patent. The patent was awarded in 2001 even though the inventions on which it was based were made in the early 1980s. If not revoked, the patent, often called the Cabilly II patent after the lead inventor, Shmuel Cabilly, would expire in 2018. … Last month the Supreme Court ruled that MedImmune could challenge the patent even though it had licensed the rights to use it. Lawyers said the decision would have a big impact on how patent licensing deals are structured. … The patent covers techniques for making monoclonal antibodies, which are the basis for many of the biggest selling products made by the biotechnology industry. Genentech shares revenue from the patent with its research partner at the time, the City of Hope, a medical center in Duarte, Calif."

EU OKs Lukoil Purchase Of ConocoPhillips Stations. AFP (2/22) reports, "EU antitrust regulators gave their approval on Wednesday to Russian energy group Lukoil's plans to buy the filling stations of US oil giant ConocoPhillips in seven European countries." AFP continues, "After probing the deal for its impact on competition, the European Commission said that it had 'ound that the proposed transaction would not impede effective competition'in Europe." AFP adds, "Under the deal, the Russian oil and gas group is buying 400 filling stations from ConocoPhillips in Belgium, the Czech Republic, Finland, Luxembourg, Poland, Hungary and Slovakia. … The two companies have been close partners since ConocoPhillips bought 7.59 percent of Lukoil in 2004. The US company has since increased its stake to 20 percent."

DOJ_NMG_0135442

EU Gives Antitrust Nod To Japan Tobacco's Bid For Gallaher. The AP (2/22) reports, "European Union antitrust regulators on Wednesday cleared Japan Tobacco Inc.'s proposed $14.7 billion purchase of British cigarette maker Gallaher Group PLC, saying the deal did not pose competition problems on the European market." The AP continues, "Japan Tobacco, the world's third biggest cigarette company wants to buy Gallaher to give the maker of the Mild Seven brand a bigger share in the European market." The AP adds, "The European Commission said the deal showed overlaps between the two companies 'are generally limited,' with the brands of the two positioned in different market areas. 'Moreover, for all products concerned, the new entity would continue to face several strong, effective competitors with significant market shares,' the commission said in a statement. … The deal would reportedly be the biggest Japanese overseas acquisition. Gallaher, which employs 12,000 people worldwide, dates back to 1857, when Tom Gallaher started a business making Irish roll tobacco in Londonderry, Northern Ireland. Its cigarette brands in Europe include Benson & Hedges, Silk Cut and Sovereign."

AFP (2/22) reports, "The deal is expected to leave the JT group holding some 14 percent of the European Union market, with a 39-percent share in Britain and 45 percent in Austria. … EU regulators also found that the merger would not leave the combined company with crushing market share as it would face 'several strong, effective competitors.' … Japan Tobacco sells brands including Mild Seven, Camel and Winston in about 120 countries and the takeover will give it extra muscle to take on world number one Philip Morris Cos. Inc. of the United States."

Union Questions Steel Mill Sale Order. The AP (2/22, Dishneau) reports, "The United Steelworkers union and Maryland's economic development chief say they disagree with a federal order that global steel giant Mittal Steel Co. sell its Sparrows Point mill near Baltimore to settle antitrust issues raised by the Dutch company's planned acquisition of Arcelor SA." The AP continues, "While ordering the sale of the Maryland plant, the consent decree proposed Tuesday by Justice Department would allow Mittal to keep a Weirton, W.Va., mill that had volunteered to be sold to preserve competition for tin-plated steel, which is used primarily for food and aerosol cans." The AP adds, "The United Steelworkers, which represents the mill's 2,106 production workers, said it will seek a reversal of the decision because selling Sparrows Point won't necessarily help workers or the company. … 'It makes Mittal USA not as strong as it could be and does not assure Sparrows Point or Weirton a secure future,' said David R. McCall, chairman of the union's Mittal Steel committee. … The Justice Department said Sparrow Point's profitability and port access would help make it a viable competitor. In contrast, the Weirton mill has failed to thrive under Mittal's ownership, according to the Independent Steelworkers Union, which represents workers there."

Mittal Says Mill Sale Is Necessary. The Baltimore Sun (2/22, Connolly) reports, "After a day of silence, Mittal Steel Co. NV said yesterday that it was disappointed by the Justice Department's decision requiring it to divest its Sparrows Point steel mill to resolve antitrust concerns over tin plate production in the wake of its $33 billion merger with Luxembourg-based Arcelor SA." The Sun continues, "During a previously scheduled conference call with analysts yesterday to discuss fourth-quarter and year-end earnings, Mittal Chief Financial Officer Aditya Mittal said the company had no choice but to comply with the order even though it preferred to sell its plant in Weirton, W.Va. … A tentative deal to sell Weirton to Chicago-based Esmark Inc. is off the table, Mittal said, because of the Justice Department's decision. … 'We sympathize with everyone in Maryland because we feel the same disappointment,' Mittal said." The Sun adds, "The company has 90 days from Tuesday's ruling to sell Sparrows Point, but is eligible for a 60-day extension. … Esmark Chief Executive Officer James Bouchard said his company, which recently won control of Wheeling-Pittsburgh Steel Corp. in Wheeling, W.Va., has not heard from Mittal even though it has signaled its desire to buy Weirton and possibly Sparrows Point. … In yesterday's conference call, Aditya Mittal said the company wants to 'improve profitability' at Weirton. … However, he said tin plate production, while profitable, will likely face some restructuring in the near future because there is excess capacity."

House Judiciary Committee Plans Hearing With Sirius Executive. CNET News (2/22, Broache) reports, "A proposed merger between XM Satellite Radio and Sirius Satellite Radio has only been officially public for a few days, but it's already stirring questions on Capitol Hill." CNET continues, "On February 28, the U.S. House of Representatives Judiciary Committee, which has jurisdiction over antitrust laws, plans to hold a hearing to examine potential ramifications of uniting the nation's only two satellite radio operators, a deal estimated at $5 billion. Sirius CEO Mel Karmazin is the only confirmed participant so far. … 'We are holding this hearing to allow members to probe whether this merger will enhance or diminish competition in the digital music distribution industry,' Rep. John Conyers (D-Mich.), the committee chairman, said in a statement. 'Our members will explore how to define this new marketplace, and whether this merger will lead to increased choices and lower prices for consumers.' … Rep. Lamar Smith (R-Texas), the committee's co-chairman, said the panel plans to pay close attention to 'whether satellite radio competes against terrestrial radio, the Internet, or other emerging technologies'--a consideration that is key to making an antitrust analysis. … It is ultimately up to the U.S. Department of Justice and the Federal Communications Commission to decide whether the deal merits approval. One of the questions that has been raised is whether such a merger it would amount, as critics say, to a 'monopoly merger.'"

DOJ_NMG_0135443

Verizon, Vonage Patent Dispute Heads To Trial. . The Wall Street Journal (2/22, B4, Fam) reports, "Verizon Communications Inc.'s patent-infringement suit against Vonage Holding Corp. opened in federal court, potentially adding to the troubles of the largest Internet telephone start-up." The Journal continues, "The case is closely watched by the nascent Web-calling industry, with some experts saying that a ruling against Vonage could encourage more patent suits in the telecom world." The Journal adds, "Verizon is accusing Vonage of infringing five patents, some related to features such as call forwarding, fraud detection and other technologies. Vonage denies the accusations and argues that the actual goal of the Verizon suit is to eliminate the Internet company, a growing competitor to Verizon's landline phone business. … 'We are firm in our belief that we have not infringed on their patents,' said Brooke Schulz, a Vonage spokeswoman. 'This case is about one thing and one thing only and that's about Verizon's attempts to stifle competition.'" The Journal notes, "Officials at Verizon have said the company is motivated by a straightforward desire to protect its intellectual property. The phone company filed the suit in June in U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia, a month after Vonage's initial public offering in May. … Pretrial talks between the two competitors failed to result in a settlement. In court yesterday , the judge selected a jury and attorneys delivered opening statements for both sides."

Apple, Cisco Settle Differences Over iPhone Name. The Wall Street Journal (2/22, B4, Wingfield) reports, "Apple Inc. and Cisco Systems Inc. agreed to resolve a trademark dispute over the term iPhone that had threatened to put a damper on the introduction of Apple's most eagerly anticipated electronics product in years." The Journal continues, "Under their agreement, Cisco, of San Jose, Calif., and Apple, of Cupertino, Calif., are free to use the iPhone trademark on their respective products throughout the world. Cisco will drop a lawsuit it filed against Apple in federal court in San Francisco, accusing Apple of infringing on a Cisco trademark with a forthcoming cellphone called the iPhone, due out in June." The Journal adds, "In a joint statement, Apple and Cisco said they will explore opportunities for making their products work better together "in the areas of security, and consumer and enterprise communications." The companies said other terms of the settlement are confidential, declining to comment further. … By reaching a deal, the two Silicon Valley icons head off a battle that potentially could have dragged on for years, and possibly led to an injunction to block Apple's use of the iPhone name."

The New York Times (2/22, Stone) reports, "Wednesday night, in a short, ambiguously worded statement, the companies said they would dismiss all legal action against each other regarding the trademark and that Apple could use the name for its device, which it plans to start selling in June. … In addition, the companies said they would explore ways to make their identically named iPhone products work together 'in the areas of security and consumer and enterprise communication.'" The Times adds, "Representatives for Apple and Cisco said other terms of the deal would remain confidential. It is not known if Apple made a cash payment to Cisco, but intellectual property lawyers say some sort of payment is typical in these cases. It is also unclear whether Cisco had sold Apple the name iPhone outright and had then secured permission to use it itself. … But the deal appears to give a partial victory to both sides. Apple can begin selling its phone with the name that its strong-willed chief executive, Steven P. Jobs, seemed to prefer. … Cisco can also continue to use the name, and with the promise of interoperability, it might have some of the hype and magic surrounding Apple's products rub off on its own less prominent offerings."

USA Today (2/22, Kessler) reports, "Apple and Cisco Systems ended their feud over the iPhone name late Wednesday — and Apple appears to have won, tech analysts said." USA continues, "The two Silicon Valley tech giants said they agreed to share rights to the name and end their legal battle over it. … Cisco — the longtime owner of the name — had earlier said it would share it with Apple as long as the electronics-maker made its iPhone compatible with other companies' products. The settlement addressed that concern, with the two companies pledging to "explore opportunities for interoperability in the areas of security, and consumer and (business) communications." … Other terms were confidential." USA adds, "Since the full deal was not made public, it's hard to say for sure which company came out on top, says tech analyst Roger Kay with Endpoint Technologies Associates. But it sure looks like a 'face-saving' agreement for Cisco, he says. … 'It looks like Cisco caved,' says independent tech analyst Rob Enderle. The pledge of interoperability talks 'looks like the typical promise that (Apple CEO) Steve Jobs has no intention of keeping,' he says." USA notes, "The controversy over the iPhone name began last year, when Apple was developing a feature-packed cellphone. Long before it had an official name, Apple fans dubbed it the iPhone. That's because many Apple products begin with an 'I', including the iPod music player and iTunes music store. … But there was a problem: Cisco, the world's largest network equipment maker, owned the iPhone trademark. It had originally been registered in 1996 by InfoGear, a networking company later acquired by Cisco. After the deal, Cisco adopted the name and introduced a line of iPhones, which it still sells today."

DOJ_NMG_0135444

Justices Consider Patent Case. The Wall Street Journal (2/22, A4, Bravin, 2.04M) reports, "The Supreme Court, in the latest in a series of cases revisiting the application of patent protections in the high-tech era, heard arguments over where software fits within intellectual-property law." AT&T Inc. "holds a patent for voice-compression technology that makes it easier to transmit and store speech on personal computers and other devices. Microsoft Corp. concedes installing the technology on US-built computers would infringe the patent. But it says it isn't a violation to ship a master disk of the software overseas, where it duplicates the software for installation on computers assembled in Germany, Belgium and other countries." Microsoft "argues the 'component' is a physical disk containing the software, and it is free to duplicate it overseas, much as it could duplicate any other patented device overseas. AT&T contends the software itself is the component, regardless of the medium." Lower courts "have agreed with AT&T." The Washington Post (2/22, D1, Barnes, Sipress, 690K) among other newspapers, also reports the story.

ENVIRONMENT:

Nine States Sue US Over Mercury Emissions. The AP (2/22, Flesher) reports from Traverse City, MI, "Michigan and eight other states sued the Bush administration Tuesday, saying the White House failed to adequately regulate emissions of mercury and other pollutants at cement plants." The AP continues, "The states contend a rule issued by the Environmental Protection Agency in December does not comply with the federal Clean Air Act." The AP adds, "Mercury comes from raw materials used to make cement - such as limestone, clay, sand and iron ore - and from fuels such as coal, which fires the kilns where the ingredients are baked at high temperatures. … In December, the EPA announced new limits on mercury and hydrocarbon emissions from cement kilns built after Dec. 2, 2005. … But for kilns built earlier, the agency imposes lesser requirements such as operating kilns properly to ensure complete combustion and removing kiln dust when it can no longer be recycled." The AP notes, "Critics say the Clean Air Act requires the EPA to limit mercury from all kilns, not just new ones. … The lawsuit was filed in the U.S. Court of Appeals in the District of Columbia, where several environmental groups filed a separate action last week. The other eight states are Connecticut, Delaware, Illinois, Maryland, Massachusetts, New York, New Jersey and Pennsylvania."

Study Says Southwest Droughts, Water Shortages Likely To Worsen. The New York Times (2/22, Dean, 1.16M) reports, "The Colorado River Basin is more prone to drought than had been thought, a panel of experts reported yesterday, and as the climate warms and the population in the region grows, pressure on water supplies will become greater." The "panel recommended an 'action-oriented' study of water use patterns and demands, including drought planning, population projections and possible effects of transferring water to urban areas from agriculture, still the dominant consumer." The Times adds, "Global warming is already making things worse, the experts said."

USA Today (2/22, O'Driscoll, 2.27M) reports, "Rising population 'will inevitably result in increasingly costly, controversial and unavoidable trade-off choices' in sharing the Southwest's most precious natural resource, the report says." The "report says climate reconstructions using tree-ring data and projections with computer models show extended droughts were common in the past and will be longer, more severe and more frequent in the future."

The Los Angeles Times (2/22, Boxall, 850K) reports, "Global warming will worsen drought and reduce flows on the Colorado River, a key water source for several western states, according to" the report. The "study, prepared by a National Research Council committee, paints a sobering picture as the water needs of a rapidly expanding population test the limits of a river system strained by the effects of climate change." The Times adds, "Such measures as conservation, desalination and water recycling would be helpful, the [study's] authors said, but wouldn't offer a panacea."

Scientists Fear Release Of Carbon From Northern Forests Could Set Off Vicious Cycle. In a front-page story, the Washington Post (2/22, A1, Struck, 690K) reports, "Nearly half of the carbon that exists on land is contained in the sweeping boreal forests, which gird the Earth in the northern reaches of Canada, Alaska, Scandinavia and Russia. Scientists now fear that the steady rise in the temperature of the atmosphere and the increasing human activity in those lands are releasing that carbon, a process that could trigger a vicious cycle of even more warming." Rising temperatures "could free vast stores of carbon and methane that have been collecting since the last ice age in the frozen tundra and northern forests. Their release would push the world's climate toward a heat spiral that would raise ocean levels, spawn fierce storms and scorch farmlands, scientists believe." But the land "could also be enlisted to help abate global warming, as both a storehouse for man-made carbon dioxide and a natural sponge for greenhouse gases. Policymakers are considering changes to protect and expand the forested areas that store carbon; outside the boreal forest, they are experimenting with techniques to bury man-made carbon dioxide in underground vaults and porous seams."

DOJ_NMG_0135445

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Group Sues US Over Medical Marijuana Policy.

The New York Times (2/22, Marshall) reports, "Frustrated by government policy and inaction, a group of advocates for medical marijuana sued two federal health agencies on Wednesday over the assertion that smoking it has no medical benefit." The Times continues, "The group, Americans for Safe Access, a nonprofit organization based in Oakland, filed the lawsuit in Federal District Court, challenging the government's position that marijuana, 'has no currently accepted medical use in treatment in the United States.'" The Times adds, "In its lawsuit, the group contends that federal regulators have publicly issued 'false and misleading statements' about the medical benefits of marijuana. … The lawsuit, which named the Department of Health and Human Services and the Food and Drug Administration, seeks a court order to retract and correct statements that the group called, 'incorrect, dishonest and a flagrant violation of laws.' … A lawyer for the medical marijuana group, Joseph Elford, said the lawsuit was filed now because administrative avenues had been exhausted and because of mounting scientific and anecdotal evidence to the contrary."

The AP (2/22, Leff) reports, "Armed with a new study that shows smoking marijuana eased pain in some HIV patients, medical marijuana advocates sued the U.S. government Wednesday over its claim that the drug has no accepted medical benefits." The AP continues, "The lawsuit filed in U.S. District Court by Americans for Safe Access accuses the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services of engaging in 'arbitrary and unlawful behavior' that prevents 'sick and dying persons from seeking to obtain medicine that could provide them needed, and often lifesaving relief.'" The AP adds, "The group wants a judge to force the department and the U.S. Food and Drug Administration to stop giving out information that casts doubt on the efficacy of marijuana in treating various illnesses. … 'The FDA position on medical cannabis is incorrect, dishonest and a flagrant violation of laws requiring the government to base policy on sound science,' Joe Elford, chief counsel for the group, said in a statement. … California is one of 11 states where marijuana use is legal for people with a doctor's recommendation, but because the U.S. government does not recognize the drug's medical benefits, patients can still be arrested and prosecuted by federal authorities."

The San Mateo County Times (2/21) reported the lawsuit "comes a week after the release of a controlled, clinical University of California, San Francisco study showing HIV patients who smoked marijuana found relief from chronic foot pain."

Medical Marijuana ID Card Fee To Nearly Quadruple In California. The San Mateo (CA) Daily Journal (2/22) reports state fee increases "due to a shortfall of clients for California's medical marijuana identification cards is trickling down to local programs, including San Mateo County which plans to nearly quadruple the cost by next month. At its meeting Feb. 27, the Board of Supervisors plan to increase fees from $45 to $174. Medi-Cal beneficiaries will still receive a 50 percent discount. … The change is effective March 1 but participants will only feel the pinch as their cards expire annually. The ID program must be funded entirely by fees rather than taxpayer dollars at both the state and county level."

Researchers Say Long-term Marijuana Use May Cause Respiratory Problems. HealthDay News (2/22) reports people who "smoke marijuana for a long time face many of the same kinds of respiratory problems - such as phlegm, coughing and wheezing - as long-term cigarette smokers, say researchers at the Yale School of Medicine. They reviewed previous studies from 1966 to 2005 that examined the association between marijuana and pulmonary function and respiratory complications. Some of the studies found a link between short-term marijuana use and relaxation and opening of the air passages. However, other studies identified an association between long-term marijuana use and increased risk of respiratory symptoms, suggestive of obstructive lung disease."

Marijuana Use Linked To Impaired Memory. CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (2/21, 6:00 p.m.) aired, "Marijuana is the most commonly used illegal drug in this country. But in ten states, it's legal for medical purposes. Political maneuvering has intensified the debate over medical marijuana and the growing evidence about its detrimental and dangerous effects. … Proponents of medical marijuana point to its pain-relieving qualities. And a recently-published study with HIV patients with the University of California San Francisco found benefits. But researchers at Brookhaven National laboratory have been conducting research on a different topic: the impact of long-term marijuana use and dependency on the brain." Reporter: "Impaired memory and feelings of anxiety are more than just jokes, they are reality. So too are frequent respiratory infections and concern that the cancer risk of marijuana users is higher, which is why the American cancer society does not endorse smoking marijuana nor its legalization."

DOJ_NMG_0135446

NBC Highlights Illegal Internet Drug Sales. NBC News (2/21) reports online that "buying prescription drugs over the Internet has become standard operating procedure for many Americans who used to visit the neighborhood pharmacy. And while many Internet pharmacies are 100-percent legitimate, hundreds of others are not and are seen by law enforcement as a dangerous problem." NBC's Mark Potter "was on a raid of one of these alleged pill mills." NBC adds, "At a drug store near Tampa, agents and investigators from the Drug Enforcement Agency swoop in to suspend the license of an Internet pharmacy for allegedly selling painkillers over the Web illegally. In this case, boxes and boxes of hydrocodone. 'This is probably destined for a customer who's ordered it online somewhere across the country,' says DEA Investigator Chris Grush."

NBC Nightly News (2/21, story 10, 2:30, Williams) aired, "Authorities say thousands of Web sites and hundreds of illegal pharmacies have sprung up nationwide, cutting corners on medical exams, charging 6 to 10 times the normal price for prescription drugs that are widely abused." Mark Trouville, DEA: "They're hiding behind the profession, they're hiding behind their education and out to make money." NBC added, "The big concern is that many online pharmacies use doctors to write prescriptions for dangerous and addictive drugs, for people they've never met. Federal agents say it is not uncommon for Internet buyers to simply fill out a brief medical questionnaire."

Authorities Say Colombian Woman Is Highest Ranking FARC Member Convicted In US. The Washington Times (2/22, Seper) reports a "high-ranking female member of a left-wing Colombian terrorist organization has been convicted with two others in U.S. District Court for the District of Columbia on drug charges." Nayibe Rojas Valderama, "was convicted, along with co-defendants Jose Antonio Celis and Juan Diego Giraldo, on charges of conspiring to import cocaine into the United States and conspiring to manufacture and distribute cocaine -- knowing it would be unlawfully imported into the United States." Valderama "has been identified by U.S. law-enforcement authorities as the finance officer of the 14th Front of FARC and is the highest-ranking member of the group to be convicted in the United States. … 'The FARC is a double evil -- they poison the blood of our people with their drugs and spill the blood of their own with guns and machetes bought with drug profits,' U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration boss Karen P. Tandy said."

In its "Nation in Brief" section, the Washington Post (2/21, A4) reported prosecutors "cast Rojas, also known as Sonia, as a gun-toting senior FARC official who gathered coca base from farmers and sold it to refiners and traffickers, who then sent more than five tons of cocaine to the United States."

IMMIGRATION:

Kennedy Set To Introduce Immigration Reform Bill. The Washington Times (2/22, Hurt, 88K) reports, "Senators and lobbyists are putting the final touches on a comprehensive immigration-reform bill that includes an easier citizenship path for illegal aliens and weaker enforcement provisions than were in the highly criticized legislation that the Senate approved last year." Sen. Edward Kennedy "will introduce the bill as early as next week, according to Senate sources knowledgeable about the negotiations. If the Senate Judiciary Committee can make quick work of the bill, it could be ready for floor action in April." Kennedy "drafted this year's bill with help from Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican, and outside lobbyists. Mr. McCain and the outside groups share Mr. Kennedy's support for increased immigration and leniency for illegals already in the country." Among the "most active participants have been the Essential Worker Immigration Coalition (EWIC) and the U.S. Chamber of Commerce."

Arizona Sees Shortage Of Farm Workers. The Christian Science Monitor (2/22, Bowers, 59K) reports, "Empty stations on the harvest lines are more common this year throughout this swath of Arizona farm country, says" Rick Rademacher, "who serves as president of the Yuma Fresh Vegetable Association. The reasons are many: A 40,000-person limit on the number of foreign guest workers allowed into the US, tighter borders that are discouraging illegal crossings, and rising demand for day laborers in other industries, such as higher-paying construction work." The shortage "of farm workers has been driving wages higher. Last season, base pay for day laborers working in this area was $6.50 an hour. Now it's $8.50. Rademacher says it may go higher because farmers here can't attract enough employees." Rademacher would "like to see an expanded guest-worker program to ease the labor crunch here, just five miles from the border. It would ensure that he can get his crop in – and sell it to supermarkets at a price that is competitive with prices of vegetables from overseas."

Advocacy Groups Criticize Conditions At Family Detention Centers. The New York Times (2/22, Swarns, 1.16M) reports a pair of advocacy groups, the Women's Commission for Refugee Women and Children, and Lutheran Immigration and Refugee Services, are expected to release a report Thursday criticizing the "prisonlike housing" at detention centers used by the Bush administration to hold immigrant families. "The Department of Homeland Security, which allowed the advocacy groups to visit the two detention centers that house immigrant families, has already corrected several problems identified by the groups." Officials at the agency, "who said they were still reviewing the report, vigorously defended the quality of services provided by" the T. Don Hutto Residential Center and the Berks Family Shelter Care Facility, with spokesman Marc Raimondi saying that both "adhere to the highest standards."

DOJ_NMG_0135447

The Washington Post (2/22, A3, Moreno, 690K) reports Mustafa Elmi, a 3-year-old living at Hutto, "had to report to his cell three times for headcount" on his birthday. "To be able to get one hour of recreation inside a concrete compound sealed off by metal gates and razor wire he had to pin his picture ID to his uniform." Though "US Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) routinely separated parents from their children upon apprehension by the Border Patrol" before Hutto was opened last May, the advocacy groups "have termed the facility 'a penal detention model that is fundamentally anti-family and anti-American.'" Their report "lauded the goal of keeping families together but urged DHS to close the Hutto facility, saying that 'prison-like institutions' are not appropriate for families. … In response, ICE spokesman Marc Raimondi said that the Hutto and Berks facilities 'maintain safe, secure and humane conditions and invest heavily in the welfare' of the detainees."

McClatchy (2/22, Mondics) reports Berks was found to have "the more humane conditions, but even there detainees reported harassment by staff including the threat of separating parents from their children, the report said. 'Every woman we talked to in the facilities cried,' said Michelle Brane, one of the authors of the report, prepared by the Lutheran Immigration and Refugee Service and the Women's Commission for Refugee Women and Children."

Immigration Raids Raise Concerns Among Advocate Groups. The AP (2/22, Barbassa) reports, "Fear has gripped immigrant families across the United States as federal agents raid neighborhoods, work sites and jails in a nationwide crackdown on illegal immigration." The AP continues, "Tens of thousands of people have been rounded up over the past several months, and many more are afraid to leave home, answer a knock on the door or leave their children alone in fear they might be next. Churches and community groups are stepping in with legal advice and financial aid for families split up or left without an income because of the sweeps. … From California to Connecticut, federal officials have launched a full-scale offensive to find and deport illegal immigrants. It's part of a two-pronged approach, said Virginia Kice, spokeswoman for U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement: secure the nation's borders while stepping up enforcement within." The AP adds, "Groups supporting a reduction in immigration have praised the shift toward more aggressive enforcement. 'Enforcement actions like these play an enormous role in deterrence,' said Steven Camarota, of the conservative think tank Center for Immigration Studies. … But many immigrants and their advocates say it's splitting families and hurting the legal relatives of immigrants who crossed the border illegally, as well as their co-workers, employers and the businesses that serve them."

TAX:

Brother Of Alleged Chicago Mobster Gets Probation For Tax Fraud. The Chicago Tribune (2/22, Gibson, 617K) reports, "The brother of reputed mob boss Joey 'the Clown' Lombardo was sentenced Wednesday to 60 months' probation for conspiracy in a tax fraud scheme centered at a strip club in Las Vegas. Sixteen individuals, including Lombardo's brother Rocco, have pleaded guilty to the conspiracy scheme for underreporting cash they received while working at the Crazy Horse Too strip club. The case stems from a lengthy federal investigation of the strip club and owner Ricky Rizzolo." The Tribune notes, "Rizzolo and Rocco Lombardo would dine with Joey Lombardo when Rizzolo came to Chicago on business, court records show. And when Joey Lombardo disappeared, FBI agents went looking for him in Las Vegas."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Bush Promotes Healthcare Plans In Visit To Tennessee. USA Today (2/22, 7A, 2.27M) reports President Bush "flew to Chattanooga, Tenn., on Wednesday to promote his plan to expand health care coverage to millions of people by shifting decisions and responsibility to individuals. … Under the president's proposal, health insurance benefits would be taxable income, but people would get a standard tax deduction for health insurance: up to $15,000 for family coverage, $7,500 for individual coverage." In Chattanooga, Bush co-hosted a healthcare forum with Tennessee Gov. Phil Bredesen, a Democrat. The AP (2/22, Feller) says Bush "received a hearty ovation as he described his plan." He "shared a stage with people who hold full-time jobs but can't afford health insurance for their families."

The Chattanoogan (2/21) reported on its website, "Some 500 Chattanoogans, including many of the city's leaders, were in attendance as the President moderated the event aimed at promoting his new policies aimed at making health care more affordable. He was on the podium with selected citizens and business owners -- all of whom said they either could not afford health care coverage or had inadequate coverage."

DOJ_NMG_0135448

The Washington Post (2/22, Abramowitz, 690K) reports, "Democrats in Washington are showing little enthusiasm for the Bush health agenda, but the president is plugging away, insisting he sees hope for compromise before his term ends in less than two years. Indeed, the end seemed on his mind as he bantered with several hundred audience members, arguing for greater transparency in health-care pricing." The Post also reviews Bush's proposed tax-code changes and notes, "Many health economists say they think Bush is overstating the impact of the tax code changes, but they say he might have a bigger bang if he were to give low-income people tax credits to buy insurance, an idea the White House considered and rejected. A study released this week by the Community Research Council of Chattanooga concluded that very few of the uninsured in Hamilton County, which includes Chattanooga and its suburbs, make enough money to benefit under the current Bush plan." The Post also notes, "Even as the president arrived in Tennessee, the local news was full of reports that a change in federal reimbursement policy could cost the state as much as $250 million annually for charity care, countering any relief under the president's new plan."

The New York Times (2/22, Stolberg, 1.16M) says Bush "held forth for nearly an hour," at the event, where "participants had been carefully selected, the tone was confessional, and the president, describing himself as the 'educator in chief,' sounded more like talk-show host in chief." The Times continues, "The round-table discussion, which followed a similar if less lively event with health insurance executives in Washington on Tuesday, was aimed at pitching the president's proposal to provide tax breaks for low- and moderate-income workers to buy insurance while imposing tax increases on some Americans covered by generous employer-sponsored plans." The Times also notes that Bredesen, who has sponsored an initiative called Cover Tennessee, "said in a phone interview that he was skeptical of the president's tax proposal and had been a bit leery of participating in the event here."

The Los Angeles Times (2/22, Reynolds, 850K) says the President "traded one-liners with a handful of workers and employers, who have had trouble getting health insurance. One of them was an interior designer named Amy Childers, who dropped her health coverage when she turned 35 and the premium was raised to $210 a month. 'Doesn't it make sense to change the tax code so that Amy Childers can better afford health care?' the president asked. Then he joked, 'You don't look a day over 34.' 'Most people say 22,' Childers responded, adding that she would forgive him."

Local TV stations in Tennessee and around the country reported on the President's trip. WVLT-TV Knoxville (2/21, 11:03 pm) reported, "President Bush set his sights on Chattanooga today, promoting his healthcare initiative." The station showed the President saying, "We want there to be price transparency in healthcare. I don't know about you but I don't remember ever asking how much something was going to cost when it came to healthcare." The station added, "President Bush wants Congress to create a tax break to encourage the uninsured to buy health insurance. Opponents argue his plan would give more companies a reason to drop company-provided healthcare." Many other newscasts ran that quote from the President, including WTXL-TV Tallahassee (2/21, 11:15 pm), WBIR-TV Knoxville (2/21, 11:10 pm), WWMT-TV Grand Rapids (2/21, 11:10 pm), WZTV-TV Nashville (2/21, 9:49 pm), WBBJ-TV Jackson, TN (2/21, 6:11 pm), WRCB-TV Chattanooga (2/21, 6:03 pm), and KGTV-TV San Diego (2/21, 5:39 pm).

The AP (2/22) reports that "supporters and protesters" turned out at Bush's events yesterday. The AP says "most carried welcome signs or waved flags on a sunny and unseasonably warm day with temperatures in the mid-60s. Among them were several students from Chattanooga State Technical Community College, who attended in order to earn some credit for a government class." The Chattanoogan (2/22, Frank) runs a similar report.

Democrats Criticize Bush Proposals. As Bush promoted his proposals, congressional Democrats continued to criticize them as insufficient. The Los Angeles Times (2/22, Reynolds, 850K) reports Democrats "say the biggest problem facing the system is the 40 million Americans with no health insurance, and they say the president's proposal would help only a small fraction of them become insured. In particular, they point out that the deduction would not help taxpayers who do not itemize their income tax returns, especially poorer paid workers who are the most likely to lack health insurance." Instead, "Democrats favor a tax credit for health care premiums, which would help all taxpayers regardless of their filing status." USA Today (2/22, 7A, 2.27M) notes Sen. Edward Kennedy, chairman of the Senate committee "that oversees health matters," said yesterday the Bush plan "undercuts a system built on employer-provided coverage."

Meanwhile, noting that Bush's plan "has been pronounced dead by leading Democrats on Capitol Hill.," the New York Times (2/22, Stolberg, 1.16M) also says "leading Democrats, including Senator Max Baucus of Montana, chairman of the Finance Committee, and Representative Pete Stark of California, chairman of a subcommittee overseeing health policy, said in interviews that Mr. Bush's plan was far too dependent on the private sector and that they did not envision anything like it becoming law. Mr. Stark called it 'a farcical move' that was 'primarily designed to encourage employers to drop group coverage.' Mr. Baucus said the plan was 'too much focused on the individual market,' though he did give the president credit for 'stirring up the debate' with his tax idea."

DOJ_NMG_0135449

The AP (2/22, Feller) reports "key Democratic leaders have denounced Bush's plan," while Market Watch (2/21, Watts) notes "top Senate Democrats on Wednesday charged that…Bush's proposal to change how the tax code treats employer-provided health benefits would do little to help the uninsured."

Army Rushes To Correct Poor Living Conditions At Walter Reed Hospital. ABC World News (2/21, story 4, 2:10, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Many of the wounded being brought home from Iraq, have passed through the Army's Walter Reed Medical Center in Washington. The medical care there has been much praised. But a Washington newspaper investigation has reported that part of the facility itself is ailing. And the Army has been quick to acknowledge that that is, indeed, the case." ABC (Kerly) added, "Just across the street from Walter Reed hospital, this is what greets wounded soldiers. Mold, holes in walls, rats and insect infestation. Building 18 is home for those, who among other things, have lost limbs or suffered brain injuries. And now, a huge embarrassment for the Army." Gen Richard Cody, Army Vice Chief of Staff: "The senior Army leadership takes full responsibility for the lack of quality of life at Building 18. And we're going to fix it." Kerly: "But the Army didn't even know about the problems, until 'The Washington Post' printed the stunning results of a four-month investigation. But it's not just problems with the rooms in this building. 'The Post' investigation found that many of the wounded soldiers here are not getting the services they need. Soldiers face a bureaucratic nightmare and a shortage of trained staff." Rep. Tom Davis (R): "These people gave their lives, their limbs for this country. And they come back here and we treat them very shabbily. And it shouldn't happen."

NBC Nightly News (2/21, story 4, 2:00, Yang, 9.87M) reported, "As the fallout continued over the shocking conditions at Walter Reed Army Medical Center's decrepit Building 18 today, top Army officials were front and center. At the Pentagon…" Gen Richard Cody: "I'm the Vice Chief of Staff for the Army. I'll take responsibility for this and make sure it is fixed." Yang: "And at Walter Reed." Major General George Weightman: "It is a leadership problem, but I would say it is my issue as the commander of this organization to take responsibility for that." Yang: "Walter Reed's commanding general said building managers relied too much on soldiers' complaints about conditions, rather than making spot inspection, a system veterans call unacceptable." Officials "blame the problems here at Building 18 on being overwhelmed. Not just by the sheer number of wounded coming here, but by the fact more are staying longer. That is because the military is making an effort to let more of the wounded continue to serve in uniform rather than quickly discharging them."

The Washington Post (2/22, A6, Tyson, 690K) reports Gen. Cody "vowed yesterday to personally oversee the upgrading of Walter Reed Army Medical Center's Building 18, a dilapidated former hotel that houses wounded soldiers as outpatients." The Army Vice Chief of Staff "used terminology similar to that of a military campaign to describe his plan to overhaul the broken building, including giving it a more 'appropriate' name, and the sluggish bureaucracy for outpatient care." Cody "blamed 'a breakdown in leadership' for the troubling conditions but said no one has been fired or relieved of command. He did point to lower-ranking officers and noncommissioned officers lacking 'the right experience and the authority to be able to execute some of the missions.'" Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (Va.), "the top Republican on the House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform, blasted the Army yesterday, saying in a statement that it has known for years about shortcomings at Walter Reed."

The Hill (2/21, Tiron) reports, "Several lawmakers are taking action to improve the conditions and care for veterans of the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan at Walter Reed Army Medical Center." Sens. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) and Claire McCaskill (D-Mo.) "are sponsoring legislation to improve the lives of recovering veterans at Walter Reed, while Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.), a cosponsor of the Obama-McCaskill legislation, said that he would explore ways to direct new funds to Walter Reed and make immediate improvements to its veteran housing." Meanwhile, Rep. Louise Slaughter (D-N.Y.) "wrote a letter yesterday to Secretary of Defense Robert Gates demanding information on the current state of Walter Reed's outpatient facilities."

Congressional Quarterly (2/21, Yoest) reports, "Senate Veterans Affairs Chairman Daniel K. Akaka, D-Hawaii, said he would hold a hearing on the issue next month, since many of the soldiers housed at Walter Reed will soon become veterans." Akaka said, "I will purse the situation at Walter Reed and other military treatment facilities that are handling the bulk of returning Iraq and Afghanistan war veterans to ensure that the government is helping those who have been injured in service to our country, and their families." Democratic Sens. Patty Murray of Washington and Barbara Mikulski of Maryland "sent a letter to Defense Secretary Robert Gates calling for an inspector general's investigation into outpatient care and the availability of psychological counseling for soldiers and their families."

AARP Backs Effort To Reform Social Security. The Politico (2/22, Patch) reports AARP officials "said Wednesday they will push hard to revamp Social Security to maintain the social insurance program's solvency and fiscal health." CEO Bill Novelli, legislative policy director David

DOJ_NMG_0135450

Certner and John Rother, executive officer for policy and strategy said "changes need to be made in the program to head off rising health care costs and declining financial security, especially among baby boomers." Novelli said, "The next generation could be the first in American history that is less well off than their parents." Though Social Security "is often deemed a 'third rail' of American politics for its sensitivity, the program can and should be reformed, Novelli said." The Politico adds that AARP "released a poll showing a consensus for reform in some of the key areas of Social Security." Of eight "possible options, a majority of respondents favored three measures that would raise revenue for Social Security in some fashion: increasing the income cap to $150,000; increasing the payroll tax by 0.5 percent for both workers and employers, and changing the benefit formula to make the program more progressive."

Female Members Criticize Baca's Leadership Of Hispanic Caucus. The Washington Post (2/22, A17, Layton, 690K) reports that the "congressional recess has provided a timeout for feuding members of the Hispanic Caucus," and Chairman Joe Baca "is trying to hold together the group of 20 Democrats and smooth over multiple rifts." But several female members of the "mostly male caucus say Baca himself is a source of problems, and one, Rep. Loretta Sanchez (D-Calif.), resigned last month in protest. There were six female members and 15 male members before Sanchez quit. … At a closed meeting last week designed to mend fences, Sanchez made an appearance and, along with several other women, aired grievances, said sources familiar with the caucus's workings. The women said their requests of the caucus staff are not taken seriously, among other things."

Snow, Correspondents Meet For Friendly National Press Club Forum. The Washington Post (2/22, A2, Milbank, 690K) writes about what CBS's Bob Schieffer called a "man bites dog" story at the National Press Club Tuesday night, when six White House correspondents" had agreed to submit to questioning" by White House Press Secretary Tony Snow, "who usually is at the receiving end of such grillings. But Snow wouldn't bite. 'For those of you who are expecting theatrical savagery on my part, forget about it,' Snow advised the crowd of 250 and a live C-SPAN audience. … Snow argued that reporters are not the jackals that the public supposes them to be. The reporters reciprocated with warm tales about covering the Bush White House; one spoke about the perk of seeing Snow's bare knees. 'If there is a flash of tempers between me and Tony, it's not about him and me, it's nothing personal,'" said NBC's David Gregory, "whose televised clashes with Snow have become legend. Snow grinned. 'What you see quite often at the briefings are sharp exchanges, but David's right: It's not personal,' the press secretary agreed. 'I not only like but admire everybody else sitting up here on this podium. It is a real pleasure and a privilege to work with them, to get to know them. … It is a wondrous thing." The Politico (2/22, Allen) also runs a story on the event.

District Of Columbia House Vote Bill "Cruising Along." The Washington Post (2/22, A17, Romano, 690K) writes, "It can't be easy being in Congress without a vote," but District of Columbia Delegate Eleanor Holmes Norton, "has stuck it out for 16 long years, never truly a part of the club but always relentlessly knocking on the door seeking admittance. Now, Norton is sure, success is in her sights. With Democratic leaders pledging to get it done and ample Republican support, the bill giving both the District of Columbia and Utah an additional voting seat is cruising along. 'Won't we be surprised if it doesn't happen -- but I tell you, it's in the stars,' Norton said yesterday." The bill "must clear two committees before it is brought for a floor vote. Norton is hoping that will happen in March." A spokesman for House Speaker Nancy Pelosi said Pelosi "is committed to finalizing the bill's language, moving it through committees and having a floor vote as soon as possible."

Cheney Says McCain Wrong On Rumsfeld. The AP (2/22, Sidoti) reports Vice President Dick Cheney "on Wednesday challenged GOP presidential hopeful John McCain's assertion that Donald H. Rumsfeld was one of the country's worst defense secretaries." Cheney said, "John's entitled to his opinion. I just think he's wrong." In an interview with ABC News, Cheney "also disclosed that the Arizona senator had apologized to him for a previous comment that the vice president had 'badly served' President Bush on Iraq." Cheney said, "John said some nasty things about me the other day, and then next time he saw me, ran over to me and apologized. Maybe he'll apologize to Rumsfeld." The AP adds that at a campaign event in Los Angeles, McCain "said he stood by his remarks about Rumsfeld. He did not mention the vice president, and his campaign declined to comment on Cheney's remarks."

The Politico (2/22, Allen) reports Cheney "made it clear during an interview with ABC News Wednesday that he was none too pleased with McCain's declaration on Monday at a retirement community near Hilton Head Island, S.C.: 'I think that Donald Rumsfeld will go down in history as one of the worst secretaries of Defense in history.' McCain was greeted with applause."

The Washington Post (2/22, A4, Fletcher, 690K) reports Cheney "objected yesterday to Sen. John McCain's assertion that Donald H. Rumsfeld 'will go down as one of the worst secretaries of defense in history' and added that the senator had apologized to him for saying Cheney had misled President Bush on Iraq."

DOJ_NMG_0135451

Documentary Suggests Rumsfeld Policies Led To Abu Ghraib. In the Washington Post (2/22, C1, 690K), Tom Shales reviews the new HBO documentary "Ghosts Of Abu Ghraib," saying it "daringly approaches a scandal that hardly anyone wants to see reexamined -- least of all, one can safely assume, the Bush administration and the Pentagon. The reason is not just that what happened at Abu Ghraib is, to understate in the extreme, unpleasant. The documentary says it's also because this breakdown was not so much nervous as inevitable -- and not so spontaneous, having been sanctioned by the top brass, including former defense secretary Donald Rumsfeld." Kennedy "suggests the torture was not an outbreak of lunacy but the direct result of policies handed down by Rumsfeld that were designed to circumvent the Geneva Conventions…and U.N. conventions against torture, to which the United States is, at least technically, a signatory."

Davis Measure Would Extend Health Care Premium Savings Benefit To Retirees. The Washington Post's (2/22, D4, Barr) "Federal Diary" column reports, "Since 2000, federal employees have been able to pay their health insurance premiums on a tax-free basis," and many "federal retirees think they should get similar treatment. But extending 'premium conversion,' as it's called, to retirees would require a change in tax law, and Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.) and others, who have pushed for that change in the last three congressional sessions, are back at it." The Post quotes Davis who called the change "modest" and said that "to those on fixed income, this could have a real impact," noting that the measure "would result in average savings of $820 a year for federal retirees, he estimated. Under the bill, federal civil service and military retirees would pay their monthly health-care premiums through a pretax deduction from their annuities. The bill also would permit active-duty military personnel to deduct from their taxable income certain supplemental premiums or enrollment fees for Tricare, their military health insurance." The Post notes that in previous efforts to gain approval the "likely cost of the bill appears to" have been "the sticking point. According to a Congressional Budget Office estimate, extending the tax break to federal retirees would cost about $600 million over 10 years."

OTHER NEWS:

Inflation Gauge Rose More Than Expected In January. The Wall Street Journal (2/22, Conkey, 2.04M) reports, "A widely watched gauge of consumer prices rose last month at the fastest rate since June, interrupting what had been a steadily improving inflation outlook in recent months." The Labor Department "said its index of 'core' consumer prices, which excludes food and energy, rose 0.3% in January, after a string of three consecutive monthly increases of 0.1%. Those modest gains had begun to persuade economists that inflation was decelerating. … Last month's increase in core prices was fueled by unusually sharp price increases for health care, which rose 0.8% from December, and in tobacco and smoking products, which leapt 1.5%." Federal Reserve Bank of San Francisco President Janet Yellen "acknowledged yesterday that core inflation was 'on the high side of expectations.'" But "in a speech to a business group in Santa Clara, Calif., she added: 'This followed three straight months' of low core inflation."

The New York Times (2/22, Peters, 1.16M) reports, "Though inflation growth, as represented by the Consumer Price Index, slowed from December, it advanced faster than economists and Wall Street investors had expected." The Washington Post (2/22, D1, Henderson, 690K) runs a similar story under the headline "Slowing Economy Isn't Cooling Prices."

USA Today (2/22, Hagenbaugh, Kirchhoff, 2.27M) reports "Brian Bethune of Global Insight says recent indicators show economic growth wasn't as rosy as the Fed estimated at last month's meeting. Still, the bump in the consumer price index means the Fed needs to keep a close eye on inflation. He expects rates to be steady for most of 2007."

The Financial Times (2/22, Callan, Guha) reports, "The Federal Reserve grew more confident that inflation was moderating at its January policy meeting, minutes released on Wednesday revealed, but policymakers still did not see a downward trend in core inflation as 'definitely established.'" The minutes "show that all members of the Federal Open Market Committee agreed that the predominent risk remained inflation rather than growth."

Central Bankers Confident In World Economy. The Wall Street Journal (2/22, Hayashi, Perry, Ip, 2.04M) reports, "The Bank of Japan's move to raise interest rates for the first time since July underscores the surprisingly upbeat state of the world's major economies, which continue to perk along despite the damage done by high energy prices and sagging housing markets. The world's central bankers are so confident that growth will remain steady and inflation under control that their main worry is less the immediate future than whether conditions are breeding excessive speculation in financial markets." Although "the U.S. economy has slowed substantially from its torrid pace of a year ago, it has kept growing fast enough to keep unemployment down despite the housing slump. In the 13 countries that use the euro, growth is expected to abate from last year's six-year high but remain well above the sluggish pace of prior years."

DOJ_NMG_0135452

Stocks Mixed. NBC Nightly News (2/21, story 7, :10, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "On Wall Street here in New York today, a mixed finish at the end of the day. The Dow was down more than 48 points [to close at 12,738.41]. NASDAQ gained over five points on the day's trading [to close at 2518.42.]" The Wall Street Journal (2/22, C1, McKay, Karmin, 2.04M) says "the stock market reacted with little more than a shrug -- with the Dow down and the Nasdaq up -- as crude oil topped $60 a barrel for the first time this year and investors fretted about monetary policy in the U.S. and Japan."

McCain Criticizes Bush On Global Warming, Iraq. The Los Angeles Times (2/22, Finnegan, 850K) reports McCain "was anything but subtle Wednesday as he took swipes at the Bush administration during a meticulously staged appearance with Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger on the bustling docks of Los Angeles Harbor. President Bush's record on global warming? 'Terrible,' McCain declared. His pursuit of the Iraq war? 'A train wreck.'" If the "point of the Arizona senator's visit was to put distance between himself and his party's unpopular president, McCain was following a pattern set by Schwarzenegger last year in his re-election campaign. For McCain, the task is especially important, because his vocal support for Bush's recent troop buildup in Iraq threatens a voter backlash." In what "was billed as a nonpolitical event to call for tougher federal action to stop global warming, McCain joined Schwarzenegger for a hazy-morning helicopter tour of the Long Beach and Los Angeles ports. The Republican duo flew over the future site of a hydrogen power plant that would pump carbon dioxide into the ground instead of the air." On the San Pedro docks, Schwarzenegger "offered McCain access to his usual retinue of trailing television crews, and McCain used the opportunity to pound Bush on a number of fronts."

Schwarzenegger Extols McCain At Los Angeles Event. The AP (2/22, Blood) reports Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger "offered his most lavish praise yet Wednesday for any 2008 presidential candidate, calling John McCain a 'great senator' and 'very good friend' who shared his views on critical issues like the environment." Schwarzenegger "stopped short of a formal declaration of support for McCain's budding candidacy, but their appearance together in the Port of Los Angeles was a strong reminder that the two maverick Republicans share a well-developed friendship." McCain "joked that he was endorsed by Schwarzenegger. Then Schwarzenegger said their joint appearance wasn't about politics." McCain said, "We share common philosophy and goals for this country."

McCain, Giuliani Yet To Sign Tax Cut Pledge. Under the headline, "GOP 'Darlings' Slow To Sign Tax-cut Pledge," the Washington Times (2/22, Lambro, 88K) reports Sen. John McCain and Rudy Giuliani "have not signed an anti-tax-increase pledge that has been embraced by several of their rivals." The "reluctance of the party's two leading candidates to sign the pledge, which has been signed by every Republican presidential nominee since 1988, raised concerns among conservative tax cutters about Mr. McCain's and Mr. Giuliani's commitment to reduce tax rates at a time when all of the Democratic presidential contenders have vowed to raise income taxes if they are elected." Jack Kemp said, "I can't imagine that McCain wouldn't sign it or that Giuliani wouldn't sign it. I can't imagine any Republican not signing that." The Times adds the pledge, "which asks the candidates to sign a statement declaring they will 'oppose any and all efforts to increase the marginal income tax rates,' could become an issue for both men as they vie for the support of their party's economic conservatives -- especially for Mr. McCain who was a foe of President Bush's tax cuts until he began actively running for president last year."

GOP Candidates Advised To Seek The "Big Mo." In his New York Times column (2/22), David Brooks offers advice for Republican presidential candidates, suggesting, "First: Be the Snowball. The conventional view is that Feb. 5 is going to be the decisive day of the race, when California, New Jersey, Illinois and a bunch of other states will probably have their primaries. That's wrong." Because "so many states will be voting then, the candidates will be stretched thin in all of them. As a result, the Republican candidate who does best in the first three states — Iowa, New Hampshire and, on Feb. 2, South Carolina — will sweep on Feb. 5 through sheer momentum." Other advice includes "the Rule of Three. When three big candidates go up against one another, two of them often get into a mutually destructive grudge match and the third skates through to victory. (Right now, the McCain and Romney camps seem set to brawl, leaving Giuliani alone.)" Another suggestion is that if "your last name is Giuliani, McCain or Romney, social conservatives are never going to love you. Don't try to pander to gain their devotion. Instead, offer them a deal," telling them "I'm the guy who can deliver on four programs you want. Then pick out four programs you and they can agree on and repeat them in every speech for the next year."

Clinton, Obama Camps Trade Jabs Over Geffen Comments. The fallout from comments made by Hollywood mogul David Geffen, a supporter of Sen. Barack Obama's presidential campaign, that appeared in Wednesday's Maureen Dowd column in the New York Times dominates the political news today, with two broadcast networks and several major newspapers reporting on the back-and-forth between the Obama and Sen. Hillary Clinton campaigns. The story eclipses coverage of a forum for Democratic candidates in Nevada that was attended by eight candidates, with only Obama absent.

DOJ_NMG_0135453

ABC World News (2/21, story 5, 2:30, Gibson, 8.78M) said that though "there are more than 10 months to go until we even get to the presidential election year," Clinton and Obama "were sniping at one another, as if the campaign were in midstream." ABC (Tapper) said that in the Dowd column, Geffen "lashed out at both Clintons, saying, 'Everybody in politics lies. But they do it with such ease, it's troubling.' Geffen also alluded to the former 'president's personal life, calling him 'a reckless guy,' and insinuating he has not changed since the Monica Lewinsky days. … Geffen has no official role with the Obama campaign. But almost immediately the Clinton campaign went after Obama, saying he was hypocritical for tolerating Geffen's comments, given Obama's pitch against negative campaigning."

The CBS Evening News (2/21, story 10, 2:20, Couric, 7.66M) said Clinton and Obama "are trading jabs in their first public spat." CBS (Borger) added, "It's 21 months before the election at the first feel-good Democratic candidate forum, yet the campaigns of the two most famous Democrats were already hissing at each other." Clinton: "I sure don't want Democrats or the supporters of Democrats to be engaging in the politics of personal destruction." Borger: "Geffen, a movie mogul and former Clintonite, has deserted his one-time friends for Obama. … The Clinton campaign used the comments to try and recast Obama into another pol who preached against nasty politics while his supporters practice it."

The AP (2/21, Pickler, Riley) said the Clinton and Obama camps "traded accusations of nasty politics" over the Geffen comments. While the Clinton campaign "demanded that Obama denounce comments made by the DreamWorks movie studio founder," Obama, campaigning in Iowa, refused, saying, "It's not clear to me why I'd be apologizing for someone else's remark." Clinton, in Nevada, "sidestepped questions, leaving the issue to her aides to discuss. 'I'm just going to stay focused on my campaign and I'm going to run a positive campaign about the issues that affect the people in our country,'" she said. The Des Moines Register (2/22, 160K) says Obama "said he 'can't be responsible for the statements of every individual' and said voters and candidates alike have more pressing issues that deserve focus."

The Washington Post (2/22, Cillizza, Balz, 690K) headlines its front-page report "Clinton, Obama Camps' Feud Is Out In The Open," and leads by saying "an increasingly acrimonious competition" between Clinton and Obama "to enlist the Democratic Party's leading fundraisers and operatives burst into the open yesterday, overshadowing what was billed as the presidential campaign's first gathering of candidates in Nevada." The Chicago Tribune (2/22, Dorning, Zuckman, 617K) says the Clinton camp was "perhaps stung by Obama's successful incursion into Hollywood, which at one time was unchallenged Clinton country," and "hit back hard, saying Geffen's comments contrasted poorly with the Illinois senator's self-promotion as a new breed of politician, unifying and optimistic."

Newsday (2/22, Thrush) headlines its report "Barack, Hillary Trade Body Blows," saying the "fight was waged through a series of heated e-mails from both campaigns Wednesday -- in which Clinton's top spokesman accused Obama of being a 'slash & burn' politician and Obama's staff slammed the Clintons for using the Lincoln Bedroom as a cash register in the 1990s." McClatchy (2/22, Thomma) calls it the "first full-scale fight of the fledgling 2008 presidential campaign between the front-runners" on the Democratic side, and "perhaps enough to kill talk of a new, less hostile politics - and maybe even speculation about a Clinton-Obama or Obama-Clinton ticket."

On its front page, the New York Times (2/22, Healy, Rutenberg, 1.16M) calls it a "remarkably caustic exchange between the Clinton and Obama campaigns that highlighted the sensitivity in the Clinton camp to Mr. Obama's rapid rise as a rival and his positioning as a fresh face unburdened by the baggage borne by Mrs. Clinton." The Clinton camp "seemed also to be sending a warning to mudslinging critics that they would be dealt with fiercely." The Wall Street Journal (2/22, A8, Calmes, 2.04M) writes, "Forget President Bush." The Clinton and Obama campaigns "have gone after each other in an unusually early and nasty exchange. … An email fusillade yesterday left many Democrats shaking their heads that party infighting -- like everything else about the 2008 presidential campaign -- is starting so soon, nearly a year before the first nominating votes."

The Los Angeles Times (2/22, Daunt, Wallsten, 850K) says that Clinton "eventually was going to face the legacy of the more unsavory episodes of her husband's two terms as president. But in a surprise Wednesday, the first person to draw wide attention to some of the old controversies was not a Republican candidate or the 'vast, right-wing conspiracy' that the Clintons have assailed, but a leading liberal at the heart of Hollywood." USA Today (2/22, 6A, Lawrence, 2.27M) reports that at the Nevada forum, another candidate, Gov. Bill Richardson, "said Democrats should pledge not to attack one another. Asked whether Obama should denounce the Geffen comments, he replied: 'Yes. If we're going to win, we have to be positive.'" The Financial Times (2/22, Luce) and the Washington Times (2/22, Bellantoni, 88K) also report on the flap.

Clinton campaign communications director Howard Wolfson said on MSNBC's Hardball (2/21, Matthews), "Our expectation was that Sen. Obama, who was running a campaign premised on changing our politics, who has decried the politics of slash and burn, would denounce the comments, say that these comments don't represent his thinking or his campaign. We were, frankly, surprised that he didn't do that. It makes you wonder whether or not he agrees with them. It's a little ironic that the candidate on one day would say, 'I want to change America. I want to change politics. I want to lift us up. I want to stop the politics of slash and burn,' while at the same time his leading supporter in California is attacking [President Clinton] and Sen. Clinton in very personal terms. … I think that we can have differences of opinion over policy. I hope the Democrats will stay united and mostly focus on winning in November of '08, but obviously, there will be some differences on policy. But when you start getting into personal charges against people and you make personal insults against the candidate and the candidate's spouse, I think that's going too far. I think the American people will think that's going too far."

DOJ_NMG_0135454

Eight Democrats Meet In Campaign's First Major Forum. Eight Democratic presidential hopefuls -- Sen. Joseph Biden, Sen. Hillary Clinton, Sen. Christopher Dodd, John Edwards, Mike Gravel, Rep. Dennis Kucinich, Gov. Bill Richardson, and Tom Vilsack -- "defended their histories on Iraq, offered their ideas for ending the war and opened fault lines on taxes and health care Wednesday in the first major forum of the 2008 nomination race," USA Today (2/22, 6A, Lawrence, 2.27M) reports. Among major contenders, only Sen. Barack Obama, campaigning in Iowa, was missing from the Carson City, Nevada, forum, sponsored by the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees.

The New York Times (2/22, A18, Healy, 1.16M) says the "toughest words" came from Edwards, who "said Americans needed 'a different kind of leadership' than that provided by the current president who, Mr. Edwards said, had refused to admit error on Iraq." Asked about Clinton's "explanation that her vote was cast based on a sincere belief in military intelligence provided at the time, Mr. Edwards replied: 'Whether it's good enough I think is between her and her conscience. It's not for me to judge.'" Dodd, "who has also renounced his 2002 vote, said there was 'nothing wrong' with admitting mistakes." The AP (2/21, Fouhy) says the "event format did not permit Clinton to respond to Edwards' swipe, which stood out on an afternoon in which Democrats launched serial attacks on President Bush's war policies."

Daschle Endorses Obama. The AP (2/21) reports former Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle endorsed Obama Wednesday, saying Obama "'personifies the future of Democratic leadership in our country.' Daschle said Obama has a 'great capacity to unify our country and inspire a new generation of young Americans, just as I was inspired by the Kennedys and Martin Luther King when I was young.'" Daschle served in the Senate with four of the Democratic candidates, but not Obama, who took office as Daschle departed.

Broder Says Nomination System "Has Become Truly Insane." In his Washington Post (2/22, A19, 690K) column, David Broder writes, "It's only February of 2007, but from the schedules these presidential hopefuls -- and their rivals -- are keeping, you would think the primaries were almost upon us. … What we have, friends, is a remarkably distinguished field of candidates vying in an election system that has become truly insane. I think the 16 men and one woman actively pursuing the presidency right now constitute a classy assemblage. The front-runners are people of substantial stature; the long shots include many who, in other years, would have been thought of as formidable challengers. But the process in which they are engaged is bizarre -- and getting more so, every time you look."

Lobbying "Revolving Door" For Former Lawmakers Remains Open. USA Today (2/22, Kelley, 2.27M) reports the "cozy relationships between lawmakers and lobbyists that embarrassed Congress and cost some lawmakers re-election haven't stopped the revolving door between Capitol Hill and the lobbying industry that seeks to influence legislation." Five of "the 39 ex-lawmakers rejected by voters three months ago landed jobs at firms that seek to influence Congress. The hires include two Republicans — Curt Weldon of Pennsylvania and Conrad Burns of Montana — who lost in part because of allegations of ethical lapses." Federal law "requires lawmakers to wait a year after leaving office to lobby Congress, but lets former Congress members advise lobbyists and clients. The Senate passed a bill that would extend that 'cooling-off' period to two years and also ban ex-lawmakers from advising others during that time. The House of Representatives has not taken up that issue."

Rubin's Prescriptions For Fairer Trade Critiqued. In his Washington Post column (2/22, A19), Harold Meyerson says, "In reaction not just to November but to reams of economic data showing that the U.S. median income has flat-lined, such longtime champions of free-trade orthodoxy as former Clinton Treasury secretary Robert Rubin have changed their tune." To "compensate for whatever leveling effect trade may have on Americans' incomes, they now call for wage insurance to help workers who've been compelled to take lower-paying jobs than the ones they lost. As call centers relocate to India, the Rubinauts call for extending trade adjustment assistance to service as well as manufacturing workers. They call for a universal health-care system delinking insurance from employment, so that U.S. companies can compete globally without having to be the only corporations in an advanced economy that cover their workers' medical costs. They call for improving our education system so that American workers can be more competitive." But free-trade skeptics "such as I believe that these domestic reforms, while overdue, are not enough. We argue that there need to be rules for the global economy that protect workers no less than investors, that global minimum wage standards, say, are no less necessary in a global economy than national minimum wage standards are in a national economy."

DOJ_NMG_0135455

NYTimes Says Weakness In Mortgage Market A Reason For Tax Hikes. The New York Times (2/22, 1.16M) says in an editorial that if the "bankers, investors and regulators who populate the global financial markets are not already anxious, they should be. The easy money that has buoyed the global economy for much of this decade is getting harder to come by." The "trigger" of a global economic crisis "could be the rapid erosion in the quality of American home mortgages — reflected in surging delinquencies and rising defaults." Mark Zandi and Juan Manuel Licari of Moody's Economy.com "detailed the dangers recently." The "odds of a global financial crisis are still low, according to Mr. Zandi and Mr. Licari, but they are rising. There is not a lot now that can be done about the risks in the mortgage market. But the growing possibility of hard times ahead is another argument for rolling back many of the recent excessive tax cuts, so the government will have more resources available to respond if a crisis comes."

WPost Criticizes Virginia Legislature's Handling Of Transportation Funding. The Washington Post (2/22, A18, 690K) says in an editorial, "The deck is stacked in Richmond this week as negotiators from Virginia's House of Delegates and Senate try to find the first new money for transportation in a generation. Specifically, it is stacked in favor of a flawed plan that would use unstable, unreliable funding sources to produce an anemic cash flow." Just "two of the 12 negotiators" on the conference committee "are Northern Virginians, despite the fact that the region accounts for one-third of the state's population, 40 percent of its economy and at least half its traffic headaches. Ten of the 12 negotiators are Republicans. And, thanks to some artful parliamentary maneuvering, 11 of the 12 negotiators named to the conference committee voted for the House-backed funding package, which is less responsible than the Senate's approach." The "chances of this group of lawmakers forging a genuine compromise are not promising."

Rice Renews Offer For Talks With Iran. In an exclusive interview with CNN's Situation Room (2/21, 7:13PM), Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "offered an olive branch" to Iran: "Take us up on talks, anytime, anyplace. But stop enriching uranium first." Rice told CNN, "We can talk about anything -- that's an offer I would renew today. We have, in fact, even under the circumstances, cooperated some in Afghanistan. And I think that was useful. So there is a different path." Asked if there is a danger that increased rhetoric from Washington "could trigger an accidental war," the Secretary said, "Let me just say here, publicly, the United States has no desire for confrontation with Iran -- none." Rice also "appeared to be signaling to Iran's leaders impatient with Mahmoud Ahmadinejad that she hears them," telling CNN, "The option that we have is to continue to try to convince those who are reasonable in Iran that the course that they're on is destructive."

Meanwhile, AFP (2/22, Millikin) reports as Iran "ignored a U.N. deadline Wednesday to suspend its nuclear reprocessing activities," Rice urged Tehran "to reconsider its defiance and accept an offer of better relations with Washington." ." After meeting with German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier, Rice said, "The Iranians have unfortunately not acceded to the international community's demands." The Secretary was expected to discuss the issue of increasing the sanctions pressure against Iran with Steinmeier, Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov and EU foreign policy chief Javier Solana on the sideline of the Quartet meeting in Berlin.

Hadley Warns Iran Risks Further Isolation. The Financial Times (2/22, Dombey) reports national security advisor Stephen Hadley Wednesday warned that Iran "faced further isolation if it failed to meet United Nations demands to curb its nuclear programme." In Brussels, Hadley "argued that the Bush administration's concerns were shared by Russia, in spite of the split between Moscow and Washington on issues such as missile defence." Hadley added that Moscow's recent decision to delay work on Iran's light water reactor at Bushehr "indicated the Kremlin's worries about Iran's nuclear ambitions," saying, "They have been increasingly concerned about the proliferation risks associated with Bushehr," and "have entered into understandings with Iranians to mitigate some of those risks."

US, EU Weigh Additional Steps On Iran. The Wall Street Journal (2/22, A6, King, Solomon, 2.04M) reports, "Amid signs of economic unease in Iran, the US and its European partners are weighing another set of financial restrictions on Tehran, including the possibility of targeting companies run by the country's elite Revolutionary Guard Corps." US and European officials say that the move toward a second round of U.N. sanctions "reflects their cautious optimism that sustained pressure on Tehran might succeed in bringing the country to the negotiating table over its nuclear program." However, "Keeping up the pressure may not be easy. Of the five permanent members of the Security Council, France, Britain and the US are eager to push ahead on a second resolution and have already begun to consider some potential targets. But China and, above all, Russia are wary of pushing too hard."

Ahmadinejad Vows To Continue Enriching Uranium Despite U.N. Deadline. The CBS Evening News (2/21, story 5, 0:25, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "The President of Iran today defied a UN deadline and said his country will continue to pursue its nuclear energy program. Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said Iran will not retreat one iota from its position. The UN had given Iran 60 days to stop enriching uranium. The Iranians say they need it for nuclear power, but it can also be used to make nuclear weapons."

DOJ_NMG_0135456

The New York Times (2/22, A14, Bowley, Knowlton, 1.16M) reports Ahmadinejad said Iran "had a right to pursue nuclear technology" and "will continue our work to reach our right in the shortest possible time," according to the ISNA news agency. Speaking in Siahkal in northern Iran, Ahmadinejad said, "Obtaining this technology is very important for our country's development and honor."

Expert Warns Beijing's Ties With Tehran Limit Impact Of Sanctions. Ilan Berman, author and vice president for policy at the American Foreign Policy Council, writes in the Wall Street Journal (2/22, A14, 2.04M), "Financial pressure by the U.S. and other Western governments in recent weeks is beginning to have a real impact, chilling investment into Iran's energy sector and ratcheting up the costs of the regime's atomic effort. But these gains are in danger of being erased, thanks to the growing economic partnership between Tehran and Beijing." While Berman concedes that "China's economic interests are understandable," he says "the failure of the Bush administration to take Beijing to task, however, is far less comprehensible."

Differences Emerge Between US, EU Over New Palestinian Government. The New York Times (2/22, A5, Cooper, 1.16M) reports, "Fractures between the United States and Europe began to appear Wednesday over whether the new Palestinian unity government was likely to receive international economic support even as the Middle East peace negotiators officially continued their wait-and-see approach." While Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "has said repeatedly that unless the new unity government meets those conditions, the United States will continue its economic boycott of the Palestinian government," European officials Wednesday at a meeting of the so-called Quartet in Berlin "appeared more willing to hold out the possibility of finding members of a new unity government with whom to work."

Similarly, the Washington Post (2/22, A10, Kessler, 690K) reports EU and US officials "sought to play down emerging differences" over the new Palestinian unity government. US officials "say they were surprised that Abbas struck the deal," but European officials "have been much more receptive to the unity government, saying it might be a way to encourage Hamas to eventually accept a peace deal." In a statement "laden with diplomatic code words," the Quartet "welcomed Rice's efforts and reaffirmed that a Palestinian government must be committed to nonviolence, recognize Israel and honor previous agreements with Israel. But the group also said it was exploring an expansion of a European aid pipeline to the Palestinians."

AFP (2/22, Cole) says Wednesday's meeting "wrapped up with major powers saying they will await the formation of the new Palestinian unity government before deciding whether to lift aid and diplomatic embargoes." But the "two-hour talks left the diplomatic riddle posed by the power-sharing deal…unsolved."

In addition to EU officials, the Financial Times (2/22, Williamson) reports the US is also "at odds" with Russia over relations with a planned Palestinian national unity government, "revealing divisions that are likely to further hamper efforts to reinvigorate international backing for a Middle East peace initiative." Ahead of yesterday's Quartet meeting, Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov "said pressure on the Palestinian Authority should be eased by lifting an aid embargo imposed when Hamas won elections last year."

Blair Hints At Possible Deal With Hamas. The Financial Times (2/22, Williamson, Dombey) reports British Prime Minister Tony Blair "indicated [the UK] could be prepared to do business" with Hamas, "in comments that underlined the growing difference in approach between Europe and the US on how best to pursue peace in the Middle East." Speaking in London ahead of a meeting with Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas, Blair said, "It's far easier to deal with the situation in Palestine if there is a national unity government. I hope we can make progress, including even with the more sensible elements of Hamas." By contrast, Secretary Rice said earlier this month that her efforts to achieve an Israeli-Palestinian agreement had "been made more complicated by the unity government".

German FM Warns Against Unrealistic Expectations. The AP (2/22, Gearan) reports Germany's foreign minister "warned Wednesday against building unrealistic expectations for a US-backed push toward peace between Israel and the Palestinians." Following a meeting Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier said, "We have to show a great deal of realism," and "not get ahead of what is still a tentative but hopeful process."

Israeli Arabs Reject Notion Of Jewish State. On its front page, the Los Angeles Times (2/22, A1, Boudreaux, 850K) reports, "A broadly representative elite of Israel's Arab minority has rejected the idea of Israel as a Jewish state and demanded a partnership in governing the country to ensure that Arab citizens get equal treatment and more control over their communities." In a manifesto "that is stirring anger and soul-searching among Jews," Arab leaders "have declared that Israel's 1.4 million Arab citizens are an indigenous group with collective rights, not just individual rights," and "argues that Arabs are entitled to share power in a binational state and block policies that discriminate against them."

DOJ_NMG_0135457

The Wall Street Journal (2/22, A10, Simpson, 2.04M) says the "growing mistrust" between Israel's Jews and its Arab citizens is "testing a political and social fabric" of Israel. The "deepening divide has come into sharper focus" since Israeli-Arab cleric Radd Salah "sent chills across the nation last weekend" by calling for a new intifada in response to construction work near one of Jerusalem's most revered holy sites. Israeli Jews "find questions about the fundamental identity of their state jarring" and are "increasingly fearful of growing religiosity and radicalism among Arab citizens."

Rice Responds To Russian Campaign Against US Missile Plan. The Financial Times (2/22, Dombey, Williamson, Buckley) reports, "Tensions intensified on Wednesday over US plans for missile defence bases in Poland and the Czech Republic, as Washington called on Europe to take a tougher stance towards the Kremlin." Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and national security advisor Stephen Hadley separately "lashed out at Moscow's campaign against the bases." For her part, Rice "said the suggestion this week by Russia's head of strategic rocket forces that Russia could target the two central European countries if they agreed to host the bases" was "very unfortunate." She also "dismissed" comments by German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier, who "said this week Moscow should have been consulted more about the sites, given their proximity to Russia's borders." Separately in Brussels, Hadley "emphasised Washington's dismay" at a speech this month by Russian President Vladimir Putin during which he criticized the US's "unilateral" use of force. Hadley said US officials were "disappointed" by the Russian President's comments. He also noted that "a lot of Europeans were disappointed and dismayed. And one of the things that Europeans need to do is they need to make that clear to Russia and they need to make that clear to President Putin."

The AP (2/22, McHugh) reports Rice told reporters in Berlin that the US has made clear to Russia that the system would be to counter any missile threat from Iran and would pose not threat to Russia. "Anyone who knows anything about this knows that there is no way that 10 interceptors...are a threat to Russia or that they are somehow going to diminish Russia's deterrent of thousands of warheads," Rice said.

In a more conciliatory tone, the New York Times (2/22, A6, Shanker, 1.16M) reports under the headline "US Tries To Ease Concerns In Russia On Antimissile Plan," that Bush administration officials tried Wednesday "to tamp down Russian concerns, voiced in strikingly harsh terms," over the plans. The Administration's concerned "about growing criticism of the program" has prompted officials to schedule a briefing by Lt. Gen. Henry A. Obering III, director of the Missile Defense Agency, on Thursday for foreign reporters based in Washington. Joining him will be Assistant Secretary of State Daniel Fried.

The Washington Times (2/22, Kralev, 88K) says the "war of words" between the US and Russia "escalated yesterday, with Western diplomats saying that Moscow's mistrust and suspicion of Washington -- and the West in general -- have changed little since the Cold War." Several senior US officials "said they have no idea where" the "belligerent outbursts" made by Gen. Nikolay Solovtsov Monday and by Putin "are coming from, given what they described as a businesslike and professional attitude the Russians have been displaying in private meetings."

Pyongyang To Reveal Details Of Uranium Enrichment Program. The Financial Times (2/22, Fifield) reports, "Suspicions over whether Pyongyang has been running a secret uranium enrichment program are back in the spotlight after last week's apparent breakthrough in the long-running North Korean nuclear crisis. Just as concerns about possible uranium enrichment triggered the current crisis, they are again threatening to undermine the agreement under which North Korea will receive step-by-step rewards in return for declaring and then disabling its nuclear weapons program." Former Defense Secretary William Perry, who traveled to North Korea Thursday, said the issue could be a '"deal breaker," and that "much more remains to be done. Two months from now, we will know whether we have a reasonable probability of completing the agreement."

Pyongyang Accuses US Of "Fabricating Lies" About Use Of Aid Money. The AP (2/22, Lederer) reports Pyongyang has accused the US "of fabricating lies that it was diverting U.N. aid money to develop nuclear weapons and said it would accept an outside audit of U.N. operations unless the aim was to politicize aid to the country," according to a letter circulated Wednesday. In the letter to Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon, North Korea's U.N. Ambassador Pak Gil Yon accused the United States of "hostile maneuvers" against his country" in seeking an audit of the alleged misuse of aid money" from the UNDP. Pak "also made clear that North Korea wants to continue cooperation with U.N. agencies," noting that Pyongyang has maintained "good relations and cooperation" with them for several decades.

US Seen As Turning To Diplomacy After Failure Of "Go-It-Alone" Approach. The Christian Science Monitor (2/22, LaFranchi, 59K) reports the Bush administration is now embracing "collective international action" following its "disenchantment with the results of its earlier go-it-alone approach." The shift "also suggests a growing sense within the White House that once-maligned multilateralism is getting results -- on issues ranging from Iran to North Korea." The Administration's "apparent conversion to multilateralism can also be seen in Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice's efforts to revive the Middle East peace process."

DOJ_NMG_0135458

Administration's Cuba Policy To Remain In Effect. McClatchy (2/22, Bachelet) reports, "Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez had some straight talk Wednesday for lawmakers and business groups pressing for a softer approach toward Cuba as the island prepares for a post-Fidel Castro era. The Bush administration won't waver from its tough stance toward Havana, he said." Gutierrez told a Council of the Americas event on Cuba that the "question is not when will the U.S. change its policy. The question is when will the Cuban regime change its policy." McClatchy adds, "Congress is expected to debate several bills that would relax travel and trade sanctions against Cuba."

The Washington Times (2/22, Hirsch, 88K) reports Gutierrez "yesterday reiterated the Bush administration's steadfast belief in the U.S. embargo of Cuba, despite congressional moves to relax the policy. Cuban leader Fidel Castro's hospitalization last year and ceding of power to his brother, Raul, as well as the election of Democratic House and Senate majorities in Congress have helped fuel speculation that U.S. policies could be eased." The Times adds, "Legislation has been introduced in Congress to weaken the Cuba embargo," and Reps. Emerson and Flake, "two House members who are part of that effort," criticized the Administration's stance after Gutierrez's speech yesterday.

Cuba Poised For Offshore Drilling Near Florida. USA Today (2/22, 1B, Lynch, 2.27M) reports that soon "an oil rig will maneuver into position in waters less than 100 miles from the coast of Florida." But the "rig won't belong to an American company, and any petroleum it discovers won't do a thing to curb the USA's addiction to foreign oil. Instead, any new sub-sea gusher will belong to Cuba." The country "is poised for a significant expansion of its oil program into the waters that separate it from the United States. And thanks to U.S. law, Cuba's drilling partners will be working closer to Florida beaches than any American company ever could." The US Geological Survey "estimated Cuba can lay claim to 4.6 billion barrels of oil and 9.8 trillion cubic feet of natural gas. With oil prices hovering around $60 a barrel and global supplies persistently tight, any new supply source could benefit the USA. ... There's just one problem: politics."

US Urged To Reconsider Venezuela Ban On Jet Parts. The AP (2/22) reports Rep. Sheila Jackson Lee (D) called on the Bush administration Wednesday "to reconsider its ban on selling parts for US-made F-16 fighter jets to Venezuela, urging improved ties between the two nations." Jackson Lee told reporters that she was making the first US congressional visit to Venezuela since President Hugo Chavez's December re-election with the message of "an immediate repairing" of the relations between the US and Venezuela.

Death Squad Scandal Rocks Colombia. The Washington Post (2/22, A10, Forero, 690K) reports that "after disclosures that have astonished many Colombians," Col. Hernán Mejía, one of the nation's most decorated officers, "has been removed from his post, and the attorney general's office is investigating him for having worked with right-wing paramilitary groups to kill peasant farmers and guerrilla sympathizers." The allegations, announced by Defense Minister Juan Manuel Santos in January, "mark the first time the military has turned over one of its own to civilian prosecutors on suspicion of collaborating with the death squads." The case also comes as Columbia is "undergoing an imperfect but remarkable judicial process that has produced nearly daily disclosures of ties between death squad leaders and Colombia's political and military establishment."

China Launches Controversial Campaign To End Youth Internet Addiction. On its front page, the Washington Post (2/22, A1, Cha, 690K) reports, "Alarmed by a survey that found that nearly 14 percent of teens in China are vulnerable to becoming addicted to the Internet, the Chinese government has launched a nationwide campaign to stamp out what the Communist Youth League calls 'a grave social problem' that threatens the nation." The Chinese government in recent months "has joined South Korea, Thailand and Vietnam in taking measures to try to limit the time teens spend online," but "no country has gone quite as far as China." As part of the campaign, the government is "helping to fund eight in-patient rehabilitation clinics across the country" which use "a tough-love approach that includes counseling, military discipline, drugs, hypnosis and mild electric shocks."

Mandelson Says EU Farm Tariff Cuts Will Not Help Africa. In a letter to the editor of the Wall Street Journal (2/22, B6, 2.04M), EU Trade Commissioner Peter Mandelson writes, "Richard Holbrooke and Stuart Eizenstat ("Africa's Last Best Chance," Feb. 15) are absolutely right that Africa needs a successful conclusion to the Doha Round for a number of reasons, but steep EU farm tariff reductions cut both ways for developing countries depending on their level of competitiveness." EU farm tariff cuts, he argues, "will do little for most in the developing world for the simple reason that almost all their agricultural produce already enters the EU tariff free -- so tariff cuts won't help them." Instead, Mandelson says, "The real competitive gain for African farmers in the Doha Round will come from cutting trade-distorting farm subsidies and the elimination of export subsidies for farm goods -- both of which allow farmers in the rich world artificially to undercut farmers in developing countries."

DOJ_NMG_0135459

Canadian Ambassador Urges US To Proceed With Caution On Passport Rule. The Washington Times (2/22, Sands, 88K) reports Canadian Ambassador Michael Wilson said in an interview Wednesday that his country is "very concerned" about a planned US passport rule, and that it "must be implemented with 'clarity and flexibility' to avoid damaging the world's most dynamic bilateral trading relationship. … The State Department and the Department of Homeland Security (DHS) have until June 1, 2009, to implement tougher documentation rules for travelers crossing by land from Mexico and Canada. DHS officials are pressing for a quicker implementation schedule, citing the smooth adoption of similar rules for air travelers last month." However, Wilson said that the "huge surge" in passport applications that preceded the air travel change was likely to be far greater for the land crossing rule.

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"Law Would Bar Dumping Patients On The Street."
"The Conflict In Iraq: British Troop Drawdown."
"Virtual Loses Its Virtues."
"Arabs Say Israel Is Not Just For Jews."
"Gentle Jabs Turn To Punches For Clinton, Obama."
"The Trial Of The Sensory."

USA Today:
"Ex-Lawmakers Find Work With Lobbyists."
"Post-Katrina Baton Rouge Struggles With Its Identity."
"Older Seniors Return North."

New York Times:
"National Guard May Undertake Iraq Duty Early."
"Iraq Insurgents Employ Chlorine in Bomb Attacks."
"Korean Men Use Brokers to Find Brides in Vietnam."
"The Japanese Gyroball Mystery."
"In Both Parties, 2008 Politeness Falls To Infighting."
"Volunteer Group Lags In Replacing Gulf Houses."
"Settlement Lets Apple Use 'iPhone.'"

Washington Post:
"Blair Plans To Withdraw 1,600 Troops From Iraq."
"A Call To Confession, For It Is Fading."
"Va. House To Teens: 'Hang Up And Drive.'"
"In China, Stern Treatment For Young Internet 'Addicts.'"
"Clinton, Obama Camps' Feud Is Out In The Open."
"In Far North, Peril And Promise."

Washington Times:
"GOP 'Darlings' Slow To Sign Tax-Cut Pledge."
"Canada Cautions U.S. On Pending Passport Rule."
"Wages High In D.C., Counties."
"Rice Calls Iraq Coalition 'Intact.'"
"Senate Illegals Bill Near Complete."
"Hillary, Obama Producing Their Own Hollywood Drama."
"O'Malley Considers Extra Session To Sort Out Deficit."

Detroit Free Press:
"'I Am No. 1 Suspect.'"
"Mich. Teens To Get Six More Early Colleges."
"Farrakhan's Final Bow?"

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Would Feb. 5 Primary Put Georgia In Race?"
"Iran Ignores U.N. Nuclear Deadline."
"WWW.GAHOSPITALPRICECHECK.COM: Comparison Shop Hospitals With A Click."
"Delta Flies With Post-Takeover High."

Dallas Morning News:
"Priest Abuse Claims Led To Suspension."
"Parents Confront Deadly Heroin Mix."
"Senior Drivers May Face Vision Tests."
"Nuevo Laredo Handcuffed By Drug Trade."
"House Panel Fights HPV Vaccine Order.'
"Coal Hearings Delayed."

Houston Chronicle:
"Panel Votes To Block HPV Vaccine Requirement."
"Troops On Border Help Fuel Drop In Migrant Arrests."
"Biggio Hits Camp With Milestone On The Horizon."
"3-Point Barrage Carries Rockets Past Heat."
"Hellish 'Exoplanets' A Step Toward Earth-Like Find."
"Galveston Housing Costs Forcing Many From City."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Iraq-UK Troop Reduction; Iraq-Cheney Interview; Iraq-Violence Continues; Walter Reed Living Conditions; Clinton-Obama Campaign Accusations; Libby Trial Update; Tennessee Custody Battle; Miracle Baby Leaves Hospital; Dallas-Airplane Emergency Landing; Email Addicts.
CBS: Iraq-British Troops; Southern Iraq; Iraq Analysis; Iraq-Helicopter Shot Down; Iran-Nuclear Program; Healthcare Costs; ADHD Drugs; Elder Care; Libby Trial; Clinton-Obama Clash; Ballroom Dancing.
NBC: Iraq-UK Withdrawal; White House Response To UK Withdrawal; Iraq Violence Continues; Walter Reed Living Conditions; HPV Vaccination Debate; Vaccination Analysis; Economic Update; Thatcher Statue; Aging Parents; Internet-

DOJ_NMG_0135460

Buying Medication; Miracle Baby Leaves Hospital; New Orleans Firefighters.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:

CBS: University Of Illinois' Mascot Retired; Britain-Prince Harry Expected To Be Sent To Iraq; Iranian Nuclear Program-UN Deadline; Libby Trial; FL-Premature Baby; IKEA Bags-Conservation Efforts; Medical Marijuana Lawsuit Against Federal Government.

NPR: International Atomic Energy Agency-Iranian Nuclear Program; Rice-Iranian Nuclear Program; Java-Fire On Indonesian Ferry; Cisco, Apple-iPhone Trademark Agreement; Whole Foods To Purchase Wild Oats Market; Tokyo Stock Exchange; Consumer Price Index Up In January; British Minister For Africa-Sudan Sanctions.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.

White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Tours Novozymes North America plant, Franklinton, NC; participates in a panel discussion on cellulosic ethanol, Novozymes North America, Inc., Franklinton, NC.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

LAURA BUSH — Tours Katrina Cottages, Cusato Cottages, Ocean Springs, Miss.; attends luncheon, McElroy's on the Bayou Restaurant, Ocean Springs, Miss.; visits D'Iberville Elementary School, D'Iberville, Miss.

US Senate: No Scheduled Events.

US House: No Scheduled Events.

Other: US-INDIA _ Meeting of the US-India High Technology Cooperation Group. Highlights: 12:15 p.m. Commerce Secretary Gutierrez. Location: 1615 H St. NW.

BOSNIA-HERCEGOVINA _ 8:45 a.m. - 4 p.m. The Center for Strategic and International Studies and the Dayton Peace Accords Project host a conference, ``Bosnia-Hercegovina At An International Crossroads. Highlights: 1 p.m. Luncheon session, with Jozo Krizanovic, member of the BiH Parliament; Damir Arnaut, legal advisor to Haris Silajdzic, member of BiH Presidency; Nerkez Arifhodzic, foreign policy advisor to Zeljko Komsic, member of BiH Presidency; Igor Radojicic, Chairman of the National Assembly of Republika Srpska. Location: B-1 conference level, 1800 K St. NW.

PROSPERITY _ 8:15 a.m. - 12:30 p.m. The Economic Policy Institute holds a forum, ``Work that Works: An Agenda for Shared Prosperity," discussing proposals for removing obstacles that increasingly disconnect working Americans from the rewards of their work. Location: Room 345, Cannon.

CYBER SECURITY _ 8:30 a.m. Assistant Homeland Security Secretary Greg Garcia speaks at the Maryland Cyber Security Forum. Location: 3501 University Blvd. East, Adelphi.

FINANCIAL EDUCATION _ 9 a.m. Treasurer Anna Escobedo Cabral, Assistant Treasury Secretary Emil Henry, Jr., and Deputy Assistant Treasury Secretary Dan Iannicola, Jr. speaks at the Summit on K-Postsecondary Financial Education. Location: Cash Room, main Treasury.

HEALTH INSURANCE _ 9 a.m. The Federation of American Hospitals holds a briefing to release a new proposal to provide health coverage to all Americans, and a new survey of voter attitudes on health insurance coverage. Location: National Press Club.

PENTAGON-IRAQ BRIEFING _ 9 a.m. Army Lt. Gen. Ray Odierno, commander of the Multinational Corps-Iraq, will brief live from Iraq to provide an update on ongoing security operations in Iraq. Location: DOD Briefing Studio, Pentagon 2E579.

US-JAPAN _ 9 a.m. The Carnegie Endowment for International Peace holds a seminar, ``A Closer Japan-US Economic Relationship, with panels on ``The Strategic Context in Asia" at 9 a.m. and ``the Japan US-Economic Relationship" at 10:30 a.m. Location: 1779 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

VIETNAM MEMORIAL _ 9:30 a.m. Three veterans organizations hold a news conference to urge their members to come to Washington to protect the Vietnam War Memorial from harm during the March 17 anti-war rally. Location: National Press Club.

ICE CENTER _ 10 a.m. The National Ice Center, a partnership between NOAA, the Navy and the Coast Guard, marks its 30th anniversary. Location: NOAA Satellite Operations Facility, 4231 Suitland Rd., Suitland.

IRAN _ 10:30 a.m. The Council on Foreign Relations holds an on-the-record telephone briefing on ``Iran: Time for Detente," with author Ray Takeyh. Contacts: Kate Zimmerman, 212-751-3375/

MEDICARE _ 10:30 a.m. Karen Ignagni, President of America's Health Insurance Plans, holds a telephone briefing on low-income and minority beneficiaries in MA plans. Contacts: Mohit Ghose, 202-778-8494. Notes: Callin number: 866-837-9787.

SIX PARTY TALKS _ 10:30 a.m. The Brookings Institution, Asia Society and the Korea Economic Institute hold a discussion with Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill on the Six Party Talks. Location: Falk Auditorium, 1775 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

OFF LABEL USES _ 9 p.m. The Washington Legal Foundation holds a briefing on legal and regulatory challenges to the sharing of information on ``off-label" uses of prescription drugs and devices. Location: 2009 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

DOJ_NMG_0135461

OVERSIGHT VS. PRIVILEGE _ 12 p.m. The Federalist Society holds a panel discussion on congressional oversight vs. executive privilege with attorneys Chris Bartolomucci and Douglas Cox, former Interim Solicitor General Walter Dellinger, Louis Fisher of the Library of Congress, others. Location: National Press Club.

WAR POWERS _ 12 p.m. American University Washington College of Law holds a discussion on congressional authority to check presidentail war powers in Iraq, with former Associate Deputy Attorney General Patrick Philbin and former Justice Department Office of Legal Counsel advisor Martin Lederman. Location: 4801 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

SOMALIA _ 12:30 p.m. The Council on Foreign Relations holds an on-the-record meeting with Vicki Huddleston, former Charge d'Affairs in Ethiopia, and Terrence Lyons of George Mason University, others, discussing Somalia. Location: 1779 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

WALTER REED _ 12:30 p.m. Walter Reed Army Medical Center holds a media tour through various living quarters for outpatients, followed by a news conference. Location: Building 18, Mologne House, at Walter Reed.

CHILDREN'S HEALTH COVERAGE _ 1 p.m. The Center on Budget and Policy Priorities holds a conference call briefing to discuss the federal funding shortfalls states face in the State Children's Health Insurance Program and the possible consequences for children's health coverage. Contacts: Michelle Bazie, 202-408-1080.

INNOVATION _ 2 p.m. Commerce Secretary Gutierrez convenes the first meeting of his Measuring Innovation in the 21st Century Economy Advisory Committee. Location: Wyndham Hotel, 1400 M St. NW.

TAIWAN _ 2 p.m. The Center for Northeast Asian Policy Studies and the Formosan Association for Public Affairs hosts a discussion with leading experts to examine the importance of the ``228 Incident'' in 1947 to the understanding of present-day Taiwan, and the process of reconciliation on the island. Location: Falk Auditorium, 1775 Massachusetts Ave. NW.

IRAQ-VIETNAM _ 6 p.m. George Washington University sponsors a discussion with professor Shawn McHale on the untold story of the Vietnamese guerrillas told from their perspective and the implications for Iraq. Location: Room 602, 1957 E St. NW.

Copyright 2007 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Friday, February 23, 2007 7:48 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Attorney General's News Briefing for Friday, February 23, 2007
Attachments:	agnb070223.pdf; agnb070223.doc

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 23, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Defense Experts Testify Padilla Unfit For Trial 4
Writers Denounce Efforts To Gain Legal Advantage In Terror War 4
WPost Urges Congress To Restore Detainees' Rights 5
DOJ Urged To Keep More Accurate Anti-Terrorism Statistics 5
Maldonado Written Statements Describe His Actions In Somalia 6

Homeland Response:

Independent Review Of Supermax Prison Security Urged 6
Minnesota Human Rights Group Alleges Post-9/11 Harassment Of US Muslims 7
New Houses In Lower Ninth Ward Are First Since Katrina 7
Lott Said To Be Directing "Populist Rage" At Insurers Over Katrina Claims 7

War News:

Democratic Bill Would Limit Iraq Mission To Combat Against Al Qaeda Elements 8
Cheney Says Iraq Withdrawal Would Spawn Terror Wave 9
Iraqi Insurgents Seen As Adapting To Counteract Security Push 9
US Soldier Sentenced To 100 Years For Iraq Rape-Murder 12
War Places Heavy Stress On Military Families 12
South Korean Businessman Sentenced In Oil-For-Food Probe 12
Iraq Acquires New Site For US Embassy 12
US Attacked Al Qaeda In Somalia From Ethiopian Bases 12
Media Investigation Finds Little Security At Afghan-Pakistani Border 13

Corporate Scandals:

Judge Denies Motion To Delay Enron Shareholder Suit 13
SEC Fines Former Sadia CFO In Insider-Trading Case 13
Presidential Panel Devises Voluntary Guidelines For Hedge Funds 14

Criminal Law:

Libby Jurors Reach No Verdict Thursday 14
Judge Says Fumo Trial Will Not Begin For At Least A Year 14
DIA Analyst Convicted Of Espionage-Related Charges To Be Released 15
Miller Vows To Continue Land Deals, Despite Federal Probe 15
Christie Urges Public To Help Fight Public Corruption 15
Federal Agents Arrest Fugitive California Child Molester In Louisiana 15
Florida Man Pleads Guilty To Child Porn Production 16
FBI, Police Continue Intensive Search For WV Child Rapist 16
Two Nevadans Arrested On FEMA Relief Fraud Charges 16
North Carolina Man Convicted Of Silver Ingot Pyramid Scheme 16
Los Angeles Anti-Gang Program Comes Under Criticism 16

Civil Rights:

Gonzales Interviewed About Civil Liberties 17
DOJ Decides Against Seeking Death Penalty For Mississippi Jailer 18
Urban League Head Seeks DOJ Probe Of New Orleans Katrina Shootings 18
State Lawmaker Introduces Bill To Legalize Gay Marriage In Illinois House 18
Nonprofit Law Center Litigates Largest Employment Bias Case 19
WPost Praises PG County Police For K-9 Restraints 19

Antitrust:

DOJ Ends Concrete Price-Fixing Probe With $1.75 Million Fine 19
Two DOD Contractors Plead Guilty In Bid-Rigging Scheme 20
Experts Say Sirius-XM Merger Faces Major Antitrust Hurdles 20
Apple, Cisco Settle iPhone Dispute 22
South Korea Fines Refiners For Collusion 22
Judge Tosses Antitrust Suit Against Utah Home Developer 22

FTC Approves AIG Unit's Acquisition Of US Port Operations 22
EU Clears Purchase Of German TV Network 23
Black Farmers Oppose Monsanto-Delta Pine Deal 23
Esmark Says Deal For Ohio Steel Mill Is Dead 23
Jury Orders Microsoft To Pay $1.52 Billion To Alcatel In MP3 Suit 24

Environment:

Bush Promotes Energy Proposals In Visit To North Carolina. 25
Iowa City To Pay $1.5 Million In Coal Gas Site Settlement 26
BP Employee Deleted Files After Subpoena 27
GAO Report Says Funding For Gasoline Storage Tank Cleanup Falls Far Short 27
Sanford Says Conservatives Must Reframe Climate Change Debate 27
Krugman Says California's Experience Shows Conservation Not Burdensome 27

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Detroit Man Who Sold Lethal Fentanyl-Laced Drugs Gets 30-Year Sentence 28
FBI Arrests Florida Police Officers In Drug Trafficking Sting . 28
Advocates Use Data Quality Act To Dispute Government Stance On Medical Marijuana 28
Five To Face Federal Charges In California "Pot Houses" Case 28
Walters Promotes US Anti-Drug Strategy In Canada, Some Criticize Approach 29
Jury Awards Former ATF Agents $9.75 Million In Damages In Suit Against Chicago 29
Philadelphia Man Convicted Of Gun Crimes 29

Immigration:

Senate Hearing To Look For Administration Backing Of Comprehensive Immigration Reform 30
Owners Of Michigan Cleaning Service Charged After Illegal Immigrant Raid 31
Judge Dismisses Posada Carriles' Bid For Freedom 31

Tax:

Thirteen Indicted For Alleged Minnesota Cigarette Tax Fraud Scheme 32
Firms Hide Assets, Identities In State Havens 32
WSJournal Criticizes AMT Hike In 1993 Clinton Tax Plan 32

Congress-Administration:

Army Surgeon General Disputes "Characterization," But Not Facts, Of Walter Reed Reports 32
Intelligence Legislation Remains Stalled In Senate 33
Pentagon Cancels Plans For Massive Conventional Bomb Test 33
McCain Critical Of Pentagon Request For Three Experimental Aircraft 34
Business, Labor Come To Blows Over Key Unionization Bill . 34
Virginia May Lose Federal Funds If Districts Fail To Test English Language Learners 34
Student Loan Proposal Said Likely To Reduce Number Of Banks Offering Them 34
Congress May Address Lack Of Sick Pay In US 35
Bodman Lifts Energy Department Bonus Freeze 35
NYTimes Urges Congress To Increase Oversight Of For-Profit Colleges 35
NYTimes Backs "Passengers' Bill Of Rights." 35
NYTimes Criticizes Cost Of Uncompleted Congressional Visitor Center 35

Other News:

Analysis Finds US Economy Leaving Millions In "Severe Poverty." 36
Jury Rules For UCLA In Psychiatric Sex Trial, But Awards No Money 36
High School Students Earn Lower Math And Reading Scores Yet Better Grades 36
On Campaign Trail, Giuliani Seen As Avoiding Unfriendly Audiences 37
Huckabee Set To Announce Endorsements Of Two House Republicans 38
Obama Tries To "Clear The Air" As Dustup With Clinton Keeps Drawing Attention 38
Bill Clinton Has Collected Nearly $40 Million In Speaking Fees Since 2001 39
Responding To Obama Request, FEC Proposes New Fundraising Option 39
In State Senate, Obama Showed Pragmatism, Ability To Work With GOP 40
Despite Broad Résumé, Richardson Bid Could Hinge On Record As Governor 40
Democratic Hopefuls To Help Raise Funds To Finance South Carolina Primary 41
GOP Rolls Out "Put-Downs" Of Democratic Presidential Hopefuls 41
Study Of Private Management Of Philadelphia Schools Criticized 41
WSJournal Praises Jobs For Criticizing Teachers Unions 41
Rice Warns Tehran As UN Report Points To Advances In Nuclear Program 41

DOJ_NMG_0135465

Hill Says "Long Way To Go" In North Korea Deal 44
VOA To End Service In Several Languages 44
Europeans Seek To Distance Themselves From US Policy. 44
US, Russia Play Down Missile Dispute..... 45
Cheney Criticizes Chinese Missile Test..... 45
Panel Accuses Philippines Military Of Political Killings 45
Venezuela Boosting Aid To Latin American Neighbors..... 46
Cuba Refuses To Renew Two Foreign Journalists' Visas 46
Chadian Prime Minister Dies..... 46

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages..... 46

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington 47

DOJ_NMG_0135466

TERRORISM NEWS:

Defense Experts Testify Padilla Unfit For Trial. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/23, Anderson) reports, "Accused al-Qaida operative Jose Padilla suffers from intense stress and anxiety stemming from his isolated years in military custody and cannot adequately help his lawyers prepare for trial, two defense mental experts testified Thursday. Defense lawyers hope to delve more deeply into Padilla's treatment at a Navy brig in Charleston, S.C., later in the federal hearing, when they are allowed to question brig officials directly involved in his custody. … 'He is immobilized by his anxiety,' said Patricia Zapf, a forensic psychologist who administered tests on Padilla last October. 'He believes he will go back to the brig and he will die there.'" The AP notes, "Prosecutors say he is competent for trial," and Pentagon spokesman Cmdr. Jeffrey Gordon said yesterday, "The government in the strongest terms denies Padilla's allegations of torture, allegations made without support and without citing a shred of record evidence."

USA Today (2/23, 6A, Parker) reports from Miami, "A New York psychiatrist testified Thursday that Jose Padilla, a U.S. citizen accused by the government of being an 'enemy combatant,' developed so many mental ailments during three years of solitary confinement in the Navy brig in Charleston, S.C., that he is not competent to stand trial. … That view of the 36-year-old terrorism suspect, once accused of planning to detonate a radioactive 'dirty bomb,' emerged as Angela Hegarty took the stand as the first of three psychiatrists expected to testify at a hearing to determine Padilla's mental fitness. 'He lacks the capacity to assist his counsel in this case,' Hegarty said." USA adds, "More revelations are expected next week when four officials from the brig, as well as four officials from the Miami Federal Detention Center take the stand. Their testimony will provide an unprecedented window into the U.S. military's treatment of terrorism suspects. Since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, officials responsible for the detention of terrorism suspects have been ordered by a federal judge to testify only a few times."

The New York Times (2/23, Sontag) reports, "In a highly unusual competency hearing in federal court here Thursday, defense lawyers began to lay out their argument that Jose Padilla, the Brooklyn-born former enemy combatant, was rendered incompetent to stand trial on terrorism conspiracy charges by what they characterize as crippling mistreatment by the government." The Times continues, "Two mental health experts, a forensic psychiatrist and a forensic psychologist hired by the defense, testified that Mr. Padilla, 36, suffers from post-traumatic stress disorder as a result of his isolation and scores of interrogation sessions during three years and eight months in a military brig in South Carolina. … 'He's unfit to stand trial,' said Patricia A. Zapf, the psychologist, describing Mr. Padilla as so 'immobilized by his anxiety' and so distrustful that he is incapable of assisting his own lawyers — whom he at times suspects of being agents of the government — in preparing his defense." The Times adds, "Dr. Zapf said Mr. Padilla, a United States citizen who was initially accused of plotting a dirty bomb attack against the United States and held without charges by the military, believed that he would end up 'back in the brig and that he would die there.' … Mr. Padilla, who was indicted in late 2005 on terrorism conspiracy charges that do not include the dirty bomb plot but do carry a possible life sentence, sat calmly through Thursday's hearing as lawyers and doctors discussed his facial tics, anxieties and feelings of hopelessness."

The Los Angeles Times (2/23, Williams) reports, "U.S. District Judge Marcia Cooke scheduled the competency hearing after Padilla's defense attorneys filed a motion to dismiss the case because of what they called 'outrageous government conduct' that amounted to torture. … Padilla's trial is scheduled to begin April 16." The Times continues, "Both defense experts diagnosed Padilla with post-traumatic stress disorder and acute anxiety, which they attributed to his prolonged isolation and treatment at the Charleston brig. … Padilla, shackled and dressed in a tan cotton jailhouse tunic and trousers, sat impassively throughout the day's proceedings. His only show of emotion was a wave and smile to his mother, who was seated in the back of the courtroom."

Writers Denounce Efforts To Gain Legal Advantage In Terror War. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (2/23, A11), David B. Rivkin, Jr. And Lee A. Casey, who served in the Department of Justice during the Reagan and George H.W. Bush administrations and are writing a book on war's evolving legal architecture, write, "The term 'lawfare' describes the growing use of international law claims, usually factually or legally meritless, as a tool of war. The goal is to gain a moral advantage over your enemy in the court of world opinion, and potentially a legal advantage in national and international tribunals. … Al Qaeda, of course, is an experienced lawfare practitioner. Its training manual, seized by British authorities in Manchester, England, openly instructs detained al Qaeda fighters to claim torture and other types of abuse as a means of obtaining a moral advantage over their captors. That advice has been routinely followed by detainees at Guantanamo Bay, who have succeeded in generating incessant demands -- from European officials among others -- for the base's closure and their own liberation." Rivkin and Casey continue, "These efforts, however, pale to insignificance when compared to the blizzard of litigation initiated in the U.S. federal courts on behalf of al Qaeda and Taliban detainees. The suits range from habeas corpus petitions to free captured enemy combatants -- cases that were dismissed by the U.S. Court of Appeals in Washington, D.C. on Tuesday -- to tort suits seeking monies from U.S. government officials, to challenges regarding the detainees' conditions of confinement." Rivkin and Casey add, "The most significant common thread among all these actions is the clear desire to portray U.S. government actions as illegal and unprecedented. In fact, it is the claims for extensive due process rights for captured enemy combatants that are unprecedented." Rivkin and Casey note, "The effect of this lawfare effort, were it successful, would be to make it exceptionally difficult -- if not impossible -- for a law-abiding state to wage war in anything like the traditional manner, bringing the full weight of the national armed forces to bear against an enemy, without prompting charges of war crimes and efforts to intimidate individual officials with prosecutions on ersatz 'war crimes' theories. In fact, the criminalization of traditional warfare seems to be the goal. … Lawfare designed to delegitimize the use of American military force, and the American way of war, certainly has the potential to undermine public support for the war effort, both at home and abroad. Recognizing the stakes involved, the U.S. should be as committed to winning the lawfare battle as the ground combat in Afghanistan and Iraq." Rivkin and Casey conclude, "Merely defending itself in court is not enough. The U.S. must go on both the legal and public diplomacy offensive, utilizing such aggressive litigation tactics as seeking sanctions against lawyers who make frivolous arguments or violate security regulations. Most important, the administration should strive to explain, tirelessly and at the highest levels, that its policies are both legal and legitimate and that it is the lawfare's practitioners who are the true radicals."

DOJ_NMG_0135467

WPost Urges Congress To Restore Detainees' Rights. The Washington Post (2/23, A18) editorializes, "On the first day of the new Congress, two leading senators announced they would join in an attempt to reverse the hasty and ill-considered decision of the previous Congress to deprive foreign prisoners at Guantanamo Bay of the ancient right of habeas corpus, which allows the appeal of imprisonment to a judge. One of the senators, Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), predicted that the courts would rule that the provision of the Military Commissions Act eliminating habeas corpus was unconstitutional; he nevertheless joined the incoming chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.), in sponsoring a bill restoring the appeal right. … Now Mr. Specter's prediction is looking less sure: The U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit ruled this week that Congress's act was constitutional, and it threw the cases of dozens of Guantanamo detainees out of federal court. That ruling will almost certainly be reviewed by the Supreme Court on appeal, but Congress should not wait for its decision. It should move quickly on the Habeas Corpus Restoration Act." The Post adds, "The principal remaining question is whether Congress's action is permitted under Article I, Section 9 of the Constitution … Two judges of the three-member appeals court panel ruled that the provision does not apply at Guantanamo because it is not on U.S. territory and the detainees are foreigners. … Rather than wait for the court's decision, Congress should correct its own mistake. The 51 to 48 vote rejecting Mr. Specter's previous attempt to restore habeas condemned hundreds of foreign prisoners to indefinite detention without trial at Guantanamo; only a few score are expected to be prosecuted by the military commissions. Since 2002 it has become clear that a number of prisoners at the facility were arrested in error, are not terrorists and pose no threat to the United States. Moreover, improvements in the prisoners' treatment have come about largely because of their court appeals. Congress has both a practical and a moral interest in ensuring that this basic human right is restored."

DOJ Urged To Keep More Accurate Anti-Terrorism Statistics. The Ventura County (CA) Star (2/23) editorializes, "The Justice Department's post-9/11

DOJ_NMG_0135468

statistics on terrorism cases have been deeply flawed, sometimes inflated, sometimes underreported — in any case, just highly inaccurate. Only two out of 26 sets of statistics reported between 2001 and 2005 were found to be accurate by the department's inspector general, Glenn Fine." The Star continues, "The most erroneous were figures on terrorism prosecutions collected by the department's Executive Office of U.S. Attorneys. In 2004, the department reported 379 terrorism-related convictions, but Mr. Fine said the actual number was 240. … Given the penchant of the department's political leadership for overhyping terrorism-related cases, the natural inclination is to think that the figures were intentionally padded. … Mr. Fine, reassuringly, says no. He blamed the errors on a "decentralized and haphazard" system of data collection and disagreements over the definition of an 'anti-terrorism' case. … The result was that unrelated offenses like immigration violations, marriage fraud, drug trafficking and firearms violations were included in the terrorism figures." The Star concludes, "Given the sensitivity of these numbers, it's surprising that the department was so careless. The Bush administration has portrayed itself as tough on terrorism — invoking these same statistics to prove it — and, by extension, the Democrats as weak. If it got this wrong, it makes you wonder what else it got wrong. … The audit concluded that, ''it is essential that the department report accurate terrorism-related statistics.' After five years of the domestic war on terror, that's not asking a whole lot."

Maldonado Written Statements Describe His Actions In Somalia. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/23, Lozano) reports, "Handwritten statements released Thursday depict the frustration, confusion and deception that revolved around a U.S. citizen accused of receiving training from al-Qaeda in his efforts to help overthrow the Somali government. The three sets of statements, which Daniel Joseph Maldonado gave to FBI agents after his arrest in Kenya last month, detail in the 28-year-old's words why he left the United States, his time in Somalia and the frantic last few days he and his family spent in the country before his capture by authorities." The AP notes, "In his statements, Maldonado never mentioned al-Qaeda and said he was sick for a week with malaria after arriving in Kismayo. After recovering in a hospital, Maldonado said he was asked again 'to join the jihad. But I was more concerned with my family in Mogadishu and still doubtful about weather it was a valid jihad.' Maldonado later admitted he lied about his doubts" in a letter to his parents, but prosecutors "said they don't think he was lying."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Independent Review Of Supermax Prison Security Urged. The Denver Post (2/23) editorializes, "It's hard to know what to believe when it comes to assessing the state of security at the Supermax federal prison in Florence, which holds some of the most dangerous inmates in the country." The Post continues, "During a tour of the facility Wednesday, Barb Batulis, a Supermax guard and union representative, said the prison isn't adequately staffed. But U.S. Bureau of Prisons chief Harley Lappin said he can safely manage the institution with the staff he has. U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said he thinks the facility is secure but could be improved, though he shared no ideas. … That won't satisfy worried neighbors who want Lappin to erect a $23 million fence - not so much to keep the inmates inside as to keep their accomplices from approaching Supermax from the outside." The Post adds, "Despite watching over some of the nation's most diabolical criminals, Supermax staffing is actually down from when it opened in 1994. Prison officials say the addition of cameras and other technology has lessened the need for guards. … Perhaps that's true. Or perhaps it's a convenient justification. Trouble is, everyone defining the problems and creating solutions has a self-interest that could color their assessment." The Post concludes, "Colorado's congressional delegation has been active in pushing to resolve the prison's shortcomings, and they must work to penetrate the veil of ambiguity. A sweeping review of the prison's security and staffing should be conducted by the Government Accountability Office. The sooner the better."

Gonzales Visits Supermax. CNN Newsroom (2/22, 2:34 p.m. EST) broadcasted, "Attorney general Alberto Gonzalez toured Supermax, making good on a promise last November when CNN exposed the prison's shortcomings, particularly when it comes to inmates communicating with the outside world." Gonzales gave the prison good reviews, and said, "I am confident that we are doing what we should be doing in monitoring communications both in and out of these facilities. "

This story received nationwide covered with over 80 airings. Some examples include: WUSA-TV Washington, DC (2/22,

DOJ_NMG_0135469

9:19 a.m. EST) broadcasted, "US Attorney general Alberto Gonzales says the nation's most secure prison is safe but could be safer." He visited the Supermax facility "with Colorado Senators Wayne Allard and Ken Salazar who have been pushing for improvements." The prison "houses the nation's most notorious criminals."

KXAS-TV Dallas (2/22, 5:43 a.m. CST) broadcasted, "Attorney general say the prison which holds some of the most notorious inmates could be made safer," after touring the Supermax facility. Justice report "criticized the prison for not properly screening mail and other communications."

KMGH-TV Denver (2/22, 5:36 a.m.) broadcasted, "Attorney general Alberto Gonzalez says Colorado's Supermax prison is secure but could stand improvement." He toured the facility yesterday "in response to issues raised by senators Ken Salazar and Wayne Allard about staffing levels and security." Most broadcasts were in Denver, but there were also a moderate amount across the nation. Some examples are: KWNG-TV Denver (2/22, 6:05 a.m.), KWTV-TV Oklahoma City (2/22, 12:06 p.m.), WVLT-TV Knoxville (2/22, 7:10 p.m.), WWBT-TV Richmond (2/22, 6:30 a.m.), KKTV-TV Colorado Springs (2/22, 5:10 a.m.) and KSBY-TV Santa Barbara (2/22, 6:30 p.m.).

More Commentary. The Pueblo (CO) Chieftain (2/23) editorializes, "How safe is Supermax? U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales toured the nation's most secure federal prison on Wednesday and was assured security measures have been taken to beef up safety." The Chieftain continues, "Sens. Wayne Allard and Ken Salazar accompanied the AG on the tour, and afterward Sen. Allard expressed confidence that the Administrative Maximum Security U.S. Penitentiary in Florence has been improved with technological upgrades. He added that more employees and more security measures could be coming in the future. … This is not to say that Supermax has not been without growing pains. An Inspector General's report issued last year detailed relaxed phone and mail monitoring, particularly for the terrorists being held inside the lockup." The Chieftain adds, "We certainly don't believe the prison housing the nastiest of nasties in the federal system ought to be operated unsafely, so the union's concerns should get a fair hearing. On the other hand, the judgment of the professional managers should also be given due weight. … Sen. Allard said the government probably will not be able to address 100 percent of the staffers' concerns at least right away - such things are a matter of available funding - but he added that more employees and more security could be coming in the future. With a growing prison population, such measures will have to be considered by Congress."

Minnesota Human Rights Group Alleges Post-9/11 Harassment Of US Muslims. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (2/23, Hopfensperger, 395K) reports, "The terrorist attacks of 9/11 still are casting a shadow on Minnesota's immigrant and Muslim community, according to a report issued Thursday by Minnesota Advocates for Human Rights. Racial and religious stereotyping continues to this day, as do overt acts of discrimination, the report said. The 94-page report was based on interviews with more than 100 Minnesota immigrants." The Star Tribune notes, "Several incidents of alleged misconduct by the FBI are mentioned in the report. A Somali man employed by a Twin Cities school district says he received a visit from the FBI at his home a day after he inquired about bus rentals for a school event. One of the questions he was asked; 'What do you think of Saddam Hussein?' FBI spokesman Paul McCabe said he had not been informed about the incidents mentioned in the report, and that they would be impossible to verify without names, dates and places. The authors of report, however, offered confidentiality to those they interviewed. If people have concerns about the FBI, they should contact the FBI or a trusted community organization, he said. 'We will investigate,' McCabe said."

New Houses In Lower Ninth Ward Are First Since Katrina. Under the headline "In New Orleans, Progress at Last in the Lower Ninth Ward," the New York Times (2/23, Nossiter, 1.16M) reports, "The first new houses built in the Lower Ninth Ward since Hurricane Katrina were turned over to their owners on Thursday, creating a small island of hope in a sea of ruin." The houses, financed by the nonprofit group Acorn and a California bank, "stand out in a landscape grimly frozen since the storm." The Lower Ninth Ward "is a long way from being a neighborhood again, even though it has been the focus of intensive volunteer efforts and organizing since the storm." However, Gwendolyn Guice, who received one of the homes, "insisted" that the development "would help draw people back."

Lott Said To Be Directing "Populist Rage" At Insurers Over Katrina Claims. In her Wall Street Journal (2/23, A10, 2.04M) column, Kimberley Strassel writes,

DOJ_NMG_0135470

"One big question when Democrats took over Congress was which industry would be first to feel the new majority's populist rage. Oil? Pharma? Banks? Corporate America just got its answer, direct from the angriest man to have been empowered in the past election: Republican Sen. Trent Lott. The Mississippian was 'infuriated' by the insurance industry's refusal to shell out for certain Katrina claims, most notably his own. So Mr. Lott is spearheading a ferocious campaign of political revenge that would make even Henry Waxman envious -- replete with investigations, voracious trial lawyers, ambitious state attorneys general and threats of punitive federal legislation. And like most personal grievances that get morphed into policy battles, it's ending badly for consumers."

WAR NEWS:

Democratic Bill Would Limit Iraq Mission To Combat Against Al Qaeda Elements. The AP (2/23, Espo) reports, "Determined to challenge President Bush, Senate Democrats are drafting legislation to limit the mission of US troops in Iraq, effectively revoking the broad authority Congress granted in 2002, officials said Thursday." The AP adds, "officials said the precise wording of the measure remains unsettled," but "one draft would restrict American troops in Iraq to combating al-Qaida, training Iraqi army and police forces, maintaining Iraq's territorial integrity and otherwise proceeding with the withdrawal of combat forces." The officials, "Democratic aides and others familiar with private discussions, spoke only on condition of anonymity, saying rank-and-file senators had not yet been briefed on the effort. They added, though, the Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid is expected to present the proposal to fellow Democrats early next week for their consideration."

USA Today (2/23, 6A, 2.27M) runs a truncated version of the AP story, while the New York Times (2/23, Hulse, 1.16M) says "the chief authors" of the new bill "are Senators Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware, the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, and Carl Levin of Michigan, the chairman of the Armed Services Committee. The plan is to try to attach the proposal to an antiterrorism bill the Senate expects to begin considering Tuesday." The Times adds, "Lawmakers and senior aides said that such a plan was unlikely to pass Congress, and even if it did, it would certainly be vetoed." But "Democrats say their intention is to keep pressure on both Mr. Bush and Congressional Republicans who are facing a public frustrated with the war. Democrats say that other Iraq proposals are likely to emerge as well." Senate Democrats "say they prefer the emphasis on the mission of American troops over a plan by some House members to try to limit United States military involvement by putting restraints on troop deployments based on readiness and equipment availability."

The Washington Post (2/23, A1, Murray, Weisman, 690K) reports, "In both chambers, Democratic lawmakers are eager to take up binding legislation that would impose clear limits on U.S. involvement in Iraq after nearly four years of war. But Democrats remain divided over how to proceed." While "some want to avoid the funding debate altogether, fearing it would invite Republican charges that the party is not supporting the troops," others "take a more aggressive view, believing the most effective way to confront…Bush's war policy is through a $100 billion war-spending bill that the president ultimately must sign to keep the war effort on track. … 'I've had enough of "nonbinding,"' said Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.), who is helping to draft the new Democratic proposal."

Lieberman Suggests He May Switch Parties If Democrats Try To Cut Off Funding. The Politico (2/23) reports, "Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman of Connecticut told the Politico on Thursday that he has no immediate plans to switch parties but suggested that Democratic opposition to funding the war in Iraq might change his mind." Lieberman, "a self-styled independent who caucuses with the Democrats, has been among the strongest supporters of the war and President Bush's plan to send an additional 21,500 combat troops into Iraq to help quell the violence there." Lieberman said in an interview, "I have no desire to change parties. … If that ever happens, it is because I feel the majority of Democrats have gone in a direction that I don't feel comfortable with." Asked "whether that hasn't already happened with Iraq," Lieberman said, "We will see how that plays out in the coming months." He "suggested…that the forthcoming showdown over new funding could be a deciding factor that would lure him to the Republican Party."

On its website, Time (2/22, Calabresi, 4.03M) reported Lieberman "has been indulging in some fairly immodest political footsie. Early this year he terrified fellow Democrats by skipping several of the weekly caucus lunches that cement party fidelity in the Senate. Recently he was spotted in the Republican cloakroom talking with South Carolina's Lindsey Graham about reforming Social Security. He even says he might vote Republican for President in 2008, a not-so-veiled hint that he would prefer John McCain, his fellow true believer in the Iraq war, to most, perhaps all, Democratic alternatives." Lieberman "says leaving the Democratic Party is a 'very remote possibility.' But even that slight ambiguity -- and all his cross-aisle flirtation -- has proved more than enough to position Lieberman as the Senate's one-man tipping point."

DOJ_NMG_0135471

GOP War Opponent In House Breaks With Murtha. McClatchy (2/23, Schoof) reports, "A longtime Republican opponent of the Iraq war, Rep. Walter Jones of North Carolina, broke ranks Thursday with Democratic Rep. John Murtha over Murtha's plan to attach conditions to war funds." That "split signals that divisions among war opponents are likely to emerge next week when Congress returns from recess. Murtha and other Democrats have said they'll look at how they might use congressional power over military regulations and funding to pressure the Bush administration to redeploy US forces out of Iraq."

"John McCain-Like War Hero" Leading Defense Of Bush Policies In House. The Los Angeles Times (2/23, Simon, 850K) reports, "When House Republicans needed a John McCain-like war hero to lead their fight against Democratic assaults on…Bush's Iraq strategy, they turned to another former POW, a Texas Republican named Sam Johnson." Though "less known than Sen. McCain (R-Ariz.), his onetime cellmate in Vietnam," Johnson "spent nearly seven years in a prisoner of war camp, about half of it in solitary confinement. When he took to the House floor during last week's emotional debate on the Iraq war, the 76-year-old former fighter pilot drew heavily on Vietnam experiences." Johnson "has emerged as the House GOP's point man in an escalating fight in Congress over Bush's execution of the war -- a position that puts him opposite another decorated Vietnam veteran, Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.)." GOP leaders "see Johnson as the Republican best suited to counter Murtha, an ex-Marine and defense hawk who has become a influential war critic."

Krauthammer Criticizes Democratic Tactics. In the Washington Post (2/23, A19, 690K), Charles Krauthammer writes, "Slowly bleeding our forces by defunding what our commanders think they need to win (the House approach) or rewording the authorization of the use of force so that lawyers decide what operations are to be launched (the Senate approach) is no way to fight a war. It is no way to end a war." It is "a way to complicate the war and make it inherently unwinnable -- and to shirk the political responsibility for doing so."

Cheney Says Iraq Withdrawal Would Spawn Terror Wave. The Washington Times (2/23, Keats, 88K) reports Vice President Cheney warned today that the US and Australia "simply cannot indulge" thoughts of an early withdrawal from Iraq "because it would spawn a new wave of global terror." Speaking in Sydney, Cheney said, "The notion that free countries can turn our backs on what happens in places like Afghanistan, Iraq or any other possible safe haven for terrorists is an option we simply cannot indulge." If coalition troops "withdrew before Iraqis could defend themselves," the Vice President said "radical factions would battle for dominance over the country."

Powell Says US Should Leave If "Civil War" Has Not Been Quelled In A Year. The Journal and Courier (2/23, Shaw) of Lafayette, IN, reports, "Former Secretary of State Colin Powell told an audience at Purdue University that he supports sending more American soldiers to Iraq." But "if the troop surge does not quell what he characterized as a 'civil war' within a year, the United States should begin to leave, he said." Powell also "said the United States was right to retaliate against Afghanistan after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001. But he was less certain when discussing the invasion of Iraq. He conceded that the intelligence on Iraq's having weapons of mass destruction was misleading. 'But we were not wrong about the nature of this regime, and I am glad that it is gone,' he said. 'I hope the Iraqis will the seize the opportunity we have given them.'"

Iraqi Insurgents Seen As Adapting To Counteract Security Push. Media coverage of the situation in Iraq focuses on insurgents' use of chemical "dirty bombs" and a sense that the enemy is changing its tactics to meet the new security push. Such developments are being described as an ominous sign for the US mission to pacify the country. Under the headline "Old Problems Undermine New Security Plan For Baghdad," the New York Times (2/23, Oppel, 1.16M) reports, "The much anticipated effort to wrest Baghdad streets from the control of militias and insurgents has been presented in news conferences and public statements as an Iraqi-led operation. Iraqi officials have been out front, announcing arrests, weapons finds and other details, as well as new decrees intended to halt two years of so-called sectarian cleansing." But "on the streets, the joint patrols seemed little different from those of the past few years: A handful of Iraqis, acting at the direction of a larger group of Americans, opening drawers and closets and looking behind furniture as they searched for banned weapons or other contraband."

DOJ_NMG_0135472

The Washington Post (2/23, A15, Tyson, Partlow, 690K) says "insurgents…are employing a variety of new tactics -- from an unprecedented string of helicopter shoot-downs to unusual chlorine bomb attacks and direct assaults on US military bases -- that American commanders say are intended to create chaos and undermine the US and Iraqi military push to quell violence in Baghdad. … More aggressive, direct attacks by insurgents on bases housing the US military are another troubling development." USA Today (2/23, 5A, Michaels, 2.27M) reports Lt. Gen. Raymond Odierno, the No. 2 U.S. commander in Iraq, said "Al-Qaeda-associated" cells "may be behind a recent spike in downed US helicopters in Iraq." He added "two suspects have been captured in connection with the helicopter attacks. One suspect, he said, admitted involvement in one attack." USA Today adds, "Since Jan. 20, insurgents have shot or forced down eight US helicopters, killing 28 troops and civilians." The Washington Times (2/23, Gertz, 88K) notes Odierno's comments in a story titled "Al Qaeda Believed Behind Copter Crashes."

CBS and NBC ran stories on this week's "dirty" bombs. The CBS Evening News (2/22, lead story, 2:50, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "The US military in Iraq is warning tonight that insurgents are trying new tactics to try to spread fear. Bombs with chlorine gas have killed as many as 11 people this week. And today US troops found canisters of chlorine when they raided a suspected weapons factory west of Baghdad. Also today, the US military said American forces killed at least 12 insurgents in a six-hour clash in the city of Ramadi. And US forces looking for insurgents shooting down American helicopters detained two members of a militant cell." CBS (Logan) added, "This is the changing face of war in Iraq as a new weapon of terror is unleashed here -- crude chemical bombs that explode poisonous chlorine gas into the air, burning the eyes and lungs of victims too small even to understand what's happened. A chilling turn in tactics that's left survivors bewildered and in pain."

NBC Nightly News (2/22, story 3, 2:00, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "You may recall we reported last night on this broadcast about a new and dangerous trend in Iraq, the insurgents there are using chlorine gas to build bombs that are terrorizing civilians. US troops raided what is being called a bomb factory on Tuesday and what they found there is also troubling." NBC (Arraf) added, "Hospitals filled with the young and old hit not by shrapnel but chlorine gas, the same chemical used to purify water turned to deadly use. Sunni insurgents are suspected to have launched at least three chlorine attacks killing a dozen people and injuring more than 200." Loren Thompson, described as a "national security expert," was shown saying, "The insurgent's aim has been first and foremost to demoralize the Iraqi people and then to defeat American soldiers. If the Iraqis are terrified, we can't secure the country." NBC added, "Iraqis already go through their day worried about car bombs, kidnappings, shootings, mortars and now add more worry to the growing list of fears."

The New York Times (2/23, Oppel, 1.16M), under the headline "Iraq Rebels Expected To Use More Chlorine Gas In Attacks," says "military officials are also acutely concerned that insurgents have adapted tactics to exploit vulnerabilities in flight patterns of military helicopters, which are expected to fly 400,000 hours this year in Iraq, a 20 percent increase over 2006." The Washington Times/AP (2/23, Gamel) runs a similar report.

The Los Angeles Times (2/23, 850K) reports "US troops in Iraq uncovered a 'car bomb factory' near Fallouja this week that contained multiple canisters of chlorine, a potentially lethal gas that has been used in three insurgent attacks over the last month," Odierno said.

In another story that reflects poorly on the new US strategy in Iraq, the Washington Post (2/23, A16, Murphy, 690K) reports from Baqubah, in a story titled "US Unit Shoulders Burden At Police Station In Baqubah," that "it took nearly a month to build the tiny bunker on the roof of this Iraqi police station. The U.S. soldiers worked at night to avoid snipers, carrying sandbags up four flights of stairs in the dark. One day last week, several American soldiers arrived to begin their shift here, using the roof to scan the surrounding area for attackers." The Post adds "there was one thing missing from the roof of the station, and from the ranks of those who were there to defend it: members of the Iraqi security forces. Similar US units are embedded at other Iraqi police and army installations in Baqubah, a city of 300,000 about 35 miles northeast of Baghdad. Keeping these locations open and functioning is vital, military commanders say, if the Iraqis who live here are to have confidence in the government."

Insurgents Attack US Troops In Ramadi. USA Today/AP (2/23, 5A) reports, "Sunni insurgents attacked US troops in the volatile city of Ramadi, setting off a six-hour firefight that killed at least 12 people, the US military said Thursday." The Ramadi battle "broke out Wednesday evening when insurgents opened fire on a US patrol. The Americans responded with precision-guided munitions that damaged several buildings and ended the fight, said a Marine spokesman, 1st Lt. Shawn Mercer. There were no US casualties. Twelve insurgents were killed, Mercer said."

DOJ_NMG_0135473

Keane Defends Bush Plan. ABC World News (2/22, story 5, 2:50, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The new security crackdown in Iraq, the centerpiece of President Bush's surge of troops, has entered its second week. Retired Army General, Jack Keane, one of the architects of the President's plan and an ABC News consultant, over the past 11 days has visited Iraq's most volatile areas to assess how it's going. I spoke to General Keane earlier. He's now in Baghdad to get his assessment." Keane: "First of all, a lot has changed in Iraq, in a year. The situation has gotten considerably more dire certainly. And when you take a look at Baghdad itself, there are neighborhoods down there where people aren't living in anymore." Gibson: "Do you get a sense that this security crackdown can have an effect long term, on sectarian violence?" Keane: "Yeah, I definitely think so. First of all, we're in the very opening stages of this. There's only one new brigade here from the United States. And obviously, four more to arrive. However, the Iraqi ten brigades have showed up. And that's a big plus."

Chalabi In Key Security Post. The Wall Street Journal (2/23, A1, Dreazen, 2.04M) reports, "In his latest remarkable political reincarnation, onetime US favorite Ahmed Chalabi has secured a position inside the Iraqi government that could help determine whether the Bush administration's new push to secure Baghdad succeeds." In "a new post created earlier this year," Chalabi "will serve as an intermediary between Baghdad residents and the Iraqi and US security forces mounting an aggressive counterinsurgency campaign across the city. The position is meant to help Iraqis arrange reimbursement for damage to their cars and homes caused by the security sweeps in the hope of maintaining public support for the strategy." Chalabi's "writ is supposed to be limited mainly to security, according to aides to Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, but he is already speaking ambitiously about playing a larger role in economic, health and reconstruction efforts as well." He "answers directly to Mr. Maliki and is already taking part in weekly planning meetings with senior American officials such as Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad and Gen. David Petraeus, the top U.S. military commander in Iraq."

Rape Allegations Prompt Al Qaeda Vow Of Revenge. The CBS Evening News (2/22, story 2, :20, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Meanwhile, two accusations of rape involving Iraqi security forces are dumping more fuel on the already explosive situation there. Both of the alleged victims are Sunni and claim they were raped by Shiite policemen. Prime Minister Maliki's government has cleared the accused, and today Al Qaeda in Iraq vowed revenge."

ABC World News (2/22, story 4, :35, Gibson, 8.78M) also reported, 'The leader of Al Qaeda's wing in Iraq surfaced today, vowing to avenge the alleged rape of a Sunni woman by Iraq Shiite-dominated police. Abu Ayyub al Masri spoke in an audio tape posted on the Internet. He said that 300 militants volunteered to go on suicide missions after the rape allegations were made. The Shiite-dominated government claims no sexual attack occurred."

The Washington Post (2/23, A16, Londono, 690K) reports "an Iraqi police official in the northwestern city of Tall Afar said Thursday that a military officer and three soldiers had admitted to raping a Sunni woman and recording the act with a cellphone camera. The four soldiers told an investigative committee convened by the Iraqi army that they sexually assaulted the woman nearly two weeks ago, according to Gen. Najem Abdullah, a police spokesman in Tall Afar." The soldiers' statement "follows another Sunni woman's assertion this week that she had been raped in Baghdad by members of Iraq's predominantly Shiite security forces."

Many In Iraq Stop Using Banks Due To Violence. The Washington Times (2/23, Palmer, 88K) reports that most Iraqis are opting to keep their money at home instead of in banks to avoid being "confronted by criminal gangs on the streets and demands for bribes from tellers in the branches -- not to mention long lines, shortages of bank notes, and other inconveniences." Despite "the security concerns, financiers and government officials say, there are not enough banks in Iraq to serve the population and finance sorely needed reconstruction, leaving companies and individuals struggling to secure their assets."

Effects Of Golden Mosque Bombing Assessed. The Los Angeles Times (2/23, Berthelsen, 850K) reports that for many Iraqis, "life has changed in the year since sectarian warfare erupted with the bombing of the Golden Mosque in Samarra," a holy Shiite mosque. Before the mosque bombing, "anger and violence in Iraq had largely been focused on the US-led forces occupying the country in the wake of the 2003 invasion;" now anger has focused more on sectarian differences and "centuries-old distrust." A year after the bombing, "amid the latest version of a security plan intended to restore calm, bombed-out buildings scar Baghdad and Iraqis live in fear of one another" with many wanting "the plan to work and for peace to return" although "their faith in such an outcome varies widely."

DOJ_NMG_0135474

US Soldier Sentenced To 100 Years For Iraq Rape-Murder. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/23) reports, "A U.S. soldier was sentenced to 100 years in prison yesterday for the gang rape and murder of an Iraqi girl and the killing of her family last year. Sgt. Paul E. Cortez, 24, also was given a dishonorable discharge. He will be eligible for parole in 10 years under the terms of his plea agreement." The AP notes, "Earlier yesterday, tears rolled down Cortez's face as he apologized for the rape and murders. He said he could not explain why he took part. … Five soldiers who served with Cortez in Iraq testified that his actions were out of character and described the hardships of war they experienced, including sleep deprivation and the lack of running water."

War Places Heavy Stress On Military Families. In a front-page feature, the New York Times (2/23, Alvarez, 1.16M) looks at stresses to military families in wartime, saying "hundreds of thousands of soldiers and loved ones have endured long, sometimes repeated separations that test the fragility of their relationships in unforeseen ways. The situation is likely to grow worse as the military increases the number of troops in Iraq in coming months," with Pentagon plans "to send more than 14,000 National Guard troops back to Iraq next year. … Most families and soldiers cope, sometimes heroically. But these separations have also left a trail of badly strained or broken unions, many severed by adultery or sexual addictions; burdened spouses, some of whom are reaching for antidepressants; financial turmoil brought on by rising debts, lost wages and overspending; emotionally bruised children whose grades sometimes plummet; and anxious parents who at times turn on each other. Hardest hit are the reservists and their families, who never bargained on long absences, sometimes as long as 18 months, and who lack the support network of full-fledged members of the military."

The Los Angeles Times (2/23, Zucchino, 850K), meanwhile, reports that Nancy Kules created an online journal of her experience as the spouse of an injured soldier when her husband, Ryan, lost two limbs and almost died as a result of injuries he received from a roadside bomb in Iraq. Nancy's "journal opened a window on a searing experience shared by a growing number of spouses who have become collateral damage in America's overseas wars. What began as an attempt to keep loved ones informed became a unique personal account of recovery and accommodation, of suffering and redemption" that has helped others learn about the ordeals of spouses of injured soldiers.

South Korean Businessman Sentenced In Oil-For-Food Probe. The New York Times (2/23, Barron, 1.16M) reports, "Tongsun Park, a once flamboyant South Korean businessman convicted of illegally representing Saddam Hussein in trying to influence the United Nations oil-for-food program, was sentenced yesterday to five years in prison." Judge Denny Chin of Federal District Court in Manhattan "said Mr. Park had 'blatantly disregarded the law' by taking more than $2 million for trying to lobby United Nations officials to ease sanctions against Iraq." The judge "called the sentence 'harsh' for a 71-year-old man with health problems. But he also said it was 'appropriate.'" The Washington Post (2/23, A11, Lynch, 690K) notes the sentence "was the maximum possible."

Iraq Acquires New Site For US Embassy. The Washington Post (2/23, A12, Boustany, 690K) reports, "Iraq may be facing a deadly civil war, but the Iraqi government is initiating major, costly repairs to its diplomatic building in Washington and expanding its real estate holdings here." The "latest Iraqi government purchase for its US mission is a $5.8 million mansion at 3421 Massachusetts Ave. NW in Observatory Circle, across the street from Vice President Cheney's official residence." The mansion will serve "as Iraq's temporary embassy during renovations to its fading Dupont Circle mission." However, plans "are to eventually turn the Dupont Circle building into a cultural center for the exhibition of Iraqi art."

US Attacked Al Qaeda In Somalia From Ethiopian Bases. On its front page, the New York Times (2/23, A1, Gordon, Mazzetti, 1.16M) reports the US military "quietly waged a campaign from Ethiopia last month to capture or kill top leaders of Al Qaeda in the Horn of Africa, including the use of an airstrip in eastern Ethiopia to mount airstrikes against Islamic militants in neighboring Somalia," according to American officials. The "close and largely clandestine" relationship with Ethiopia "also included significant sharing of intelligence on the Islamic militants' positions and information from American spy satellites with the Ethiopian military." According to the officials, "members of a secret American Special Operations unit, Task Force 88, were deployed in Ethiopia and Kenya, and ventured into Somalia." The counterterrorism effort was described by American officials "as a qualified success that disrupted terrorist networks in Somalia, led to the death or capture of several Islamic militants and involved a collaborative relationship with Ethiopia that had been developing for years." The "secret campaign" is seen as "an example of a more aggressive approach the Pentagon has taken in recent years to dispatch Special Operations troops globally to hunt high-level terrorism suspects."

DOJ_NMG_0135475

Media Investigation Finds Little Security At Afghan-Pakistani Border. NBC Nightly News (2/22, lead story, 3:00, Myers, 9.87M) reported, "Attacks against US and NATO forces in Afghanistan are escalating. Fueled in part officials say by Al Qaeda and Taliban militants in Pakistan who easily cross the border into Afghanistan to join the fight. NBC News decided to investigate security at one of Pakistan's busiest border crossings. Two NBC News producers bought tickets for $4 each and boarded a bus in Pakistan, destination, Jalalabad Afghanistan. The route took them through Peshwar to a major border checkpoint to Jalalabad. Their bus full of passengers was waved through the border crossing. Not once in four hours did guards stop them or check for travel documents." Iqbal Sapand, NBC: "Nobody asked for our documents. Not only me but there were more than 45 people in that bus." NBC added, "The next day our producers repeated the process taking the bus from Afghanistan back to Pakistan. Again, no documents necessary." Mushtaq Yusufzai, NBC: "On both sides of the border nobody checked them."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Judge Denies Motion To Delay Enron Shareholder Suit. The AP (2/23, Lozano) reports, "A $40 billion lawsuit filed by former Enron Corp. shareholders and investors alleging investment firms and banks played key roles in the company's collapse will go to trial in April despite a pending appeals court decision on the case, a judge has ruled." The AP continues, "U.S. District Judge Melinda Harmon denied efforts by Merrill Lynch & Co., Credit Suisse First Boston and Barclays PLC to delay the trial while the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals rules on whether the case can proceed as a class-action suit. … She said in her ruling Wednesday that there should be no postponement, because of the uncertainty of when the appeals court would rule. Jury selection was set for April 9." The AP adds, "Attorneys for the shareholders and investors accused the banks and investment firms of trying to delay the case for several years. The trial has been rescheduled three times. … 'There is no reason to wait indefinitely for a decision from the Fifth Circuit that likely will not impact the trial,' attorneys for investors wrote in a motion last week. 'Any delay simply benefits the banks and harms class members who have waited patiently for over five years for their day in court.' … In their motion to delay the trial, the banks and investment firms argued the 5th Circuit's decision could significantly alter the definition of the lawsuit's class status as well as the claims and defenses to be presented at trial."

SEC Fines Former Sadia CFO In Insider-Trading Case. The AP (2/23) reports, "The former chief financial officer of Sadia SA, a Brazilian chicken and pork producer, and a former employee of Brazil's Banco ABN AMRO Real SA have agreed to pay almost half a million dollars combined to settle charges that they traded on inside information about the meat company's 2006 attempt to take over its largest local rival, Perdigao SA." The AP continues, "The Securities and Exchange Commission on Thursday announced the settlement with Luiz Gonzaga Murat Junior, the former chief financial officer at Sadia, and Alexandre Ponzio De Azevedo, the former banker. The two settled without admitting or denying wrongdoing. Their attorneys could not immediately be identified. … Murat agreed to give up $184,028 and to pay a $180,404 civil penalty. He also agreed to a five-year ban on serving as an officer or director of a public company. Azevedo agreed to give up $68,215 and to pay $67,165." The AP adds. "Murat 'is relieved to resolve this matter, and he is anxious to put this behind him and turn his attention to the future,' said his attorney, Juan Marcelino. … The SEC accused Murat of buying Perdigao securities that are listed in the United States after an April 7, 2006, meeting with investment bankers who proposed that Sadia make an offer for Perdigao. Murat's holdings rose in value after Sadia announced its offer on July 2006, when the price of Perdigao's American depositary shares rose 21 percent to $24.50, the SEC said."

DOJ_NMG_0135476

Presidential Panel Devises Voluntary Guidelines For Hedge Funds. USA Today (2/23, 4B, Shell, 2.27M) reports, "A presidential group charged with devising ways to improve oversight of the secretive $1.2 trillion hedge fund world issued a list of self-policing guidelines Thursday that it asserts will be more effective in protecting investors than more stringent laws would be. Favoring a market-based solution over government regulation, the President's Working Group on Financial Markets (PWGFM) opted for a 'principles-based approach' for dealing with the issues surrounding the fast-growing industry that now includes roughly 9,000 funds, uses exotic investment strategies and has a history of scandalous fund meltdowns." Critics "say the guidelines don't go far enough."

The Washington Post (2/23, D1, Johnson, 690K) notes "former SEC commissioner Harvey J. Goldschmid, who had supported the agency's thwarted bid to register fund managers, expressed concern that regulators lack the authority to perform random inspections of fund operations." And "in Connecticut, home to scores of hedge funds, Attorney General Richard Blumenthal criticized the recommendations as vague, insubstantial and 'unenforceable.'"

The New York Times (2/23, Labaton, 1.16M), under the headline "Officials Reject More Oversight Of Hedge Funds," reports the Administration said that "there was no need for greater government oversight of the rapidly growing hedge fund industry and other private investment groups to protect the nation's financial system." The panel's "conclusions reflected both the strong antiregulatory ideology of the administration and the formidable influence of Wall Street and the increasingly wealthy hedge fund industry among both Democrats and Republicans in Washington. Three of the administration's most senior economic policy makers -- Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr., his top deputy, Robert K. Steel, and White House chief of staff Joshua Bolten -- are alumni of Goldman Sachs, which in the last decade has evolved into one of the most important players in the private equity market." The "reaction in Congress, which is in recess this week, was largely muted. Representative Barney Frank, the Massachusetts Democrats who heads the House Financial Services Committee, called the announcement 'a first step in addressing questions presented by the significant growth of hedge funds.'"

CRIMINAL LAW:

Libby Jurors Reach No Verdict Thursday. The Wall Street Journal (2/23, Perez, Solomon, 2.04M) reports, "Jurors reached no verdict Thursday on whether former White House aide I. Lewis 'Scooter' Libby obstructed the investigation into who leaked the identity of a CIA operative married to a prominent Iraq war critic." The Journal notes that "the jurors have issued only two brief written notes, which suggested they are methodically reviewing the evidence against Mr. Libby. They requested a large flip chart, masking tape, Post-it notes and a document with pictures of the witnesses." Deliberations resume today.

In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/23) reports Libby trial jurors "reached no verdict Thursday, and the jury has "issued only two brief written notes, which suggested they are methodically reviewing the evidence." Jurors "requested a large flip chart, masking tape, Post-it notes and a document with pictures of the witnesses." Deliberations resume today.

Libby Trial Said To Show Unreliability Of Interview Notes. In a widely-distributed story, The AP (2/23, Apuzzo) reports, "Write this down: Your notes aren't as reliable as you think. … And, as the monthlong trial of former White House aide I. Lewis 'Scooter' Libby has shown, they're no more reliable if the notes belong to FBI agents, journalists or White House aides. That's a somewhat disconcerting thought. People are charged, front-page articles are written and public policies are decided in part based on those notes. If they are flawed, whose can be believed?" Libby jurors "must decide how much weight to put on notes that were sometimes sloppy and often inconsistent." The AP notes "FBI agent Deborah Bond wrote a report saying Libby 'adamantly denied' discussing…Plame. The original FBI notes, however, contain no record of that denial. Rather, they say he may have discussed Plame but couldn't recall.

Judge Says Fumo Trial Will Not Begin For At Least A Year. The Philadelphia Daily News (2/23, Hinkelman, 106K) reports, "The trial for state Sen. Vince Fumo and three co-defendants likely won't start before early next year, prosecutors and defense lawyers said at a federal court hearing yesterday. U.S. Senior District Judge William H. Yohn Jr. did not set a trial date. Prosecutors also said Fumo's trial could last three to four months. They plan to call at least 100 witnesses to testify for the government. Defense attorneys said they couldn't reliably estimate how long a trial might take until they see what evidence the feds have." The Daily News notes, "The feds have plenty to hand over: At least 100,000 documents, including e-mails, grand-jury transcripts, summaries of FBI interviews with witnesses, bills, bank-account statements and store receipts."

DOJ_NMG_0135477

The Philadelphia Inquirer (2/23, Shiffman, 385K) reports, "Defense lawyers appear likely to accuse the government of illegally leaking grand jury material to the media or unduly pressuring witnesses, it was disclosed during" yesterday's hearing, and "the government, it would appear, hopes to win the right to tell jurors about 30-year-old allegations that Fumo put ghost employees on the Senate payroll and that he spied on rivals." The Inquirer adds, "For the most part, lawyers were reluctant to reveal strategies and did their best to keep their intentions vague. One thing became clear yesterday: The case the FBI and IRS investigated for four years won't go to trial for a long time."

DIA Analyst Convicted Of Espionage-Related Charges To Be Released. In the "Inside The Ring" section in the Washington Times (2/23, 88K), Bill Gertz reports that "former Defense Intelligence Agency (DIA) analyst Ronald Montaperto, convicted last year on espionage-related charges that involved passing secrets to China, is scheduled to get out of federal prison Sunday" and "will be barred from meeting any Chinese intelligence personnel as a condition of his release." In June, Montaperto "pleaded guilty…to improperly storing classified intelligence documents and admitted as part of a plea deal that he verbally passed both 'secret' and 'top secret' intelligence to two Chinese military intelligence officers" resulting in Montaperto serving "three months at the minimum-security prison at Fort Dix, N.J."

Miller Vows To Continue Land Deals, Despite Federal Probe. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/23, Werner) reports, "Rep. Gary Miller grew up poor. Even though he's now worth more than $13 million, he says he's still worried about his family's financial security. So, while federal authorities investigate some of his real estate transactions, he says he'll keep on making deals." Miller said in an interview, "Some people are arguing I shouldn't have the opportunity to make an investment that every other American citizen has an opportunity to make. I've got kids, I've got grandkids, and it'd be nice…if I can help them." The AP notes Miller "is being scrutinized for the millions he made selling properties to two Southern California communities outside his district. FBI agents have interviewed officials in both towns. … An FBI spokeswoman declined on Thursday to confirm or deny if there's an investigation or to make any further comment."

Christie Urges Public To Help Fight Public Corruption. The New York Times (2/23, Rivera, 1.16M) reports that in a speech at Fairleigh Dickinson University in Hackensack, N.J., "Christopher J. Christie, the federal prosecutor who has aggressively pursued New Jersey politicians believed to be corrupt, said in a speech here on Thursday that the public should help stem the tide of corruption by voting out officials who break the law." Christie "said that after domestic terrorism, his office's main priority was to hold the county and state leadership accountable. He asked, 'Wouldn't it be a shame to spend all this money' and endanger so many lives to protect a way of life from outside attack, 'only to give away our way of life from the rot from within? And that's what political corruption is.'" However, "Christie refused to discuss the progress of negotiations between his office and the Office of Legislative Services," over federal subpoenas issued for legislative records. The Times notes that his "increasingly public stance on issues like domestic terrorism and immigration has raised speculation that he may be considering a run for office. Many think he may challenge Gov. Jon S. Corzine in 2009."

Federal Agents Arrest Fugitive California Child Molester In Louisiana. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/23) reports "convicted felon and registered sex offender" David John Sprong Jr, "on the run for nearly a year, was captured Thursday at an auto auction business where he'd been working for most of the month, federal authorities said. … Last spring, Sprong skipped a $1 million bond in Sacramento, where he was charged with molesting girls." The US Marshal Service Crescent Star Fugitive Task Force, "with help from the FBI and the Livingston Parish Sheriff's Office arrested Sprong…in Holden, La., without incident." The AP notes, "'When he's not molesting people, he's working on cars,' said Mike Raifield, an agent with the FBI's Sacramento field office which was coordinating the search." Raifield added that "after the America's Most Wanted segment profiled him in January, we got a tip he was running an auto shop in Humble, Texas, but it came two days too late. Apparently he saw the same program and he disappeared."

DOJ_NMG_0135478

Florida Man Pleads Guilty To Child Porn Production. The Miami Herald (2/23, Martinez, 286K) reports, "A 59-year-old man pleaded guilty Thursday in federal court in Fort Lauderdale to preying on children, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office. Raymond George Bohning, of Hollywood, faces five to 30 years in prison for production of child pornography, enticing a minor to engage in illegal sexual activity, distributing child pornography to a minor to induce her to engage in sexual activity and possessing more than 600 images of child pornography." The Herald notes, "An FBI investigation found that Bohning had an extensive collection of child pornography images depicting minors being sexually abused, including babies and toddlers."

FBI, Police Continue Intensive Search For WV Child Rapist. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (2/23, Lash, 230K) reports from Wheeling, W.Va., "Investigators believe a partially naked man who accosted a woman Sunday night in Martins Ferry, Ohio, was the same man who kidnapped and sexually assaulted a Wheeling girl two days later. That man has not been identified, but FBI agents and police from the Ohio Valley have mounted a 'significant' investigation to locate him, said Gary Wheeler, the FBI's supervisory agent for northern West Virginia. .. An FBI artist also was summoned from Quantico, Va., to develop a composite sketch of the man and possibly a drawing of his truck. Investigators said they also are reviewing computer databases of sex offenders and may consult FBI profilers in an effort to identify the man." The Wheeling Intelligencer (2/23, Wells) adds that at yesterday's press conference, Wheeling Police Department Lt. Gary Gaus "confirmed the young girl in Tuesday's abduction was sexually assaulted." Wheeling noted that the FBI sketch of the suspect "may be released today, and an improved description of the vehicle is anticipated. … 'There's no need for hysteria,' Wheeler said. 'There is a need for extra prudence.'"

Two Nevadans Arrested On FEMA Relief Fraud Charges. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/23) reports, "Nevada residents were arrested Thursday and a third person was named as a fugitive on charges they fraudulently obtained federal funds designated for victims of Hurricane Katrina, a prosecutor said." Wilbert J. Bennett Jr. and Sheila Ritter "pleaded not guilty in initial appearances before a U.S. District Court magistrate judge following their arrests on charges of theft of government funds, U.S. Attorney Daniel Bogden said in a statement." Renee Bellinger "was indicted on charges of theft of government funds, identity theft and misuse of a Social Security number. She remained a fugitive, Bogden said." The AP notes, "Ritter and Bennett were released Thursday on personal recognizance bonds."

Oklahoma Man Indicted On Katrina Relief Fraud Charges. The AP (2/23) reports Darryl Eugene Hayes of Oklahoma City "was indicted in federal court on Thursday on charges of making false claims for Hurricane Katrina disaster relief funds." The AP notes, "The indictment claims that Hayes defrauded the Federal Emergency Management Agency and the Louisiana Department of Labor of more than $10,000 by claiming unemployment benefits for supposed Hurricane Katrina evacuees under three false names." Hayes also allegedly "submitted a fraudulent application to FEMA, claiming that his home in New Orleans was damaged by the August 2005 storm and that he was living in a 'mass shelter,' and later faxed a letter to FEMA claiming he had sustained losses 'from the hurricane' and had relocated to Oklahoma City."

North Carolina Man Convicted Of Silver Ingot Pyramid Scheme. The AP (2/23, Fought) reports, "A North Carolina man who bought one-ounce silver ingots for $10.50 and resold them to investors for $98 each and the promise of huge commission payments was convicted of federal charges in what a prosecutor called a classic 'too-good-to-be-true' pyramid scheme. About 5,000 victims lost more than $4 million in total, said Assistant U.S. Attorney Chris Cardani" in Portland, Ore. Richard Dompier " faces a sentence of about 20 years under federal guidelines, Cardani said, and is free pending sentencing, likely in June." The AP notes, "After investors complained that they weren't getting payments they were promised, the Internal Revenue Service and FBI began an investigation in 2000, joined by British and Oregon authorities. The bulk of the victims were in the United States, Canada and England, but the scheme also reached to Europe, Africa and Australia and was promoted in a total of 41 countries, the U.S. attorney's office said."

Los Angeles Anti-Gang Program Comes Under Criticism. The Los Angeles Times (2/23, Mcgreevy) reports, "Under pressure to show the L.A. Bridges program actually works, the operators of the city's largest gang-prevention effort released results of a study Thursday that sparked new debate about whether the city needs to rethink its anti-gang strategy." The Times continues, "The report by the city Community Development Department shows that while some middle-school students targeted by the L.A. Bridges program have boosted or maintained their grades and attendance, most have not improved." The Times adds, "While L.A. Bridges officials said they consider the findings encouraging given the types of students they are trying to help, some city leaders said they more dubious -- especially given the fact that gang membership and crime in Los Angeles is on the rise. … Amid new doubts about the program, which costs about $14 million annually, the city has replaced John Chavez as the interim director of L.A. Bridges." The Times notes, "In addition, City Controller Laura Chick plans to audit the program, and Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa has put its operators on notice that he is only providing funding through September, by which time he expects a new comprehensive gang strategy will be developed. … The debate comes as LAPD Chief William J. Bratton has launched a new assault on gang activity in the city -- a campaign criticized by some for not also including a more aggressive effort to keep kids out of gangs. The crackdown involved the LAPD and other agencies shifting resources to focus on 11 specific street gangs that officials say cause the most problems."

DOJ_NMG_0135479

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Gonzales Interviewed About Civil Liberties. The Christian Broadcasting Network (2/23, Charbonneau) interviewed Attorney General Gonzales in Nashville, TN. CBN reports, "It's a day in the life of the U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales as he boards a plane to launch the first Freedom Initiative to protect religious liberties. … Along for the ride, we ask about a report that says discrimination against Muslims after 9/11 in part prompted this new program. … 'It's something we worry about, naturally, when people see images on the television screen that these are the enemies of America, they may naturally assume anyone who looks like these people, or have the same religious belief - that, in fact, they constitute enemies of the United States. And that's just not true,' Gonzales said. … 'The President sent a very clear message in the days following following the attacks of 9/11, going to a Muslim center, and expressing to the American people his clear belief in our country, we have many people of the Muslim faith that do not represent a danger to America and we need to be tolerant of the views of the people of the Muslim faith.'" CBN continues, "We asked Gonzales about 'The Breach,' the just-released film about the worst intelligence failure in the FBIs history - when it turned out an American was spying for the Russians" and "what has been done since that incident at the Justice Department to make sure spies like Robert Hanssen aren't still at the FBI? … Gonzales: Well, I can't tell you everything, otherwise I'd be tipping off someone about our efforts to ensure something like that doesn't happen.I think we're in much better shape today than we were just a few years ago." CBN notes, "Gonzales is at the center of the debate over much-publicized case of two imprisoned border patrol agents who were tried and found guilty for shooting an alleged illegal drug smuggler. He didn't say whether he will recommend a presidential pardon. He did say the facts in the case are not getting out. … 'I've heard people complain about how could these people be convicted for doing their jobs,' he said. 'It's not part of their job to shoot an unarmed man from behind. It's not part of their job to conspire to conceal what they did. It's not part of their job to lie about what they did, to hide it from their superiors. So all that occurred in this particular case. And that's why these individuals were convicted.'" CBN asks Gonzales if he is "concerned that in the last couple of years of the Administration that your efforts will be bogged down by endless hearings and investigations by Democrats? … Gonzales: I think that the American people lose if I spend all my time worrying about congressional requests for information, if I spend all my time responding to subpoenas, to things of that nature. We will work with Congress, and we will do the very best we can to reach an accommodation with Congress, to give them the information, the appropriate information, they need for oversight. But that's an important part of my job. But I also believe that the American people expect me to do my job as Attorney General to protect their kids and make their neighborhood safer."

Report Details DOJ Civil Rights Record Under Bush. UPI (2/22) reports, "In a 43-page document released by the U.S. Department of Justice Feb. 20, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales says the department takes seriously the protection of religious freedom and has worked vigorously during the Bush administration to protect them. … 'Many came to America precisely because of the recognition of religious liberty and the protection of this most basic of human rights,' the report, released in conjunction with the attorney general's visit to the Southern Baptist Convention Building in Nashville, Tenn., says. The document was labeled, 'Report on Enforcement of Laws Protecting Religious Freedom: Fiscal Years 2001-2006,' Baptist Press reported Wednesday." UPI continues, "The Civil Rights Division of the justice department was established in 1957 and is best known for its work toward ending racial discrimination. Early in the Bush administration, the department established a Special Counsel for Religious Discrimination to monitor the enforcement of religious freedom laws. … 'Prior to 2001, except for prosecution of religious bias crimes and employment cases, the Civil Rights Division exercised its jurisdiction to enforce civil rights laws with respect to religion sparingly, and had never had an attorney charged with ensuring that these laws were comprehensively enforced,' the report says." UPI adds, "Religious discrimination is a growing problem in the United States as the country is now home to more than 2,000 different faiths and denominations, the report says. From 1992 to 2005, complaints of religious discrimination in employment filed with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission increased 69 percent, compared to single-digit increases in complaints about sex discrimination and racial discrimination during that period. … Education discrimination cases involving religion increased from one case reviewed and no investigations during the period of 1995-2000 to 82 cases reviewed and 40 investigations from 2001-2006, according to the report."

DOJ_NMG_0135480

DOJ Decides Against Seeking Death Penalty For Mississippi Jailer. The Biloxi (MS) Sun Herald (2/23, Fitzgerald) reports from Gulfport, MS, "U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez decided against seeking the death penalty in the prosecution of Ryan Teel after an extensive review of the criminal case, according to U.S. Attorney Dunn Lampton for the Southern District of Mississippi." The Herald continues, "Teel, a former Harrison County jailer, remains in custody pending trial in the Feb. 4, 2006, fatal beating of inmate Jessie Lee Williams Jr. A motion filed in court Thursday asks for a bond review so Teel could await his May 28 trial out of jail, as first reported on sunherald.com. … Teel was in charge of the booking room the night of the beating. He has been held at an undisclosed location since his arrest Aug. 28, 2006. Teel, 30, pleaded not guilty to charges of deprivation of civil rights under color of law and of falsifying records to obstruct a federal investigation." The Herald adds, "Gonzalez decided against the death penalty after Teel's attorneys and federal prosecutors met with a U.S. Justice Department review panel in Washington. … 'No reason was given,' Lampton said. … 'There's all kinds of arguments for it, but it was his call. I've tried a number of death cases and in this case, I think it's the right decision. It's better to start the case off without the jury or the judge having to deal with the death-penalty issue.'" The Herald notes, "Lampton called the review 'a very serious, involved procedure. They look at all the possible factors like a jury would. With 94 (federal court) districts, I think that's the wise approach in fairness and consistency across the board. When a case goes through, you want the law to be enforced the same in Mississippi that it is in Minnesota and Montana.' … The decision means Teel faces life in prison if convicted on the civil-rights charge."

Urban League Head Seeks DOJ Probe Of New Orleans Katrina Shootings. The AP (2/23, Foster) reports, "Police shootings that left two people dead at a bridge in New Orleans in the chaotic days after Hurricane Katrina should be investigated by the U.S. Justice Department, the president of the National Urban League said Thursday." The AP continues, "In a letter to the chairwoman of the Congressional Black Caucus, Marc Morial - a former New Orleans mayor - asked that the caucus support a federal civil rights investigation into the 'circumstances surrounding the police killing of two unarmed African American men and the wounding of four others.' … Six current and one former police officer have been charged in the case." The AP adds, "Sgts. Kenneth Bowen and Robert Gisevius Jr., Officer Anthony Villavaso II, and former officer Robert Faulcon Jr. were indicted in December on first-degree murder charges and attempted murder charges in the Sept. 4, 2005, shootings on the Danziger Bridge. … Conviction on a first-degree murder charge would mean mandatory life in prison. District Attorney Eddie Jordan said he would not seek the death penalty for the four. … Two other officers - Robert Barrios and Mike Hunter Jr. - were charged with attempted first-degree murder, and Officer Ignatius Hills was charged with attempted second-degree murder in the case." The AP notes, "The New Orleans NAACP asked the U.S. Attorney and the civil rights division of the Justice Department to investigate the shootings after those charged were allowed to return to work in non-sensitive jobs away from the public. Danatus King, president of the New Orleans branch of the NAACP said the move smacked of favoritism."

State Lawmaker Introduces Bill To Legalize Gay Marriage In Illinois House. The Chicago

DOJ_NMG_0135481

Tribune (2/23, Yednak, 617K) reports, "A state lawmaker fired up the gay marriage debate in Illinois Thursday by introducing a bill that would legalize marriage between same-sex couples. 'Illinois is a heartland state but has always been a leader in civil rights and social justice issues,' said the bill's sponsor," state Rep. Greg Harris (D), saying "It's the right thing to do." The proposal "would eliminate wording in state law that marriage is between 'a man and a woman' and substitute the phrase 'two persons.'" Harris, "who is openly gay, said a significant education effort would be necessary to get his bill passed, as was the case in 2005 when a gay rights bill passed in Illinois."

Nonprofit Law Center Litigates Largest Employment Bias Case. The National Law Journal (2/23, Bathija) reports, "Attorney Brad Seligman was on a hunt to find out whatever he could about Wal-Mart Stores Inc. after hearing about a potential claim of alleged sex discrimination against the retailer in 1999. … 'I called up my friend, another attorney, and he immediately said, "evil empire,"' said Seligman, executive director and founder of a nonprofit group called The Impact Fund, located in Berkeley, Calif. 'Then I called another friend, who is an economist, and he also indicated the same.'" The Journal continues, "Based on the advice of his friends and some statistical research of his own, the litigation began. On Feb. 6, the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals upheld a lower court decision making the case the largest employment discrimination class action to go to trial. Dukes v. Wal-Mart Stores Inc., No. 3:01-CV-02252 (N.D. Calif.). … The Impact Fund filed the lawsuit against Wal-Mart. The organization aims to provide funding, training and advice to lawyers who want to bring public interest impact lawsuits in civil rights, poverty and environmental justice. And its Equal Justice Litigation Program works as co-counsel on select cases, including the Wal-Mart case." The Journal adds, "The Impact Fund has three attorneys: Seligman, Jocelyn Larkin and Julia Campins. The entire organization runs with 12 employees, said Larkin … The Impact Fund is currently involved in litigating six cases, including another gender discrimination class action against Costco stores."

WPost Praises PG County Police For K-9 Restraints. The Washington Post (2/23, A18) editorializes, "The police of Prince George's County deserve a pat on the back for mending their canine unit's ways. What for too many years had been a barrage of grisly brutality reports has given way to dramatically fewer injuries to suspects and other people. As reported last week by The Post's Ruben Castaneda, the canine unit, which had been operating under a Justice Department consent decree because of allegations of excessive force and lack of accountability, is being freed of federal oversight." The Post continues, "The statistics -- and the views of citizen groups that used to complain constantly about snarly, excessively ferocious dogs -- indicate significant improvement. During a seven-year period from the mid-1980s to the early 1990s, county police dogs were involved in nearly 800 biting incidents, according to an internal police report included in a federal civil lawsuit against a canine handler. Last year, county police dogs apprehended 55 suspects without biting them, a result of steady training of the dogs to 'bark and hold'" not bark and sink their teeth. … We call it encouraging news for all county residents."

ANTITRUST:

DOJ Ends Concrete Price-Fixing Probe With $1.75 Million Fine. The Indianapolis Star (2/23, Corcoran) reports, "A probe into concrete price-fixing in the Indianapolis area, which sent nine current or former executives to prison, ended after more than three years Thursday with yet another corporate fine." The Star continues, "The $1.75 million penalty levied against MA-RI-AL Corp. during a U.S. District Court sentencing completed a sweeping antitrust investigation into agreements among more than a half-dozen companies to limit discounts on bid work from July 2000 through May 25, 2004. … MA-RI-AL, a Noblesville company doing business as Beaver Materials, agreed Thursday to settle its November conviction by paying the fine in installments over five years." The Star adds, "The company's co-owners, Allyn M. and R. Gary Beaver, who were not charged in the investigation, agreed to the settlement with representatives of the U.S. Department of Justice. … Chief U.S. District Judge Larry J. McKinney accepted the negotiated fine as a fair punishment that would send a message to other corporations about the risks of fixing prices without putting Beaver Materials out of business. The company also got five years' probation." The Star notes, "Companies involved in the conspiracy, including those whose executives cooperated with the Justice Department Antitrust Division and FBI, also face civil suits from customers to recover any overcharges. … Beaver's defense attorney,

DOJ_NMG_0135482

James Voyles, said an agreement was possible because the Justice Department's accountants and the company's experts were relatively close in assessments of the firm's ability to pay a fine. … Federal antitrust officials won't say whether more charges could result from alleged price-fixing schemes in Bloomington, Marion and Muncie, where Irving Materials officials have acknowledged participating in additional price fixing."

Two DOD Contractors Plead Guilty In Bid-Rigging Scheme. Newsday (2/23, Kessler) reports, "Two executives of a Pennsylvania defense contractor pleaded guilty yesterday in federal court in Central Islip to charges of bid-rigging in connection with a contract to sell the Navy slings that are used to move bombs and other munitions on aircraft carriers, officials said." Newsday continues, "Thomas Cunningham, 61, the vice president of Total Industrial & Packaging Inc., of McKee's Rocks, Pa. - a Pittsburgh suburb - and Richard Barko, 44, the company's general manager, admitted they conspired with a Long Island company to criminally violate antitrust laws. The Long Island company involved in the $200,000 contract was not identified in court papers. The contract was to provide slings known as metal sling hoist assemblies, officials said. … According to officials, Barko and Cunningham, along with other unnamed conspirators, met between August 2003 and January 2004 and agreed on who would win the bid on the slings and that they all would submit non-competitive bids, officials said." Newsday adds, "As part of a plea bargain, Cunningham and Barko agreed to cooperate with an ongoing investigation into bid-rigging by the Antitrust Division of the Justice Department and the Defense Criminal Investigative Service, officials said. … Thomas Barnett, the assistant attorney general in charge of the antitrust division, said in a written statement: 'We will continue to seek out and prosecute those who subvert the competitive bidding process.'"

Experts Say Sirius-XM Merger Faces Major Antitrust Hurdles. Bloomberg (2/23, Rowley) reports, "Sirius Satellite Radio Inc. and XM Satellite Holdings Inc. will have trouble persuading the U.S. Justice Department to approve their $4.84 billion merger because the combination appears to threaten competition, antitrust experts say." Bloomberg continues, "Antitrust enforcers won't readily accept assertions by Sirius and XM that satellite radio competes for listeners with broadcast radio, iPods and music downloads by cell-phone users, said Herbert Hovenkamp, who teaches antitrust at the University of Iowa law school. The Justice Department probably won't agree with that 'fairly common error,' he said." Bloomberg adds, "Satellite radio can be viewed as 'a unique technology' controlled by 'two firms that have been duking it out,' Hovenkamp said. 'Since they have the whole thing, that would make this a merger to monopoly.' … The test for the Justice Department, he said, will be whether Sirius and XM could impose a price increase without losing customers." Bloomberg notes, "How the Justice Department defines the market is crucial to the outcome of its merger review. The agency's guidelines say that determination hinges on whether the merging companies can impose a 'small but significant and nontransitory' price increase on customers without forcing them to shift to other products. … If enough customers switch products and thus cancel out any profit from a price increase, the market must include these other products, the guidelines say."

WPost Columnist Argues Against Sirius-XM Merger. In a column for the Washington Post (2/23, D1), Steven Pearlstein writes, "Here's what to expect if the Justice Department and the Federal Communications Commission allow Sirius and XM to merge, creating a monopoly in the satellite radio business: … Clear Channel will start buying every radio station in America that it doesn't already own. … Apple will be able to buy any company that begins to challenge its dominance in the market for portable music players. … Comcast will begin merger talks with Time Warner Cable. … And there will be nothing standing in the way of a marriage of NBC and CBS." Pearlstein continues, "All that will be possible because the government will have declared that there is so much competition between the different technologies in the market for digital material -- and the outcome of that competition is so uncertain -- that there is no reason to worry about consolidation of companies using the same technology. … This is the Powell Doctrine -- not the one about overwhelming force enunciated by Gen. Colin Powell when he was chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, but the one promulgated by his son, Michael Powell, while he was chairman of the FCC. The younger Powell was guided by this doctrine in giving the green light to consolidation in almost every corner of the telecommunications sector. In the one instance he deviated from that position -- blocking the merger of EchoStar and DirecTV -- it was narrowly, on the ground that there weren't enough broadband competitors in many rural areas." Pearlstein adds, "There is something to the idea that antitrust regulators should use a lighter touch, and exercise greater humility in predicting what might happen, during periods of rapid technological change. But even discounting for that, there are plenty of reasons for the government to block an XM-Sirius merger, which would create a monopoly. … Let's start with the obvious, which is that that while there are now multiple sources for digital music, they aren't perfect substitutes for each other. … Moreover, people are somewhat locked into their current choice by the investment they've made in equipment or contracts with companies. In that way, too, customers are 'sticky.' … The different technologies also have different business models, complicating the terms of competition. Old-fashioned radio makes its money from advertising, so it is hard to see how it could discipline the XM-Sirius monopoly for raising prices. Nor could Apple, which makes its money selling devices and downloaded songs. And we don't even know yet what the business models will be for Internet radio or music over cellphones." Pearlstein concludes, "What we have here, folks, is a case of two money-losing companies locked in what has become ruinous competition, from which they hope to escape by merging. It may be that, given the economics of the business, there is room for only one to survive and prosper. But if satellite radio is such a 'natural monopoly,' consumers will be better off if the companies are forced to duke it out until one prevails and the other dies. The antitrust laws were designed to foster competition, not to foreclose it by bailing out competitors that overpaid for talent, over-invested in plant and equipment or over-promised results to their investors."

DOJ_NMG_0135483

More Commentary. In an op-ed for USA Today (2/23, 10A), Jimmy Schaeffler, senior analyst at The Carmel Group, a telecommunications and media consulting organization, writes, "When the Federal Communications Commission approved the creation of satellite radio in 1997, it had an option: Provide an exclusive license to one company, or authorize competing licenses that ensured consumer choice and lower marketplace prices. It wisely opted for the latter, saying: 'One licensee will not be permitted to acquire control of the other remaining satellite licensee. This prohibition on transfer of control will help assure continuing competition.' … This wording stemmed from the commission's core DNA, which prompts it to act on behalf of consumers by embracing competition, localism and diversity deemed to be 'in the public interest.' Now, after XM and Sirius have fought ferociously for 10 years, they come on bended knee before policymakers, begging for a government-sanctioned monopoly. … Their request should be rejected, as was a similar monopoly merger proposed by satellite television providers DirecTV and DISH Network in 2001." Schaeffler adds, "It took DirecTV and DISH Network well over a decade to gain their financial legs in the satellite TV business. XM and Sirius have sustainable businesses that can operate quite well in satellite radio — right now — as separate entities. They don't need a monopoly; all they need is a class in Business 101 and a little common sense."

USA Today (2/23, 10A) editorializes, "Remember the 'baseball, hot dogs, apple pie and Chevrolet' car ad from the 1980s? Turns out it was prescient. While the food is still sold separately, baseball now comes free with many Chevys, at least for a three-month introductory offer. … That's because General Motors has a deal to build XM Satellite radios into Chevys and its other cars. And XM has a deal with Major League Baseball." USA continues, "Satellite competitor Sirius is frozen out of both. But it has the NFL and NBA contracts, which means that if there's a Ford in your future, football and basketball aren't far behind. Not a sports fan? Oprah is on XM; Martha Stewart is on Sirius. … As Stewart might say, that is not a good thing. It makes little sense that sports fans must decide between every single pro football game and no baseball games, or vice versa. Nor does it make much sense that people's listening preferences should enter into their car-buying decisions. … That's one reason the proposed XM-Sirius combination, announced this week, may be the rare merger that is good for consumers." USA notes, "Before the federal government approves the deal, of course, it should be thoroughly vetted. The salient question for regulators is whether satellite radio is a market unto itself, in which case a merger would create a monopoly, or whether it is part of larger universe that includes broadcast radio and an array of existing and emerging technologies. … If it's the latter — and a strong case can be made that it is — the merged entity would represent a more potent competitor to entrenched broadcast interests, one that would offer its customers a more enticing and complete product." USA concludes, "The case against the proposed deal would be stronger if XM, with 7.6 million subscribers, and Sirius, with 6 million, were strong and profitable companies. Both, in fact, have been big money losers, hemorrhaging $6 billion collectively in less than a decade. … The most pressing question is not whether XM and Sirius would be too powerful if they merged; it is whether they can survive if they don't. And the best way to ensure survival is to let them combine. Baseball goes with Chevrolet, so why not also with football, basketball, Howard Stern and Martha Stewart?"

DOJ_NMG_0135484

Apple, Cisco Settle iPhone Dispute. The Financial Times (2/23, Francisco) reports, "Shares of Apple and Cisco Systems were little changed yesterday after the companies settled their dispute over the use of the iPhone name by announcing an agreement to share the controversial trademark." The Times continues, "The accord put to rest a month-long dispute that began when Apple launched the iPhone, marking the computer maker's long-awaited foray into the mobile handset market." The Times adds, "Apple and Cisco said they had reached agreement to share the iPhone name, allowing each to apply the name to products sold around the world. … Under the agreement, both sides agreed to 'xplore opportunities for inter-operability in the areas of security, and consumer and enterprise communications' … Other terms of the deal were not disclosed. The agreement represented a concession on the part of Apple, which had originally resisted calls to make the iPhone compatible with other companies' hardware."

South Korea Fines Refiners For Collusion. The Wall Street Journal (2/23, Choi) reports, "South Korea's antitrust regulator said it fined four domestic refiners a combined 52.6 billion won ($56.1 million) for colluding to fix the prices of light-oil products in 2004." The Journal continues, "The country's top four refiners -- SK Corp., GS Caltex Corp., S-Oil Corp. and Hyundai Oilbank Corp. -- colluded to coordinate the prices of light-oil products diesel, gasoline and kerosene from April 1 to June 10, 2004, according to the Korea Fair Trade Commission. … 'The collusion has incurred 240 billion won in damages to customers, which is equal to 15% of their combined sales worth 1.6 trillion won during the cited period,' said Song Sang Min, a commission official." The Journal adds, "During the 71-day period, international oil prices rose by the equivalent of 20 won a liter, but the four companies raised the prices of the three light-oil products by 40 won to 70 won a liter. … The commission said it has also filed a complaint with prosecutors for further investigation against the four refiners."

Judge Tosses Antitrust Suit Against Utah Home Developer. The Salt Lake Tribune (2/23, Manson) reports, "For the second time, a federal judge has thrown out a lawsuit that accuses the developer of a planned community on Traverse Mountain in Draper (UT) of antitrust violations." The Tribune continues, "U.S. District Judge Dee Benson ruled that U.S. General Inc. and DJ Investment Group failed to specify alleged conduct by developer SunCrest LLC that would be considered an antitrust violation. … 'An antitrust claim requires harm to the competitive process, not simply harm to a particular competitor,' Benson wrote in his Feb. 14 decision dismissing the suit. … He also wrote that Traverse Mountain does not constitute an economic market as defined in antitrust law." The Tribune adds, "SunCrest is building its community high atop Traverse Mountain, which is in an area that straddles Salt Lake and Utah counties. DJ Investment owns adjoining land and wants to build its own community with U.S. General, a construction company. … DJ Investment and U.S. General filed suit in November 2005, accusing SunCrest of conspiring with Draper city officials to shut them out of developing their land. They claimed that during secret meetings, Draper and SunCrest agreed to create protection strips that would limit access by the two companies to the DJ Investment property. … SunCrest and Draper strongly denied all of the allegations. In June 2006, U.S. District Judge Ted Stewart threw out the suit. Within days, DJ Investment and U.S. General filed a new lawsuit that made the same claims but had a more detailed argument about the alleged evidence in the case."

FTC Approves AIG Unit's Acquisition Of US Port Operations. The AP (2/23) reports, "Federal antitrust regulators said Thursday they approved American International Group Inc.'s purchase of six U.S. port operations from Dubai Ports World." The AP continues, "DP World, which is owned by the government of Dubai, touched off a political firestorm over port security in early 2006 when it acquired the operations from a British firm. … The Federal Trade Commission cleared the transaction without requiring any changes to the deal." The AP adds, "AIG's Global Investment Group first announced it would buy DP World's U.S. port operations in December 2006. The deal stumbled earlier this month when the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey, which must consent to the sale, asked the two companies for tens of millions of dollars in cash and future infrastructure work at the Port Newark Container Terminal. … After Senators Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., and Robert Menendez, D-N.J., pressured the Port Authority, it reached a deal with AIG Feb. 16."

DOJ_NMG_0135485

EU Clears Purchase Of German TV Network. The AP (2/23) reports, "The European Commission on Thursday cleared the sale of Germany's biggest commercial TV broadcaster ProSiebenSat.1 Media AG to a consortium controlled by private equity groups, saying it found no antitrust problems." The AP continues, "U.S. fund Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co. and British-based Permira plan to merge ProSieben with their other broadcasting asset, Dutch-Scandinavian SBS, with the aim of overtaking European industry leader RTL Group SA, which is controlled by media conglomerate Bertelsmann AG. Permira also controls British TV rights manager All3Media." The AP adds, "An antitrust investigation found ProSiebenSat.1 and SBS were not direct rivals and All3Media's TV content sales in Germany were negligible. … 'The Commission concluded that there was no risk that the proposed transaction would allow the new entity to drive competitors out of the market or to discriminate against them,' it said." The AP notes, "ProSieben owns the Sat.1, ProSieben, kabel eins and N24 networks in Germany and controls about 45 percent of Germany's $5 billion television advertising market. … The consortium will pay German Media Partners 3.1 billion euros ($4 billion) cash for the 50.5 percent stake in the company that it acquired in 2003 and has launched an offer to acquire the publicly traded shares. … Separately, ProSieben said Thursday that its fourth-quarter profit rose by 17 percent thanks to increased advertising, but the figure was still short of analysts' expectations."

Black Farmers Oppose Monsanto-Delta Pine Deal. The Jackson (MS) Clarion-Ledger (2/23, Goodman) reports, "Black farmers in Mississippi and around the country are bracing for a major seed company merger they say threatens to create a monopoly that will price them out of the farming business." The Clarion-Ledger continues, "St. Louis-based Monsanto Co. is forging ahead with a plan to purchase Mississippi's Scott-based cottonseed company Delta and Pine Land, and a national black farmers group says its opposition to the deal has gotten lost in the mix. … 'If this merger goes through, it's going to have a drastic effect on black farmers and small farmers around the country,' said John Boyd Jr., president of the National Black Farmers Association. … 'If this merger goes through, there is literally no competition for cottonseed, soybean seed and corn seed, genetically engineered.'" The Clarion-Ledger adds, "The association represents 80,000 members around the country, primarily small producers, and has its biggest membership in Mississippi. … Delta and Pine Land operates the largest and longest-running private cottonseed breeding program in the world while Monsanto, one of the world's largest agricultural products companies, makes Roundup, the world's best-selling herbicide. … The deal, still awaiting U.S. Department of Justice approval, would mean a monopoly on the market, and seed prices would shoot up, Boyd said. … 'It would be just like going to one supermarket and that supermarket sets the price for everything and we don't have any option but to go to that one supermarket.'"

Esmark Says Deal For Ohio Steel Mill Is Dead. The AP (2/23, Smith) reports from Charleston, WV, "A deal to sell the Weirton division of Mittal Steel Co. to Illinois-based Esmark Inc. is dead, Esmark President Craig Bouchard told The Associated Press on Thursday." The AP continues, "To comply with a federal Justice Department decree, Mittal was ordered this week to sell its Sparrows Point mill in Maryland instead of the former Weirton Steel, across the Ohio River from Steubenville, Ohio, where workers had volunteered to be sold and where Esmark had already made an offer. … The government said selling the mill near Baltimore was the best way to prevent a monopoly on the eastern U.S. market for tin-plated steel. The decree did not prevent Mittal from making a separate deal to shed Weirton, but Bouchard said the company told him Wednesday night that it would keep the West Virginia operations for now. … 'As of right now, our deal with Mittal for Weirton is dead,' he said." The AP adds, "Mittal spokesman William Steers said a January memorandum of understanding with Esmark is no longer valid because it was conditioned on the Justice Department's acceptance of the sale as a remedy to the antitrust concerns. … 'At this point in time, we're focused on developing a global packaging strategy, and Weirton will be part of that,' Steers said. 'We want to focus on seeing whether we can improve its profitability, retain that business and develop its prospects.'" The AP notes, "The 1,250-member Independent Steelworkers Union said it has been assured Mittal 'remains committed' to keeping a mill in West Virginia. … Justice officials had initially ordered Netherlands-based Mittal to try to sell Dofasco Inc. of Canada to settle antitrust issues surrounding its merger with Luxembourg's Arcelor SA. But the Dutch trust that controls Dofasco rejected a plan to sell it to ThyssenKrupp AG of Germany. … That left Mittal with the choice of selling one of its two U.S. assets in the tin market, Sparrows Point or Weirton. … Justice ruled that Sparrows Point is 'a profitable and diversified facility' with its own in-house supply of slab steel, while Weirton would have to develop new sources of slab after separating from Mittal."

DOJ_NMG_0135486

Jury Orders Microsoft To Pay $1.52 Billion To Alcatel In MP3 Suit. The Wall Street Journal (2/23, A3, Guth, Wingfield) reports, "A federal jury ordered Microsoft Corp. to pay $1.52 billion to Alcatel-Lucent SA for infringing patents on a fundamental technology for digital music." The Journal continues, "The decision found that Microsoft's Windows Media software had infringed two patents related to MP3, a software technology for recording and playing digital audio. … The patent verdict, one of the largest on record, could have broad repercussions because of the widespread use of the MP3 audio format in technology and electronics products. Devices that employ the technology include Apple Inc.'s iPod, software from Macromedia and Internet services from Yahoo Inc." The Journal adds, "The decision came from the U.S. District Court in San Diego. The battle began with a 2003 lawsuit filed by Lucent Technologies Inc., which was bought last year by Alcatel. The complaint alleged that Microsoft customers Dell Inc. and Gateway Inc. infringed 15 patents related to the MP3 technology for encoding and decoding audio files. Those companies sell personal computers that include Microsoft's player technology, which uses MP3."

The New York Times (2/23, Hansell) reports, "At issue is the way the Windows Media Player software from Microsoft plays audio files using MP3, the most common method of distributing music on the Internet. If the ruling stands, Apple and hundreds of other companies that make products that play MP3 files, including portable players, computers and software, could also face demands to pay royalties to Alcatel. … Microsoft and others have licensed MP3 — not from Alcatel-Lucent, but from a consortium led by the Fraunhofer Institute, a large German research organization that was involved, along with the French electronics company Thomson and Bell Labs, in the format's development." The Times adds, "The current case turns on two patents that Alcatel claims were developed by Bell Labs before it joined with Fraunhofer to develop MP3. … Thomas W. Burt, the deputy general counsel of Microsoft, said the company would most likely petition the judge in the San Diego case, Rudi M. Brewster, to set aside or reduce the judgment. If she does not, Microsoft will probably take the case to the federal appeals court in Washington, which hears patent cases."

USA Today (2/23, 1B, Swartz) reports, "In 2002 and 2003, Lucent, which was acquired by Alcatel last year, filed 15 patent claims against computer makers Gateway and Dell. Microsoft sued Lucent over the claims and was countersued by Lucent. A judge has tossed out two of Lucent's claims and set six trials to consider the remaining patent disputes." USA adds, "Microsoft says it properly licensed the MP3 technology from Fraunhofer-Gesellschaft, a German research company, for $16 million, in 1997 and 2004. … 'We are concerned that this decision opens the door for Alcatel-Lucent to pursue action against hundreds of other companies who purchased the rights to use MP3 technology from Fraunhofer, the industry-recognized rightful licensor,' Burt said in an earlier statement."

The Washington Post (2/23, D1, Sipress) reports, "The judgment, which lawyers from both sides called the largest patent award ever, raised the prospect that scores of other companies could now be financially liable for using the popular MP3 format. /// Alcatel-Lucent argued that it held the rights to the technology because it was developed at Bell Laboratories, which later became part of Lucent. Alcatel bought Lucent last year. The company successfully argued that Microsoft infringed on the patents by including the digital music technology in its Windows operating system starting in 1998. The same technology later was used in Microsoft's Windows Media Player and is included in the Windows Vista operating system, which was released to the public last month. … Microsoft countered that it had properly licensed the technology from Germany's Fraunhofer Institute, which was involved with Bell Labs in developing aspects of the MP3 format. Only after Microsoft and other companies made licensing agreements with Fraunhofer did Alcatel-Lucent raise its claim, Microsoft argued."

The Financial Times (2/23, Waters) reports, "The large size of the award highlights the scale of the risk to Microsoft as it faces a series of other wide-ranging legal disputes with Alcatel-Lucent over some of the fundamental technology used in PCs and related devices. … Thursday's verdict, stemming from the use of audio coding technology in PCs, was the first of five due to be heard by the San Diego court in the coming months. The others relate to speech coding technology in Windows; user interface patents; technology in the Xbox games console; and video coding in other Microsoft software."

DOJ_NMG_0135487

The AP (2/23, Mintz) reports, "The court will consider the next of the patent suits, which relates to speech coding, in March or April, Microsoft said. Other areas in dispute include video coding on Microsoft's Xbox game console and Windows' user interface."

ENVIRONMENT:

Bush Promotes Energy Proposals In Visit To North Carolina. The Daily Dispatch (2/23, Ponder) reports this morning, "President George W. Bush promoted a major reduction in gasoline use during a visit Thursday to a Franklinton biotechnology facility doing cutting-edge research in the production of ethanol, one of the fuels at the heart of the plan." Bush "told an audience at the Novozymes facility outside Franklinton Thursday that the company's role in ethanol production was a key to American energy independence. The 20 in 10 initiative is a new Bush administration goal to reduce gasoline consumption in America by 20 percent over the next 10 years." Bush "said ethanol would allow Americans to be 'better stewards of the environment' while reducing dependence on foreign oil."

The Washington Post (2/23, A8, Fletcher, 690K) says "Bush's energy proposal is among the few items in his domestic agenda likely to receive support from Democrats in Congress." Although "Bush has not submitted specific legislation," White House "officials have said that they hope the principles he has laid out will guide lawmakers when they consider energy policy." McClatchy (2/23, Barrett), meanwhile, reports that "for Bush, it was another step in his tour across the country to pitch the priorities he outlined in his State of the Union address in January." For Franklinton, "the visit was a very big deal. Novozymes' CEO flew over from Denmark. The mayor was there, along with county commissioners. Sen. Richard Burr, R-N.C., Rep. G.K. Butterfield, D-N.C., and North Carolina Agriculture Commissioner Steve Troxler showed up. Signs around town welcomed the president, and a quartet of children on a nearby road manned a candy stand, hoping Bush might stop by for a $1 Snickers."

The New York Times (2/23, Andrews, 1.16M) reports, "After touring the laboratory, which is developing enzymes to make cellulosic ethanol, fuel distilled from plant byproducts, Mr. Bush spoke buoyantly about new technologies that may reduce the nation's thirst for foreign oil. … After listening to company executives describe the role of enzymes in reducing the cost of ethanol, Mr. Bush jumped in to ask a layman's question: 'So is this like a distillery?'" The trip "is the latest event this week in which Mr. Bush has stepped away from grim questions about the war in Iraq to focus on domestic themes like energy and health care." The Times adds, "Some environmental groups complain about Mr. Bush's definition of alternative fuel including liquefied coal, which could produce even more heat-trapping gases than gasoline." But "the president appeared to show genuine enthusiasm for cellulosic ethanol, frequently interrupting Novozymes executives to boil down technical explanations into more simple sound bites. At one point, Mr. Bush jumped in to explain that corn-based ethanol could not provide enough alternative fuel because ethanol demand was already outstripping supply."

The AP (2/23, Loven) recounts that at one point, "the president held up a beaker of nearly complete ethanol, sniffed it and laughed: 'I quit drinking in 1986,' he said. Then he turned serious. 'Someday you're going to be able to use this in your car,' Bush said." Remarking on that anecdote, the Los Angeles Times (2/23, Gerstenzang, 850K) runs a story titled "Bush Gets A Whiff Of Alternative Fuel," in which is says that Bush, "who frequently jokes about his undistinguished record as a history major at Yale, is devoting considerable time these days to matters scientific."

News & Observer (2/23) says Inside the company, Bush "donned a white lab coat with his name and the company's name and went from room to room learning about how the company works to develop biotechnology. … Afterward, he greeted people along the rope line and then boarded his helicopter just after 1 p.m."

Bush's visit to North Carolina was extensively covered by local TV newscasts across the country. Some examples: WWAY-TV Wilmington, NC (2/22, 11:12 pm) said in its broadcast, "Bush and a panel of experts came to Franklinton, North Carolina today. They say our state can partake in the growth of the ethanol fuel industry." WCNC-TV Charlotte (2/22, 11:06 pm) reported, "Bush went to Franklinton near Raleigh to visit biotech plant Novozymes. The company produces enzymes which help turn corn into ethanol fuel. WCNC was there as the President learned about other resources which could produce ethanol." The station showed the President saying, "We're on the verge of some breakthroughs that will enable a pile of wood chips to become the raw materials for fuels that will run your car." Many other stations, including WFMZ-TV Philadelphia (2/22, 10:46 pm), WSJV-TV South Bend (2/22, 10:24 pm), and KTVU-TV San Francisco (2/22, 5:39 pm), aired similar quotes from the President.

DOJ_NMG_0135488

Bush Honors North Carolina Volunteer. The Herald-Sun (2/23, West) reports, "Forgive Durham's Jamie Lathan if he feels humbled right now. After all, it's not everyday someone gets to meet and chat briefly with the leader of the free world on the tarmac by Air Force One -- plus have…Bush himself turn and wave to your mother, your father and your younger brother standing nearby in the crowd of spectators. That's precisely what happened to Lathan, 28, a mentor who on Thursday joined an elite list of more than 500 people nationally who have received the President's Volunteer Service Award for making a difference in the lives of others." The Sun adds, "Amid a morning burst of sunshine, Bush presented a ceremonial box containing a pin to Lathan moments before leaving Raleigh-Durham International Airport via helicopter to tour an alternative-energy plant in Franklinton. 'It was amazing. It was amazing,' Lathan said immediately afterward, affixing the pin to the lapel of his dark suit jacket." Lathan "said he told the commander-in-chief he was praying for him." He is "a mentor at the Youth Life Learning Center of Durham, an outreach program originally founded by King's Park International Church."

Critics Criticize Bush Proposal For Energy R&D Spending. The Christian Science Monitor (2/23, Clayton, 59K) reports, "If new technology is a key answer to global warming and America's addiction to oil, then…Bush's proposal to boost federal spending on energy R&D – by no less than 30 percent in fiscal 2008 – would seem a welcome step. In the new $2.7 billion budget plan, R&D dollars allotted to the US Department of Energy (DOE) continue a transition toward research that will help cut greenhouse gases." However, "federal spending on energy research in real dollars is only one-third what it was at its 1978 peak, according to a Harvard University analysis. Some also question the administration's emphasis on nuclear research, saying other promising technologies could be applied sooner to climate and energy-security issues."

Rising Costs Threaten Development Of Gas-To-Liquid Fuel. The Wall Street Journal (2/23, A2, Gold, 2.04M) reports, "The rush to build a new industry that turns natural gas into an ultraclean transportation fuel is stumbling over rising costs, showing how tough it is for emerging fuels to compete with crude oil. This past week, Exxon Mobil Corp. backed out of plans to build an enormous gas-to-liquids, or GTL, plant in Qatar." Yesterday, Shell "broke ground on its own similarly sized GTL plant in Qatar, but said the cost might have tripled to as high as $18 billion. Escalating budgets are threatening to constrain the growth of the GTL industry, which produces a clear liquid that can run existing diesel engines without any of the sooty pollutants associated with diesel." The Journal adds, "Higher costs have hit companies developing Canada's oil sands, where crude is packed into tar-like deposits. Prices for corn and other crops have risen, in part, because of the U.S.'s increasing interest in ethanol."

New Fuel Economy Ratings Show Hybrids Not As Efficient As Thought. In a front-page story, USA Today (2/23, 1A, Healey, 2.27M) reports, "Fuel-saving gasoline-electric hybrid cars don't save as much fuel as thought, according to new government fuel-economy ratings available to the public for the first time. The new ratings go into effect beginning with 2008 models," but "it's possible to tell what rating 2007 and older models would get using the '08 standards. The government's fuel-economy website has a program than makes the comparison." The Toyota Prius "drops to 48 miles per gallon in the city under the '08 testing procedure, from a 60 mpg rating under the current system — a 20% decline. Its highway mileage rating falls about 12%, to 45 mpg."

Iowa City To Pay $1.5 Million In Coal Gas Site Settlement. The Le Mars (IA) Daily Sentinel (2/23, Stevens) reports, "Le Mars City Council members Tuesday approved an agreement with the U.S. Justice Department on the nearly five-year-old dispute centering on clean-up of contamination at the former Le Mars Coal Gas site." The Sentinel continues, "The agreement, as outlined by City Attorney Joe Flannery, calls for the city to pay $1.5 million in clean-up response costs plus additional interest. Payments are to be made in three increments, the first $500,000 to be paid on or before July 31, 2007." The Sentinel adds, "Two additional $500,000 payments will be made, upon final federal acceptance of the pact, by April 22, 2008 and April 22, 2008. MidAmerican Energy has agreed to pay $3.1 million in response cost stemming from the clean-up. The coal gas site is located at the northwest corner of the intersection of Fourth Avenue and First Street Northeast where currently the Le Mars street department building sits. … The agreement, after publication in the Federal Register, will then be ruled on in Federal Court in Sioux City. Councilman John Rexwinkle, a

DOJ_NMG_0135489

MidAmerican employee, emphasized during Tuesday's meeting that he had excused himself from any and all discussions that have taken place on the agreement talks."

BP Employee Deleted Files After Subpoena. The Financial Times (2/23, McNulty) reports, "A BP employee has admitted destroying documents after plaintiffs' lawyers subpoenaed her laptop on an anonymous tip that she had information useful in the lawsuits against the UK oil company arising from its fatal refinery explosion." On "November 3 2006, plaintiffs' lawyers subpoenaed Susan Moore, BP regulatory affairs manager, requesting certain documents and the laptop she has used for the past two to three years in her work for BP." When "plaintiffs' lawyers questioned Ms Moore on January 26 2007, a transcript revealed, she said BP had not shown her the subpoena until earlier in the week, and that she had deleted e-mails in the two months after the subpoena." Moore said, " "To the best of my knowledge, I have not deleted information relative to this case." But "Joseph Gourrier, the plaintiffs' attorney questioning Ms Moore, responded, 'It's not up to you to determine what would be relevant to this case.'"

GAO Report Says Funding For Gasoline Storage Tank Cleanup Falls Far Short. The AP (2/23, Heilprin) reports, "It will cost at least $12 billion to clean up contamination from tens of thousands of gasoline storage tanks that are leaking underground, congressional auditors say. That is far more than the $72 million that Congress and the Bush administration have provided each year, according to the report Thursday from the General Accountability Office." The EPA "has already spent more than $10 billion to reduce the contamination over the past 20 years caused by hundreds of thousands of leaking tanks, many of them found at gas stations and convenience stores. Yet some 117,000 faulty tanks still await cleanups, according to the latest figures current as of September 2005." The "lag in cleanups isn't necessarily due to lack of money, according to the GAO." A trust fund to remove the contamination "has about $2.6 billion and is expected to reach $3 billion before the end of 2008." But "annually only a small fraction has been appropriated for cleanups. Most has sat in the Treasury to help counter federal budget deficits."

Sanford Says Conservatives Must Reframe Climate Change Debate. In a Washington Post (2/23, A19, 690K) op-ed, South Carolina Gov. Mark Sanford (R) writes, "The climate change debate is here to stay, and as America warms to the idea of environmental conservation on a grander scale, it's vital that conservatives change the debate before government regulation expands yet again and personal freedom is pushed closer toward extinction." Conservatives "must reframe the environmental discussion by replacing the political left's scare tactics with conservative principles such as responsibility and stewardship." And "conservatives must reclaim lost ground from far-left interest groups by showing how environmental conservation is as much about expanding economic opportunity as it is about saving whales or replanting rain forests." Finally, "conservatives must respond to climate change with innovation, not regulation. This means encouraging private research and implementation of more eco-friendly construction, more energy-efficient workplaces and more sustainable ways of going about life." If "conservatives cannot reframe, reclaim and respond to climate change with our principles intact, government will undoubtedly provide a solution, no matter how taxing it may be."

Krugman Says California's Experience Shows Conservation Not Burdensome. New York Times (2/23, 1.16M) columnist Paul Krugman writes, "[C]limate change skeptics seem to be making a seamless transition from denial to fatalism. In the past, they rejected the science. Now, with the scientific evidence pretty much irrefutable, they insist that it doesn't matter because any serious attempt to curb greenhouse gas emissions is politically and economically impossible." Krugman adds, "Behind this claim lies the assumption...that any substantial cut in energy use would require a drastic change in the way we live." But "the assumption is false." California "has managed to combine rising living standards with a substantial decline in per capita energy consumption, and managed to keep total carbon dioxide emissions more or less flat for two decades, even as both its economy and its population grew rapidly. And it achieved all this without fundamentally changing" its lifestyle. After the energy crisis of the 1970s, "conservation in most of America soon stalled." In "California, by contrast, the state continued to push policies designed to encourage conservation, especially of electricity. And these policies worked." The state's "experience shows that serious conservation is a lot less disruptive, imposes much less of a burden, than the skeptics would have it."

DOJ_NMG_0135490

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Detroit Man Who Sold Lethal Fentanyl-Laced Drugs Gets 30-Year Sentence. The Detroit News (2/23) reports a Detroit man who "admitted selling a fentanyl-laced drug cocktail that killed two people was sentenced Thursday to more than 30 years in prison. U.S. District Judge Lawrence P. Zatkoff, sitting in Port Huron, sentenced James Edgar Coleman to 365 months in federal prison. That sentence was at the top of the sentencing guideline range for Coleman, who has previous convictions for drug trafficking. … U.S. Attorney Stephen Murphy credited the work of the Drug Enforcement Agency and Oakland County. 'This significant sentence is the result of a robust federal response to the rash of overdose deaths caused by fentanyl-laced heroin,' Murphy said."

The Detroit Free Press (2/23, Ashenfelter) reports, "Coleman -- accused of selling the drugs that killed 17-year-old Lauren Jolly and 30-year-old Daniel McElmurry -- pleaded guilty in November to avoid a possible life sentence. … Detroit Drug Enforcement Administration Chief Robert Corso said, 'Today's sentencing reflects a substantial sentence for a substantial violator' and should send a message to Detroit-area drug dealers."

The AP (2/23) reports Coleman's "plea to two counts of delivering a controlled substance resulting in death was the first related to fentanyl-laced heroin and cocaine that killed more than 100 people in metropolitan Detroit in 2005 and 2006…Murphy said." CBS News, FOX News, the Washington Post, Los Angeles Times, Houston Chronicle, Newsday, and the Kansas City Star used the AP story.

FBI Arrests Florida Police Officers In Drug Trafficking Sting. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/23, Anderson) reports, "Four police officers in Hollywood, Fla., have been arrested on suspicion of providing protection and running drugs and money for an organized crime group that was really an FBI sting operation, a law enforcement official said Thursday. The source, who is familiar with the case, spoke on condition of anonymity because the matter is sealed until Friday." The AP notes, "An FBI spokesman in Miami did not immediately return calls seeking comment. The four officers were expected to appear Friday in federal court in Fort Lauderdale."

The Miami Herald (2/23, Wright, 286K) reports, "It is unclear whether Kevin Companion, Jeff Courtney, Steve Harrison and Tom Simcox, all veterans of the police force, were being held in federal prison Thursday night, but word of the arrests sent shock waves through the department and City Hall." Hollywood City Manager Cameron Benson "said he was told the FBI had been running the sting for about two years. Mayor Mara Giulianti first heard of the investigation several weeks ago and said there was 'pretty convincing and strong evidence' that the officers had been involved in wrongdoing. The FBI has scheduled a press conference at 11 a.m. today in front of the federal courthouse in downtown Fort Lauderdale, where officials are expected to give more details on the case."

Advocates Use Data Quality Act To Dispute Government Stance On Medical Marijuana. The San Francisco Chronicle (2/22) reported medical marijuana advocates "tried a new approach …in their tug-of-war with the federal government, filing suit under a law that requires the government to correct its own misstatements -- including, the advocates say, the assertion that marijuana has no medical value. … The suit was filed in federal court in San Francisco under the Data Quality Act, a little-known statute signed by President Bush in 2001. It directs federal agencies to allow members of the public to 'seek and obtain correction' of false or misleading government information that affects them."

The Los Angeles Times (2/23) reports advocates say the government's stance "ignores its own studies." A 1999 report by the Institute of Medicine "declared that marijuana showed medicinal promise and advocated the development of cannabis-based drugs."

Five To Face Federal Charges In California "Pot Houses" Case. The San Francisco Chronicle (2/22) reported five suspects who "allegedly grew marijuana in specially-outfitted homes in Oakland…are facing federal charges for producing plants with a street value of $6 million." The suspects "were arrested Feb. 7 in Oakland and San Francisco by police and members of the Yolo County Narcotic Enforcement Team. Authorities seized 1,500 marijuana plants during raids of homes in Oakland and West Sacramento, where the investigation began several months ago. … Acting on a tip, agents initially began watching a home in West Sacramento, Drug Enforcement Administration Special Agent James Sheeran wrote in a 30-page affidavit "

DOJ_NMG_0135491

Walters Promotes US Anti-Drug Strategy In Canada, Some Criticize Approach. The Canadian Press (2/22) reported John Walters "is in Ottawa touting America's anti-drug policy as a model for Canada. Walters says a blend of treatment, prevention and tough law-and-order measures have lowered drug use among American teens. But critics aren't buying it. Lawyers, academics and a Liberal senator warned against a U.S.-style approach in Canada, saying it's hugely expensive and ineffective." They "say the Conservatives should reconsider any drug crackdown that focuses more on prison terms than prevention or treatment." The Edmonton Sun and Ottawa Citizen used the Canadian Press story.

In the Ottawa Citizen (2/22) Ethan Nadelmann, founder and executive director of the Drug Policy Alliance, wrote Walters "is in Ottawa today, trying his best to put a positive spin on one of the greatest disasters in U.S. foreign and domestic policy. Part of his agenda is to persuade Canada to follow in U.S. footsteps, which can only happen if Canadians ignore science, compassion, health and human rights." The United States "ranks first in the world in per-capita incarceration. … The U.S. 'war on drugs' costs at least $40 billion U.S. a year in direct costs, and tens of billions more in indirect costs. It's all useful information for Canadians to keep in mind when being encouraged to further toughen their drug laws to bring them in line with those of the United States."

Jury Awards Former ATF Agents $9.75 Million In Damages In Suit Against Chicago. The AP (2/23, Robinson) reports, "A jury awarded a husband and wife $9.75 million in damages Thursday for a smear and terror campaign aimed at them after they accused a police officer of corruption while working as federal agents." The AP continues, "Diane Klipfel and Michael Casali hugged and kissed their friends and their attorney after the jury delivered its verdict in the civil trial. … 'I'm relieved that the ordeal is finally over and justice is served,' Casali, an agent with the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, told reporters." The AP adds, "City Law Department spokeswoman Jennifer Hoyle said officials were disappointed and were reviewing appeals options. … The verdict ended a five-week trial focusing on Joseph Miedzianowski, sometimes described as Chicago's most corrupt police officer. … Miedzianowski was convicted in April 2001 of masterminding a Chicago-to-Miami cocaine pipeline and supplying guns and ammunition to the very street gangs he was supposed to be investigating. He is serving a life sentence at a federal prison in California." The AP notes, "Klipfel is a retired ATF agent and Casali still is an agent. They say Miedzianowski smeared them with misconduct allegations and terrified them with threats after they leveled corruption charges against him in 1992 while working in the Chicago ATF office. They say they were so frightened, their children slept in a closet in the interior of the house in case shots were fired through the walls. … Jurors leaving the court scoffed at city officials' claim that they conducted an 18-month investigation of Miedzianowski but never interviewed Klipfel and Casali, and were unable to uncover evidence of corruption at the time."

The Chicago Tribune (2/23, Coen) reports, "Juror Megan Cox said the key to the case was the Chicago Police Department's 'incompetent, lazy and overall negligent' internal investigation into the corrupt officer. … The plaintiffs had argued that Miedzianowski was allowed to select witnesses and bring them in for questioning himself and that Klipfel wasn't interviewed. … Juror Joe Karl said that was especially outrageous given that the corruption was reported by a federal agent. … 'How do you run an investigation and not interview the person making the complaint?' Karl said." The Tribune notes, "The largest part of the $9.75 million award came for the jury's decision that the city and Miedzianowski violated Klipfel's civil rights. Klipfel had testified she was forced from ATF after the Police Department retaliated against her and that she moved her children out of state at times, fearing for their safety."

Philadelphia Man Convicted Of Gun Crimes. The Philadelphia Inquirer (2/23, Shiffman) reports, "A Philadelphia man secretly recorded on tape talking about a plot to detonate pipe bombs inside the Gallery at Market East mall was convicted yesterday of 27 unrelated violent crimes that are likely to send him to prison for life." The Inquirer continues, "The verdicts against Andre L. Henry are significant, federal authorities said, because they represent a brazen case of a felon using women with clean records to make straw gun purchases, then using the weapons in a crime spree. … The jury found that shortly after the women helped Henry buy assault rifles, shotguns and handguns in 2003, he robbed two banks and seven fast-food restaurants, fired shots at a Philadelphia police officer and solicited the murder of grand-jury witnesses." The Inquirer adds, "Henry, 29, also faces two decade-old state murder charges. He spent much of his federal trial wearing an electronic stun belt after U.S. marshals said they caught him trying to sneak a seven-inch homemade knife into the courtroom. … Near the end of the two-week trial, Henry testified that the person who confessed to the 27 crimes on a secret recording is actually his twin brother. Assistant U.S. Attorneys Michelle Rotella and Susan Fields presented evidence that Henry does not have a twin brother. … 'His story is just absurd,' Rotella told jurors." The Inquirer notes, "U.S. District Judge Jan E. Dubois scheduled sentencing for May 24. Under the advisory federal guidelines, Henry probably faces life imprisonment. … John Hageman, a spokesman for the Bureau of Alcohol Tobacco and Firearms, said that the Henry case 'truly exhibits the danger and violence brought to Philadelphia by these illegally purchased firearms.' … 'This case also shows that this is a regional problem,' Hageman said. 'All of the guns were purchased in Montgomery County.'"

DOJ_NMG_0135492

IMMIGRATION:

Senate Hearing To Look For Administration Backing Of Comprehensive Immigration Reform. The Washington Times (2/23, Hurt, 88K) reports, "Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick J. Leahy will hold a hearing next week that he hopes will get the Bush administration to confirm publicly that it wants 'comprehensive immigration reform' this year." The Times notes "Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez and Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff will testify at the Wednesday hearing. The White House yesterday said Mr. Bush remains committed to comprehensive reform, which many Republicans fear will contain some sort of amnesty for illegal aliens and usher millions of new foreign workers into the country." Meanwhile, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy "plans to introduce a major bill sometime after next week, his office said yesterday." Kennedy's office says the administration has been kept up to date "on the developments of drafting the bill," but a number of Republicans "complain that they have been left out of negotiations," prompting fears "that the bill is being pushed further to the left than last year's final bill."

On CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (2/22, 6:19 pm), host Lou Dobbs said, "Corporate lobbyists and special interest groups are helping" to write Kennedy's bill. "The legislative work is being done in secret. Taxpayers who will ultimately have to pay for that legislation for amnesty will not have a voice. But guess who does? … The Chamber of Commerce and groups like it have been allowed to hijack a large part of the process and even write part of the legislation." CNN (Sylvester) continued, "Even moderate Republicans like Senator Arlen Specter have not been offered a seat at the table. … One Republican Hill staffer complained, 'The Chamber has seen more than the senators when it comes to the actual writing on paper.'" Sylvester added later that "despite the election, in which the people spoke loudly and clearly, we are seeing more of the same when it comes to letting special interests dictate what ultimately is the policy on immigration in this country."

Smuggling Rivalries Boost Violence On US-Mexico Border. The Washington Times (2/23, Seper, 88K) reports, "Rival alien and drug smugglers on the US-Mexico border are targeting each other in a wave of escalating violence to win control of smuggling corridors into the United States, with at least four recent killings tied to efforts to kidnap migrants for ransom." Border violence "has risen dramatically over the past three years in what US Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) has called 'an unprecedented surge.' ICE has established intelligence and investigative operations along the border to combat the increased brutality." The Times continues that much of the violence has been directed at "US Border Patrol agents, who have seen a spike in incidents as the agency continues its efforts to bring larger areas of the border under operational control."

Three Executives, 200 Workers Arrested In ICE Sweep Of National Cleaning Company. The Wall Street Journal (2/23, A5, Block, 2.04M) reports the Department of Homeland Security's "new strategy to 'attack the economic engine' that fuels most illegal migration into the US" has led to the arrest of "three top executives of a national cleaning service for allegedly employing illegal immigrants and defrauding the government. The sweep also netted nearly 200 employees believed to be illegal immigrants." A 23-count indictment unsealed yesterday says Nevada-based Rosenbaum-Cunningham International Inc., or RCI, "knowingly hired illegal immigrants, intentionally failed to withhold taxes and created shell accounts to line the pockets of top executives. RCI co-owners Richard M. Rosenbaum and Edward Scott Cunningham and firm controller Christina Flocken face criminal fraud, immigration and tax charges."

DOJ_NMG_0135493

The Washington Times (2/23, Seper, 88K) describes the sweep as "the latest in a series of high-profile efforts by the Bush administration to strengthen its immigration-enforcement credentials as Congress and the White House begin debate on a new round of immigration legislation."

The Washington Post (2/23, A10, Hsu, 690K) reports, "The case marked the latest wrinkle in a renewed campaign by the Bush administration to crack down on employers as Congress debates an overhaul of the nation's immigration laws. ICE arrested 716 individuals on criminal charges last year, up from a few dozen in recent years." The RCI executives "allegedly paid workers in cash and set up shell companies, with such names as Ricurt Inc., Monker and Sunchaser Service Corp., to hide assets from the Internal Revenue Service, the indictment said. Dividing nearly $7 million, defendants allegedly purchased 'racehorses, fancy boats and lavish homes' in Florida and California," said Myers.

The New York Times (2/23, Sander, 1.16M) reports, "By failing to pay taxes on their employees' income, Social Security and Medicare, the three executives cheated the government of $18,640,345 and used about a third of the excess money to finance the "extravagant lifestyle costs" of lavish houses, luxury boats, racehorses and college tuition, the indictment said."

USA Today (2/23, 2B, Leinwand, 2.27M) reports, "The investigation began two years ago when police in Grand Rapids arrested a man who provided fraudulent documents. That arrest led Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) agents to 23 other illegal laborers working at the Grand Traverse Resort & Spa, which had contracted more than $3 million in RCI cleaning services from June 1997 to March 2006, ICE Assistant Secretary Julie Myers said Thursday."

Owners Of Michigan Cleaning Service Charged After Illegal Immigrant Raid. The AP (2/23, Prichard) reports from Grand Rapids, MI, "An investigation of cleaning crews working at a Michigan resort has led to federal fraud and tax charges being filed against three top officials at a U.S. janitorial service and the arrest of more than 200 illegal immigrants around the country, government officials said." The AP continues, "The detainees - mostly Mexican nationals - who were rounded up early Thursday were working as janitors for Rosenbaum-Cunningham International Inc., or RCI, a Florida-based cleaning contractor." The AP adds, "RCI co-owners Richard M. Rosenbaum, 60, and Edward Scott Cunningham, 43, and firm controller Christina A. Flocken, 59, all of Florida, face criminal fraud, immigration and tax charges in a 23-count indictment unsealed Thursday in U.S. District Court in Grand Rapids. … 'This is not a case of bad bookkeeping or skirting the rules,' said Brian M. Moskowitz, special agent in charge of the Detroit office of U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement. 'It involved flagrant criminal behavior.'" The AP notes, "Moskowitz said during a news conference in Grand Rapids that federal agents arrested Rosenbaum in Longwood earlier in the day. Cunningham and Flocken were expected to soon turn themselves in to federal authorities in Grand Rapids, where the case will be tried, he said. … Their practice of paying cash wages to their workers deprived the U.S. government of about $18.6 million in employment taxes, according to the indictment. … 'In this particular investigation, these defendants took advantage of illegal workers in order to enrich themselves by violating the internal revenue laws that were created specifically to protect the legitimate work force, all at a cost to taxpayers of approximately $18 million, all so that they could live a very lavish lifestyle and live the high life,' said Sandra L. Carter, special agent in charge of the Internal Revenue Service office in Detroit. … About 203 illegal immigrants who worked for RCI were arrested and expected to be deported, Moskowitz said. Agents took them into custody at 63 business locations in 17 states and the District of Columbia."

Judge Dismisses Posada Carriles' Bid For Freedom. The AP (2/23, Caldwell) reports from El Paso, "A federal judge on Wednesday denied a request by an anti-Fidel Castro activist to be released from jail while immigration officials figure out where to deport him to." The AP continues, "U.S. District Judge Philip R. Martinez threw out Luis Posada Carriles' lawsuit after federal prosecutors said immigration officials could not release him because he is in the custody of the U.S. Marshals Service. … Posada, an ex-CIA operative who is suspected of bombing a Cuban jet 31 years ago, left Department of Homeland Security custody after his indictment last month on suspicion of lying in a citizenship application." The AP adds, "Posada, 79, was arrested two years ago on an immigration violation after he reported paying a smuggler to sneak him into Texas from Mexico. … An immigration judge later ordered that Posada be deported but ruled that he could not be sent to Cuba, where he was born, or Venezuela, where he is a naturalized citizen. … Several countries, including Mexico, have declined to allow Posada in. He sued last year, arguing that the U.S. government cannot hold him indefinitely while they look for a country willing to let him move there."

DOJ_NMG_0135494

TAX:

Thirteen Indicted For Alleged Minnesota Cigarette Tax Fraud Scheme. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (2/23, Olson, Louwagie, 395K) reports, "Thirteen people face federal charges of defrauding the state of more than $2.5 million in sales tax by concealing revenues from cigarette sales, according to a federal indictment unsealed Thursday. The indictment…cites numerous attempts to conceal earnings and wealth through fraudulent bookkeeping and tax returns, as well as property transfers and large cash transactions." The Star Tribune notes, "The case, the result of a joint investigation by the FBI and the Internal Revenue Service, includes one conspiracy count, 13 mail fraud counts and 26 wire fraud counts. … The defendants also are accused of transferring nearly $1 million to Jordan, Lebanon and the Palestinian territories through checks, currency and wire transfers backed by the tobacco store proceeds. "

Firms Hide Assets, Identities In State Havens. USA Today (2/23, 1B, Mccoy) reports, "Roughly four miles from the famed Las Vegas casino strip, ABC Equity's corporate office is registered in a modest business suite located off West Sahara Avenue. … Great Fortune 600 is registered in the same suite. So are DK Financial, Hill 99, Stock Savant, ZZYZX Holdings — and more than 1,000 other corporations." USA continues, "They share something in common besides their business address. Each lists the same man as its sole corporate officer in Nevada incorporation records. He is William Reed, a businessman with a suspended law license and the target of a Federal Trade Commission lawsuit that alleges he and a convicted felon teamed in a business that promoted forming Nevada corporations to shield assets 'from "capricious federal judges and any government agency."'" USA adds, "A USA TODAY computer-aided review shows that the two men and their business, Asset Protection Group, are part of a thriving mini-industry that has capitalized on real or perceived gaps in domestic incorporation laws and virtually non-existent government oversight to promote some U.S. states as secrecy rivals of offshore havens. … A multi-agency U.S. Money Laundering Threat Assessment issued in 2005 cited Nevada, Wyoming and Delaware as the states with laws most conducive to anonymous corporate ownership. USA TODAY's review… examined databases of all Nevada and Wyoming incorporations but was unable to obtain comprehensive data for Delaware … USA TODAY's findings buttressed the money laundering report's warning that a 'race to the bottom' among states vying to set minimal corporate information requirements has enabled companies to hide the identities of their owners, thereby making it harder for law enforcement agencies to track suspected tax evasion, money laundering and other crimes."

WSJournal Criticizes AMT Hike In 1993 Clinton Tax Plan. Under the headline "Bill Clinton's AMT Bomb," the Wall Street Journal (2/23, 2.04M) editorializes, "As tax season nears, Democrats in Congress are discovering they have an urgent political bomb to defuse -- the alternative minimum tax. The AMT already hits four million Americans, and without new legislation this year it will explode in the pocketbooks of 23 million taxpayers come April 15, 2008. What's amazing is that many Democrats and reporters are trying to blame this looming tax increase on the 2001-2003 tax cuts. See if you can follow their argument: Taxpayers are obliged to pay the higher of their tax bill under either the regular IRS code or the AMT. And because the tax cuts reduced the regular income tax of the average family by $2,000 a year, more middle-class families are being bounced to the AMT system. Ergo, it's all President Bush's fault." The Journal adds "the politician most responsible for the AMT's relentless expansion in recent years is none other than William Jefferson Clinton. Remember the 1993 tax hike that was supposed to fall only on the rich? In addition to raising gas taxes and Medicare payroll taxes and income tax rates, the Democratic Congress that year also raised the AMT: from a 24% flat rate to a dual tax rate of 26% on AMT income up to $175,000 and 28% on AMT income above that amount."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Army Surgeon General Disputes "Characterization," But Not Facts, Of Walter Reed Reports. The Washington Post runs two stories on the problems at Walter Reed Army Medical Center near the front of the A section this morning. On page A3, the

DOJ_NMG_0135495

Washington Post (2/23, Vogel, 690K) runs a straightforward account saying that the "Army's surgeon general yesterday criticized stories" in the Post disclosing problems at Walter Reed, saying the "series unfairly characterized the living conditions and care for soldiers recuperating from wounds at the hospital's facilities." Lt. Gen. Kevin Kiley said during a news conference, "I'm not sure it was an accurate representation. It was a one-sided representation." The Post notes that, "until now, the Army had not challenged any aspect of the Post series." After the news conference, Kiley was "asked to elaborate on his comments." He said he "does not dispute the facts in the Post stories. 'It's not the accuracy I question, it's the characterization,' he said."

On the facing page A2, Dana Milbank of the Washington Post (2/23, 690K) criticizes the military's response in a story headlined "Painting Over The Problems At Walter Reed's Building 18." Milbank writes, "It's not every day one gets to witness a whitewash in action, but Walter Reed…provided just such an opportunity yesterday." A Sunday Post story "described the woeful conditions of Room 205 in Walter Reed's Building 18," and "the Army mobilized. Painters were deployed to cover the offending wall with a fresh coat of white semigloss. And television crews were invited in to inspect the result. … Mission accomplished? Lt. Gen. Kevin Kiley thought so."

In an interview with PBS' NewsHour (2/22, 7:38PM), Rep. Robert Filner (D), chairman of the House Veterans' Affairs Committee, called the conditions "a catastrophic or horrific circumstance" for "our young people coming back" from service overseas. Rep. Filner also pointed a lack of continuity between the medical record systems of the armed forces, which he said, "are not translatable into the VA system." Rep. Filner also noted that the inspector general "although supposedly independent, is really part of that system." Therefore, in order to "do something very quickly" about the problem, he recommended setting up "a hotline that is manned by independent people, maybe some veterans who understand these issues and allow people to report on the situation."

Also appearing on PBS' NewsHour (2/22, 7:39PM), Rep. Christopher Shays (R) said, "The bigger problem is the process of why you would have someone in a hospital for two months to two years. They want to be discharged in some cases, in other cases they can come right back into the military. The problem is the paperwork is just pathetic."

NYTimes Blasts Leaders For Permitting "Shameful Neglect At Walter Reed." The New York Times (2/23, A20, 1.16M) editorializes on the subject, saying that "when the Senate next debates whether to debate the Iraq war, members would do well to visit Walter Reed. … There they can run a stark reality check on how the country is failing the war's wounded despite all those Capitol orations about unstinting support of our fighting troops. As fine as the surgery wards have been through a five-year torrent of battle casualties, Walter Reed has seen the shameful growth of a parallel village of almost 700 traumatized and maimed outpatients. Far too many of these souls wait lost and wasted, abandoned by the post's and the Army's shambling bureaucracy. … The shameful neglect at Walter Reed is more proof of how America's leaders…are failing the nation's warriors in this disastrous war."

Intelligence Legislation Remains Stalled In Senate. The Washington Times (2/23, Waterman, 88K) reports, "The annual legislation that governs the 16 U.S. intelligence agencies and their new boss, the director of national intelligence, is stalled again in the Senate, where efforts to pass it in the past two years also died. 'We're still working it,' said a senior staffer from the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, which voted the bill out 12-3 last month," adding that Chairman Jay Rockefeller "continued to hope the bill could be passed after the Presidents Day recess." In the "previous two years, under the chairmanship of Sen. Pat Roberts," committee efforts "to move the bill have been blocked by holds from Republican senators" over what some see "as the bill's excessive reporting requirements, both on intelligence agencies about their detention and interrogation of terror suspects, and on the administration as a whole."

Pentagon Cancels Plans For Massive Conventional Bomb Test. The AP (2/23, Talhelm) reports "the Pentagon on Thursday scrapped plans for a 700-ton non-nuclear test blast that would have produced the first mushroom cloud of dust over the Nevada desert in decades." The Defense Department "said it would find other ways to test the nation's ability to penetrate underground bunkers that produce and store weapons of mass destruction. … The decision was not based on any technical information that indicated the test would harm workers, the public or the environment, according to James Tegnelia, director of the Pentagon unit that works on technical aspects of how to destroy deeply buried enemy weapons.

DOJ_NMG_0135496

The New York Times (2/23, 1.16M) reports, "The test, known as Divine Strake, at the Nevada Test Site would have been conducted near a place used for decades for atomic testing. Opponents said the explosion would create a two-mile-high mushroom cloud and release radioactive dust from long-undisturbed radioactive material." Utah's Congressional delegation and "thousands of Utah residents have written to the Defense Threat Reduction Agency of their opposition to the test."

McCain Critical Of Pentagon Request For Three Experimental Aircraft. The Politico (2/23, Lowe) reports, "Quarreling with Pentagon spending requests, Sen. John McCain has chided Defense Secretary Robert Gates and Air Force Secretary Michael Wynne for seeking three experimental aircraft in the Pentagon's emergency wartime funding bill. The $93 billion funding request for military operations yet this year in Iraq, Afghanistan and other hot spots includes nearly $14 billion for two F-35 Lightning II fighter jets" -- also known as the Joint Strike Fighter – "and a CV-22 Osprey tilt-rotor transport to replace aircraft lost in overseas combat operations. Both aircraft are still in development and years from being fielded. 'In an emergency supplemental, you are proposing to replace combat loss with unproven platforms that not only are not yet operational but will also ultimately cost a lot more than they do now,'" McCain "told Gates and Wynne in a Feb. 13 letter obtained by Politico." McCain added in his letter: "Both the JSF and Osprey are controversial, next-generation programs that require considerable congressional oversight. … Your including the requests to procure both aircraft types in an emergency supplemental effectively insulates these programs from this committee's routine oversight. This is inappropriate.'"

Business, Labor Come To Blows Over Key Unionization Bill. The New York Times (2/23, A18, Greenhouse, 1.16M) reports organized labor "is fighting" for the "pro-union" Employee Free Choice Act "as if its life depended on it. Some labor experts say the union movement's ability to reverse its slide could in fact hinge on its winning passage of the bill, which would make it easier for workers to join unions" by giving employees at a workplace "the right to unionize as soon as a majority sign cards saying they want a union." Currently, "employers can insist on a secret-ballot election to determine whether a majority of employees favors a union." Business groups "are mounting a fierce campaign to stop the bill," while labor unions "are sponsoring demonstrations, conferences and meetings in 99 cities this month to push for the legislation. The two sides have also squared off with newspaper advertisements." While "legislative aides say they expect the bill to be approved next Thursday in the House, where it has 234 sponsors, including seven Republicans," opponents "voice confidence that they can block the bill in the Senate," and last week, Vice President Cheney said resident Bush would veto the bill if it reached his desk.

Virginia May Lose Federal Funds If Districts Fail To Test English Language Learners. The Washington Post (2/23, Glod, 690K) reports, "The U.S. Education Department threatened yesterday to withhold more than $17 million from Fairfax County schools if the system continues to defy a federal mandate to give reading tests to thousands of immigrant children. Other Virginia school systems would also be in jeopardy if they refuse to comply with the federal No Child Left Behind Act, and the state could lose $2 million in administrative funds." The threat "raises the stakes" in the dispute "over the best way to test immigrant students learning English." The department found that the test Virginia uses "shows how well students learn to read, write and speak English" but doesn't "test students on their understanding of grade-level reading material." U.S. officials told Virginia Supt. Billy K. Cannaday Jr. that "they expect to approve a state request to use a portfolio of a student's work over time instead of a test."

The Washington Times/AP (2/23, Sampson) reports Deputy Education Secretary Raymond Simon said that "Virginia school divisions will lose federal funding if they do not comply with a federal law that requires children struggling to learn English take the same reading tests as their native-speaking peers." Cannaday said that "he expected school divisions to comply with the law 'even though they question whether the tests are appropriate and the accommodations are adequate.'" industry with a proposed budget that would cut subsidies and drive out many private lenders by reducing their profits, the head of student loan giant Sallie Mae said yesterday." The proposal "would reduce education subsidies for special programs, such as student loans, to $6.6 billion, from $9.7 billion this year. Lender subsidies would fall by 0.5 percentage points. The White House said the $12.4 billion saved over five years by cutting subsidies would be used to increase the number of Pell Grants."

Student Loan Proposal Said Likely To Reduce Number Of Banks Offering Them. The Washington Times (2/23, Ramstack, 88K) reports, "President Bush is trying to 'right-size' the student loan

DOJ_NMG_0135497

Congress May Address Lack Of Sick Pay In US. ABC World News (2/22, story 6, 2:50, Gibson, 8.78M) took "A Closer Look" at "an enormous problem for American workers: the lack of sick pay. We were surprised to learn that 145 nations, but not the United States, require businesses to provide some paid sick days, and that nearly half of the private sector workers in America, are not paid when they are too sick to work. This month, San Francisco became the first city to mandate sick pay, and now, Congress might act." ABC (Stark) added that "59 million Americans…have no paid sick days at all," and 86 million "do not get a single paid day off to care for a sick child. The federal government requires most employers to offer some unpaid leave for serious medical conditions. But advocates say until it requires them to provide a few paid sick days, as well, millions of Americans will have no choice…but to work when they should stay home." But business groups "say another federal mandate is the last thing employers can afford. And if paid sick leave becomes the law of the land, somebody will pay."

Bodman Lifts Energy Department Bonus Freeze. In its "Federal Diary" column, the Washington Post (2/23, D4, Barr, 690K) writes, "Bonuses are back at the Energy Department. The department got caught in a budget squeeze late last year when Congress failed to complete the annual spending bills funding the government on time." Last week, "President Bush signed a budget bill that included funds for Energy, and Secretary Samuel W. Bodman sent a memo to the workforce saying 'this new law has allowed us to lift the 'hold' on performance-based awards and discretionary pay adjustments.'"

NYTimes Urges Congress To Increase Oversight Of For-Profit Colleges. The New York Times (2/23, 1.16M) writes in an editorial, "The Democratic leadership in Congress plans to make college affordability a central theme of this legislative session. The pending bills that would increase federal aid to low-income students and lower the costs of student loans are good, as far as they go. But Congress must do more to ensure that scarce federal aid dollars are legitimately spent and not gobbled up by for-profit diploma mills that bilk the government and students alike." Congress "needs to take a harder look at for-profit colleges to make sure that students and the government are getting what they pay for."

NYTimes Backs "Passengers' Bill Of Rights." The New York Times (2/23, 1.16M) editorializes, "JetBlue's horrendous performance during the recent ice storms that paralyzed New York City's airports has reinvigorated calls for a 'passengers' bill of rights' to protect air travelers against what can only be deemed abusive treatment. JetBlue has moved rapidly to make amends, but its shocking failures and those of other airlines in recent months make a federal law the best solution." Sens. Barbara Boxer and Olympia Snowe "have introduced a bill that would require that passengers be provided with adequate food and water and sanitary bathrooms while delayed on the ground and be allowed to leave the plane after three hours. Representative Mike Thompson, also a California Democrat, will introduce a bill that would also require airlines to update passengers frequently on the cause and timing of delays. Both proposals would be strengthened if they required the Transportation Department to impose suitable fines or passenger compensation should an airline fail to comply."

NYTimes Criticizes Cost Of Uncompleted Congressional Visitor Center. The New York Times (2/23, 1.16M) writes in an editorial, "If government had a department of irony, the mammoth, ever more expensive and still uncompleted Capitol Visitor Center would be renamed the People's Debt and Deficit Walk-Through Memorial. The three-story subterranean center being built (for nearly seven years) under the Capitol's East Plaza will have a 600-seat cafeteria, an interactive museum about the glories of democracy and the latest in security to screen out potential malefactors among the throngs who currently gather in snaking outdoor lines for tours. … The American taxpayers, who will pay for the project for generations to come, deserve to be treated to candor. And what better way than by turning the center into a teaching museum on the hyperbolic plans and procrastination of Washington life?"

DOJ_NMG_0135498

OTHER NEWS:

Analysis Finds US Economy Leaving Millions In "Severe Poverty." Under the headline "US Economy Leaving Record Numbers In Severe Poverty," McClatchy (2/23, Pugh) reports, "The percentage of poor Americans who are living in severe poverty has reached a 32-year high, millions of working Americans are falling closer to the poverty line and the gulf between the nation's 'haves' and 'have-nots' continues to widen. A McClatchy Newspapers "analysis of 2005 census figures, the latest available, found that nearly 16 million Americans are living in deep or severe poverty. A family of four with two children and an annual income of less than $9,903 - half the federal poverty line - was considered severely poor in 2005. So were individuals who made less than $5,080 a year." The analysis "found that the number of severely poor Americans grew by 26 percent from 2000 to 2005. That's 56 percent faster than the overall poverty population grew in the same period. McClatchy's review also found statistically significant increases in the percentage of the population in severe poverty in 65 of 215 large U.S. counties, and similar increases in 28 states."

Stocks Mixed Yesterday. USA Today (2/23, 5B, Krantz, 2.27M) reports, "Weak earnings from a leading home builder, a $1.5 billion damage verdict against Microsoft and general concern that a market correction is overdue piled up to send stocks lower Thursday." The Dow Jones industrial average "fell 52.39 points to 12,686.02, making it the benchmark's second-straight down day. Still, the Dow remains up 1.8% this year." The Standard & Poor's 500 index lost 1.25 points to 1456.38. The S&P 500 remains up 2.7% for the year," while the Nasdaq composite index rose 6.52 points to 2524.94. The Wall Street Journal (2/23, C1, Anand, 2.04M), among other major newspapers, also reports the Wall Street numbers.

Jury Rules For UCLA In Psychiatric Sex Trial, But Awards No Money. The Los Angeles Times (2/23, Garrison) reports, "A Los Angeles jury today ruled against a former UCLA psychiatric resident who claimed the school unfairly rescinded its offer of a coveted job because he broke off an affair with his supervisor. … But jurors did not believe the supervisor's counter-charge that Dr. David Martorano had slandered her by making up the affair, which Martorano testified included oral sex in parked cars." The Times continues, "In the end, neither party was awarded any money after a two-week trial of their dueling lawsuits that featured the appearance of no fewer than nine psychiatrists, along with women testifying about their sex lives under code names to protect their privacy. … As Los Angeles Superior Court Judge Judith Chirlin said to the jury: 'You could have been here on some boring contract case.'" The Times adds, "Martorano, a handsome Columbia University-educated physician and a former psychiatric resident at UCLA's Neuropsychiatric Institute, alleged that he lost a coveted post as chief resident and that his reputation was ruined once rumors of the affair began to circulate after he broke off the relationship. He sued his former supervisor, Dr. Heather Krell, and UCLA. … Krell's lawyer accused Martorano of making the whole thing up to seduce yet another psychiatrist. Krell countersued Martorano for slander and invasion of privacy. … UCLA's lawyer, meanwhile, said it didn't matter from a legal perspective whether Martorano and Krell had an affair -- university administrators acted properly when they revoked the offer for Martorano to become chief resident after rumors began to fly because it was unacceptable for there to be even the perception that he was getting a job based on a sexual affair at the institute, one of the top facilities of its kind in the country."

High School Students Earn Lower Math And Reading Scores Yet Better Grades. ABC World News (2/22, story 7, :30, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The government issued a disappointing report card today for the nation's high school seniors. In standardized national reading tests, 73% read at a basic level. That's down from 80% in 1992. And just 35% scored at a proficient level defined as competent with challenging subject matter. That's down from 40%. Then, there was a puzzling second report, as well. While the reading scores fell, graduating seniors are taking harder courses and getting higher grades. Education officials say they're not sure why."

NBC Nightly News (2/22, story 5, :40, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Now to one of the issues that will be talked about in the next election. There is a new national report card out on how this nation's high school seniors are doing in reading and math. These grades are not good."

The New York Times (2/23, Schemo, 1.16M) reports the National Assessment of Educational Progress results in reading "were significantly worse than those of students in 1992" and also "showed that the overwhelming majority of high school seniors have not fully mastered high-school-level math." The Bush administration "seized upon the results as proof that high schools were not measuring up." Secretary of Education Margaret Spellings said, "Schools must prepare students to succeed in college and the 21st-century work force."

DOJ_NMG_0135499

USA Today (2/23, Toppo, 2.27M) reports the results were "contradictory" because while, "a record 68% of the class of 2005 completed at least a standard curriculum with four years of English and three each of math, science and social studies" and "51% of students were doing college-preparatory work" yet, "the average high school senior doesn't read as well as those in 1992."

The Washington Post (2/23, Paley, 690K) reports the findings were called "evidence of grade inflation and the dumbing-down of courses" and "also prompted renewed calls for tough national standards and the expansion of the federal No Child Left Behind law." Spellings said, "If, in fact, our high school students are taking more challenging courses and earning higher grades, we should be seeing greater gains in test scores."

The Wall Street Journal (2/23, Tomsho, 2.04M) reports, "American educators have complained about grade inflation for years. But new findings suggest that U.S. high schools may also suffer from another type of inflation -- in the labeling of courses." Yesterday's NAEP results "aren't the only signs that college-prep courses may not be delivering all that they promise. The College Board…is in the midst of a nationwide audit of its high-school Advanced Placement Program courses, amid concerns that some districts aren't offering college-level content."

The AP (2/23, Zuckerbrod) reports that "It is unclear whether student performance has improved or whether grade inflation or something else might be responsible." Meanwhile, "the gap in reading scores between whites and minorities was relatively unchanged since 2002."

The Washington Times (2/23, Fagan, 88K) reports, "Lawmakers and education researchers agreed that improvement is needed but disagreed on the best way of getting there -- with some arguing the federal government should get more involved in high schools and some saying that is exactly the wrong approach."

Bloomberg (2/23, Basken) reports, "Business and education leaders said the latest results reinforce fears that the U.S. school system isn't preparing its students to be competitive in the global workplace." The results also "may reinforce fears that the quality of high-level courses suffers as more students are allowed into them."

On Campaign Trail, Giuliani Seen As Avoiding Unfriendly Audiences. The New York Times (2/23, Pérez-Peña, 1.16M) reports, "In a swing through South Carolina this week," ex-New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani (R) "chose to campaign at a fire house, which is a little like Derek Jeter meeting with Yankees fans -- a most unlikely forum for hostility, or even much skepticism. Instead of the sometimes barbed give-and-take endured by the other candidates," Giuliani "fielded a few questions from the firefighters and police officers," which "stuck almost entirely to issues on which Mr. Giuliani is most comfortable, like airport security and border control. More than the other major presidential candidates, Mr. Giuliani has limited himself to events with narrowly defined, friendly audiences, avoiding the kind of uncomfortable interrogations his rivals have occasionally faced." Giuliani has "done little of the politicking that exposes candidates to random sets of people -- at shopping malls or train stations -- who might be of any political stripe, and can raise any issue." He's "yet to be questioned by voters about his support for abortion rights, same-sex civil unions and gun control, or about his marital history." However, Giuliani spokeswoman Maria Comella said the former mayor "was not avoiding difficult questions. … 'The mayor will be at a wide variety of events that will put him in front of voters where he will answer their questions,' Ms. Comella said."

Giuliani To Meet With K Street Lobbyists Friday. In a brief article in The Politico (2/23), Jonathan Martin reports that "Giuliani comes to Washington tomorrow to do a little lobbyist outreach. Lobbyists Dirk Van Dongen, Susan Molinari, Mike Zarelli and Willie Gaynor have helped put together the meet-and-greet, which is designed to familiarize Rudy with top K St. Republicans and vice-versa. There is no charge for the afternoon get-together, to take place at a downtown Washington hotel. … Because of the recess, members are not expected to attend. But Rudy is also making progress on that front and will soon roll out the backing of" PA Rep. Charlie Dent (R). Martin added, "I'm also told that Team Rudy is making progress with other members of both chambers of Congress and will soon be announcing additional endorsements from the sort of states (Pennsylvania being one) that his supporters think he could put in play in the general election."

DOJ_NMG_0135500

Huckabee Set To Announce Endorsements Of Two House Republicans. The Politico (2/23, Allen) reports that ex-Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee (R) "plans to make a splash on Capitol Hill on Friday with the surprising announcement that Rep. Don Young of Alaska has signed on as congressional chairman of his Republican presidential exploratory committee. In a letter to House Republicans, Young says Huckabee will help produce 'a reawakening of the conservative values that make our country a land of opportunity.' … Young, the third ranking Republican in Congress…has deep personal connections with almost every member because he was chairman of the Transportation and Infrastructure Committee, which put him in charge of massive amounts of pork." The Politico notes, "Also Friday, Huckabee plans to announce that Rep. John Boozman of Arkansas will be congressional co-chairman of his presidential exploratory committee. Boozman is a member of the Republican Study Committee, the conservative caucus, and so has ties to a group of members whose support could really help Huckabee."

The Washington Post (2/23, A8, Cillizza, 690K) reports, "Asked about winning congressional endorsements, Huckabee said 'it shows [that] people who are policy makers are willing to sign on,' but he added: 'Frankly, I don't think it's going to tip the election one way or another.'"

Obama Tries To "Clear The Air" As Dustup With Clinton Keeps Drawing Attention. Coverage of the clash between Democratic presidential rivals Sens. Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama continues, with a lengthy report on NBC and a front-page story in the New York Times. NBC Nightly News (2/22, story 4, 2:45, Williams, 9.87M) said an effort to "tamp down what has been an unusually early and bitter fight between two of the top contenders" for the Democratic nod is underway. NBC (Gregory) added that Obama was "on the campaign trail today trying to clear the air with Hillary Clinton." Obama: "It should be about the issues and not about personalities or what supporters say." Gregory: "The response, an attempt to overcome a rift started by Hollywood mogul David Geffen, longtime Clinton friend and fundraiser turned foe. His attacks this week caused her campaign to lash out" at Obama. While "the Democratic infighting has made headlines and comes as Clinton's opponents are attacking her for refusal to apologize for supporting the war in Iraq…it was the Clinton campaign's response to Geffen that revealed the tough tactics that Clinton will use against her opponents."

The New York Times (2/23, Nagourney, 1.16M) writes that "after weeks of watching in frustration" as Obama "presented himself as a fresh face gliding above partisan politics," Clinton" has drawn Mr. Obama onto a muddy political field, engaging him in a back-and-forth that recalls the kind of Washington bickering Mr. Obama has decried. Mrs. Clinton's effort to identify Mr. Obama with an attack made by one of his chief Hollywood supporters was widely viewed among Democrats as carrying some cost to Mrs. Clinton. The remarks at the heart of the dispute, by David Geffen, the Hollywood executive who was once a big fund-raiser for the Clintons, were a sharp reminder of Clinton family history that has led some Democrats to believe Mrs. Clinton cannot win a general election. But when it came to tallying the final score on the most intense engagement so far in the 2008 presidential race, even Mr. Obama, the junior senator from Illinois, seemed to acknowledge that he may have been outmaneuvered." In another story, the New York Times (2/23, A16, Steinhauer, Halbfinger, 1.16M) examines the "public unwinding of the relationship between the Clintons and David Geffen," saying that Geffen "has been telling friends for two years that he thinks that Mrs. Clinton is a divisive figure who would fail to bring the nation together."

Clinton Said To "Fall Prey To Missteps." An AP (2/22, Fouhy) analysis piece says the "Hollywood-style brawl" is just "the latest in a series of speed bumps tripping up Hillary Rodham Clinton's early presidential moves. From the Clinton team's decision to criticize -- and therefore publicize -- producer David Geffen's complaints about both Clintons to increasingly skeptical questions about Sen. Clinton's nuanced explanation of her 2002 vote authorizing the Iraq war, it became apparent even a battle-tested front-runner can fall prey to missteps."

LATimes Says Geffen "Has A Point" About "Dynastic Aspect" Of Clinton Bid. The Los Angeles Times (2/23, 850K) headlines an editorial "Geffen Has A Point About The Clintons," saying Geffen "was on to something with his passing mention of the fact that Obama is not from 'the Bush royal family' or the 'Clinton royal family.' Regardless of what you think of Bill Clinton's presidency, or his wife's talent, the dynastic aspect of Hillary Clinton's candidacy is an issue that will increasingly come to occupy center stage in this campaign. Is the country prepared to be governed, potentially, for 28 years by two families who alternate turns in the White House? The Clinton campaign appears unwilling to acknowledge this concern."

DOJ_NMG_0135501

Dionne Says Tiff Bad For Both Clinton And Obama. In his Washington Post (2/23, A19, 690K) column, E.J. Dionne said the outbreak of the feud "was a good day for Joe Biden, Chris Dodd, John Edwards, Bill Richardson, Tom Vilsack -- and, what the heck, Dennis Kucinich. It was a bad day for Barack Obama, Hillary Clinton and David Geffen. It was a good day for the Republican Party, particularly George W. Bush, John McCain and Dick Cheney. It was a bad day for the Democratic Party, opponents of the Iraq war and advocates of national health insurance." Dionne warns Clinton and Obama to heed the example of the 1988 Democratic nomination contest, when two strong early candidates, Gary Hart and Biden, "were knocked out of the race, because of their own mistakes for sure, but also because of whispering campaigns and subterranean attacks by their opponents."

Robinson Says Clinton Confirming Rivals' Caricature. In his Washington Post (2/23, A19, 690K) column, Eugene Robinson writes under the headline "Depends What The Meaning Of 'Mistake' Is," that Clinton's rivals "would love to paint her as inflexible, programmed, focus-grouped within an inch of her life and intent on bringing nothing less than a full-fledged Clinton Restoration to the White House. So why is she sitting for the portrait?" On Iraq, "Clinton may believe that being the front-runner for the nomination means never having to say you're sorry. She may believe that positioning herself at the hawkish end of the Democratic spectrum helps her project an image of toughness, dispelling any reservations voters may have about a woman as commander in chief. … It sounds like something a candidate has decided to say rather than something a candidate believes." As for the Geffen controversy, Robinson says "the impression that was left at the end of the week was of a touchy, grouchy Clinton Inc. and a candidate constrained by her campaign strategy."

Bill Clinton Has Collected Nearly $40 Million In Speaking Fees Since 2001. In a 2,100-word front-page story, the Washington Post (2/23, Solomon, Mosk, 690K) reports that ex-President Clinton, "who came to the White House with modest means and left deeply in debt, has collected nearly $40 million in speaking fees over the past six years, according to interviews and financial disclosure statements" filed by Sen. Hillary Clinton. In 2006, "one of his most lucrative" years since leaving office, the former president "earned $9 million to $10 million on the lecture circuit. He averaged almost a speech a day -- 352 for the year -- but only about 20 percent were for personal income. The others were given for no fee or for donations to the William J. Clinton Foundation."

Responding To Obama Request, FEC Proposes New Fundraising Option. The AP (2/23, Kuhnhenn) reports, "Presidential candidates may solicit contributions for a general election campaign even if they later decide to take public money for the race, federal regulators said Thursday in a proposed opinion. The draft document, which would have to be approved by the" FEC, "was in response to a request for FEC advice from Democratic presidential candidate Barack Obama, the Illinois senator." The AP notes, "If a majority of the six election commissioners support the opinion, candidates would have yet another incentive to seek double contributions this early in the presidential election cycle. Any candidate who then chooses to accept public money would have to refund money raised exclusively for the general election. The commission will meet March 1."

The Chicago Tribune (2/23, McCormick, 617K) reports that Obama, New York Sen. Hillary Clinton and ex-North Carolina Sen. John Edwards (D) "have indicated they would likely reject the public financing system that has governed presidential elections for more than three decades. … In its draft ruling, the commission said Obama may solicit and receive contributions for the general election if he meets certain conditions, including a requirement to keep the money in a separate escrow account and that the funds not be used for any other purpose other than general election activities. Under the draft proposal, if Obama were to win the Democratic nomination and then decide to accept public funding for the general election, he would need to refund all general election contributions within 60 days of certifying his eligibility for public funds."

The New York Times (2/23, Kirkpatrick, 1.16M) reports that "Obama, campaigning on pledges to clean up politics, argued in his filing with the commission that the public financing system had insulated candidates from a corrupting dependence on big donors. He asserted that the system could be preserved for the general election through bipartisan agreement if party nominees returned early contributions. The plausibility of such an agreement is not clear. One nominee is likely to have a financial edge on the other at the outset of the campaign, and accepting public financing would mean relinquishing that edge."

DOJ_NMG_0135502

WPost Sees "Glimmer Of Hope" In FEC Draft Ruling. In an editorial, the Washington Post (2/23, A18, 690K) applauds the commission's draft ruling, saying, "The FEC's positive reaction yesterday offers a glimmer of hope that 2008 will not become the first presidential election since the Watergate scandal to be fully financed by private funds. … The solution of allowing a candidate to begin to raise general election funds now but opt to live within the system later isn't perfect, but it's far better than the alternative. Mr. Obama's competitors in both parties should join him in trying to salvage this broken system. As the FEC prepares to finalize its ruling, the candidates should support its interpretation -- and pledge, if they win the nomination, to help control the campaign arms race."

In State Senate, Obama Showed Pragmatism, Ability To Work With GOP. The Wall Street Journal (2/23, A4, Calmes, 2.04M) takes a look at Sen. Barack Obama's tenure as an Illinois state senator, when he "was a leader in helping to tighten state ethics laws -- up to a point. When a 2003 package seemed doomed in the Senate's final hours -- with his Democratic leader among the foes -- he left the chamber to tell advocates there was nothing more he could do." Illinois Campaign for Political Reform Director Cynthia Canary, "an admirer" of Obama, said, "He wasn't going to stand on the desk and pound his shoe. Barack is a political realist. You may know that in his heart he feels strongly, but he'll only go so far." She adds that "a compromise was salvaged" and Obama "helped to toughen it in subsequent legislative sessions. The accomplishment was emblematic of the picture that emerges of the eight years Mr. Obama spent here: of a lawmaker of lofty, liberal rhetoric who nonetheless pragmatically accepted bipartisan compromises that won over foes -- and sometimes left supporters dissatisfied." Republicans in the state "recall Mr. Obama as a committed liberal of no singular achievements, yet one they could work with to pass ethics, welfare and death-penalty revisions." GOP state Sen. Kirk Dillard said, "He's unique in his ability to deal with extremely complex issues, to reach across the aisle and to deal with diverse people. If he surrounds himself with good people, I wouldn't lose any sleep with him as my president."

Wilder Says Obama Smart To Not Rely Just On Black Leaders. The Washington Times (2/23, McLaughlin, 88K) reports L. Douglas Wilder, mayor of Richmond and former governor of Virginia, said Obama's "strategy of relying less on the black leaders of the civil rights era and more on a message of unity gives him the best chance of becoming the first Democrat in 44 years to win the state's electoral votes in a presidential election." Wilder said, "The civil rights movement was over 50-something years ago. … The worst mistake one can make, in my judgment, is to try to tailor a message to a group and to say: 'I am the person for your group.' He should be the person for the American people." Wilder, the nation's first elected black governor, briefly ran for president in 1992.

Daschle Explains Endorsement Of Obama. Former Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle was asked on CNN's The Situation Room (2/22, Blitzer) why he endorsed Obama, whom he never served with, for president over four Democrats he did serve with in the Senate. Daschle said, "I think they are outstanding United States senators, and I think they would make great presidents. … I didn't reject them. I simply said that I would like to help Barack, because I think he has got a unique ability to communicate with the American people, especially with younger people. I remember, back in the '60s, when I was just beginning to be interested in politics and government, how inspired I was by certain leaders at the time, the Kennedys and Martin Luther King. I think Barack has some of that same magical ability to communicate, to connect, to unify, to inspire."

Despite Broad Résumé, Richardson Bid Could Hinge On Record As Governor. In an article profiling New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson (D), the New York Times (2/23, Blumenthal, Frosch, 1.16M) reports, "With portfolios as a congressman, global troubleshooter and energy czar, Mr. Richardson, 59, may rightly claim the broadest résumé of the declared presidential candidates." However, "as he makes his case for the Democratic nomination, he is likely to be judged in large measure by his four years as governor, a record that has won him friends and foes." In his time as governor, "unemployment is down, to 3.8 percent from 5.8 percent, according to the federal Labor Department. New Mexico is 10th in economic growth, according to a report by the Federal Funds Information Service for States." He's also "positioned New Mexico for the private space age by carving a spaceport out of the desert alongside the White Sands Missile Range." However, "national studies show New Mexico continuing to lag in categories where the state has historically underachieved. … The Annie E. Casey Foundation ranked the state 48th in its 2003-4 Kids Count index of problem indicators. The foundation said more than a quarter of New Mexico children lived in poverty, among the highest rates in the nation. A Census Bureau study shows that from 2003 to 2005, an average of 21 percent of New Mexicans went without health insurance. Just Texas had a greater average rate in that period."

DOJ_NMG_0135503

Democratic Hopefuls To Help Raise Funds To Finance South Carolina Primary. The Washington Post (2/23, A8, Cillizza, 690K) reports, "South Carolina may be a new addition to the early days of Democrats' presidential nomination fight, but the state is already showing veteran savvy when it comes to collecting cash for its Jan. 29, 2008, primary. Witness a fundraiser set for March 7 in Washington. The featured guests? The bulk of the 2008 Democratic field, including Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.), Joe Biden (Del.) and Chris Dodd (Conn.), as well as former senator John Edwards (N.C.) and former Iowa governor Tom Vilsack. … The event, which will be emceed by Clinton White House press secretary Mike McCurry, is being billed as a 'kickoff reception' for the state's presidential primary." South Carolina Democratic Party Chairman Joe Erwin "explained that his state is one of a handful where the party must raise all of the money to finance the primary. In 2004, Erwin estimated, the cost of South Carolina's Democratic primary was $285,000. He believes the price tag this time will be closer to $500,000."

GOP Rolls Out "Put-Downs" Of Democratic Presidential Hopefuls. In The Politico (2/23), Mike Allen examines "The New GOP Attack Machine," a "69-page playbook, posted on the national party's Web site" Wednesday that offers "put-downs – some clever, some blunt" -- of the Democratic presidential candidates. Sen. Joseph Biden is called "An Undisciplined, Self-Described Northeast Liberal, In Love With The Sound Of His Own Voice"; Sen. Hillary Clinton "A Calculating, Divisive, Lifelong Liberal With Political Baggage"; Sen. Christopher Dodd "A New England Liberal, Past His Prime, On An Unrealistic Vanity Run For The White House"; John Edwards "A Hypocritical, Inexperienced Liberal With A New Negative Attitude"; Sen. Barack Obama "An Inexperienced, Insulated, Arrogant, Unabashed Liberal"; Gov. Bill Richardson "A Self-Promoting, Washington Insider With A Controversial Record"; and Tom Vilsack "A Tax-Hiking, Mismanaging, 'Blip' Candidate With No Foreign Policy Experience."

Study Of Private Management Of Philadelphia Schools Criticized. Paul E. Peterson, director of the Program on Education Policy and Governance at Harvard University, writes in the Wall Street Journal (2/23, 2.04M) about a Rand Corporation study to be released today on the Philadelphia schools and particularly evaluating the performance of 45 schools that have been privately managed. Peterson faults the report for failing to identify schools it compares the privately managed schools with and for ignoring "the fact that the 45 schools assigned to the private managers were among the city's most challenging." He concludes, "if education policy research is going to make a solid contribution to school reform, it needs to be both objective and keep pace with rising standards in educational research."

WSJournal Praises Jobs For Criticizing Teachers Unions. The Wall Street Journal (2/23, 2.04M) writes in an editorial, "If Apple CEO Steve Jobs had praised teachers unions as the backbone of public education in the U.S., it would have made the front pages. Instead, at an education conference in Austin, Texas, Mr. Jobs offered some constructive criticism of teachers unions and barely anyone noticed." Jobs said that "the real crisis in public education…has nothing to do with the amount of technology in the classroom. It's the fact that union work rules prevent principals from firing the bad teachers and rewarding the good ones." Jobs "is right to point the finger at the union stewards of public education. And fellow business leaders, who have as big a stake in this matter, would do well to lend him public support."

Rice Warns Tehran As UN Report Points To Advances In Nuclear Program. ABC World News (2/22, story 3, 2:20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported on "Iran's march toward nuclear power and possibly nuclear weapons." The U.N. "had given Iran an ultimatum to stop its uranium enrichment program effective today. Iran not only ignored the ultimatum, it has stepped up production. That has brought a scathing response from the U.N. and raised the possibility of tougher sanctions against Iran." ABC (Raddatz) said the U.N.'s report on Iran's nuclear program "is damning in every way." But today, US officials said "major powers will meet on Monday to draft new sanctions resolutions. And while the US is already sending two carrier groups toward the region, President Bush insists the US has no plans to attack the country."

DOJ_NMG_0135504

The CBS Evening News (2/22, story 3, 1:45, Couric, 7.66M) said the report "is making a tense situation even worse." The Washington Times/AP (2/23, Jahn) says that although the report's conclusions were "widely expected," they were "important because they could serve as the trigger for the [U.N. Security] Council to start deliberating on new sanctions."

USA Today (2/23, 6A, Slavin, 2.27M) reports Mohammad Saeedi, deputy head of Iran's Atomic Energy Organization, Thursday rejected the report, saying the U.N. demand for Iran to suspend its nuclear program "has no legal basis and…naturally, it could not be accepted by Iran."

NBC Nightly News (2/22, story 2, 1:40, Williams, 9.87M) said the U.N. report put the US "and indeed much of the world" in "a rough spot" as to it will how respond. NBC (Mitchell) noted that as diplomats prepare to meet Monday, "Secretary Rice says there are signs that some of Iran's leaders are not happy with President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's nuclear policy and that is because the economic sanctions are having a real impact on Iran's oil and gas industry. But Russia, Iran's ally will likely oppose any new economic pressure. So the US may find that it has to go it alone."

On its front page, the Washington Post (2/23, A1, Lynch, Linzer, 690K) reports Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice Thursday warned Iran "that it will face further punishment and isolation if it forges ahead with efforts to develop a uranium-enrichment program," but she said the US and other powers "are prepared to restart talks aimed at ending the standoff if Iran suspends its most controversial nuclear activities." Also Thursday, the State Department said Undersecretary Nicholas Burns will attend Monday's meeting in London. After meeting with her European counterparts in Berlin, Rice said, "We have the common goal to encourage Iran back to the bargaining table. The hope is that the sanctions show the Iranians the isolation that they are enduring, that isolation is likely to increase over time and that it is time to take a different course." However, the Post notes that Russia, China and several European countries "have become increasingly uncomfortable with the Bush administration's positions on Iran as tensions between Tehran and Washington have risen in recent months." Those concerns "have prompted renewed calls for direct dialogue with Iran."

The AP (2/23, Gearan) reports Secretary Rice "said she and her counterparts made no decisions Thursday because they met before" the report was released. In Washington, State Department spokesman Tom Casey "said that Iran's refusal to curtail its nuclear program is a 'missed opportunity' for Iran's government and people," but he "is confident that the Security Council will approve additional sanctions against Iran." Separately, the AP (2/23, Gearan) reports Undersecretary of State Burns said Thursday he hoped the US and other Security Council members "can quickly draft a resolution," but "said it was too soon to say what provisions the resolution might contain."

The New York Times (2/23, A1, Sanger, Broad, 1.16M) reports on its front page that "in open defiance" of the U.N., Iran is "steadily expanding its efforts to enrich uranium," which has prompted the Bush administration to press "for more severe sanctions against the country, at a moment of greatly increased tensions between Washington and Tehran." Coming "on the heels of the Bush administration's accusations that Iran's Quds Force is sending deadly bombs and other weapons into Iraq, the report heightens what has become a growing confrontation." The report also comes "at a time of debate within the Administration over whether and how to find a way to negotiate with Iran without violating Mr. Bush's stricture that the country must first suspend its enrichment work." Officials say they are "trying to exploit fissures in Iranian society, as some Iranian groups are beginning to question whether the hard-line position taken by President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and some of the country's ruling ayatollahs is worth the cost in sanctions and isolation."

The Financial Times (2/23, Dombey, Bozorgmehr) notes the U.N. said Iran intends to "gradually" bring the 3,000 centrifuges it has installed "into operation by May 2007." The speed with which Tehran intends to pursue its program "adds to the tensions surrounding the dispute." However, privately IAEA officials "are skeptical of whether Iran can meet its timetable." But the Los Angeles Times (2/23, Drogin, 850K) warns, "If true…a facility that large conceivably could produce enough enriched uranium in a year to provide enough highly enriched uranium for a nuclear bomb."

Bush To Discuss Report With Rice Friday. Fox Special Report (2/22, lead story, 3:15, Rosen) reported

DOJ_NMG_0135505

President Bush "declined to answer a reporter's shouted questions about the report" during a visit to North Carolina Thursday, "but he was due to discuss [the report] over breakfast Friday with Secretary of State Rice."

Tensions Spark Renewed Concern Of US Military Action. McClatchy (2/23, Hutcheson, Strobel) says the increasing tensions with Iran "have fueled speculation that Bush may be paving the way for military action." Though with US forces "tied down in Iraq and Afghanistan, no one expects a ground invasion, but analysts at both ends of the political spectrum put little stock in Bush's insistence that he's focused only on diplomacy."

Wary Of Iran, Arab States Add To Their Arsenals. The New York Times (2/23, A10, Fattah, 1.16M) reports, "As fears grow over the escalating confrontation between Iran and the West, Arab states across the Persian Gulf have begun a rare show of muscle flexing, publicly advertising a shopping spree for new weapons and openly discussing their security concerns." The "typically secretive" gulf nations "have long planned upgrades to their armed forces, but now are speaking openly about them." American military officials say the countries, which are "normally prone to squabbling, have also increased their military cooperation and opened lines of communication to the American military" in the region. As tensions with Iran rise, many gulf countries "have come to see themselves as the likely first targets of an Iranian attack," while growing "more concerned that the United States may be overstretched militarily."

Iran Sending New Ambassador To UN. The Washington Post's (2/23, A17, 690K) Al Kamen reports in his "In the Loop" column that "in the midst of building tensions' between the US and Iran, Tehran "is withdrawing its long-serving ambassador to the United Nations, Javad Zarif." Iranian sources say Zarif will be replaced by Mohammad Khazai, the deputy minister of economics.

US Commander Reiterates Claim Iranian Forces Are In Iraq. In its "Inside The Ring" column, the Washington Times (2/23, Gertz, 88K) reports, "Army Lt. Gen. Ray Odierno, commander of multinational forces in Iraq, yesterday added his voice to the chorus of officials who identified the Iranian Quds force as working against US and allied forces by helping insurgents in Iraq." However, Odierno "stopped short of saying the Iranian agents are playing a vital role in backing Shi'ite insurgents but that they are assisting with weapons, training and 'some money' and "warned the Iranians that 'we will take action' against the Quds force."

McClatchy (2/23, Landay) says the Quds force is "at the center of the rising tensions between Washington and Tehran," and "many experts now warn that if the US-Iranian frictions over Iraq and Iran's nuclear program escalate into conflict, Tehran would use the Quds Force to launch terrorist attacks against US and allied targets around the world."

Hagel Says Diplomacy Is Best Option For Iran. The AP (2/23, Funk) reports Sen. Chuck Hagel said Thursday that Iran "should be held accountable for supporting terrorists through 'wise statecraft' instead of military force, and America should be careful not to follow the 'same destructive path' it did in Iraq." During an address at the University of Nebraska, Hagel warned that "in a hazy, hair-triggered environment, careless rhetoric and military movements that one side may believe are required to demonstrate resolve and strength...can be misinterpreted as preparations for military options."

More Commentary. In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (2/23, A10, 2.04M) writes, "Ultimately, whatever hope there might be of resolving the Iranian issue through diplomacy is going to require compromises by the Iranians themselves. Here's what Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad had to say about that: 'If we shut down other activities for 10 years and the country only focuses on nuclear energy it will be worth it because if we obtain this energy our people will advance as much as 50 years.' Maybe it's time the rest of us start taking Mr. Ahmadinejad at his word, and tailoring our expectations accordingly."

Meanwhile, Abbas Milani, director of Iranian studies at Stanford and a research fellow at the Hoover Institution, writes in the New York Times (2/23, 1.16M) that as Iran "has once again defied" the U.N., "simultaneously, Iranian officials have been sending a very different message -- one that has gone largely unremarked but merits close attention." For example, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei's chief foreign policy adviser, Ali Akbar Velayati, "declared last week that…the mullahs might be ready to agree to some kind of a suspension." Another "powerful insider," Ali Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani, "said much the same thing in a different setting." Therefore, Milani argues that "with prudence, backed by power but guided by the wisdom to recognize the new signals coming from Tehran, the United States can today achieve a principled solution to the nuclear crisis."

The Washington Post's (2/23, A19) David Ignatius writes that while "Western officials see various signs of an altered political balance in Tehran," a number of US and European officials say that does not "mean it's time to go back to the bargaining table." Ignatius says "the only way the Iranians can escape sanctions is to suspend enrichment and sit down at the table. If they do so, an array of goodies awaits. Meanwhile, the strategy of confrontation continues, and US and European officials -- who haven't had much to cheer about recently -- seem confident that it's working."

DOJ_NMG_0135506

Hill Says "Long Way To Go" In North Korea Deal. AFP (2/23, Collinson) reports Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill Thursday said the US has a "long way to go" to implement the nuclear pact with North Korea and "warned tough talks loom on Pyongyang's suspected secret uranium enrichment program." In an address to the Brookings Institution, Hill also "defended the deal," saying, "I think there is a real sense among all the parties that we have a process going. We are very mindful of the fact that we have a long way to go." He "lavished praise' on China for its role in brokering the deal, and "confirmed that if things go smoothly," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will travel to Beijing in April "as required by the deal" for talks with her counterparts from North Korea, China, Russia, Japan, and South Korea. Admitting that the North Koreans "never acknowledged US accusations they had a program to manufacture highly enriched uranium (HEU) for nuclear bombs," Hill said, "They have been willing to discuss what we know and to try to resolve this...to mutual satisfaction."

The Financial Times (2/23, Dinmore) adds, Hill also warned Pyongyang "must stick to the tight deadlines of the new deal to freeze its Yongbyon nuclear facility in exchange for a modest amount of fuel oil."

The Washington Times (2/23, Sands, 88K) notes the US "will insist on strict deadlines to keep" the deal "from unraveling."

The AP (2/23, Schweid) reports Hill said the accord "could pay wide-ranging dividends for all sides, especially in the area of already improving US relations with China and America's allies." Other side benefits "might include a peace treaty formally ending the war on the Korean peninsula after more than a half-century, a cut in the force of 25,000 US troops in South Korea, a better life for impoverished North Koreans and the State Department's declassifying of the North as a sponsor of terror," Hill said.

North Korean Official To Meet With Hill In New York In March. In its "Washington Wire" section, the Wall Street Journal (2/23, Harwood, 2.04M) reports US diplomats are seeking meetings with North Korean officials "within two weeks, probably in New York, for unprecedented talks on normalizing relations and perhaps taking communist state off the list of terror sponsors." Meanwhile, AFP (2/23) reports North Korea's chief nuclear negotiator, Kim Kye-Gwan, "will visit New York early next month" to meet with Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill, a source told Yonhap news agency. "No date has been set for his visit, but it is likely to last from March 5 through 7," the source said.

Cheney Expresses Concern About Pyongyang's Commitment. The AP (2/23, Sullivan) reports Vice President Cheney, speaking in Sydney Friday, "expressed wariness about North Korea's commitment" to the deal, but "praised China for playing an 'especially important' role" in the six-party talks.

VOA To End Service In Several Languages. The Washington Post (2/23, A13, Schrank, 690K) reports, "For the second year running, the board overseeing the government-funded VOA has plans to wipe out news in several languages, including its flagship English-language 'News Now' programming." The Broadcast Board of Governors, which oversees VOA, "said this month that the cutbacks are being made in an effort to shift resources to new technology and 'critical audiences' in the Middle East, North Korea, Somalia and Cuba." The board's $668.2 million budget "request calls for a 3.8 percent increase from its anticipated fiscal 2007 level" to fund the expansion of programming to North Korea, Iran, Afghanistan and Pakistan, as well as to the Arab-language satellite network Alhurra TV and Radio Sawa. Board spokesman Larry Hart "said the decision to scrap the services largely reflects their diminishing audiences," but VOA employees and advocates "counter that their programming is a model of open media and a crucial source of trustworthy news and information for decision makers and influential figures worldwide, a demographic that is difficult to quantify."

Europeans Seek To Distance Themselves From US Policy. The Christian Science Monitor (2/23, Marquand, 59K) says the resignation this week of Italian Prime Minister Romano Prodi "underscores the difficulty in Europe of governments trying to support US foreign policy on terror while at the same time pleasing their own publics." Prodi's announcement "came hours after Britain and Denmark announced the start of troop withdrawals from Iraq," a move seen as "a blow to the White House as it deploys an additional 21,000 soldiers to stabilize Baghdad." Then in "a further departure from perfect alignment with US policy in the Middle East," British Prime Minister Tony Blair "also said this week that he will consider dealing with the Palestinian group Hamas."

DOJ_NMG_0135507

Columnist Says Bush Has Created Anti-Americanism In UK. Nick Cohen, author and columnist for the Observer and the New Statesman, writes in a Wall Street Journal (2/23, A10, 2.04M) op-ed that it is "a measure of President Bush's failure that anti-Americanism has swept out of the intelligentsia and become mainstream in Britain." A country that "was once the most pro-American in Western Europe," Cohen says, "now derides Tony Blair for sticking with the Atlantic alliance."

Friedman Says Bush Now Trying To Remedy Foreign Policy Mistakes. The New York Times' (2/23) Thomas Friedman writes that "when the inside history of the Bush team is written, we will discover that, contrary to its carefully managed image of a disciplined core operating from consistent, conservative principles, it has actually been one of the most internally divided administrations -- ever." For example, he says the Administration "was divided for so long on Iran and North Korea, over regime change or behavior change, it got neither." President Bush, he continues, "obviously recognizes that and is now trying to remedy it." Friedman concludes, "I guess we should be thankful that Mr. Bush is trying to fix some of his mistakes, but we have paid a huge, unnecessary price for his learning curve. Which is why it's always best to get it right the first time."

US, Russia Play Down Missile Dispute. The Financial Times (2/23, Buckley, Williamson) reports senior US and Russian officials "sought to play down their differences on Thursday after two weeks that have seen a sharp cooling in relations between their countries." On a visit to Moscow, national security advisor Stephen Hadley "said he did not see a speech" by Russian President Vladimir Putin in Munich this month "that was sharply critical of US 'unilateralism' as a return to cold war-style confrontation." Hadley "also reiterated assurances that Washington's planned missile defense system…was not aimed at Russia but at a potential threat from Iran or other rogue states." For its part, Igor Ivanov, head of Russia's national security council, "acknowledged there were disagreements between the two countries, but said it was important that these should be resolved by dialogue." Hadley also held talks with President Putin "during a visit that seemed designed to project a more conciliatory stance after the sharp exchanges that have taken place since the Russian president's Munich address."

The AP (2/23, Danilova) notes that "US and other Western journalists were not invited to be present when [Hadley] made the remarks, which suggests they were aimed at a Russian audience."

Cheney Criticizes Chinese Missile Test. The AP (2/23, Sullivan) reports Vice President Cheney said Friday that China's recent anti-satellite weapons test "and a rapid military buildup were 'not consistent' with its stated aim of a peaceful rise as a global power." Speaking in Sydney, Cheney said, "Last month's anti-satellite test, China's continued fast-paced military buildup are less constructive and are not consistent with China's stated goal of a peaceful rise." The Chinese Foreign Ministry did not immediately respond Cheney's remarks.

Pentagon Says Test Was Part Of "Long-Term Program." In its "Inside The Ring" column, the Washington Times (2/23, Gertz, 88K) reports Air Force Lt. Gen. Henry Obering, head of the Pentagon's Missile Defense Agency (MDA), said yesterday the test "was part of a long-term space weapons program by Beijing's military that has been under way in secret for years." Gen. Obering added that although "the Chinese space weapons system currently does not threaten US missile defenses against North Korea or a future defense against Iranian missiles," possibly "it may do so in the future... based on what we have seen them...demonstrate."

Panel Accuses Philippines Military Of Political Killings. The New York Times (2/23, Times, 1.16M) reports, "A commission investigating political murder in the Philippines has found that members of the armed forces were responsible for 'an undetermined number of killings' and that senior officers could be held accountable." The report, released yesterday, "said military officials had allowed, tolerated and even encouraged the murders of political activists, and that the government of President Gloria Macapagal Arroyo had not done enough to stem the violence." The military chief of staff, Gen. Hermogenes Esperon, "called the commission's conclusions 'strained, unfair and a blank accusation.'" The Christian Science Monitor (2/23, Montlake, 59K) says the "government commission headed by retired Supreme Court judge Jose

DOJ_NMG_0135508

Melo" issued a "damning report," which "came one day after a visiting United Nations investigator said the military was in a 'state of denial' about its involvement in the killings."

Venezuela Boosting Aid To Latin American Neighbors. The Washington Post (2/23, D1, Forero, Goodman, 690K) reports Venezuelan Hugo Chavez "recently announced that his government would build housing, a highway and an oil refinery in Nicaragua, part of an aid package that would benefit one of Washington's most tenacious Cold War adversaries, President Daniel Ortega. Farther south, Venezuela has pledged to provide Ecuador with $1 billion in credit, a gesture that would soften the blow if that country's leftist government follows through on its threat to default on foreign debt payments. And, along with President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad of Iran, a foe of the Bush administration, Chavez has announced a $2 billion international investment fund for Latin America." The Post adds, "Taken together, economists and others who track the country's affairs say, the investments signify an effort by Venezuela to curb the reach of the U. government, whose influence has waned in Latin America."

The New York Times (2/23, Romero, 1.16M) reports from Bolivia, "To understand Venezuela's growing influence here, consider that more than two dozen ambassadors are in this capital city, including those of Bolivia's leading trading partners like Brazil, the United States and Argentina. Yet none enjoy the direct conduit that the Venezuelan ambassador, Julio Montes, has established with President Evo Morales." Since Morales "became president little more than a year ago, Venezuela has quickly come to rival the United States as Bolivia's main patron. It has provided assistance for the army, cattle ranches, soybean cultivation, microfinance projects, urban sanitation companies and the oil industry. Perhaps most important to Washington, despite its opposition, Venezuelan financial assistance has helped Bolivia push ahead with plans to increase exports of its industrial production of coca, the main ingredient in cocaine." The Times adds, "A senior American official here, speaking anonymously out of concern that Bolivia's already fragile relations with the United States could erode further, said it was difficult to know the exact amount of Venezuelan aid because many of the agreements between Venezuela and Bolivia were not made public."

Congresswoman Says US Should Engage Chavez. In an interview with the Houston Chronicle (2/23, Otis, 530K), Rep. Sheila Jackson Lee discussed her recent trip to Venezuela, which she said was meant to "break the tension, to warm up a chilled relationship" with President Hugo Chavez. Jackson Lee said the Bush administration has "made a serious mistake in not engaging with President Chavez" and called on the administration to lift a ban on arms sales to Venezuela.

Cuba Refuses To Renew Two Foreign Journalists' Visas. The Wall Street Journal (2/23, A5, De Córdoba, 2.04M) reports, "The Cuban government refused to renew the visas of at least two resident foreign journalists, dimming hopes it will move forward with reforms as Fidel Castro fades from power. The refusals were 'part of a political tightening in the expectation that when Fidel dies they will have total control and there won't be any opposition or resistance,' said Jaime Suchlicki, an expert on Cuba at the University of Miami." Gary Marx, "who has been based in Havana for the Chicago Tribune since 2002," and Cesar Gonzalez Calero, "a reporter for the Mexico City daily El Universal, were told this week by Cuban officials that their visas wouldn't be renewed and they could no longer report from the island, according to the Chicago Tribune and El Universal."

Chadian Prime Minister Dies. The AP (2/23) reports Chadian Prime Minister Pascal Yoadimnadji died Friday at a Paris hospital "where he was being treated for cardiovascular problems," the African nation's embassy said. The cause of death was not immediately known. Embassy spokesman Kadallah Ousman said he had no immediate information on who would replace Yoadimnadji.

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:

"Back From Despair, In Her Words."

"Cramped And Old, LAX Is Losing International Flights To Newer Airports."

"Iran's Nuclear Effort In High Gear, U.N. Says."

"For Some, Beverly Hills Ballots Went Too Farsi."

"Anti-Doping Case Against Landis May Be In Jeopardy."

USA Today:

"Trans Fats: Infamous But Not The Only Villain."

DOJ_NMG_0135509

"Car MPG Ratings Going Down."
"How Much Lower?"

New York Times:
"U.S. Used Bases In Ethiopia To Hunt Al Qaeda In Africa."
"Long Iraq Tours Can Make Home a Trying Front."
"Officials Reject More Oversight of Hedge Funds."
"Iran Expanding Nuclear Effort, Agency Reports."
"Detour From High Road in Clinton-Obama Clash."
"Springtime for Hit's End: 'The Producers' Is Closing."
"MP3 Patents in Upheaval After Verdict."
"Wimbledon Agrees to Even Out Its Prize Money."

Washington Post:
"Test Scores, Grades at Odds."
"Rice Warns Iran It Risks More U.N. Sanctions."
"Dems Aim to Repeal Resolution."
"For Clinton, Wealth in Speeches."
"Brothers Survive Odds Together."
"Chefs Put Accents On Sushi."

Washington Times:
"Iran Defies Nuclear Ultimatum."
"Janitor-Service Chiefs Charged In Illegals Ring."
"Wilder Praises Obama Strategy."
"Children Can Travel Without Passports."
"Weepy Judge Rules On Body In Smith Case."
"Smugglers Raise Stakes In Fight Over Border Rule."
"Withdrawing From Banks."

Detroit Free Press:
"Sales Tax Could Be Waived At Cobo."
"Cosmetic Surgery Like Economy Needs A Lift."
"Ford Boss Urges Care In Buyouts."
"Detroit School Down But Not Broken."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Funding Problems Stall Nichols Trial."
"Animal Labs Earn Re-Accreditation."
"Good Weekend For Marta."
"Virtual CDC Spreads Like Flu."
"Grades, Test Scores Don't Jibe, Study Says."
"First Ancient Americans?"

Dallas Morning News:
"Does Perry Really Have The Power?"
"Harry's Wild About Serving His Country."
"Dems Seek Repeal Of '02 War Decree."

Houston Chronicle:
"Ex-Girlfriend Recalls Anna Nicole She Knew."
"Deputies Kill Pit Bulls That Attacked Schoolgirls."
"800-Plus-Pound Woman Risks Surgery For A New Life."
"Utopia Eluded Houston Terror Suspect In Somalia."
"FBI Agent Tells Of Texas Syndicate's Vicious Tactics."
"Metro Board OKs Acquisitions For Four Rapid Routes."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Cervical Cancer Vaccine; Vaccine Analysis; Iran Nukes-United Nations; Iraq-Al Qaeda; Iraq Security; US Sick Pay; High School Seniors-Standardized Tests; Anna Nicole Smith Trial; Female Tennis Player Earnings, Movie Snacks.
CBS: Iraq-Chlorine Bombs; Iraq-Rape Charges; Iranian Nuclear Program; Food Inspections; Airport Security; Library For The Blind; Anna Nicole Funeral Hearing; Academy Awards.
NBC: US Security-Afghanistan; Iran Nukes-United Nations; Iraq-Chemical Bombs; Clinton-Obama Dispute; High School Seniors-Standardized Tests; Anna Nicole Smith Trial; TX Electric Company Raises Rates; Iraq-Prince Harry.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: Senate Democrats-Iraq; Cheney-Australia; Bush-Iran; FL-Anna Nicole Smith's Body Released; Britney Spears Returns To Rehab; Wall Street.
CBS: Senate Democrats-Iraq; US Soldier Pleads Guilty To Raping Iraqi Girl; Iraq-Chemical Bombs; Peanut Butter-Salmonella Lawsuits; Latvia-Boarding House Fire; Atlanta-Fulton County Courthouse Shooting Trial Delayed By Judge; Doctors Say Jose Padilla Not Fit To Stand Trial.
NPR: White House-IAEA Report On Iranian Nuclear Program; NY-South Korean Sentenced For His Involvement In Oil-For-Food Scandal; Iraq-Chemical Bombs; US Soldier Pleads Guilty To Raping Iraqi Girl; Tokyo Stock Exchange; Egyptian Cleric Allegedly Abducted By CIA Claims He Was Tortured By Egyptians; Microsoft, Alcatel-Lucent Case.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.
White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Meets with transportation fuel experts and researchers, closed, Roosevelt Room; views a demonstration of alternative fuel automobiles, South Lawn.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: No Scheduled Events.

US House: No Scheduled Events.

DOJ_NMG_0135510

Other: MEDICAID _ 9 a.m. The Urban Institute and Health Affairs hold a briefing on the future of Medicaid, with John Holahan of the institute, Alan Weil of the National Academy for State Health Policy, others. Location: Urban Institute, 2100 M St. NW.

AVIATION SAFETY _ 9:15 a.m. The National Air Disaster Alliance holds a news conference on ways to promote safety, security and survivability, with former FBI agent Coleen Rowley, and family members of people killed in air crashes and the 7/7 London subway bombings, along with former DOT Inspector General Mary Schiavo. Location: National Press Club.

EDUCATION _ 10 a.m. The American Federation of Teachers, Council for Exceptional Children, Easter Seals, Higher Education Consortium for Special Education, others, hold a briefing about Universal Design for Learning and its implications for reauthorization of the No Child Left Behind Act. Location: Room 430, Dirksen.

HEALTH REFORM _ 10 a.m. The Heritage Foundation holds a seminar on whether tax policy is the key to comprehensive health reform, with John Goodman of the National Center for Policy Analysis, David Kendall of the Progressive Policy Institute, Tom Miller of AEI, Len Nichols of the New America Foundation, others. Location: Room S-207, Capitol.

PEACEKEEPING _ 10 a.m. The US Institute of Peace and the Stimson Center hold a discussion on the increasing use of peacekeepers in world hot spots, with Amb. Lakhdar Brahimi, Special Envoy for Sudan Andrew Natsios, William Durch of the Stimson Center, Amb. Carlos Pasacual, others. Location: 2nd floor conference room, 1200 17th St. NW.

WALTER REED _ 10:30 a.m. Secretary of Defense Robert Gates and Vice Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff Adm. Edmund Giambastiani hold a press briefing at Walter Reed Army Medical Center. Location: Walter Reed Army Medical Center, 6900 Georgia Ave. NW.

ARMY-BLACK HISTORY _ 12 p.m. The Army's Freedom Team Salute program marks Black History Month by honoring the Brooks family, the only African American family in Army history with three generals, a teacher who was nominated by her son serving in Iraq and others. Location: Madison Building, Library of Congress.

BROADBAND _ 12 p.m. The New America Foundation holds a discussion on the best way to bring broadband access to all Americans, with John Muleta of M2Z Networks, Chris Guttman-McCabe of the Wireless Association, Nextel Communications co-founder Morgan O'Brien, others. Location: Room 385, Russell.

GATES-KOREA _ 12 p.m. Secretary of Defense Robert M. Gates hosts an honor cordon to welcome South Korean Minister of National Defense Kim Jang-soo to the Pentagon. Location: The cordon will be held on the steps of the Pentagon Mall Entrance.

BULGARIA _ 2 p.m. Bulgarian Finance Minister Plamen Orescharski and Deputy Treasury Secretary Robert Kimmit, others, attend a tax treaty and protocol signing. Location: Room 3311, main Treasury.

NAPOLITANO _ 5 p.m. The National Italian American Foundation holds a private reception for Arizona Gov. Janet Napolitano. Location: Willard Inter-Continental Hotel, 1401 Pennsylvania Ave. NW.

Copyright 2007 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S NEWS BRIEFING

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 23, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Defense Experts Testify Padilla Unfit For Trial 3
Writers Denounce Efforts To Gain Legal Advantage In Terror War 3
WPost Urges Congress To Restore Detainees' Rights 4
DOJ Urged To Keep More Accurate Anti-Terrorism Statistics 4
Maldonado Written Statements Describe His Actions In Somalia. 5

Homeland Response:

Independent Review Of Supermax Prison Security Urged 5
Minnesota Human Rights Group Alleges Post-9/11 Harassment Of US Muslims 6
New Houses In Lower Ninth Ward Are First Since Katrina 6
Lott Said To Be Directing "Populist Rage" At Insurers Over Katrina Claims 6

War News:

Democratic Bill Would Limit Iraq Mission To Combat Against Al Qaeda Elements 6
Cheney Says Iraq Withdrawal Would Spawn Terror Wave 7
Iraqi Insurgents Seen As Adapting To Counteract Security Push. 8
US Soldier Sentenced To 100 Years For Iraq Rape-Murder 10
War Places Heavy Stress On Military Families 10
South Korean Businessman Sentenced In Oil-For-Food Probe.. 10
Iraq Acquires New Site For US Embassy 10
US Attacked Al Qaeda In Somalia From Ethiopian Bases 10
Media Investigation Finds Little Security At Afghan-Pakistani Border 11

Corporate Scandals:

Judge Denies Motion To Delay Enron Shareholder Suit 11
SEC Fines Former Sadia CFO In Insider-Trading Case 11
Presidential Panel Devises Voluntary Guidelines For Hedge Funds 11

Criminal Law:

Libby Jurors Reach No Verdict Thursday 12
Judge Says Fumo Trial Will Not Begin For At Least A Year 12
DIA Analyst Convicted Of Espionage-Related Charges To Be Released 12
Miller Vows To Continue Land Deals, Despite Federal Probe 13
Christie Urges Public To Help Fight Public Corruption 13
Federal Agents Arrest Fugitive California Child Molester In Louisiana 13
Florida Man Pleads Guilty To Child Porn Production 13
FBI, Police Continue Intensive Search For WV Child Rapist 13
Two Nevadans Arrested On FEMA Relief Fraud Charges 14
North Carolina Man Convicted Of Silver Ingot Pyramid Scheme 14
Los Angeles Anti-Gang Program Comes Under Criticism 14

Civil Rights:

Gonzales Interviewed About Civil Liberties 14
DOJ Decides Against Seeking Death Penalty For Mississippi Jailer 15
Urban League Head Seeks DOJ Probe Of New Orleans Katrina Shootings 16
State Lawmaker Introduces Bill To Legalize Gay Marriage In Illinois House 16
Nonprofit Law Center Litigates Largest Employment Bias Case. 16
WPost Praises PG County Police For K-9 Restraints 16

Antitrust:

DOJ Ends Concrete Price-Fixing Probe With $1.75 Million Fine 16
Two DOD Contractors Plead Guilty In Bid-Rigging Scheme 17
Experts Say Sirius-XM Merger Faces Major Antitrust Hurdles.... 17
Apple, Cisco Settle iPhone Dispute 19
South Korea Fines Refiners For Collusion 19
Judge Tosses Antitrust Suit Against Utah Home Developer 19
FTC Approves AIG Unit's Acquisition Of US Port Operations..... 19
EU Clears Purchase Of German TV Network 19
Black Farmers Oppose Monsanto-Delta Pine Deal 20
Esmark Says Deal For Ohio Steel Mill Is Dead 20
Jury Orders Microsoft To Pay $1.52 Billion To Alcatel In MP3 Suit 20

Environment:

Bush Promotes Energy Proposals In Visit To North Carolina 21
Iowa City To Pay $1.5 Million In Coal Gas Site Settlement 23
BP Employee Deleted Files After Subpoena 23
GAO Report Says Funding For Gasoline Storage Tank Cleanup Falls Far Short 23
Sanford Says Conservatives Must Reframe Climate Change Debate 23
Krugman Says California's Experience Shows Conservation Not Burdensome 24

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Detroit Man Who Sold Lethal Fentanyl-Laced Drugs Gets 30-Year Sentence ... 24
FBI Arrests Florida Police Officers In Drug Trafficking Sting ... 24
Advocates Use Data Quality Act To Dispute Government Stance On Medical Marijuana ... 24
Five To Face Federal Charges In California "Pot Houses" Case 25
Walters Promotes US Anti-Drug Strategy In Canada, Some Criticize Approach ... 25
Jury Awards Former ATF Agents $9.75 Million In Damages In Suit Against Chicago ... 25
Philadelphia Man Convicted Of Gun Crimes ... 25

Immigration:

Senate Hearing To Look For Administration Backing Of Comprehensive Immigration Reform ... 26
Owners Of Michigan Cleaning Service Charged After Illegal Immigrant Raid ... 27
Judge Dismisses Posada Carriles' Bid For Freedom ... 27

Tax:

Thirteen Indicted For Alleged Minnesota Cigarette Tax Fraud Scheme ... 27
Firms Hide Assets, Identities In State Havens ... 27
WSJournal Criticizes AMT Hike In 1993 Clinton Tax Plan ... 28

Congress-Administration:

Army Surgeon General Disputes "Characterization," But Not Facts, Of Walter Reed Reports ... 28
Intelligence Legislation Remains Stalled In Senate ... 29
Pentagon Cancels Plans For Massive Conventional Bomb Test 29
McCain Critical Of Pentagon Request For Three Experimental Aircraft ... 29
Business, Labor Come To Blows Over Key Unionization Bill ... 29
Virginia May Lose Federal Funds If Districts Fail To Test English Language Learners ... 30
Student Loan Proposal Said Likely To Reduce Number Of Banks Offering Them ... 30
Congress May Address Lack Of Sick Pay In US ... 30
Bodman Lifts Energy Department Bonus Freeze ... 30
NYTimes Urges Congress To Increase Oversight Of For-Profit Colleges ... 30
NYTimes Backs "Passengers' Bill Of Rights." ... 30
NYTimes Criticizes Cost Of Uncompleted Congressional Visitor Center ... 31

Other News:

Analysis Finds US Economy Leaving Millions In "Severe Poverty." ... 31
Jury Rules For UCLA In Psychiatric Sex Trial, But Awards No Money ... 31
High School Students Earn Lower Math And Reading Scores Yet Better Grades ... 31
On Campaign Trail, Giuliani Seen As Avoiding Unfriendly Audiences ... 32
Huckabee Set To Announce Endorsements Of Two House Republicans ... 33
Obama Tries To "Clear The Air" As Dustup With Clinton Keeps Drawing Attention ... 33
Bill Clinton Has Collected Nearly $40 Million In Speaking Fees Since 2001 ... 34
Responding To Obama Request, FEC Proposes New Fundraising Option ... 34
In State Senate, Obama Showed Pragmatism, Ability To Work With GOP ... 34
Despite Broad Résumé, Richardson Bid Could Hinge On Record As Governor ... 35
Democratic Hopefuls To Help Raise Funds To Finance South Carolina Primary ... 35
GOP Rolls Out "Put-Downs" Of Democratic Presidential Hopefuls ... 35
Study Of Private Management Of Philadelphia Schools Criticized ... 36
WSJournal Praises Jobs For Criticizing Teachers Unions ... 36
Rice Warns Tehran As UN Report Points To Advances In Nuclear Program ... 36
Hill Says "Long Way To Go" In North Korea Deal ... 38
VOA To End Service In Several Languages ... 38
Europeans Seek To Distance Themselves From US Policy ... 39
US, Russia Play Down Missile Dispute ... 39
Cheney Criticizes Chinese Missile Test ... 39
Panel Accuses Philippines Military Of Political Killings ... 39
Venezuela Boosting Aid To Latin American Neighbors ... 40
Cuba Refuses To Renew Two Foreign Journalists' Visas ... 40
Chadian Prime Minister Dies ... 40

The Big Picture:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages ... 40

Washington's Schedule:

Today's Events In Washington ... 41

DOJ_NMG_0135513

TERRORISM NEWS:

Defense Experts Testify Padilla Unfit For Trial. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/23, Anderson) reports, "Accused al-Qaida operative Jose Padilla suffers from intense stress and anxiety stemming from his isolated years in military custody and cannot adequately help his lawyers prepare for trial, two defense mental experts testified Thursday. Defense lawyers hope to delve more deeply into Padilla's treatment at a Navy brig in Charleston, S.C., later in the federal hearing, when they are allowed to question brig officials directly involved in his custody. … 'He is immobilized by his anxiety,' said Patricia Zapf, a forensic psychologist who administered tests on Padilla last October. 'He believes he will go back to the brig and he will die there.'" The AP notes, "Prosecutors say he is competent for trial," and Pentagon spokesman Cmdr. Jeffrey Gordon said yesterday, "The government in the strongest terms denies Padilla's allegations of torture, allegations made without support and without citing a shred of record evidence."

USA Today (2/23, 6A, Parker) reports from Miami, "A New York psychiatrist testified Thursday that Jose Padilla, a U.S. citizen accused by the government of being an 'enemy combatant,' developed so many mental ailments during three years of solitary confinement in the Navy brig in Charleston, S.C., that he is not competent to stand trial. … That view of the 36-year-old terrorism suspect, once accused of planning to detonate a radioactive 'dirty bomb,' emerged as Angela Hegarty took the stand as the first of three psychiatrists expected to testify at a hearing to determine Padilla's mental fitness. 'He lacks the capacity to assist his counsel in this case,' Hegarty said." USA adds, "More revelations are expected next week when four officials from the brig, as well as four officials from the Miami Federal Detention Center take the stand. Their testimony will provide an unprecedented window into the U.S. military's treatment of terrorism suspects. Since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, officials responsible for the detention of terrorism suspects have been ordered by a federal judge to testify only a few times."

The New York Times (2/23, Sontag) reports, "In a highly unusual competency hearing in federal court here Thursday, defense lawyers began to lay out their argument that Jose Padilla, the Brooklyn-born former enemy combatant, was rendered incompetent to stand trial on terrorism conspiracy charges by what they characterize as crippling mistreatment by the government." The Times continues, "Two mental health experts, a forensic psychiatrist and a forensic psychologist hired by the defense, testified that Mr. Padilla, 36, suffers from post-traumatic stress disorder as a result of his isolation and scores of interrogation sessions during three years and eight months in a military brig in South Carolina. … 'He's unfit to stand trial,' said Patricia A. Zapf, the psychologist, describing Mr. Padilla as so 'immobilized by his anxiety' and so distrustful that he is incapable of assisting his own lawyers — whom he at times suspects of being agents of the government — in preparing his defense." The Times adds, "Dr. Zapf said Mr. Padilla, a United States citizen who was initially accused of plotting a dirty bomb attack against the United States and held without charges by the military, believed that he would end up 'back in the brig and that he would die there.' … Mr. Padilla, who was indicted in late 2005 on terrorism conspiracy charges that do not include the dirty bomb plot but do carry a possible life sentence, sat calmly through Thursday's hearing as lawyers and doctors discussed his facial tics, anxieties and feelings of hopelessness."

The Los Angeles Times (2/23, Williams) reports, "U.S. District Judge Marcia Cooke scheduled the competency hearing after Padilla's defense attorneys filed a motion to dismiss the case because of what they called 'outrageous government conduct' that amounted to torture. … Padilla's trial is scheduled to begin April 16." The Times continues, "Both defense experts diagnosed Padilla with post-traumatic stress disorder and acute anxiety, which they attributed to his prolonged isolation and treatment at the Charleston brig. … Padilla, shackled and dressed in a tan cotton jailhouse tunic and trousers, sat impassively throughout the day's proceedings. His only show of emotion was a wave and smile to his mother, who was seated in the back of the courtroom."

Writers Denounce Efforts To Gain Legal Advantage In Terror War. In an op-ed for the Wall Street Journal (2/23, A11), David B. Rivkin, Jr. And Lee A. Casey, who served in the Department of Justice during the Reagan and George H.W. Bush administrations and are writing a book on war's evolving legal architecture, write, "The term 'lawfare' describes the growing use of international law claims, usually factually or legally meritless, as a tool of war. The goal is to gain a moral advantage over your enemy in the court of world opinion, and potentially a legal advantage in national and international tribunals. … Al Qaeda, of course, is an experienced lawfare practitioner. Its training manual, seized by British authorities in Manchester, England, openly instructs detained al Qaeda fighters to claim torture and other types of abuse as a means of obtaining a moral advantage over their captors. That advice has been routinely followed by detainees at Guantanamo Bay, who have succeeded in generating incessant demands -- from European officials among others -- for the base's closure and their own liberation." Rivkin and Casey continue, "These efforts, however, pale to insignificance when compared to the blizzard of litigation initiated in the U.S. federal courts on behalf of al Qaeda and Taliban detainees. The suits range from habeas corpus petitions to free captured enemy combatants -- cases that were dismissed by the U.S. Court of Appeals in Washington, D.C. on Tuesday -- to tort suits seeking monies from U.S. government officials, to challenges regarding the detainees' conditions of confinement." Rivkin and Casey add, "The most significant common thread among all these actions is the clear desire to portray U.S. government actions as illegal and unprecedented. In fact, it is the claims for extensive due process rights for captured enemy combatants that are unprecedented." Rivkin and Casey note, "The effect of this lawfare effort, were it successful, would be to make it exceptionally difficult -- if not impossible -- for a law-abiding state to wage war in anything like the traditional manner, bringing the full weight of the national armed forces to bear against an enemy, without prompting charges of war crimes and efforts to intimidate individual officials with prosecutions on ersatz 'war crimes' theories. In fact, the criminalization of traditional warfare seems to be the goal. … Lawfare designed to delegitimize the use of American military force, and the American way of war, certainly has the potential to undermine public support for the war effort, both at home and abroad. Recognizing the stakes involved, the U.S. should be as committed to winning the lawfare battle as the ground combat in Afghanistan and Iraq." Rivkin and Casey conclude, "Merely defending itself in court is not enough. The U.S. must go on both the legal and public diplomacy offensive, utilizing such aggressive litigation tactics as seeking sanctions against lawyers who make frivolous arguments or violate security regulations. Most important, the administration should strive to explain, tirelessly and at the highest levels, that its policies are both legal and legitimate and that it is the lawfare's practitioners who are the true radicals."

DOJ_NMG_0135514

WPost Urges Congress To Restore Detainees' Rights. The Washington Post (2/23, A18) editorializes, "On the first day of the new Congress, two leading senators announced they would join in an attempt to reverse the hasty and ill-considered decision of the previous Congress to deprive foreign prisoners at Guantanamo Bay of the ancient right of habeas corpus, which allows the appeal of imprisonment to a judge. One of the senators, Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), predicted that the courts would rule that the provision of the Military Commissions Act eliminating habeas corpus was unconstitutional; he nevertheless joined the incoming chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.), in sponsoring a bill restoring the appeal right. … Now Mr. Specter's prediction is looking less sure: The U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit ruled this week that Congress's act was constitutional, and it threw the cases of dozens of Guantanamo detainees out of federal court. That ruling will almost certainly be reviewed by the Supreme Court on appeal, but Congress should not wait for its decision. It should move quickly on the Habeas Corpus Restoration Act." The Post adds, "The principal remaining question is whether Congress's action is permitted under Article I, Section 9 of the Constitution … Two judges of the three-member appeals court panel ruled that the provision does not apply at Guantanamo because it is not on U.S. territory and the detainees are foreigners. … Rather than wait for the court's decision, Congress should correct its own mistake. The 51 to 48 vote rejecting Mr. Specter's previous attempt to restore habeas condemned hundreds of foreign prisoners to indefinite detention without trial at Guantanamo; only a few score are expected to be prosecuted by the military commissions. Since 2002 it has become clear that a number of prisoners at the facility were arrested in error, are not terrorists and pose no threat to the United States. Moreover, improvements in the prisoners' treatment have come about largely because of their court appeals. Congress has both a practical and a moral interest in ensuring that this basic human right is restored."

DOJ Urged To Keep More Accurate Anti-Terrorism Statistics. The Ventura County (CA) Star (2/23) editorializes, "The Justice Department's post-9/11 statistics on terrorism cases have been deeply flawed, sometimes inflated, sometimes underreported — in any case, just highly inaccurate. Only two out of 26 sets of statistics reported between 2001 and 2005 were found to be accurate by the department's inspector general, Glenn Fine." The Star continues, "The most erroneous were figures on terrorism prosecutions collected by the department's Executive Office of U.S. Attorneys. In 2004, the department reported 379 terrorism-related convictions, but Mr. Fine said the actual number was 240. … Given the penchant of the department's political leadership for overhyping terrorism-related cases, the natural inclination is to think that the figures were intentionally padded. … Mr. Fine, reassuringly, says no. He blamed the errors on a "decentralized and haphazard" system of data collection and disagreements over the definition of an 'anti-terrorism' case. … The result was that unrelated offenses like immigration violations, marriage fraud, drug trafficking and firearms violations were included in the terrorism figures." The Star concludes, "Given the sensitivity of these numbers, it's surprising that the department was so careless. The Bush administration has portrayed itself as tough on terrorism — invoking these same statistics to prove it — and, by extension, the Democrats as weak. If it got this wrong, it makes you wonder what else it got wrong. … The audit concluded that, ''it is essential that the department report accurate terrorism-related statistics.' After five years of the domestic war on terror, that's not asking a whole lot."

DOJ_NMG_0135515

Maldonado Written Statements Describe His Actions In Somalia. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/23, Lozano) reports, "Handwritten statements released Thursday depict the frustration, confusion and deception that revolved around a U.S. citizen accused of receiving training from al-Qaeda in his efforts to help overthrow the Somali government. The three sets of statements, which Daniel Joseph Maldonado gave to FBI agents after his arrest in Kenya last month, detail in the 28-year-old's words why he left the United States, his time in Somalia and the frantic last few days he and his family spent in the country before his capture by authorities." The AP notes, "In his statements, Maldonado never mentioned al-Qaeda and said he was sick for a week with malaria after arriving in Kismayo. After recovering in a hospital, Maldonado said he was asked again 'to join the jihad. But I was more concerned with my family in Mogadishu and still doubtful about weather it was a valid jihad.' Maldonado later admitted he lied about his doubts" in a letter to his parents, but prosecutors "said they don't think he was lying."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Independent Review Of Supermax Prison Security Urged. The Denver Post (2/23) editorializes, "It's hard to know what to believe when it comes to assessing the state of security at the Supermax federal prison in Florence, which holds some of the most dangerous inmates in the country." The Post continues, "During a tour of the facility Wednesday, Barb Batulis, a Supermax guard and union representative, said the prison isn't adequately staffed. But U.S. Bureau of Prisons chief Harley Lappin said he can safely manage the institution with the staff he has. U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said he thinks the facility is secure but could be improved, though he shared no ideas. … That won't satisfy worried neighbors who want Lappin to erect a $23 million fence - not so much to keep the inmates inside as to keep their accomplices from approaching Supermax from the outside." The Post adds, "Despite watching over some of the nation's most diabolical criminals, Supermax staffing is actually down from when it opened in 1994. Prison officials say the addition of cameras and other technology has lessened the need for guards. … Perhaps that's true. Or perhaps it's a convenient justification. Trouble is, everyone defining the problems and creating solutions has a self-interest that could color their assessment." The Post concludes, "Colorado's congressional delegation has been active in pushing to resolve the prison's shortcomings, and they must work to penetrate the veil of ambiguity. A sweeping review of the prison's security and staffing should be conducted by the Government Accountability Office. The sooner the better."

Gonzales Visits Supermax. CNN Newsroom (2/22, 2:34 p.m. EST) broadcasted, "Attorney general Alberto Gonzalez toured Supermax, making good on a promise last November when CNN exposed the prison's shortcomings, particularly when it comes to inmates communicating with the outside world." Gonzales gave the prison good reviews, and said, "I am confident that we are doing what we should be doing in monitoring communications both in and out of these facilities. "

This story received nationwide covered with over 80 airings. Some examples include: WUSA-TV Washington, DC (2/22, 9:19 a.m. EST) broadcasted, "US Attorney general Alberto Gonzales says the nation's most secure prison is safe but could be safer." He visited the Supermax facility "with Colorado Senators Wayne Allard and Ken Salazar who have been pushing for improvements." The prison "houses the nation's most notorious criminals."

KXAS-TV Dallas (2/22, 5:43 a.m. CST) broadcasted, "Attorney general say the prison which holds some of the most notorious inmates could be made safer," after touring the Supermax facility. Justice report "criticized the prison for not properly screening mail and other communications."

KMGH-TV Denver (2/22, 5:36 a.m.) broadcasted, "Attorney general Alberto Gonzalez says Colorado's Supermax prison is secure but could stand improvement." He toured the facility yesterday "in response to issues raised by senators Ken Salazar and Wayne Allard about staffing levels and security." Most broadcasts were in Denver, but there were also a moderate amount across the nation. Some examples are: KWNG-TV Denver (2/22, 6:05 a.m.), KWTV-TV Oklahoma City (2/22, 12:06 p.m.), WVLT-TV Knoxville (2/22, 7:10 p.m.), WWBT-TV Richmond (2/22, 6:30 a.m.), KKTV-TV Colorado Springs (2/22, 5:10 a.m.) and KSBY-TV Santa Barbara (2/22, 6:30 p.m.).

More Commentary. The Pueblo (CO) Chieftain (2/23) editorializes, "How safe is Supermax? U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales toured the nation's most secure federal prison on Wednesday and was assured security measures have been taken to beef up safety." The Chieftain continues, "Sens. Wayne Allard and Ken Salazar accompanied the AG on the tour, and afterward Sen. Allard expressed confidence that the Administrative Maximum Security U.S. Penitentiary in Florence has been improved with technological upgrades. He added that more employees and more security measures could be coming in the future. … This is not to say that Supermax has not been without growing pains. An Inspector General's report issued last year detailed relaxed phone and mail monitoring, particularly for the terrorists being held inside the lockup." The Chieftain adds, "We certainly don't believe the prison housing the nastiest of nasties in the federal system ought to be operated unsafely, so the union's concerns should get a fair hearing. On the other hand, the judgment of the professional managers should also be given due weight. … Sen. Allard said the government probably will not be able to address 100 percent of the staffers' concerns at least right away - such things are a matter of available funding - but he added that more employees and more security could be coming in the future. With a growing prison population, such measures will have to be considered by Congress."

DOJ_NMG_0135516

Minnesota Human Rights Group Alleges Post-9/11 Harassment Of US Muslims. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (2/23, Hopfensperger, 395K) reports, "The terrorist attacks of 9/11 still are casting a shadow on Minnesota's immigrant and Muslim community, according to a report issued Thursday by Minnesota Advocates for Human Rights. Racial and religious stereotyping continues to this day, as do overt acts of discrimination, the report said. The 94-page report was based on interviews with more than 100 Minnesota immigrants." The Star Tribune notes, "Several incidents of alleged misconduct by the FBI are mentioned in the report. A Somali man employed by a Twin Cities school district says he received a visit from the FBI at his home a day after he inquired about bus rentals for a school event. One of the questions he was asked; 'What do you think of Saddam Hussein?' FBI spokesman Paul McCabe said he had not been informed about the incidents mentioned in the report, and that they would be impossible to verify without names, dates and places. The authors of report, however, offered confidentiality to those they interviewed. If people have concerns about the FBI, they should contact the FBI or a trusted community organization, he said. 'We will investigate,' McCabe said."

New Houses In Lower Ninth Ward Are First Since Katrina. Under the headline "In New Orleans, Progress at Last in the Lower Ninth Ward," the New York Times (2/23, Nossiter, 1.16M) reports, "The first new houses built in the Lower Ninth Ward since Hurricane Katrina were turned over to their owners on Thursday, creating a small island of hope in a sea of ruin." The houses, financed by the nonprofit group Acorn and a California bank, "stand out in a landscape grimly frozen since the storm." The Lower Ninth Ward "is a long way from being a neighborhood again, even though it has been the focus of intensive volunteer efforts and organizing since the storm." However, Gwendolyn Guice, who received one of the homes, "insisted" that the development "would help draw people back."

Lott Said To Be Directing "Populist Rage" At Insurers Over Katrina Claims. In her Wall Street Journal (2/23, A10, 2.04M) column, Kimberley Strassel writes, "One big question when Democrats took over Congress was which industry would be first to feel the new majority's populist rage. Oil? Pharma? Banks? Corporate America just got its answer, direct from the angriest man to have been empowered in the past election: Republican Sen. Trent Lott. The Mississippian was 'infuriated' by the insurance industry's refusal to shell out for certain Katrina claims, most notably his own. So Mr. Lott is spearheading a ferocious campaign of political revenge that would make even Henry Waxman envious -- replete with investigations, voracious trial lawyers, ambitious state attorneys general and threats of punitive federal legislation. And like most personal grievances that get morphed into policy battles, it's ending badly for consumers."

WAR NEWS:

Democratic Bill Would Limit Iraq Mission To Combat Against Al Qaeda Elements. The AP (2/23, Espo) reports, "Determined to challenge President Bush, Senate Democrats are drafting legislation to limit the mission of US troops in Iraq, effectively revoking the broad authority Congress granted in 2002, officials said Thursday." The AP adds, "officials said the precise wording of the measure remains unsettled," but "one draft would restrict American troops in Iraq to combating al-Qaida, training Iraqi army and police forces, maintaining Iraq's territorial integrity and otherwise proceeding with the withdrawal of combat forces." The officials, "Democratic aides and others familiar with private discussions, spoke only on condition of anonymity, saying rank-and-file senators had not yet been briefed on the effort. They added, though, the Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid is expected to present the proposal to fellow Democrats early next week for their consideration."

USA Today (2/23, 6A, 2.27M) runs a truncated version of the AP story, while the New York Times (2/23, Hulse, 1.16M) says "the chief authors" of the new bill "are Senators Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware, the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, and Carl Levin of Michigan, the chairman of the Armed Services Committee. The plan is to try to attach the proposal to an antiterrorism bill the Senate expects to begin considering Tuesday." The Times adds, "Lawmakers and senior aides said that such a plan was unlikely to pass Congress, and even if it did, it would certainly be vetoed." But "Democrats say their intention is to keep pressure on both Mr. Bush and Congressional Republicans who are facing a public frustrated with the war. Democrats say that other Iraq proposals are likely to emerge as well." Senate Democrats "say they prefer the emphasis on the mission of American troops over a plan by some House members to try to limit United States military involvement by putting restraints on troop deployments based on readiness and equipment availability."

DOJ_NMG_0135517

The Washington Post (2/23, A1, Murray, Weisman, 690K) reports, "In both chambers, Democratic lawmakers are eager to take up binding legislation that would impose clear limits on U.S. involvement in Iraq after nearly four years of war. But Democrats remain divided over how to proceed." While "some want to avoid the funding debate altogether, fearing it would invite Republican charges that the party is not supporting the troops," others "take a more aggressive view, believing the most effective way to confront…Bush's war policy is through a $100 billion war-spending bill that the president ultimately must sign to keep the war effort on track. … 'I've had enough of "nonbinding,"' said Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.), who is helping to draft the new Democratic proposal."

Lieberman Suggests He May Switch Parties If Democrats Try To Cut Off Funding. The Politico (2/23) reports, "Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman of Connecticut told the Politico on Thursday that he has no immediate plans to switch parties but suggested that Democratic opposition to funding the war in Iraq might change his mind." Lieberman, "a self-styled independent who caucuses with the Democrats, has been among the strongest supporters of the war and President Bush's plan to send an additional 21,500 combat troops into Iraq to help quell the violence there." Lieberman said in an interview, "I have no desire to change parties. … If that ever happens, it is because I feel the majority of Democrats have gone in a direction that I don't feel comfortable with." Asked "whether that hasn't already happened with Iraq," Lieberman said, "We will see how that plays out in the coming months." He "suggested…that the forthcoming showdown over new funding could be a deciding factor that would lure him to the Republican Party."

On its website, Time (2/22, Calabresi, 4.03M) reported Lieberman "has been indulging in some fairly immodest political footsie. Early this year he terrified fellow Democrats by skipping several of the weekly caucus lunches that cement party fidelity in the Senate. Recently he was spotted in the Republican cloakroom talking with South Carolina's Lindsey Graham about reforming Social Security. He even says he might vote Republican for President in 2008, a not-so-veiled hint that he would prefer John McCain, his fellow true believer in the Iraq war, to most, perhaps all, Democratic alternatives." Lieberman "says leaving the Democratic Party is a 'very remote possibility.' But even that slight ambiguity -- and all his cross-aisle flirtation -- has proved more than enough to position Lieberman as the Senate's one-man tipping point."

GOP War Opponent In House Breaks With Murtha. McClatchy (2/23, Schoof) reports, "A longtime Republican opponent of the Iraq war, Rep. Walter Jones of North Carolina, broke ranks Thursday with Democratic Rep. John Murtha over Murtha's plan to attach conditions to war funds." That "split signals that divisions among war opponents are likely to emerge next week when Congress returns from recess. Murtha and other Democrats have said they'll look at how they might use congressional power over military regulations and funding to pressure the Bush administration to redeploy US forces out of Iraq."

"John McCain-Like War Hero" Leading Defense Of Bush Policies In House. The Los Angeles Times (2/23, Simon, 850K) reports, "When House Republicans needed a John McCain-like war hero to lead their fight against Democratic assaults on…Bush's Iraq strategy, they turned to another former POW, a Texas Republican named Sam Johnson." Though "less known than Sen. McCain (R-Ariz.), his onetime cellmate in Vietnam," Johnson "spent nearly seven years in a prisoner of war camp, about half of it in solitary confinement. When he took to the House floor during last week's emotional debate on the Iraq war, the 76-year-old former fighter pilot drew heavily on Vietnam experiences." Johnson "has emerged as the House GOP's point man in an escalating fight in Congress over Bush's execution of the war -- a position that puts him opposite another decorated Vietnam veteran, Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.)." GOP leaders "see Johnson as the Republican best suited to counter Murtha, an ex-Marine and defense hawk who has become a influential war critic."

Krauthammer Criticizes Democratic Tactics. In the Washington Post (2/23, A19, 690K), Charles Krauthammer writes, "Slowly bleeding our forces by defunding what our commanders think they need to win (the House approach) or rewording the authorization of the use of force so that lawyers decide what operations are to be launched (the Senate approach) is no way to fight a war. It is no way to end a war." It is "a way to complicate the war and make it inherently unwinnable -- and to shirk the political responsibility for doing so."

Cheney Says Iraq Withdrawal Would Spawn Terror Wave. The Washington Times (2/23, Keats, 88K) reports Vice President Cheney warned today that the US and Australia "simply cannot indulge" thoughts of an early withdrawal from Iraq "because it would spawn a new wave of global terror." Speaking in Sydney, Cheney said, "The notion that free countries can turn our backs on what happens in places like Afghanistan, Iraq or any other possible safe haven for terrorists is an option we simply cannot indulge." If coalition troops "withdrew before Iraqis could defend themselves," the Vice President said "radical factions would battle for dominance over the country."

DOJ_NMG_0135518

Powell Says US Should Leave If "Civil War" Has Not Been Quelled In A Year. The Journal and Courier (2/23, Shaw) of Lafayette, IN, reports, "Former Secretary of State Colin Powell told an audience at Purdue University that he supports sending more American soldiers to Iraq." But "if the troop surge does not quell what he characterized as a 'civil war' within a year, the United States should begin to leave, he said." Powell also "said the United States was right to retaliate against Afghanistan after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001. But he was less certain when discussing the invasion of Iraq. He conceded that the intelligence on Iraq's having weapons of mass destruction was misleading. 'But we were not wrong about the nature of this regime, and I am glad that it is gone,' he said. 'I hope the Iraqis will the seize the opportunity we have given them.'"

Iraqi Insurgents Seen As Adapting To Counteract Security Push. Media coverage of the situation in Iraq focuses on insurgents' use of chemical "dirty bombs" and a sense that the enemy is changing its tactics to meet the new security push. Such developments are being described as an ominous sign for the US mission to pacify the country. Under the headline "Old Problems Undermine New Security Plan For Baghdad," the New York Times (2/23, Oppel, 1.16M) reports, "The much anticipated effort to wrest Baghdad streets from the control of militias and insurgents has been presented in news conferences and public statements as an Iraqi-led operation. Iraqi officials have been out front, announcing arrests, weapons finds and other details, as well as new decrees intended to halt two years of so-called sectarian cleansing." But "on the streets, the joint patrols seemed little different from those of the past few years: A handful of Iraqis, acting at the direction of a larger group of Americans, opening drawers and closets and looking behind furniture as they searched for banned weapons or other contraband."

The Washington Post (2/23, A15, Tyson, Partlow, 690K) says "insurgents…are employing a variety of new tactics -- from an unprecedented string of helicopter shoot-downs to unusual chlorine bomb attacks and direct assaults on US military bases -- that American commanders say are intended to create chaos and undermine the US and Iraqi military push to quell violence in Baghdad. … More aggressive, direct attacks by insurgents on bases housing the US military are another troubling development." USA Today (2/23, 5A, Michaels, 2.27M) reports Lt. Gen. Raymond Odierno, the No. 2 U.S. commander in Iraq, said "Al-Qaeda-associated" cells "may be behind a recent spike in downed US helicopters in Iraq." He added "two suspects have been captured in connection with the helicopter attacks. One suspect, he said, admitted involvement in one attack." USA Today adds, "Since Jan. 20, insurgents have shot or forced down eight US helicopters, killing 28 troops and civilians." The Washington Times (2/23, Gertz, 88K) notes Odierno's comments in a story titled "Al Qaeda Believed Behind Copter Crashes."

CBS and NBC ran stories on this week's "dirty" bombs. The CBS Evening News (2/22, lead story, 2:50, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "The US military in Iraq is warning tonight that insurgents are trying new tactics to try to spread fear. Bombs with chlorine gas have killed as many as 11 people this week. And today US troops found canisters of chlorine when they raided a suspected weapons factory west of Baghdad. Also today, the US military said American forces killed at least 12 insurgents in a six-hour clash in the city of Ramadi. And US forces looking for insurgents shooting down American helicopters detained two members of a militant cell." CBS (Logan) added, "This is the changing face of war in Iraq as a new weapon of terror is unleashed here -- crude chemical bombs that explode poisonous chlorine gas into the air, burning the eyes and lungs of victims too small even to understand what's happened. A chilling turn in tactics that's left survivors bewildered and in pain."

NBC Nightly News (2/22, story 3, 2:00, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "You may recall we reported last night on this broadcast about a new and dangerous trend in Iraq, the insurgents there are using chlorine gas to build bombs that are terrorizing civilians. US troops raided what is being called a bomb factory on Tuesday and what they found there is also troubling." NBC (Arraf) added, "Hospitals filled with the young and old hit not by shrapnel but chlorine gas, the same chemical used to purify water turned to deadly use. Sunni insurgents are suspected to have launched at least three chlorine attacks killing a dozen people and injuring more than 200." Loren Thompson, described as a "national security expert," was shown saying, "The insurgent's aim has been first and foremost to demoralize the Iraqi people and then to defeat American soldiers. If the Iraqis are terrified, we can't secure the country." NBC added, "Iraqis already go through their day worried about car bombs, kidnappings, shootings, mortars and now add more worry to the growing list of fears."

The New York Times (2/23, Oppel, 1.16M), under the headline "Iraq Rebels Expected To Use More Chlorine Gas In Attacks," says "military officials are also acutely concerned that insurgents have adapted tactics to exploit vulnerabilities in flight patterns of military helicopters, which are expected to fly 400,000 hours this year in Iraq, a 20 percent increase over 2006." The Washington Times/AP (2/23, Gamel) runs a similar report.

The Los Angeles Times (2/23, 850K) reports "US troops in Iraq uncovered a 'car bomb factory' near Fallouja this week that contained multiple canisters of chlorine, a potentially lethal gas that has been used in three insurgent attacks over the last month," Odierno said.

DOJ_NMG_0135519

In another story that reflects poorly on the new US strategy in Iraq, the Washington Post (2/23, A16, Murphy, 690K) reports from Baqubah, in a story titled "US Unit Shoulders Burden At Police Station In Baqubah," that "it took nearly a month to build the tiny bunker on the roof of this Iraqi police station. The U.S. soldiers worked at night to avoid snipers, carrying sandbags up four flights of stairs in the dark. One day last week, several American soldiers arrived to begin their shift here, using the roof to scan the surrounding area for attackers." The Post adds "there was one thing missing from the roof of the station, and from the ranks of those who were there to defend it: members of the Iraqi security forces. Similar US units are embedded at other Iraqi police and army installations in Baqubah, a city of 300,000 about 35 miles northeast of Baghdad. Keeping these locations open and functioning is vital, military commanders say, if the Iraqis who live here are to have confidence in the government."

Insurgents Attack US Troops In Ramadi. USA Today/AP (2/23, 5A) reports, "Sunni insurgents attacked US troops in the volatile city of Ramadi, setting off a six-hour firefight that killed at least 12 people, the US military said Thursday." The Ramadi battle "broke out Wednesday evening when insurgents opened fire on a US patrol. The Americans responded with precision-guided munitions that damaged several buildings and ended the fight, said a Marine spokesman, 1st Lt. Shawn Mercer. There were no US casualties. Twelve insurgents were killed, Mercer said."

Keane Defends Bush Plan. ABC World News (2/22, story 5, 2:50, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The new security crackdown in Iraq, the centerpiece of President Bush's surge of troops, has entered its second week. Retired Army General, Jack Keane, one of the architects of the President's plan and an ABC News consultant, over the past 11 days has visited Iraq's most volatile areas to assess how it's going. I spoke to General Keane earlier. He's now in Baghdad to get his assessment." Keane: "First of all, a lot has changed in Iraq, in a year. The situation has gotten considerably more dire certainly. And when you take a look at Baghdad itself, there are neighborhoods down there where people aren't living in anymore." Gibson: "Do you get a sense that this security crackdown can have an effect long term, on sectarian violence?" Keane: "Yeah, I definitely think so. First of all, we're in the very opening stages of this. There's only one new brigade here from the United States. And obviously, four more to arrive. However, the Iraqi ten brigades have showed up. And that's a big plus."

Chalabi In Key Security Post. The Wall Street Journal (2/23, A1, Dreazen, 2.04M) reports, "In his latest remarkable political reincarnation, onetime US favorite Ahmed Chalabi has secured a position inside the Iraqi government that could help determine whether the Bush administration's new push to secure Baghdad succeeds." In "a new post created earlier this year," Chalabi "will serve as an intermediary between Baghdad residents and the Iraqi and US security forces mounting an aggressive counterinsurgency campaign across the city. The position is meant to help Iraqis arrange reimbursement for damage to their cars and homes caused by the security sweeps in the hope of maintaining public support for the strategy." Chalabi's "writ is supposed to be limited mainly to security, according to aides to Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, but he is already speaking ambitiously about playing a larger role in economic, health and reconstruction efforts as well." He "answers directly to Mr. Maliki and is already taking part in weekly planning meetings with senior American officials such as Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad and Gen. David Petraeus, the top U.S. military commander in Iraq."

Rape Allegations Prompt Al Qaeda Vow Of Revenge. The CBS Evening News (2/22, story 2, :20, Couric, 7.66M) reported, "Meanwhile, two accusations of rape involving Iraqi security forces are dumping more fuel on the already explosive situation there. Both of the alleged victims are Sunni and claim they were raped by Shiite policemen. Prime Minister Maliki's government has cleared the accused, and today Al Qaeda in Iraq vowed revenge."

ABC World News (2/22, story 4, :35, Gibson, 8.78M) also reported, 'The leader of Al Qaeda's wing in Iraq surfaced today, vowing to avenge the alleged rape of a Sunni woman by Iraq Shiite-dominated police. Abu Ayyub al Masri spoke in an audio tape posted on the Internet. He said that 300 militants volunteered to go on suicide missions after the rape allegations were made. The Shiite-dominated government claims no sexual attack occurred."

The Washington Post (2/23, A16, Londono, 690K) reports "an Iraqi police official in the northwestern city of Tall Afar said Thursday that a military officer and three soldiers had admitted to raping a Sunni woman and recording the act with a cellphone camera. The four soldiers told an investigative committee convened by the Iraqi army that they sexually assaulted the woman nearly two weeks ago, according to Gen. Najem Abdullah, a police spokesman in Tall Afar." The soldiers' statement "follows another Sunni woman's assertion this week that she had been raped in Baghdad by members of Iraq's predominantly Shiite security forces."

Many In Iraq Stop Using Banks Due To Violence. The Washington Times (2/23, Palmer, 88K) reports that most Iraqis are opting to keep their money at home instead of in banks to avoid being "confronted by criminal gangs on the streets and demands for bribes from tellers in the branches -- not to mention long lines, shortages of bank notes, and other inconveniences." Despite "the security concerns, financiers and government officials say, there are not enough banks in Iraq to serve the population and finance sorely needed reconstruction, leaving companies and individuals struggling to secure their assets."

DOJ_NMG_0135520

Effects Of Golden Mosque Bombing Assessed. The Los Angeles Times (2/23, Berthelsen, 850K) reports that for many Iraqis, "life has changed in the year since sectarian warfare erupted with the bombing of the Golden Mosque in Samarra," a holy Shiite mosque. Before the mosque bombing, "anger and violence in Iraq had largely been focused on the US-led forces occupying the country in the wake of the 2003 invasion;" now anger has focused more on sectarian differences and "centuries-old distrust." A year after the bombing, "amid the latest version of a security plan intended to restore calm, bombed-out buildings scar Baghdad and Iraqis live in fear of one another" with many wanting "the plan to work and for peace to return" although "their faith in such an outcome varies widely."

US Soldier Sentenced To 100 Years For Iraq Rape-Murder. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/23) reports, "A U.S. soldier was sentenced to 100 years in prison yesterday for the gang rape and murder of an Iraqi girl and the killing of her family last year. Sgt. Paul E. Cortez, 24, also was given a dishonorable discharge. He will be eligible for parole in 10 years under the terms of his plea agreement." The AP notes, "Earlier yesterday, tears rolled down Cortez's face as he apologized for the rape and murders. He said he could not explain why he took part. … Five soldiers who served with Cortez in Iraq testified that his actions were out of character and described the hardships of war they experienced, including sleep deprivation and the lack of running water."

War Places Heavy Stress On Military Families. In a front-page feature, the New York Times (2/23, Alvarez, 1.16M) looks at stresses to military families in wartime, saying "hundreds of thousands of soldiers and loved ones have endured long, sometimes repeated separations that test the fragility of their relationships in unforeseen ways. The situation is likely to grow worse as the military increases the number of troops in Iraq in coming months," with Pentagon plans "to send more than 14,000 National Guard troops back to Iraq next year. … Most families and soldiers cope, sometimes heroically. But these separations have also left a trail of badly strained or broken unions, many severed by adultery or sexual addictions; burdened spouses, some of whom are reaching for antidepressants; financial turmoil brought on by rising debts, lost wages and overspending; emotionally bruised children whose grades sometimes plummet; and anxious parents who at times turn on each other. Hardest hit are the reservists and their families, who never bargained on long absences, sometimes as long as 18 months, and who lack the support network of full-fledged members of the military."

The Los Angeles Times (2/23, Zucchino, 850K), meanwhile, reports that Nancy Kules created an online journal of her experience as the spouse of an injured soldier when her husband, Ryan, lost two limbs and almost died as a result of injuries he received from a roadside bomb in Iraq. Nancy's "journal opened a window on a searing experience shared by a growing number of spouses who have become collateral damage in America's overseas wars. What began as an attempt to keep loved ones informed became a unique personal account of recovery and accommodation, of suffering and redemption" that has helped others learn about the ordeals of spouses of injured soldiers.

South Korean Businessman Sentenced In Oil-For-Food Probe. The New York Times (2/23, Barron, 1.16M) reports, "Tongsun Park, a once flamboyant South Korean businessman convicted of illegally representing Saddam Hussein in trying to influence the United Nations oil-for-food program, was sentenced yesterday to five years in prison." Judge Denny Chin of Federal District Court in Manhattan "said Mr. Park had 'blatantly disregarded the law' by taking more than $2 million for trying to lobby United Nations officials to ease sanctions against Iraq." The judge "called the sentence 'harsh' for a 71-year-old man with health problems. But he also said it was 'appropriate.'" The Washington Post (2/23, A11, Lynch, 690K) notes the sentence "was the maximum possible."

Iraq Acquires New Site For US Embassy. The Washington Post (2/23, A12, Boustany, 690K) reports, "Iraq may be facing a deadly civil war, but the Iraqi government is initiating major, costly repairs to its diplomatic building in Washington and expanding its real estate holdings here." The "latest Iraqi government purchase for its US mission is a $5.8 million mansion at 3421 Massachusetts Ave. NW in Observatory Circle, across the street from Vice President Cheney's official residence." The mansion will serve "as Iraq's temporary embassy during renovations to its fading Dupont Circle mission." However, plans "are to eventually turn the Dupont Circle building into a cultural center for the exhibition of Iraqi art."

US Attacked Al Qaeda In Somalia From Ethiopian Bases. On its front page, the New York Times (2/23, A1, Gordon, Mazzetti, 1.16M) reports the US military "quietly waged a campaign from Ethiopia last month to capture or kill top leaders of Al Qaeda in the Horn of Africa, including the use of an airstrip in eastern Ethiopia to mount airstrikes against Islamic militants in neighboring Somalia," according to American officials. The "close and largely clandestine" relationship with Ethiopia "also included significant sharing of intelligence on the Islamic militants' positions and information from American spy satellites with the Ethiopian military." According to the officials, "members of a secret American Special Operations unit, Task Force 88, were deployed in Ethiopia and Kenya, and ventured into Somalia." The counterterrorism effort was described by American officials "as a qualified success that disrupted terrorist networks in Somalia, led to the death or capture of several Islamic militants and involved a collaborative relationship with Ethiopia that had been developing for years." The "secret campaign" is seen as "an example of a more aggressive approach the Pentagon has taken in recent years to dispatch Special Operations troops globally to hunt high-level terrorism suspects."

DOJ_NMG_0135521

Media Investigation Finds Little Security At Afghan-Pakistani Border. NBC Nightly News (2/22, lead story, 3:00, Myers, 9.87M) reported, "Attacks against US and NATO forces in Afghanistan are escalating. Fueled in part officials say by Al Qaeda and Taliban militants in Pakistan who easily cross the border into Afghanistan to join the fight. NBC News decided to investigate security at one of Pakistan's busiest border crossings. Two NBC News producers bought tickets for $4 each and boarded a bus in Pakistan, destination, Jalalabad Afghanistan. The route took them through Peshwar to a major border checkpoint to Jalalabad. Their bus full of passengers was waved through the border crossing. Not once in four hours did guards stop them or check for travel documents." Iqbal Sapand, NBC: "Nobody asked for our documents. Not only me but there were more than 45 people in that bus." NBC added, "The next day our producers repeated the process taking the bus from Afghanistan back to Pakistan. Again, no documents necessary." Mushtaq Yusufzai, NBC: "On both sides of the border nobody checked them."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Judge Denies Motion To Delay Enron Shareholder Suit. The AP (2/23, Lozano) reports, "A $40 billion lawsuit filed by former Enron Corp. shareholders and investors alleging investment firms and banks played key roles in the company's collapse will go to trial in April despite a pending appeals court decision on the case, a judge has ruled." The AP continues, "U.S. District Judge Melinda Harmon denied efforts by Merrill Lynch & Co., Credit Suisse First Boston and Barclays PLC to delay the trial while the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals rules on whether the case can proceed as a class-action suit. … She said in her ruling Wednesday that there should be no postponement, because of the uncertainty of when the appeals court would rule. Jury selection was set for April 9." The AP adds, "Attorneys for the shareholders and investors accused the banks and investment firms of trying to delay the case for several years. The trial has been rescheduled three times. … 'There is no reason to wait indefinitely for a decision from the Fifth Circuit that likely will not impact the trial,' attorneys for investors wrote in a motion last week. 'Any delay simply benefits the banks and harms class members who have waited patiently for over five years for their day in court.' … In their motion to delay the trial, the banks and investment firms argued the 5th Circuit's decision could significantly alter the definition of the lawsuit's class status as well as the claims and defenses to be presented at trial."

SEC Fines Former Sadia CFO In Insider-Trading Case. The AP (2/23) reports, "The former chief financial officer of Sadia SA, a Brazilian chicken and pork producer, and a former employee of Brazil's Banco ABN AMRO Real SA have agreed to pay almost half a million dollars combined to settle charges that they traded on inside information about the meat company's 2006 attempt to take over its largest local rival, Perdigao SA." The AP continues, "The Securities and Exchange Commission on Thursday announced the settlement with Luiz Gonzaga Murat Junior, the former chief financial officer at Sadia, and Alexandre Ponzio De Azevedo, the former banker. The two settled without admitting or denying wrongdoing. Their attorneys could not immediately be identified. … Murat agreed to give up $184,028 and to pay a $180,404 civil penalty. He also agreed to a five-year ban on serving as an officer or director of a public company. Azevedo agreed to give up $68,215 and to pay $67,165." The AP adds. "Murat 'is relieved to resolve this matter, and he is anxious to put this behind him and turn his attention to the future,' said his attorney, Juan Marcelino. … The SEC accused Murat of buying Perdigao securities that are listed in the United States after an April 7, 2006, meeting with investment bankers who proposed that Sadia make an offer for Perdigao. Murat's holdings rose in value after Sadia announced its offer on July 2006, when the price of Perdigao's American depositary shares rose 21 percent to $24.50, the SEC said."

Presidential Panel Devises Voluntary Guidelines For Hedge Funds. USA Today (2/23, 4B, Shell, 2.27M) reports, "A presidential group charged with devising ways to improve oversight of the secretive $1.2 trillion hedge fund world issued a list of self-policing guidelines Thursday that it asserts will be more effective in protecting investors than more stringent laws would be. Favoring a market-based solution over government regulation, the President's Working Group on Financial Markets (PWGFM) opted for a 'principles-based approach' for dealing with the issues surrounding the fast-growing industry that now includes roughly 9,000 funds, uses exotic investment strategies and has a history of scandalous fund meltdowns." Critics "say the guidelines don't go far enough."

DOJ_NMG_0135522

The Washington Post (2/23, D1, Johnson, 690K) notes "former SEC commissioner Harvey J. Goldschmid, who had supported the agency's thwarted bid to register fund managers, expressed concern that regulators lack the authority to perform random inspections of fund operations." And "in Connecticut, home to scores of hedge funds, Attorney General Richard Blumenthal criticized the recommendations as vague, insubstantial and 'unenforceable.'"

The New York Times (2/23, Labaton, 1.16M), under the headline "Officials Reject More Oversight Of Hedge Funds," reports the Administration said that "there was no need for greater government oversight of the rapidly growing hedge fund industry and other private investment groups to protect the nation's financial system." The panel's "conclusions reflected both the strong antiregulatory ideology of the administration and the formidable influence of Wall Street and the increasingly wealthy hedge fund industry among both Democrats and Republicans in Washington. Three of the administration's most senior economic policy makers -- Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr., his top deputy, Robert K. Steel, and White House chief of staff Joshua Bolten -- are alumni of Goldman Sachs, which in the last decade has evolved into one of the most important players in the private equity market." The "reaction in Congress, which is in recess this week, was largely muted. Representative Barney Frank, the Massachusetts Democrats who heads the House Financial Services Committee, called the announcement 'a first step in addressing questions presented by the significant growth of hedge funds.'"

CRIMINAL LAW:

Libby Jurors Reach No Verdict Thursday. The Wall Street Journal (2/23, Perez, Solomon, 2.04M) reports, "Jurors reached no verdict Thursday on whether former White House aide I. Lewis 'Scooter' Libby obstructed the investigation into who leaked the identity of a CIA operative married to a prominent Iraq war critic." The Journal notes that "the jurors have issued only two brief written notes, which suggested they are methodically reviewing the evidence against Mr. Libby. They requested a large flip chart, masking tape, Post-it notes and a document with pictures of the witnesses." Deliberations resume today.

In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/23) reports Libby trial jurors "reached no verdict Thursday, and the jury has "issued only two brief written notes, which suggested they are methodically reviewing the evidence." Jurors "requested a large flip chart, masking tape, Post-it notes and a document with pictures of the witnesses." Deliberations resume today.

Libby Trial Said To Show Unreliability Of Interview Notes. In a widely-distributed story, The AP (2/23, Apuzzo) reports, "Write this down: Your notes aren't as reliable as you think. … And, as the monthlong trial of former White House aide I. Lewis 'Scooter' Libby has shown, they're no more reliable if the notes belong to FBI agents, journalists or White House aides. That's a somewhat disconcerting thought. People are charged, front-page articles are written and public policies are decided in part based on those notes. If they are flawed, whose can be believed?" Libby jurors "must decide how much weight to put on notes that were sometimes sloppy and often inconsistent." The AP notes "FBI agent Deborah Bond wrote a report saying Libby 'adamantly denied' discussing…Plame. The original FBI notes, however, contain no record of that denial. Rather, they say he may have discussed Plame but couldn't recall.

Judge Says Fumo Trial Will Not Begin For At Least A Year. The Philadelphia Daily News (2/23, Hinkelman, 106K) reports, "The trial for state Sen. Vince Fumo and three co-defendants likely won't start before early next year, prosecutors and defense lawyers said at a federal court hearing yesterday. U.S. Senior District Judge William H. Yohn Jr. did not set a trial date. Prosecutors also said Fumo's trial could last three to four months. They plan to call at least 100 witnesses to testify for the government. Defense attorneys said they couldn't reliably estimate how long a trial might take until they see what evidence the feds have." The Daily News notes, "The feds have plenty to hand over: At least 100,000 documents, including e-mails, grand-jury transcripts, summaries of FBI interviews with witnesses, bills, bank-account statements and store receipts."

The Philadelphia Inquirer (2/23, Shiffman, 385K) reports, "Defense lawyers appear likely to accuse the government of illegally leaking grand jury material to the media or unduly pressuring witnesses, it was disclosed during" yesterday's hearing, and "the government, it would appear, hopes to win the right to tell jurors about 30-year-old allegations that Fumo put ghost employees on the Senate payroll and that he spied on rivals." The Inquirer adds, "For the most part, lawyers were reluctant to reveal strategies and did their best to keep their intentions vague. One thing became clear yesterday: The case the FBI and IRS investigated for four years won't go to trial for a long time."

DIA Analyst Convicted Of Espionage-Related Charges To Be Released. In the "Inside The Ring" section in the Washington Times (2/23, 88K), Bill Gertz reports that "former Defense Intelligence Agency (DIA) analyst Ronald Montaperto, convicted last year on espionage-related charges that involved passing secrets to China, is scheduled to get out of federal prison Sunday" and

DOJ_NMG_0135523

"will be barred from meeting any Chinese intelligence personnel as a condition of his release." In June, Montaperto "pleaded guilty…to improperly storing classified intelligence documents and admitted as part of a plea deal that he verbally passed both 'secret' and 'top secret' intelligence to two Chinese military intelligence officers" resulting in Montaperto serving "three months at the minimum-security prison at Fort Dix, N.J."

Miller Vows To Continue Land Deals, Despite Federal Probe. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/23, Werner) reports, "Rep. Gary Miller grew up poor. Even though he's now worth more than $13 million, he says he's still worried about his family's financial security. So, while federal authorities investigate some of his real estate transactions, he says he'll keep on making deals." Miller said in an interview, "Some people are arguing I shouldn't have the opportunity to make an investment that every other American citizen has an opportunity to make. I've got kids, I've got grandkids, and it'd be nice…if I can help them." The AP notes Miller "is being scrutinized for the millions he made selling properties to two Southern California communities outside his district. FBI agents have interviewed officials in both towns. … An FBI spokeswoman declined on Thursday to confirm or deny if there's an investigation or to make any further comment."

Christie Urges Public To Help Fight Public Corruption. The New York Times (2/23, Rivera, 1.16M) reports that in a speech at Fairleigh Dickinson University in Hackensack, N.J., "Christopher J. Christie, the federal prosecutor who has aggressively pursued New Jersey politicians believed to be corrupt, said in a speech here on Thursday that the public should help stem the tide of corruption by voting out officials who break the law." Christie "said that after domestic terrorism, his office's main priority was to hold the county and state leadership accountable. He asked, 'Wouldn't it be a shame to spend all this money' and endanger so many lives to protect a way of life from outside attack, 'only to give away our way of life from the rot from within? And that's what political corruption is.'" However, "Christie refused to discuss the progress of negotiations between his office and the Office of Legislative Services," over federal subpoenas issued for legislative records. The Times notes that his "increasingly public stance on issues like domestic terrorism and immigration has raised speculation that he may be considering a run for office. Many think he may challenge Gov. Jon S. Corzine in 2009."

Federal Agents Arrest Fugitive California Child Molester In Louisiana. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/23) reports "convicted felon and registered sex offender" David John Sprong Jr, "on the run for nearly a year, was captured Thursday at an auto auction business where he'd been working for most of the month, federal authorities said. … Last spring, Sprong skipped a $1 million bond in Sacramento, where he was charged with molesting girls." The US Marshal Service Crescent Star Fugitive Task Force, "with help from the FBI and the Livingston Parish Sheriff's Office arrested Sprong…in Holden, La., without incident." The AP notes, "'When he's not molesting people, he's working on cars,' said Mike Raifield, an agent with the FBI's Sacramento field office which was coordinating the search." Raifield added that "after the America's Most Wanted segment profiled him in January, we got a tip he was running an auto shop in Humble, Texas, but it came two days too late. Apparently he saw the same program and he disappeared."

Florida Man Pleads Guilty To Child Porn Production. The Miami Herald (2/23, Martinez, 286K) reports, "A 59-year-old man pleaded guilty Thursday in federal court in Fort Lauderdale to preying on children, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office. Raymond George Bohning, of Hollywood, faces five to 30 years in prison for production of child pornography, enticing a minor to engage in illegal sexual activity, distributing child pornography to a minor to induce her to engage in sexual activity and possessing more than 600 images of child pornography." The Herald notes, "An FBI investigation found that Bohning had an extensive collection of child pornography images depicting minors being sexually abused, including babies and toddlers."

FBI, Police Continue Intensive Search For WV Child Rapist. The Pittsburgh Post-Gazette (2/23, Lash, 230K) reports from Wheeling, W.Va., "Investigators believe a partially naked man who accosted a woman Sunday night in Martins Ferry, Ohio, was the same man who kidnapped and sexually assaulted a Wheeling girl two days later. That man has not been identified, but FBI agents and police from the Ohio Valley have mounted a 'significant' investigation to locate him, said Gary Wheeler, the FBI's supervisory agent for northern West Virginia. .. An FBI artist also was summoned from Quantico, Va., to develop a composite sketch of the man and possibly a drawing of his truck. Investigators said they also are reviewing computer databases of sex offenders and may consult FBI profilers in an effort to identify the man." The Wheeling Intelligencer (2/23, Wells) adds that at yesterday's press conference, Wheeling Police Department Lt. Gary Gaus "confirmed the young girl in Tuesday's abduction was sexually assaulted." Wheeling noted that the FBI sketch of the suspect "may be released today, and an improved description of the vehicle is anticipated. … 'There's no need for hysteria,' Wheeler said. 'There is a need for extra prudence.'"

DOJ_NMG_0135524

Two Nevadans Arrested On FEMA Relief Fraud Charges. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/23) reports, "Nevada residents were arrested Thursday and a third person was named as a fugitive on charges they fraudulently obtained federal funds designated for victims of Hurricane Katrina, a prosecutor said." Wilbert J. Bennett Jr. and Sheila Ritter "pleaded not guilty in initial appearances before a U.S. District Court magistrate judge following their arrests on charges of theft of government funds, U.S. Attorney Daniel Bogden said in a statement." Renee Bellinger "was indicted on charges of theft of government funds, identity theft and misuse of a Social Security number. She remained a fugitive, Bogden said." The AP notes, "Ritter and Bennett were released Thursday on personal recognizance bonds."

Oklahoma Man Indicted On Katrina Relief Fraud Charges. The AP (2/23) reports Darryl Eugene Hayes of Oklahoma City "was indicted in federal court on Thursday on charges of making false claims for Hurricane Katrina disaster relief funds." The AP notes, "The indictment claims that Hayes defrauded the Federal Emergency Management Agency and the Louisiana Department of Labor of more than $10,000 by claiming unemployment benefits for supposed Hurricane Katrina evacuees under three false names." Hayes also allegedly "submitted a fraudulent application to FEMA, claiming that his home in New Orleans was damaged by the August 2005 storm and that he was living in a 'mass shelter,' and later faxed a letter to FEMA claiming he had sustained losses 'from the hurricane' and had relocated to Oklahoma City."

North Carolina Man Convicted Of Silver Ingot Pyramid Scheme. The AP (2/23, Fought) reports, "A North Carolina man who bought one-ounce silver ingots for $10.50 and resold them to investors for $98 each and the promise of huge commission payments was convicted of federal charges in what a prosecutor called a classic 'too-good-to-be-true' pyramid scheme. About 5,000 victims lost more than $4 million in total, said Assistant U.S. Attorney Chris Cardani" in Portland, Ore. Richard Dompier " faces a sentence of about 20 years under federal guidelines, Cardani said, and is free pending sentencing, likely in June." The AP notes, "After investors complained that they weren't getting payments they were promised, the Internal Revenue Service and FBI began an investigation in 2000, joined by British and Oregon authorities. The bulk of the victims were in the United States, Canada and England, but the scheme also reached to Europe, Africa and Australia and was promoted in a total of 41 countries, the U.S. attorney's office said."

Los Angeles Anti-Gang Program Comes Under Criticism. The Los Angeles Times (2/23, Mcgreevy) reports, "Under pressure to show the L.A. Bridges program actually works, the operators of the city's largest gang-prevention effort released results of a study Thursday that sparked new debate about whether the city needs to rethink its anti-gang strategy." The Times continues, "The report by the city Community Development Department shows that while some middle-school students targeted by the L.A. Bridges program have boosted or maintained their grades and attendance, most have not improved." The Times adds, "While L.A. Bridges officials said they consider the findings encouraging given the types of students they are trying to help, some city leaders said they more dubious -- especially given the fact that gang membership and crime in Los Angeles is on the rise. … Amid new doubts about the program, which costs about $14 million annually, the city has replaced John Chavez as the interim director of L.A. Bridges." The Times notes, "In addition, City Controller Laura Chick plans to audit the program, and Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa has put its operators on notice that he is only providing funding through September, by which time he expects a new comprehensive gang strategy will be developed. … The debate comes as LAPD Chief William J. Bratton has launched a new assault on gang activity in the city -- a campaign criticized by some for not also including a more aggressive effort to keep kids out of gangs. The crackdown involved the LAPD and other agencies shifting resources to focus on 11 specific street gangs that officials say cause the most problems."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Gonzales Interviewed About Civil Liberties. The Christian Broadcasting Network (2/23, Charbonneau) interviewed Attorney General Gonzales in Nashville, TN. CBN reports, "It's a day in the life of the U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales as he boards a plane to launch the first Freedom Initiative to protect religious liberties. … Along for the ride, we ask about a report that says discrimination against Muslims after 9/11 in part prompted this new program. … 'It's something we worry about, naturally, when people see images on the television screen that these are the enemies of America, they may naturally assume anyone who looks like these people, or have the same religious belief - that, in fact, they constitute enemies of the United States. And that's just not true,' Gonzales said. … 'The President sent a very clear message in the days following following the attacks of 9/11, going to a Muslim center, and expressing to the American people his clear belief in our country, we have many people of the Muslim faith that do not represent a danger to America and we need to be tolerant of the views of the people of the Muslim faith.'" CBN continues, "We asked Gonzales about 'The Breach,' the just-released film about the worst intelligence failure in the FBIs history - when it turned out an American was spying for the Russians" and "what has been done since that incident at the Justice Department to make sure spies like Robert Hanssen aren't still at the FBI? … Gonzales: Well, I can't tell you everything, otherwise I'd be tipping off someone about our efforts to ensure something like that doesn't happen.I think we're in much better shape today than we were just a few years ago." CBN notes, "Gonzales is at the center of the debate over much-publicized case of two imprisoned border patrol agents who were tried and found guilty for shooting an alleged illegal drug smuggler. He didn't say whether he will recommend a presidential pardon. He did say the facts in the case are not getting out. … 'I've heard people complain about how could these people be convicted for doing their jobs,' he said. 'It's not part of their job to shoot an unarmed man from behind. It's not part of their job to conspire to conceal what they did. It's not part of their job to lie about what they did, to hide it from their superiors. So all that occurred in this particular case. And that's why these individuals were convicted.'" CBN asks Gonzales if he is "concerned that in the last couple of years of the Administration that your efforts will be bogged down by endless hearings and investigations by Democrats? … Gonzales: I think that the American people lose if I spend all my time worrying about congressional requests for information, if I spend all my time responding to subpoenas, to things of that nature. We will work with Congress, and we will do the very best we can to reach an accommodation with Congress, to give them the information, the appropriate information, they need for oversight. But that's an important part of my job. But I also believe that the American people expect me to do my job as Attorney General to protect their kids and make their neighborhood safer."

DOJ_NMG_0135525

Report Details DOJ Civil Rights Record Under Bush. UPI (2/22) reports, "In a 43-page document released by the U.S. Department of Justice Feb. 20, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales says the department takes seriously the protection of religious freedom and has worked vigorously during the Bush administration to protect them. … 'Many came to America precisely because of the recognition of religious liberty and the protection of this most basic of human rights,' the report, released in conjunction with the attorney general's visit to the Southern Baptist Convention Building in Nashville, Tenn., says. The document was labeled, 'Report on Enforcement of Laws Protecting Religious Freedom: Fiscal Years 2001-2006,' Baptist Press reported Wednesday." UPI continues, "The Civil Rights Division of the justice department was established in 1957 and is best known for its work toward ending racial discrimination. Early in the Bush administration, the department established a Special Counsel for Religious Discrimination to monitor the enforcement of religious freedom laws. … 'Prior to 2001, except for prosecution of religious bias crimes and employment cases, the Civil Rights Division exercised its jurisdiction to enforce civil rights laws with respect to religion sparingly, and had never had an attorney charged with ensuring that these laws were comprehensively enforced,' the report says." UPI adds, "Religious discrimination is a growing problem in the United States as the country is now home to more than 2,000 different faiths and denominations, the report says. From 1992 to 2005, complaints of religious discrimination in employment filed with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission increased 69 percent, compared to single-digit increases in complaints about sex discrimination and racial discrimination during that period. … Education discrimination cases involving religion increased from one case reviewed and no investigations during the period of 1995-2000 to 82 cases reviewed and 40 investigations from 2001-2006, according to the report."

DOJ Decides Against Seeking Death Penalty For Mississippi Jailer. The Biloxi (MS) Sun Herald (2/23, Fitzgerald) reports from Gulfport, MS, "U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez decided against seeking the death penalty in the prosecution of Ryan Teel after an extensive review of the criminal case, according to U.S. Attorney Dunn Lampton for the Southern District of Mississippi." The Herald continues, "Teel, a former Harrison County jailer, remains in custody pending trial in the Feb. 4, 2006, fatal beating of inmate Jessie Lee Williams Jr. A motion filed in court Thursday asks for a bond review so Teel could await his May 28 trial out of jail, as first reported on sunherald.com. … Teel was in charge of the booking room the night of the beating. He has been held at an undisclosed location since his arrest Aug. 28, 2006. Teel, 30, pleaded not guilty to charges of deprivation of civil rights under color of law and of falsifying records to obstruct a federal investigation." The Herald adds, "Gonzalez decided against the death penalty after Teel's attorneys and federal prosecutors met with a U.S. Justice Department review panel in Washington. … 'No reason was given,' Lampton said. … 'There's all kinds of arguments for it, but it was his call. I've tried a number of death cases and in this case, I think it's the right decision. It's better to start the case off without the jury or the judge having to deal with the death-penalty issue.'" The Herald notes, "Lampton called the review 'a very serious, involved procedure. They look at all the possible factors like a jury would. With 94 (federal court) districts, I think that's the wise approach in fairness and consistency across the board. When a case goes through, you want the law to be enforced the same in Mississippi that it is in Minnesota and Montana.' … The decision means Teel faces life in prison if convicted on the civil-rights charge."

DOJ_NMG_0135526

Urban League Head Seeks DOJ Probe Of New Orleans Katrina Shootings. The AP (2/23, Foster) reports, "Police shootings that left two people dead at a bridge in New Orleans in the chaotic days after Hurricane Katrina should be investigated by the U.S. Justice Department, the president of the National Urban League said Thursday." The AP continues, "In a letter to the chairwoman of the Congressional Black Caucus, Marc Morial - a former New Orleans mayor - asked that the caucus support a federal civil rights investigation into the 'circumstances surrounding the police killing of two unarmed African American men and the wounding of four others.' … Six current and one former police officer have been charged in the case." The AP adds, "Sgts. Kenneth Bowen and Robert Gisevius Jr., Officer Anthony Villavaso II, and former officer Robert Faulcon Jr. were indicted in December on first-degree murder charges and attempted murder charges in the Sept. 4, 2005, shootings on the Danziger Bridge. … Conviction on a first-degree murder charge would mean mandatory life in prison. District Attorney Eddie Jordan said he would not seek the death penalty for the four. … Two other officers - Robert Barrios and Mike Hunter Jr. - were charged with attempted first-degree murder, and Officer Ignatius Hills was charged with attempted second-degree murder in the case." The AP notes, "The New Orleans NAACP asked the U.S. Attorney and the civil rights division of the Justice Department to investigate the shootings after those charged were allowed to return to work in non-sensitive jobs away from the public. Danatus King, president of the New Orleans branch of the NAACP said the move smacked of favoritism."

State Lawmaker Introduces Bill To Legalize Gay Marriage In Illinois House. The Chicago Tribune (2/23, Yednak, 617K) reports, "A state lawmaker fired up the gay marriage debate in Illinois Thursday by introducing a bill that would legalize marriage between same-sex couples. 'Illinois is a heartland state but has always been a leader in civil rights and social justice issues,' said the bill's sponsor," state Rep. Greg Harris (D), saying "It's the right thing to do." The proposal "would eliminate wording in state law that marriage is between 'a man and a woman' and substitute the phrase 'two persons.'" Harris, "who is openly gay, said a significant education effort would be necessary to get his bill passed, as was the case in 2005 when a gay rights bill passed in Illinois."

Nonprofit Law Center Litigates Largest Employment Bias Case. The National Law Journal (2/23, Bathija) reports, "Attorney Brad Seligman was on a hunt to find out whatever he could about Wal-Mart Stores Inc. after hearing about a potential claim of alleged sex discrimination against the retailer in 1999. … 'I called up my friend, another attorney, and he immediately said, "evil empire,"' said Seligman, executive director and founder of a nonprofit group called The Impact Fund, located in Berkeley, Calif. 'Then I called another friend, who is an economist, and he also indicated the same.'" The Journal continues, "Based on the advice of his friends and some statistical research of his own, the litigation began. On Feb. 6, the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals upheld a lower court decision making the case the largest employment discrimination class action to go to trial. Dukes v. Wal-Mart Stores Inc., No. 3:01-CV-02252 (N.D. Calif.). … The Impact Fund filed the lawsuit against Wal-Mart. The organization aims to provide funding, training and advice to lawyers who want to bring public interest impact lawsuits in civil rights, poverty and environmental justice. And its Equal Justice Litigation Program works as co-counsel on select cases, including the Wal-Mart case." The Journal adds, "The Impact Fund has three attorneys: Seligman, Jocelyn Larkin and Julia Campins. The entire organization runs with 12 employees, said Larkin … The Impact Fund is currently involved in litigating six cases, including another gender discrimination class action against Costco stores."

WPost Praises PG County Police For K-9 Restraints. The Washington Post (2/23, A18) editorializes, "The police of Prince George's County deserve a pat on the back for mending their canine unit's ways. What for too many years had been a barrage of grisly brutality reports has given way to dramatically fewer injuries to suspects and other people. As reported last week by The Post's Ruben Castaneda, the canine unit, which had been operating under a Justice Department consent decree because of allegations of excessive force and lack of accountability, is being freed of federal oversight." The Post continues, "The statistics -- and the views of citizen groups that used to complain constantly about snarly, excessively ferocious dogs -- indicate significant improvement. During a seven-year period from the mid-1980s to the early 1990s, county police dogs were involved in nearly 800 biting incidents, according to an internal police report included in a federal civil lawsuit against a canine handler. Last year, county police dogs apprehended 55 suspects without biting them, a result of steady training of the dogs to 'bark and hold'" not bark and sink their teeth. … We call it encouraging news for all county residents."

ANTITRUST:

DOJ Ends Concrete Price-Fixing Probe With $1.75 Million Fine. The Indianapolis Star (2/23, Corcoran) reports, "A probe into concrete price-fixing in the Indianapolis area, which sent nine current or former executives to prison, ended after more than three years Thursday with yet another corporate fine." The Star continues, "The $1.75 million penalty levied against MA-RI-AL Corp. during a U.S. District Court sentencing completed a sweeping antitrust investigation into agreements among more than a half-dozen companies to limit discounts on bid work from July 2000 through May 25, 2004. … MA-RI-AL, a Noblesville company doing business as Beaver Materials, agreed Thursday to settle its November conviction by paying the fine in installments over five years." The Star adds, "The company's co-owners, Allyn M. and R. Gary Beaver, who were not charged in the investigation, agreed to the settlement with representatives of the U.S. Department of Justice. … Chief U.S. District Judge Larry J. McKinney accepted the negotiated fine as a fair punishment that would send a message to other corporations about the risks of fixing prices without putting Beaver Materials out of business. The company also got five years' probation." The Star notes, "Companies involved in the conspiracy, including those whose executives cooperated with the Justice Department Antitrust Division and FBI, also face civil suits from customers to recover any overcharges. … Beaver's defense attorney, James Voyles, said an agreement was possible because the Justice Department's accountants and the company's experts were relatively close in assessments of the firm's ability to pay a fine. … Federal antitrust officials won't say whether more charges could result from alleged price-fixing schemes in Bloomington, Marion and Muncie, where Irving Materials officials have acknowledged participating in additional price fixing."

DOJ_NMG_0135527

Two DOD Contractors Plead Guilty In Bid-Rigging Scheme. Newsday (2/23, Kessler) reports, "Two executives of a Pennsylvania defense contractor pleaded guilty yesterday in federal court in Central Islip to charges of bid-rigging in connection with a contract to sell the Navy slings that are used to move bombs and other munitions on aircraft carriers, officials said." Newsday continues, "Thomas Cunningham, 61, the vice president of Total Industrial & Packaging Inc., of McKee's Rocks, Pa. - a Pittsburgh suburb - and Richard Barko, 44, the company's general manager, admitted they conspired with a Long Island company to criminally violate antitrust laws. The Long Island company involved in the $200,000 contract was not identified in court papers. The contract was to provide slings known as metal sling hoist assemblies, officials said. … According to officials, Barko and Cunningham, along with other unnamed conspirators, met between August 2003 and January 2004 and agreed on who would win the bid on the slings and that they all would submit non-competitive bids, officials said." Newsday adds, "As part of a plea bargain, Cunningham and Barko agreed to cooperate with an ongoing investigation into bid-rigging by the Antitrust Division of the Justice Department and the Defense Criminal Investigative Service, officials said. … Thomas Barnett, the assistant attorney general in charge of the antitrust division, said in a written statement: 'We will continue to seek out and prosecute those who subvert the competitive bidding process.'"

Experts Say Sirius-XM Merger Faces Major Antitrust Hurdles. Bloomberg (2/23, Rowley) reports, "Sirius Satellite Radio Inc. and XM Satellite Holdings Inc. will have trouble persuading the U.S. Justice Department to approve their $4.84 billion merger because the combination appears to threaten competition, antitrust experts say." Bloomberg continues, "Antitrust enforcers won't readily accept assertions by Sirius and XM that satellite radio competes for listeners with broadcast radio, iPods and music downloads by cell-phone users, said Herbert Hovenkamp, who teaches antitrust at the University of Iowa law school. The Justice Department probably won't agree with that 'fairly common error,' he said." Bloomberg adds, "Satellite radio can be viewed as 'a unique technology' controlled by 'two firms that have been duking it out,' Hovenkamp said. 'Since they have the whole thing, that would make this a merger to monopoly.' … The test for the Justice Department, he said, will be whether Sirius and XM could impose a price increase without losing customers." Bloomberg notes, "How the Justice Department defines the market is crucial to the outcome of its merger review. The agency's guidelines say that determination hinges on whether the merging companies can impose a 'small but significant and nontransitory' price increase on customers without forcing them to shift to other products. … If enough customers switch products and thus cancel out any profit from a price increase, the market must include these other products, the guidelines say."

WPost Columnist Argues Against Sirius-XM Merger. In a column for the Washington Post (2/23, D1), Steven Pearlstein writes, "Here's what to expect if the Justice Department and the Federal Communications Commission allow Sirius and XM to merge, creating a monopoly in the satellite radio business: … Clear Channel will start buying every radio station in America that it doesn't already own. … Apple will be able to buy any company that begins to challenge its dominance in the market for portable music players. … Comcast will begin merger talks with Time Warner Cable. … And there will be nothing standing in the way of a marriage of NBC and CBS." Pearlstein continues, "All that will be possible because the government will have declared that there is so much competition between the different technologies in the market for digital material -- and the outcome of that competition is so uncertain -- that there is no reason to worry about consolidation of companies using the same technology. … This is the Powell Doctrine -- not the one about overwhelming force enunciated by Gen. Colin Powell when he was chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, but the one promulgated by his son, Michael Powell, while he was chairman of the FCC. The younger Powell was guided by this doctrine in giving the green light to consolidation in almost every corner of the telecommunications sector. In the one instance he deviated from that position -- blocking the merger of EchoStar and DirecTV -- it was narrowly, on the ground that there weren't enough broadband competitors in many rural areas." Pearlstein adds, "There is something to the idea that antitrust regulators should use a lighter touch, and exercise greater humility in predicting what might happen, during periods of rapid technological change. But even discounting for that, there are plenty of reasons for the government to block an XM-Sirius merger, which would create a monopoly. … Let's start with the obvious, which is that that while there are now multiple sources for digital music, they aren't perfect substitutes for each other. … Moreover, people are somewhat locked into their current choice by the investment they've made in equipment or contracts with companies. In that way, too, customers are 'sticky.' … The different technologies also have different business models, complicating the terms of competition. Old-fashioned radio makes its money from advertising, so it is hard to see how it could discipline the XM-Sirius monopoly for raising prices. Nor could Apple, which makes its money selling devices and downloaded songs. And we don't even know yet what the business models will be for Internet radio or music over cellphones." Pearlstein concludes, "What we have here, folks, is a case of two money-losing companies locked in what has become ruinous competition, from which they hope to escape by merging. It may be that, given the economics of the business, there is room for only one to survive and prosper. But if satellite radio is such a 'natural monopoly,' consumers will be better off if the companies are forced to duke it out until one prevails and the other dies. The antitrust laws were designed to foster competition, not to foreclose it by bailing out competitors that overpaid for talent, over-invested in plant and equipment or over-promised results to their investors."

DOJ_NMG_0135528

More Commentary. In an op-ed for USA Today (2/23, 10A), Jimmy Schaeffler, senior analyst at The Carmel Group, a telecommunications and media consulting organization, writes, "When the Federal Communications Commission approved the creation of satellite radio in 1997, it had an option: Provide an exclusive license to one company, or authorize competing licenses that ensured consumer choice and lower marketplace prices. It wisely opted for the latter, saying: 'One licensee will not be permitted to acquire control of the other remaining satellite licensee. This prohibition on transfer of control will help assure continuing competition.' … This wording stemmed from the commission's core DNA, which prompts it to act on behalf of consumers by embracing competition, localism and diversity deemed to be 'in the public interest.' Now, after XM and Sirius have fought ferociously for 10 years, they come on bended knee before policymakers, begging for a government-sanctioned monopoly. … Their request should be rejected, as was a similar monopoly merger proposed by satellite television providers DirecTV and DISH Network in 2001." Schaeffler adds, "It took DirecTV and DISH Network well over a decade to gain their financial legs in the satellite TV business. XM and Sirius have sustainable businesses that can operate quite well in satellite radio — right now — as separate entities. They don't need a monopoly; all they need is a class in Business 101 and a little common sense."

USA Today (2/23, 10A) editorializes, "Remember the 'baseball, hot dogs, apple pie and Chevrolet' car ad from the 1980s? Turns out it was prescient. While the food is still sold separately, baseball now comes free with many Chevys, at least for a three-month introductory offer. … That's because General Motors has a deal to build XM Satellite radios into Chevys and its other cars. And XM has a deal with Major League Baseball." USA continues, "Satellite competitor Sirius is frozen out of both. But it has the NFL and NBA contracts, which means that if there's a Ford in your future, football and basketball aren't far behind. Not a sports fan? Oprah is on XM; Martha Stewart is on Sirius. … As Stewart might say, that is not a good thing. It makes little sense that sports fans must decide between every single pro football game and no baseball games, or vice versa. Nor does it make much sense that people's listening preferences should enter into their car-buying decisions. … That's one reason the proposed XM-Sirius combination, announced this week, may be the rare merger that is good for consumers." USA notes, "Before the federal government approves the deal, of course, it should be thoroughly vetted. The salient question for regulators is whether satellite radio is a market unto itself, in which case a merger would create a monopoly, or whether it is part of larger universe that includes broadcast radio and an array of existing and emerging technologies. … If it's the latter — and a strong case can be made that it is — the merged entity would represent a more potent competitor to entrenched broadcast interests, one that would offer its customers a more enticing and complete product." USA concludes, "The case against the proposed deal would be stronger if XM, with 7.6 million subscribers, and Sirius, with 6 million, were strong and profitable companies. Both, in fact, have been big money losers, hemorrhaging $6 billion collectively in less than a decade. … The most pressing question is not whether XM and Sirius would be too powerful if they merged; it is whether they can survive if they don't. And the best way to ensure survival is to let them combine. Baseball goes with Chevrolet, so why not also with football, basketball, Howard Stern and Martha Stewart?"

DOJ_NMG_0135529

Apple, Cisco Settle iPhone Dispute. The Financial Times (2/23, Francisco) reports, "Shares of Apple and Cisco Systems were little changed yesterday after the companies settled their dispute over the use of the iPhone name by announcing an agreement to share the controversial trademark." The Times continues, "The accord put to rest a month-long dispute that began when Apple launched the iPhone, marking the computer maker's long-awaited foray into the mobile handset market." The Times adds, "Apple and Cisco said they had reached agreement to share the iPhone name, allowing each to apply the name to products sold around the world. … Under the agreement, both sides agreed to 'xplore opportunities for inter-operability in the areas of security, and consumer and enterprise communications' … Other terms of the deal were not disclosed. The agreement represented a concession on the part of Apple, which had originally resisted calls to make the iPhone compatible with other companies' hardware."

South Korea Fines Refiners For Collusion. The Wall Street Journal (2/23, Choi) reports, "South Korea's antitrust regulator said it fined four domestic refiners a combined 52.6 billion won ($56.1 million) for colluding to fix the prices of light-oil products in 2004." The Journal continues, "The country's top four refiners -- SK Corp., GS Caltex Corp., S-Oil Corp. and Hyundai Oilbank Corp. -- colluded to coordinate the prices of light-oil products diesel, gasoline and kerosene from April 1 to June 10, 2004, according to the Korea Fair Trade Commission. … 'The collusion has incurred 240 billion won in damages to customers, which is equal to 15% of their combined sales worth 1.6 trillion won during the cited period,' said Song Sang Min, a commission official." The Journal adds, "During the 71-day period, international oil prices rose by the equivalent of 20 won a liter, but the four companies raised the prices of the three light-oil products by 40 won to 70 won a liter. … The commission said it has also filed a complaint with prosecutors for further investigation against the four refiners."

Judge Tosses Antitrust Suit Against Utah Home Developer. The Salt Lake Tribune (2/23, Manson) reports, "For the second time, a federal judge has thrown out a lawsuit that accuses the developer of a planned community on Traverse Mountain in Draper (UT) of antitrust violations." The Tribune continues, "U.S. District Judge Dee Benson ruled that U.S. General Inc. and DJ Investment Group failed to specify alleged conduct by developer SunCrest LLC that would be considered an antitrust violation. … 'An antitrust claim requires harm to the competitive process, not simply harm to a particular competitor,' Benson wrote in his Feb. 14 decision dismissing the suit. … He also wrote that Traverse Mountain does not constitute an economic market as defined in antitrust law." The Tribune adds, "SunCrest is building its community high atop Traverse Mountain, which is in an area that straddles Salt Lake and Utah counties. DJ Investment owns adjoining land and wants to build its own community with U.S. General, a construction company. … DJ Investment and U.S. General filed suit in November 2005, accusing SunCrest of conspiring with Draper city officials to shut them out of developing their land. They claimed that during secret meetings, Draper and SunCrest agreed to create protection strips that would limit access by the two companies to the DJ Investment property. … SunCrest and Draper strongly denied all of the allegations. In June 2006, U.S. District Judge Ted Stewart threw out the suit. Within days, DJ Investment and U.S. General filed a new lawsuit that made the same claims but had a more detailed argument about the alleged evidence in the case."

FTC Approves AIG Unit's Acquisition Of US Port Operations. The AP (2/23) reports, "Federal antitrust regulators said Thursday they approved American International Group Inc.'s purchase of six U.S. port operations from Dubai Ports World." The AP continues, "DP World, which is owned by the government of Dubai, touched off a political firestorm over port security in early 2006 when it acquired the operations from a British firm. … The Federal Trade Commission cleared the transaction without requiring any changes to the deal." The AP adds, "AIG's Global Investment Group first announced it would buy DP World's U.S. port operations in December 2006. The deal stumbled earlier this month when the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey, which must consent to the sale, asked the two companies for tens of millions of dollars in cash and future infrastructure work at the Port Newark Container Terminal. … After Senators Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., and Robert Menendez, D-N.J., pressured the Port Authority, it reached a deal with AIG Feb. 16."

EU Clears Purchase Of German TV Network. The AP (2/23) reports, "The European Commission on Thursday cleared the sale of Germany's biggest commercial TV broadcaster ProSiebenSat.1 Media AG to a consortium controlled by private equity groups, saying it found no antitrust problems." The AP continues, "U.S. fund Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co. and British-based Permira plan to merge ProSieben with their other broadcasting asset, Dutch-Scandinavian SBS, with the aim of overtaking European industry leader RTL Group SA, which is controlled by media conglomerate Bertelsmann AG. Permira also controls British TV rights manager All3Media." The AP adds, "An antitrust investigation found ProSiebenSat.1 and SBS were not direct rivals and All3Media's TV content sales in Germany were negligible. … 'The Commission concluded that there was no risk that the proposed transaction would allow the new entity to drive competitors out of the market or to discriminate against them,' it said." The AP notes, "ProSieben owns the Sat.1, ProSieben, kabel eins and N24 networks in Germany and controls about 45 percent of Germany's $5 billion television advertising market. … The consortium will pay German Media Partners 3.1 billion euros ($4 billion) cash for the 50.5 percent stake in the company that it acquired in 2003 and has launched an offer to acquire the publicly traded shares. … Separately, ProSieben said Thursday that its fourth-quarter profit rose by 17 percent thanks to increased advertising, but the figure was still short of analysts' expectations."

DOJ_NMG_0135530

Black Farmers Oppose Monsanto-Delta Pine Deal. The Jackson (MS) Clarion-Ledger (2/23, Goodman) reports, "Black farmers in Mississippi and around the country are bracing for a major seed company merger they say threatens to create a monopoly that will price them out of the farming business." The Clarion-Ledger continues, "St. Louis-based Monsanto Co. is forging ahead with a plan to purchase Mississippi's Scott-based cottonseed company Delta and Pine Land, and a national black farmers group says its opposition to the deal has gotten lost in the mix. … 'If this merger goes through, it's going to have a drastic effect on black farmers and small farmers around the country,' said John Boyd Jr., president of the National Black Farmers Association. … 'If this merger goes through, there is literally no competition for cottonseed, soybean seed and corn seed, genetically engineered.'" The Clarion-Ledger adds, "The association represents 80,000 members around the country, primarily small producers, and has its biggest membership in Mississippi. … Delta and Pine Land operates the largest and longest-running private cottonseed breeding program in the world while Monsanto, one of the world's largest agricultural products companies, makes Roundup, the world's best-selling herbicide. … The deal, still awaiting U.S. Department of Justice approval, would mean a monopoly on the market, and seed prices would shoot up, Boyd said. … 'It would be just like going to one supermarket and that supermarket sets the price for everything and we don't have any option but to go to that one supermarket.'"

Esmark Says Deal For Ohio Steel Mill Is Dead. The AP (2/23, Smith) reports from Charleston, WV, "A deal to sell the Weirton division of Mittal Steel Co. to Illinois-based Esmark Inc. is dead, Esmark President Craig Bouchard told The Associated Press on Thursday." The AP continues, "To comply with a federal Justice Department decree, Mittal was ordered this week to sell its Sparrows Point mill in Maryland instead of the former Weirton Steel, across the Ohio River from Steubenville, Ohio, where workers had volunteered to be sold and where Esmark had already made an offer. … The government said selling the mill near Baltimore was the best way to prevent a monopoly on the eastern U.S. market for tin-plated steel. The decree did not prevent Mittal from making a separate deal to shed Weirton, but Bouchard said the company told him Wednesday night that it would keep the West Virginia operations for now. … 'As of right now, our deal with Mittal for Weirton is dead,' he said." The AP adds, "Mittal spokesman William Steers said a January memorandum of understanding with Esmark is no longer valid because it was conditioned on the Justice Department's acceptance of the sale as a remedy to the antitrust concerns. … 'At this point in time, we're focused on developing a global packaging strategy, and Weirton will be part of that,' Steers said. 'We want to focus on seeing whether we can improve its profitability, retain that business and develop its prospects.'" The AP notes, "The 1,250-member Independent Steelworkers Union said it has been assured Mittal 'remains committed' to keeping a mill in West Virginia. … Justice officials had initially ordered Netherlands-based Mittal to try to sell Dofasco Inc. of Canada to settle antitrust issues surrounding its merger with Luxembourg's Arcelor SA. But the Dutch trust that controls Dofasco rejected a plan to sell it to ThyssenKrupp AG of Germany. … That left Mittal with the choice of selling one of its two U.S. assets in the tin market, Sparrows Point or Weirton. … Justice ruled that Sparrows Point is 'a profitable and diversified facility' with its own in-house supply of slab steel, while Weirton would have to develop new sources of slab after separating from Mittal."

Jury Orders Microsoft To Pay $1.52 Billion To Alcatel In MP3 Suit. The Wall Street Journal (2/23, A3, Guth, Wingfield) reports, "A federal jury ordered Microsoft Corp. to pay $1.52 billion to Alcatel-Lucent SA for infringing patents on a fundamental technology for digital music." The Journal continues, "The decision found that Microsoft's Windows Media software had infringed two patents related to MP3, a software technology for recording and playing digital audio. … The patent verdict, one of the largest on record, could have broad repercussions because of the widespread use of the MP3 audio format in technology and electronics products. Devices that employ the technology include Apple Inc.'s iPod, software from Macromedia and Internet services from Yahoo Inc." The Journal adds, "The decision came from the U.S. District Court in San Diego. The battle began with a 2003 lawsuit filed by Lucent Technologies Inc., which was bought last year by Alcatel. The complaint alleged that Microsoft customers Dell Inc. and Gateway Inc. infringed 15 patents related to the MP3 technology for encoding and decoding audio files. Those companies sell personal computers that include Microsoft's player technology, which uses MP3."

DOJ_NMG_0135531

The New York Times (2/23, Hansell) reports, "At issue is the way the Windows Media Player software from Microsoft plays audio files using MP3, the most common method of distributing music on the Internet. If the ruling stands, Apple and hundreds of other companies that make products that play MP3 files, including portable players, computers and software, could also face demands to pay royalties to Alcatel. … Microsoft and others have licensed MP3 — not from Alcatel-Lucent, but from a consortium led by the Fraunhofer Institute, a large German research organization that was involved, along with the French electronics company Thomson and Bell Labs, in the format's development." The Times adds, "The current case turns on two patents that Alcatel claims were developed by Bell Labs before it joined with Fraunhofer to develop MP3. … Thomas W. Burt, the deputy general counsel of Microsoft, said the company would most likely petition the judge in the San Diego case, Rudi M. Brewster, to set aside or reduce the judgment. If she does not, Microsoft will probably take the case to the federal appeals court in Washington, which hears patent cases."

USA Today (2/23, 1B, Swartz) reports, "In 2002 and 2003, Lucent, which was acquired by Alcatel last year, filed 15 patent claims against computer makers Gateway and Dell. Microsoft sued Lucent over the claims and was countersued by Lucent. A judge has tossed out two of Lucent's claims and set six trials to consider the remaining patent disputes." USA adds, "Microsoft says it properly licensed the MP3 technology from Fraunhofer-Gesellschaft, a German research company, for $16 million, in 1997 and 2004. … 'We are concerned that this decision opens the door for Alcatel-Lucent to pursue action against hundreds of other companies who purchased the rights to use MP3 technology from Fraunhofer, the industry-recognized rightful licensor,' Burt said in an earlier statement."

The Washington Post (2/23, D1, Sipress) reports, "The judgment, which lawyers from both sides called the largest patent award ever, raised the prospect that scores of other companies could now be financially liable for using the popular MP3 format. /// Alcatel-Lucent argued that it held the rights to the technology because it was developed at Bell Laboratories, which later became part of Lucent. Alcatel bought Lucent last year. The company successfully argued that Microsoft infringed on the patents by including the digital music technology in its Windows operating system starting in 1998. The same technology later was used in Microsoft's Windows Media Player and is included in the Windows Vista operating system, which was released to the public last month. … Microsoft countered that it had properly licensed the technology from Germany's Fraunhofer Institute, which was involved with Bell Labs in developing aspects of the MP3 format. Only after Microsoft and other companies made licensing agreements with Fraunhofer did Alcatel-Lucent raise its claim, Microsoft argued."

The Financial Times (2/23, Waters) reports, "The large size of the award highlights the scale of the risk to Microsoft as it faces a series of other wide-ranging legal disputes with Alcatel-Lucent over some of the fundamental technology used in PCs and related devices. … Thursday's verdict, stemming from the use of audio coding technology in PCs, was the first of five due to be heard by the San Diego court in the coming months. The others relate to speech coding technology in Windows; user interface patents; technology in the Xbox games console; and video coding in other Microsoft software."

The AP (2/23, Mintz) reports, "The court will consider the next of the patent suits, which relates to speech coding, in March or April, Microsoft said. Other areas in dispute include video coding on Microsoft's Xbox game console and Windows' user interface."

ENVIRONMENT:

Bush Promotes Energy Proposals In Visit To North Carolina. The Daily Dispatch (2/23, Ponder) reports this morning, "President George W. Bush promoted a major reduction in gasoline use during a visit Thursday to a Franklinton biotechnology facility doing cutting-edge research in the production of ethanol, one of the fuels at the heart of the plan." Bush "told an audience at the Novozymes facility outside Franklinton Thursday that the company's role in ethanol production was a key to American energy independence. The 20 in 10 initiative is a new Bush administration goal to reduce gasoline consumption in America by 20 percent over the next 10 years." Bush "said ethanol would allow Americans to be 'better stewards of the environment' while reducing dependence on foreign oil."

The Washington Post (2/23, A8, Fletcher, 690K) says "Bush's energy proposal is among the few items in his domestic agenda likely to receive support from Democrats in Congress." Although "Bush has not submitted specific legislation," White House "officials have said that they hope the principles he has laid out will guide lawmakers when they consider energy policy." McClatchy (2/23, Barrett), meanwhile, reports that "for Bush, it was another step in his tour across the country to pitch the priorities he outlined in his State of the Union address in January." For Franklinton, "the visit was a very big deal. Novozymes' CEO flew over from Denmark. The mayor was there, along with county commissioners. Sen. Richard Burr, R-N.C., Rep. G.K. Butterfield, D-N.C., and North Carolina Agriculture Commissioner Steve Troxler showed up. Signs around town welcomed the president, and a quartet of children on a nearby road manned a candy stand, hoping Bush might stop by for a $1 Snickers."

DOJ_NMG_0135532

The New York Times (2/23, Andrews, 1.16M) reports, "After touring the laboratory, which is developing enzymes to make cellulosic ethanol, fuel distilled from plant byproducts, Mr. Bush spoke buoyantly about new technologies that may reduce the nation's thirst for foreign oil. … After listening to company executives describe the role of enzymes in reducing the cost of ethanol, Mr. Bush jumped in to ask a layman's question: 'So is this like a distillery?'" The trip "is the latest event this week in which Mr. Bush has stepped away from grim questions about the war in Iraq to focus on domestic themes like energy and health care." The Times adds, "Some environmental groups complain about Mr. Bush's definition of alternative fuel including liquefied coal, which could produce even more heat-trapping gases than gasoline." But "the president appeared to show genuine enthusiasm for cellulosic ethanol, frequently interrupting Novozymes executives to boil down technical explanations into more simple sound bites. At one point, Mr. Bush jumped in to explain that corn-based ethanol could not provide enough alternative fuel because ethanol demand was already outstripping supply."

The AP (2/23, Loven) recounts that at one point, "the president held up a beaker of nearly complete ethanol, sniffed it and laughed: 'I quit drinking in 1986,' he said. Then he turned serious. 'Someday you're going to be able to use this in your car,' Bush said." Remarking on that anecdote, the Los Angeles Times (2/23, Gerstenzang, 850K) runs a story titled "Bush Gets A Whiff Of Alternative Fuel," in which is says that Bush, "who frequently jokes about his undistinguished record as a history major at Yale, is devoting considerable time these days to matters scientific."

News & Observer (2/23) says Inside the company, Bush "donned a white lab coat with his name and the company's name and went from room to room learning about how the company works to develop biotechnology. … Afterward, he greeted people along the rope line and then boarded his helicopter just after 1 p.m."

Bush's visit to North Carolina was extensively covered by local TV newscasts across the country. Some examples: WWAY-TV Wilmington, NC (2/22, 11:12 pm) said in its broadcast, "Bush and a panel of experts came to Franklinton, North Carolina today. They say our state can partake in the growth of the ethanol fuel industry." WCNC-TV Charlotte (2/22, 11:06 pm) reported, "Bush went to Franklinton near Raleigh to visit biotech plant Novozymes. The company produces enzymes which help turn corn into ethanol fuel. WCNC was there as the President learned about other resources which could produce ethanol." The station showed the President saying, "We're on the verge of some breakthroughs that will enable a pile of wood chips to become the raw materials for fuels that will run your car." Many other stations, including WFMZ-TV Philadelphia (2/22, 10:46 pm), WSJV-TV South Bend (2/22, 10:24 pm), and KTVU-TV San Francisco (2/22, 5:39 pm), aired similar quotes from the President.

Bush Honors North Carolina Volunteer. The Herald-Sun (2/23, West) reports, "Forgive Durham's Jamie Lathan if he feels humbled right now. After all, it's not everyday someone gets to meet and chat briefly with the leader of the free world on the tarmac by Air Force One -- plus have…Bush himself turn and wave to your mother, your father and your younger brother standing nearby in the crowd of spectators. That's precisely what happened to Lathan, 28, a mentor who on Thursday joined an elite list of more than 500 people nationally who have received the President's Volunteer Service Award for making a difference in the lives of others." The Sun adds, "Amid a morning burst of sunshine, Bush presented a ceremonial box containing a pin to Lathan moments before leaving Raleigh-Durham International Airport via helicopter to tour an alternative-energy plant in Franklinton. 'It was amazing. It was amazing,' Lathan said immediately afterward, affixing the pin to the lapel of his dark suit jacket." Lathan "said he told the commander-in-chief he was praying for him." He is "a mentor at the Youth Life Learning Center of Durham, an outreach program originally founded by King's Park International Church."

Critics Criticize Bush Proposal For Energy R&D Spending. The Christian Science Monitor (2/23, Clayton, 59K) reports, "If new technology is a key answer to global warming and America's addiction to oil, then…Bush's proposal to boost federal spending on energy R&D – by no less than 30 percent in fiscal 2008 – would seem a welcome step. In the new $2.7 billion budget plan, R&D dollars allotted to the US Department of Energy (DOE) continue a transition toward research that will help cut greenhouse gases." However, "federal spending on energy research in real dollars is only one-third what it was at its 1978 peak, according to a Harvard University analysis. Some also question the administration's emphasis on nuclear research, saying other promising technologies could be applied sooner to climate and energy-security issues."

Rising Costs Threaten Development Of Gas-To-Liquid Fuel. The Wall Street Journal (2/23, A2, Gold, 2.04M) reports, "The rush to build a new industry that turns natural gas into an ultraclean transportation fuel is stumbling over rising costs, showing how tough it is for emerging fuels to compete with crude oil. This past week, Exxon Mobil Corp. backed out of plans to build an enormous gas-to-liquids, or GTL, plant in Qatar." Yesterday, Shell "broke ground on its own similarly sized GTL plant in Qatar, but said the cost might have tripled to as high as $18 billion. Escalating budgets are threatening to constrain the growth of the GTL industry, which produces a clear liquid that can run existing diesel engines without any of the sooty pollutants associated with diesel." The Journal adds, "Higher costs have hit companies developing Canada's oil sands, where crude is packed into tar-like deposits. Prices for corn and other crops have risen, in part, because of the U.S.'s increasing interest in ethanol."

DOJ_NMG_0135533

New Fuel Economy Ratings Show Hybrids Not As Efficient As Thought. In a front-page story, USA Today (2/23, 1A, Healey, 2.27M) reports, "Fuel-saving gasoline-electric hybrid cars don't save as much fuel as thought, according to new government fuel-economy ratings available to the public for the first time. The new ratings go into effect beginning with 2008 models," but "it's possible to tell what rating 2007 and older models would get using the '08 standards. The government's fuel-economy website has a program than makes the comparison." The Toyota Prius "drops to 48 miles per gallon in the city under the '08 testing procedure, from a 60 mpg rating under the current system — a 20% decline. Its highway mileage rating falls about 12%, to 45 mpg."

Iowa City To Pay $1.5 Million In Coal Gas Site Settlement. The Le Mars (IA) Daily Sentinel (2/23, Stevens) reports, "Le Mars City Council members Tuesday approved an agreement with the U.S. Justice Department on the nearly five-year-old dispute centering on clean-up of contamination at the former Le Mars Coal Gas site." The Sentinel continues, "The agreement, as outlined by City Attorney Joe Flannery, calls for the city to pay $1.5 million in clean-up response costs plus additional interest. Payments are to be made in three increments, the first $500,000 to be paid on or before July 31, 2007." The Sentinel adds, "Two additional $500,000 payments will be made, upon final federal acceptance of the pact, by April 22, 2008 and April 22, 2008. MidAmerican Energy has agreed to pay $3.1 million in response cost stemming from the clean-up. The coal gas site is located at the northwest corner of the intersection of Fourth Avenue and First Street Northeast where currently the Le Mars street department building sits. … The agreement, after publication in the Federal Register, will then be ruled on in Federal Court in Sioux City. Councilman John Rexwinkle, a MidAmerican employee, emphasized during Tuesday's meeting that he had excused himself from any and all discussions that have taken place on the agreement talks."

BP Employee Deleted Files After Subpoena. The Financial Times (2/23, McNulty) reports, "A BP employee has admitted destroying documents after plaintiffs' lawyers subpoenaed her laptop on an anonymous tip that she had information useful in the lawsuits against the UK oil company arising from its fatal refinery explosion." On "November 3 2006, plaintiffs' lawyers subpoenaed Susan Moore, BP regulatory affairs manager, requesting certain documents and the laptop she has used for the past two to three years in her work for BP." When "plaintiffs' lawyers questioned Ms Moore on January 26 2007, a transcript revealed, she said BP had not shown her the subpoena until earlier in the week, and that she had deleted e-mails in the two months after the subpoena." Moore said, " "To the best of my knowledge, I have not deleted information relative to this case." But "Joseph Gourrier, the plaintiffs' attorney questioning Ms Moore, responded, 'It's not up to you to determine what would be relevant to this case.'"

GAO Report Says Funding For Gasoline Storage Tank Cleanup Falls Far Short. The AP (2/23, Heilprin) reports, "It will cost at least $12 billion to clean up contamination from tens of thousands of gasoline storage tanks that are leaking underground, congressional auditors say. That is far more than the $72 million that Congress and the Bush administration have provided each year, according to the report Thursday from the General Accountability Office." The EPA "has already spent more than $10 billion to reduce the contamination over the past 20 years caused by hundreds of thousands of leaking tanks, many of them found at gas stations and convenience stores. Yet some 117,000 faulty tanks still await cleanups, according to the latest figures current as of September 2005." The "lag in cleanups isn't necessarily due to lack of money, according to the GAO." A trust fund to remove the contamination "has about $2.6 billion and is expected to reach $3 billion before the end of 2008." But "annually only a small fraction has been appropriated for cleanups. Most has sat in the Treasury to help counter federal budget deficits."

Sanford Says Conservatives Must Reframe Climate Change Debate. In a Washington Post (2/23, A19, 690K) op-ed, South Carolina Gov. Mark Sanford (R) writes, "The climate change debate is here to stay, and as America warms to the idea of environmental conservation on a grander scale, it's vital that conservatives change the debate before government regulation expands yet again and personal freedom is pushed closer toward extinction." Conservatives "must reframe the environmental discussion by replacing the political left's scare tactics with conservative principles such as responsibility and stewardship." And "conservatives must reclaim lost ground from far-left interest groups by showing how environmental conservation is as much about expanding economic opportunity as it is about saving whales or replanting rain forests." Finally, "conservatives must respond to climate change with innovation, not regulation. This means encouraging private research and implementation of more eco-friendly construction, more energy-efficient workplaces and more sustainable ways of going about life." If "conservatives cannot reframe, reclaim and respond to climate change with our principles intact, government will undoubtedly provide a solution, no matter how taxing it may be."

DOJ_NMG_0135534

Krugman Says California's Experience Shows Conservation Not Burdensome. New York Times (2/23, 1.16M) columnist Paul Krugman writes, "[C]limate change skeptics seem to be making a seamless transition from denial to fatalism. In the past, they rejected the science. Now, with the scientific evidence pretty much irrefutable, they insist that it doesn't matter because any serious attempt to curb greenhouse gas emissions is politically and economically impossible." Krugman adds, "Behind this claim lies the assumption...that any substantial cut in energy use would require a drastic change in the way we live." But "the assumption is false." California "has managed to combine rising living standards with a substantial decline in per capita energy consumption, and managed to keep total carbon dioxide emissions more or less flat for two decades, even as both its economy and its population grew rapidly. And it achieved all this without fundamentally changing" its lifestyle. After the energy crisis of the 1970s, "conservation in most of America soon stalled." In "California, by contrast, the state continued to push policies designed to encourage conservation, especially of electricity. And these policies worked." The state's "experience shows that serious conservation is a lot less disruptive, imposes much less of a burden, than the skeptics would have it."

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Detroit Man Who Sold Lethal Fentanyl-Laced Drugs Gets 30-Year Sentence. The Detroit News (2/23) reports a Detroit man who "admitted selling a fentanyl-laced drug cocktail that killed two people was sentenced Thursday to more than 30 years in prison. U.S. District Judge Lawrence P. Zatkoff, sitting in Port Huron, sentenced James Edgar Coleman to 365 months in federal prison. That sentence was at the top of the sentencing guideline range for Coleman, who has previous convictions for drug trafficking. … U.S. Attorney Stephen Murphy credited the work of the Drug Enforcement Agency and Oakland County. 'This significant sentence is the result of a robust federal response to the rash of overdose deaths caused by fentanyl-laced heroin,' Murphy said."

The Detroit Free Press (2/23, Ashenfelter) reports, "Coleman -- accused of selling the drugs that killed 17-year-old Lauren Jolly and 30-year-old Daniel McElmurry -- pleaded guilty in November to avoid a possible life sentence. … Detroit Drug Enforcement Administration Chief Robert Corso said, 'Today's sentencing reflects a substantial sentence for a substantial violator' and should send a message to Detroit-area drug dealers."

The AP (2/23) reports Coleman's "plea to two counts of delivering a controlled substance resulting in death was the first related to fentanyl-laced heroin and cocaine that killed more than 100 people in metropolitan Detroit in 2005 and 2006…Murphy said." CBS News, FOX News, the Washington Post, Los Angeles Times, Houston Chronicle, Newsday, and the Kansas City Star used the AP story.

FBI Arrests Florida Police Officers In Drug Trafficking Sting. In a widely-distributed story, the AP (2/23, Anderson) reports, "Four police officers in Hollywood, Fla., have been arrested on suspicion of providing protection and running drugs and money for an organized crime group that was really an FBI sting operation, a law enforcement official said Thursday. The source, who is familiar with the case, spoke on condition of anonymity because the matter is sealed until Friday." The AP notes, "An FBI spokesman in Miami did not immediately return calls seeking comment. The four officers were expected to appear Friday in federal court in Fort Lauderdale."

The Miami Herald (2/23, Wright, 286K) reports, "It is unclear whether Kevin Companion, Jeff Courtney, Steve Harrison and Tom Simcox, all veterans of the police force, were being held in federal prison Thursday night, but word of the arrests sent shock waves through the department and City Hall." Hollywood City Manager Cameron Benson "said he was told the FBI had been running the sting for about two years. Mayor Mara Giulianti first heard of the investigation several weeks ago and said there was 'pretty convincing and strong evidence' that the officers had been involved in wrongdoing. The FBI has scheduled a press conference at 11 a.m. today in front of the federal courthouse in downtown Fort Lauderdale, where officials are expected to give more details on the case."

Advocates Use Data Quality Act To Dispute Government Stance On Medical Marijuana. The San Francisco Chronicle (2/22) reported medical marijuana advocates "tried a new approach …in their tug-of-war with the federal government, filing suit under a law that requires the government to correct its own misstatements -- including, the advocates say, the assertion that marijuana has no medical value. … The suit was filed in federal court in San Francisco under the Data Quality Act, a little-known statute signed by President Bush in 2001. It directs federal agencies to allow members of the public to 'seek and obtain correction' of false or misleading government information that affects them."

The Los Angeles Times (2/23) reports advocates say the government's stance "ignores its own studies." A 1999 report by the Institute of Medicine "declared that marijuana showed medicinal promise and advocated the development of cannabis-based drugs."

DOJ_NMG_0135535

Five To Face Federal Charges In California "Pot Houses" Case. The San Francisco Chronicle (2/22) reported five suspects who "allegedly grew marijuana in specially-outfitted homes in Oakland…are facing federal charges for producing plants with a street value of $6 million." The suspects "were arrested Feb. 7 in Oakland and San Francisco by police and members of the Yolo County Narcotic Enforcement Team. Authorities seized 1,500 marijuana plants during raids of homes in Oakland and West Sacramento, where the investigation began several months ago. … Acting on a tip, agents initially began watching a home in West Sacramento, Drug Enforcement Administration Special Agent James Sheeran wrote in a 30-page affidavit "

Walters Promotes US Anti-Drug Strategy In Canada, Some Criticize Approach. The Canadian Press (2/22) reported John Walters "is in Ottawa touting America's anti-drug policy as a model for Canada. Walters says a blend of treatment, prevention and tough law-and-order measures have lowered drug use among American teens. But critics aren't buying it. Lawyers, academics and a Liberal senator warned against a U.S.-style approach in Canada, saying it's hugely expensive and ineffective." They "say the Conservatives should reconsider any drug crackdown that focuses more on prison terms than prevention or treatment." The Edmonton Sun and Ottawa Citizen used the Canadian Press story.

In the Ottawa Citizen (2/22) Ethan Nadelmann, founder and executive director of the Drug Policy Alliance, wrote Walters "is in Ottawa today, trying his best to put a positive spin on one of the greatest disasters in U.S. foreign and domestic policy. Part of his agenda is to persuade Canada to follow in U.S. footsteps, which can only happen if Canadians ignore science, compassion, health and human rights." The United States "ranks first in the world in per-capita incarceration. … The U.S. 'war on drugs' costs at least $40 billion U.S. a year in direct costs, and tens of billions more in indirect costs. It's all useful information for Canadians to keep in mind when being encouraged to further toughen their drug laws to bring them in line with those of the United States."

Jury Awards Former ATF Agents $9.75 Million In Damages In Suit Against Chicago. The AP (2/23, Robinson) reports, "A jury awarded a husband and wife $9.75 million in damages Thursday for a smear and terror campaign aimed at them after they accused a police officer of corruption while working as federal agents." The AP continues, "Diane Klipfel and Michael Casali hugged and kissed their friends and their attorney after the jury delivered its verdict in the civil trial. … 'I'm relieved that the ordeal is finally over and justice is served,' Casali, an agent with the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, told reporters." The AP adds, "City Law Department spokeswoman Jennifer Hoyle said officials were disappointed and were reviewing appeals options. … The verdict ended a five-week trial focusing on Joseph Miedzianowski, sometimes described as Chicago's most corrupt police officer. … Miedzianowski was convicted in April 2001 of masterminding a Chicago-to-Miami cocaine pipeline and supplying guns and ammunition to the very street gangs he was supposed to be investigating. He is serving a life sentence at a federal prison in California." The AP notes, "Klipfel is a retired ATF agent and Casali still is an agent. They say Miedzianowski smeared them with misconduct allegations and terrified them with threats after they leveled corruption charges against him in 1992 while working in the Chicago ATF office. They say they were so frightened, their children slept in a closet in the interior of the house in case shots were fired through the walls. … Jurors leaving the court scoffed at city officials' claim that they conducted an 18-month investigation of Miedzianowski but never interviewed Klipfel and Casali, and were unable to uncover evidence of corruption at the time."

The Chicago Tribune (2/23, Coen) reports, "Juror Megan Cox said the key to the case was the Chicago Police Department's 'incompetent, lazy and overall negligent' internal investigation into the corrupt officer. … The plaintiffs had argued that Miedzianowski was allowed to select witnesses and bring them in for questioning himself and that Klipfel wasn't interviewed. … Juror Joe Karl said that was especially outrageous given that the corruption was reported by a federal agent. … 'How do you run an investigation and not interview the person making the complaint?' Karl said." The Tribune notes, "The largest part of the $9.75 million award came for the jury's decision that the city and Miedzianowski violated Klipfel's civil rights. Klipfel had testified she was forced from ATF after the Police Department retaliated against her and that she moved her children out of state at times, fearing for their safety."

Philadelphia Man Convicted Of Gun Crimes. The Philadelphia Inquirer (2/23, Shiffman) reports, "A Philadelphia man secretly recorded on tape talking about a plot to detonate pipe bombs inside the Gallery at Market East mall was convicted yesterday of 27 unrelated violent crimes that are likely to send him to prison for life." The Inquirer continues, "The verdicts against Andre L. Henry are significant, federal authorities said, because they represent a brazen case of a felon using women with clean records to make straw gun purchases, then using the weapons in a crime spree. … The jury found that shortly after the women helped Henry buy assault rifles, shotguns and handguns in 2003, he robbed two banks and seven fast-food restaurants, fired shots at a Philadelphia police officer and solicited the murder of grand-jury witnesses." The Inquirer adds, "Henry, 29, also faces two decade-old state murder charges. He spent much of his federal trial wearing an electronic stun belt after U.S. marshals said they caught him trying to sneak a seven-inch homemade knife into the courtroom. … Near the end of the two-week trial, Henry testified that the person who confessed to the 27 crimes on a secret recording is actually his twin brother. Assistant U.S. Attorneys Michelle Rotella and Susan Fields presented evidence that Henry does not have a twin brother. … 'His story is just absurd,' Rotella told jurors." The Inquirer notes, "U.S. District Judge Jan E. Dubois scheduled sentencing for May 24. Under the advisory federal guidelines, Henry probably faces life imprisonment. … John Hageman, a spokesman for the Bureau of Alcohol Tobacco and Firearms, said that the Henry case 'truly exhibits the danger and violence brought to Philadelphia by these illegally purchased firearms.' … 'This case also shows that this is a regional problem,' Hageman said. 'All of the guns were purchased in Montgomery County.'"

DOJ_NMG_0135536

IMMIGRATION:

Senate Hearing To Look For Administration Backing Of Comprehensive Immigration Reform. The Washington Times (2/23, Hurt, 88K) reports, "Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick J. Leahy will hold a hearing next week that he hopes will get the Bush administration to confirm publicly that it wants 'comprehensive immigration reform' this year." The Times notes "Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez and Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff will testify at the Wednesday hearing. The White House yesterday said Mr. Bush remains committed to comprehensive reform, which many Republicans fear will contain some sort of amnesty for illegal aliens and usher millions of new foreign workers into the country." Meanwhile, Sen. Edward M. Kennedy "plans to introduce a major bill sometime after next week, his office said yesterday." Kennedy's office says the administration has been kept up to date "on the developments of drafting the bill," but a number of Republicans "complain that they have been left out of negotiations," prompting fears "that the bill is being pushed further to the left than last year's final bill."

On CNN's Lou Dobbs Tonight (2/22, 6:19 pm), host Lou Dobbs said, "Corporate lobbyists and special interest groups are helping" to write Kennedy's bill. "The legislative work is being done in secret. Taxpayers who will ultimately have to pay for that legislation for amnesty will not have a voice. But guess who does? … The Chamber of Commerce and groups like it have been allowed to hijack a large part of the process and even write part of the legislation." CNN (Sylvester) continued, "Even moderate Republicans like Senator Arlen Specter have not been offered a seat at the table. … One Republican Hill staffer complained, 'The Chamber has seen more than the senators when it comes to the actual writing on paper.'" Sylvester added later that "despite the election, in which the people spoke loudly and clearly, we are seeing more of the same when it comes to letting special interests dictate what ultimately is the policy on immigration in this country."

Smuggling Rivalries Boost Violence On US-Mexico Border. The Washington Times (2/23, Seper, 88K) reports, "Rival alien and drug smugglers on the US-Mexico border are targeting each other in a wave of escalating violence to win control of smuggling corridors into the United States, with at least four recent killings tied to efforts to kidnap migrants for ransom." Border violence "has risen dramatically over the past three years in what US Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) has called 'an unprecedented surge.' ICE has established intelligence and investigative operations along the border to combat the increased brutality." The Times continues that much of the violence has been directed at "US Border Patrol agents, who have seen a spike in incidents as the agency continues its efforts to bring larger areas of the border under operational control."

Three Executives, 200 Workers Arrested In ICE Sweep Of National Cleaning Company. The Wall Street Journal (2/23, A5, Block, 2.04M) reports the Department of Homeland Security's "new strategy to 'attack the economic engine' that fuels most illegal migration into the US" has led to the arrest of "three top executives of a national cleaning service for allegedly employing illegal immigrants and defrauding the government. The sweep also netted nearly 200 employees believed to be illegal immigrants." A 23-count indictment unsealed yesterday says Nevada-based Rosenbaum-Cunningham International Inc., or RCI, "knowingly hired illegal immigrants, intentionally failed to withhold taxes and created shell accounts to line the pockets of top executives. RCI co-owners Richard M. Rosenbaum and Edward Scott Cunningham and firm controller Christina Flocken face criminal fraud, immigration and tax charges."

The Washington Times (2/23, Seper, 88K) describes the sweep as "the latest in a series of high-profile efforts by the Bush administration to strengthen its immigration-enforcement credentials as Congress and the White House begin debate on a new round of immigration legislation."

The Washington Post (2/23, A10, Hsu, 690K) reports, "The case marked the latest wrinkle in a renewed campaign by the Bush administration to crack down on employers as Congress debates an overhaul of the nation's immigration laws. ICE arrested 716 individuals on criminal charges last year, up from a few dozen in recent years." The RCI executives "allegedly paid workers in cash and set up shell companies, with such names as Ricurt Inc., Monker and Sunchaser Service Corp., to hide assets from the Internal Revenue Service, the indictment said. Dividing nearly $7 million, defendants allegedly purchased 'racehorses, fancy boats and lavish homes' in Florida and California," said Myers.

DOJ_NMG_0135537

The New York Times (2/23, Sander, 1.16M) reports, "By failing to pay taxes on their employees' income, Social Security and Medicare, the three executives cheated the government of $18,640,345 and used about a third of the excess money to finance the "extravagant lifestyle costs" of lavish houses, luxury boats, racehorses and college tuition, the indictment said."

USA Today (2/23, 2B, Leinwand, 2.27M) reports, "The investigation began two years ago when police in Grand Rapids arrested a man who provided fraudulent documents. That arrest led Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) agents to 23 other illegal laborers working at the Grand Traverse Resort & Spa, which had contracted more than $3 million in RCI cleaning services from June 1997 to March 2006, ICE Assistant Secretary Julie Myers said Thursday."

Owners Of Michigan Cleaning Service Charged After Illegal Immigrant Raid. The AP (2/23, Prichard) reports from Grand Rapids, MI, "An investigation of cleaning crews working at a Michigan resort has led to federal fraud and tax charges being filed against three top officials at a U.S. janitorial service and the arrest of more than 200 illegal immigrants around the country, government officials said." The AP continues, "The detainees - mostly Mexican nationals - who were rounded up early Thursday were working as janitors for Rosenbaum-Cunningham International Inc., or RCI, a Florida-based cleaning contractor." The AP adds, "RCI co-owners Richard M. Rosenbaum, 60, and Edward Scott Cunningham, 43, and firm controller Christina A. Flocken, 59, all of Florida, face criminal fraud, immigration and tax charges in a 23-count indictment unsealed Thursday in U.S. District Court in Grand Rapids. … 'This is not a case of bad bookkeeping or skirting the rules,' said Brian M. Moskowitz, special agent in charge of the Detroit office of U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement. 'It involved flagrant criminal behavior.'" The AP notes, "Moskowitz said during a news conference in Grand Rapids that federal agents arrested Rosenbaum in Longwood earlier in the day. Cunningham and Flocken were expected to soon turn themselves in to federal authorities in Grand Rapids, where the case will be tried, he said. … Their practice of paying cash wages to their workers deprived the U.S. government of about $18.6 million in employment taxes, according to the indictment. … 'In this particular investigation, these defendants took advantage of illegal workers in order to enrich themselves by violating the internal revenue laws that were created specifically to protect the legitimate work force, all at a cost to taxpayers of approximately $18 million, all so that they could live a very lavish lifestyle and live the high life,' said Sandra L. Carter, special agent in charge of the Internal Revenue Service office in Detroit. … About 203 illegal immigrants who worked for RCI were arrested and expected to be deported, Moskowitz said. Agents took them into custody at 63 business locations in 17 states and the District of Columbia."

Judge Dismisses Posada Carriles' Bid For Freedom. The AP (2/23, Caldwell) reports from El Paso, "A federal judge on Wednesday denied a request by an anti-Fidel Castro activist to be released from jail while immigration officials figure out where to deport him to." The AP continues, "U.S. District Judge Philip R. Martinez threw out Luis Posada Carriles' lawsuit after federal prosecutors said immigration officials could not release him because he is in the custody of the U.S. Marshals Service. … Posada, an ex-CIA operative who is suspected of bombing a Cuban jet 31 years ago, left Department of Homeland Security custody after his indictment last month on suspicion of lying in a citizenship application." The AP adds, "Posada, 79, was arrested two years ago on an immigration violation after he reported paying a smuggler to sneak him into Texas from Mexico. … An immigration judge later ordered that Posada be deported but ruled that he could not be sent to Cuba, where he was born, or Venezuela, where he is a naturalized citizen. … Several countries, including Mexico, have declined to allow Posada in. He sued last year, arguing that the U.S. government cannot hold him indefinitely while they look for a country willing to let him move there."

TAX:

Thirteen Indicted For Alleged Minnesota Cigarette Tax Fraud Scheme. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (2/23, Olson, Louwagie, 395K) reports, "Thirteen people face federal charges of defrauding the state of more than $2.5 million in sales tax by concealing revenues from cigarette sales, according to a federal indictment unsealed Thursday. The indictment…cites numerous attempts to conceal earnings and wealth through fraudulent bookkeeping and tax returns, as well as property transfers and large cash transactions." The Star Tribune notes, "The case, the result of a joint investigation by the FBI and the Internal Revenue Service, includes one conspiracy count, 13 mail fraud counts and 26 wire fraud counts. … The defendants also are accused of transferring nearly $1 million to Jordan, Lebanon and the Palestinian territories through checks, currency and wire transfers backed by the tobacco store proceeds. "

Firms Hide Assets, Identities In State Havens. USA Today (2/23, 1B, Mccoy) reports, "Roughly four miles from the famed Las Vegas casino strip, ABC Equity's corporate office is registered in a modest business suite located off West Sahara Avenue. … Great Fortune 600 is registered in the same suite. So are DK Financial, Hill 99, Stock Savant, ZZYZX Holdings — and more than 1,000 other corporations." USA continues, "They share something in common besides their business address. Each lists the same man as its sole corporate officer in Nevada incorporation records. He is William Reed, a businessman with a suspended law license and the target of a Federal Trade Commission lawsuit that alleges he and a convicted felon teamed in a business that promoted forming Nevada corporations to shield assets 'from "capricious federal judges and any government agency."'" USA adds, "A USA TODAY computer-aided review shows that the two men and their business, Asset Protection Group, are part of a thriving mini-industry that has capitalized on real or perceived gaps in domestic incorporation laws and virtually non-existent government oversight to promote some U.S. states as secrecy rivals of offshore havens. … A multi-agency U.S. Money Laundering Threat Assessment issued in 2005 cited Nevada, Wyoming and Delaware as the states with laws most conducive to anonymous corporate ownership. USA TODAY's review… examined databases of all Nevada and Wyoming incorporations but was unable to obtain comprehensive data for Delaware … USA TODAY's findings buttressed the money laundering report's warning that a 'race to the bottom' among states vying to set minimal corporate information requirements has enabled companies to hide the identities of their owners, thereby making it harder for law enforcement agencies to track suspected tax evasion, money laundering and other crimes."

DOJ_NMG_0135538

WSJournal Criticizes AMT Hike In 1993 Clinton Tax Plan. Under the headline "Bill Clinton's AMT Bomb," the Wall Street Journal (2/23, 2.04M) editorializes, "As tax season nears, Democrats in Congress are discovering they have an urgent political bomb to defuse -- the alternative minimum tax. The AMT already hits four million Americans, and without new legislation this year it will explode in the pocketbooks of 23 million taxpayers come April 15, 2008. What's amazing is that many Democrats and reporters are trying to blame this looming tax increase on the 2001-2003 tax cuts. See if you can follow their argument: Taxpayers are obliged to pay the higher of their tax bill under either the regular IRS code or the AMT. And because the tax cuts reduced the regular income tax of the average family by $2,000 a year, more middle-class families are being bounced to the AMT system. Ergo, it's all President Bush's fault." The Journal adds "the politician most responsible for the AMT's relentless expansion in recent years is none other than William Jefferson Clinton. Remember the 1993 tax hike that was supposed to fall only on the rich? In addition to raising gas taxes and Medicare payroll taxes and income tax rates, the Democratic Congress that year also raised the AMT: from a 24% flat rate to a dual tax rate of 26% on AMT income up to $175,000 and 28% on AMT income above that amount."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Army Surgeon General Disputes "Characterization," But Not Facts, Of Walter Reed Reports. The Washington Post runs two stories on the problems at Walter Reed Army Medical Center near the front of the A section this morning. On page A3, the Washington Post (2/23, Vogel, 690K) runs a straightforward account saying that the "Army's surgeon general yesterday criticized stories" in the Post disclosing problems at Walter Reed, saying the "series unfairly characterized the living conditions and care for soldiers recuperating from wounds at the hospital's facilities." Lt. Gen. Kevin Kiley said during a news conference, "I'm not sure it was an accurate representation. It was a one-sided representation." The Post notes that, "until now, the Army had not challenged any aspect of the Post series." After the news conference, Kiley was "asked to elaborate on his comments." He said he "does not dispute the facts in the Post stories. 'It's not the accuracy I question, it's the characterization,' he said."

On the facing page A2, Dana Milbank of the Washington Post (2/23, 690K) criticizes the military's response in a story headlined "Painting Over The Problems At Walter Reed's Building 18." Milbank writes, "It's not every day one gets to witness a whitewash in action, but Walter Reed…provided just such an opportunity yesterday." A Sunday Post story "described the woeful conditions of Room 205 in Walter Reed's Building 18," and "the Army mobilized. Painters were deployed to cover the offending wall with a fresh coat of white semigloss. And television crews were invited in to inspect the result. … Mission accomplished? Lt. Gen. Kevin Kiley thought so."

In an interview with PBS' NewsHour (2/22, 7:38PM), Rep. Robert Filner (D), chairman of the House Veterans' Affairs Committee, called the conditions "a catastrophic or horrific circumstance" for "our young people coming back" from service overseas. Rep. Filner also pointed a lack of continuity between the medical record systems of the armed forces, which he said, "are not translatable into the VA system." Rep. Filner also noted that the inspector general "although supposedly independent, is really part of that system." Therefore, in order to "do something very quickly" about the problem, he recommended setting up "a hotline that is manned by independent people, maybe some veterans who understand these issues and allow people to report on the situation."

DOJ_NMG_0135539

Also appearing on PBS' NewsHour (2/22, 7:39PM), Rep. Christopher Shays (R) said, "The bigger problem is the process of why you would have someone in a hospital for two months to two years. They want to be discharged in some cases, in other cases they can come right back into the military. The problem is the paperwork is just pathetic."

NYTimes Blasts Leaders For Permitting "Shameful Neglect At Walter Reed." The New York Times (2/23, A20, 1.16M) editorializes on the subject, saying that "when the Senate next debates whether to debate the Iraq war, members would do well to visit Walter Reed. … There they can run a stark reality check on how the country is failing the war's wounded despite all those Capitol orations about unstinting support of our fighting troops. As fine as the surgery wards have been through a five-year torrent of battle casualties, Walter Reed has seen the shameful growth of a parallel village of almost 700 traumatized and maimed outpatients. Far too many of these souls wait lost and wasted, abandoned by the post's and the Army's shambling bureaucracy. … The shameful neglect at Walter Reed is more proof of how America's leaders…are failing the nation's warriors in this disastrous war."

Intelligence Legislation Remains Stalled In Senate. The Washington Times (2/23, Waterman, 88K) reports, "The annual legislation that governs the 16 U.S. intelligence agencies and their new boss, the director of national intelligence, is stalled again in the Senate, where efforts to pass it in the past two years also died. 'We're still working it,' said a senior staffer from the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, which voted the bill out 12-3 last month," adding that Chairman Jay Rockefeller "continued to hope the bill could be passed after the Presidents Day recess." In the "previous two years, under the chairmanship of Sen. Pat Roberts," committee efforts "to move the bill have been blocked by holds from Republican senators" over what some see "as the bill's excessive reporting requirements, both on intelligence agencies about their detention and interrogation of terror suspects, and on the administration as a whole."

Pentagon Cancels Plans For Massive Conventional Bomb Test. The AP (2/23, Talhelm) reports "the Pentagon on Thursday scrapped plans for a 700-ton non-nuclear test blast that would have produced the first mushroom cloud of dust over the Nevada desert in decades." The Defense Department "said it would find other ways to test the nation's ability to penetrate underground bunkers that produce and store weapons of mass destruction. … The decision was not based on any technical information that indicated the test would harm workers, the public or the environment, according to James Tegnelia, director of the Pentagon unit that works on technical aspects of how to destroy deeply buried enemy weapons.

The New York Times (2/23, 1.16M) reports, "The test, known as Divine Strake, at the Nevada Test Site would have been conducted near a place used for decades for atomic testing. Opponents said the explosion would create a two-mile-high mushroom cloud and release radioactive dust from long-undisturbed radioactive material." Utah's Congressional delegation and "thousands of Utah residents have written to the Defense Threat Reduction Agency of their opposition to the test."

McCain Critical Of Pentagon Request For Three Experimental Aircraft. The Politico (2/23, Lowe) reports, "Quarreling with Pentagon spending requests, Sen. John McCain has chided Defense Secretary Robert Gates and Air Force Secretary Michael Wynne for seeking three experimental aircraft in the Pentagon's emergency wartime funding bill. The $93 billion funding request for military operations yet this year in Iraq, Afghanistan and other hot spots includes nearly $14 billion for two F-35 Lightning II fighter jets" -- also known as the Joint Strike Fighter – "and a CV-22 Osprey tilt-rotor transport to replace aircraft lost in overseas combat operations. Both aircraft are still in development and years from being fielded. 'In an emergency supplemental, you are proposing to replace combat loss with unproven platforms that not only are not yet operational but will also ultimately cost a lot more than they do now,'" McCain "told Gates and Wynne in a Feb. 13 letter obtained by Politico." McCain added in his letter: "Both the JSF and Osprey are controversial, next-generation programs that require considerable congressional oversight. … Your including the requests to procure both aircraft types in an emergency supplemental effectively insulates these programs from this committee's routine oversight. This is inappropriate.'"

Business, Labor Come To Blows Over Key Unionization Bill. The New York Times (2/23, A18, Greenhouse, 1.16M) reports organized labor "is fighting" for the "pro-union" Employee Free Choice Act "as if its life depended on it. Some labor experts say the union movement's ability to reverse its slide could in fact hinge on its winning passage of the bill, which would make it easier for workers to join unions" by giving employees at a workplace "the right to unionize as soon as a majority sign cards saying they want a union." Currently, "employers can insist on a secret-ballot election to determine whether a majority of employees favors a union." Business groups "are mounting a fierce campaign to stop the bill," while labor unions "are sponsoring demonstrations, conferences and meetings in 99 cities this month to push for the legislation. The two sides have also squared off with newspaper advertisements." While "legislative aides say they expect the bill to be approved next Thursday in the House, where it has 234 sponsors, including seven Republicans," opponents "voice confidence that they can block the bill in the Senate," and last week, Vice President Cheney said resident Bush would veto the bill if it reached his desk.

DOJ_NMG_0135540

Virginia May Lose Federal Funds If Districts Fail To Test English Language Learners. The Washington Post (2/23, Glod, 690K) reports, "The U.S. Education Department threatened yesterday to withhold more than $17 million from Fairfax County schools if the system continues to defy a federal mandate to give reading tests to thousands of immigrant children. Other Virginia school systems would also be in jeopardy if they refuse to comply with the federal No Child Left Behind Act, and the state could lose $2 million in administrative funds." The threat "raises the stakes" in the dispute "over the best way to test immigrant students learning English." The department found that the test Virginia uses "shows how well students learn to read, write and speak English" but doesn't "test students on their understanding of grade-level reading material." U.S. officials told Virginia Supt. Billy K. Cannaday Jr. that "they expect to approve a state request to use a portfolio of a student's work over time instead of a test."

The Washington Times/AP (2/23, Sampson) reports Deputy Education Secretary Raymond Simon said that "Virginia school divisions will lose federal funding if they do not comply with a federal law that requires children struggling to learn English take the same reading tests as their native-speaking peers." Cannaday said that "he expected school divisions to comply with the law 'even though they question whether the tests are appropriate and the accommodations are adequate.'"

Student Loan Proposal Said Likely To Reduce Number Of Banks Offering Them. The Washington Times (2/23, Ramstack, 88K) reports, "President Bush is trying to 'right-size' the student loan industry with a proposed budget that would cut subsidies and drive out many private lenders by reducing their profits, the head of student loan giant Sallie Mae said yesterday." The proposal "would reduce education subsidies for special programs, such as student loans, to $6.6 billion, from $9.7 billion this year. Lender subsidies would fall by 0.5 percentage points. The White House said the $12.4 billion saved over five years by cutting subsidies would be used to increase the number of Pell Grants."

Congress May Address Lack Of Sick Pay In US. ABC World News (2/22, story 6, 2:50, Gibson, 8.78M) took "A Closer Look" at "an enormous problem for American workers: the lack of sick pay. We were surprised to learn that 145 nations, but not the United States, require businesses to provide some paid sick days, and that nearly half of the private sector workers in America, are not paid when they are too sick to work. This month, San Francisco became the first city to mandate sick pay, and now, Congress might act." ABC (Stark) added that "59 million Americans…have no paid sick days at all," and 86 million "do not get a single paid day off to care for a sick child. The federal government requires most employers to offer some unpaid leave for serious medical conditions. But advocates say until it requires them to provide a few paid sick days, as well, millions of Americans will have no choice…but to work when they should stay home." But business groups "say another federal mandate is the last thing employers can afford. And if paid sick leave becomes the law of the land, somebody will pay."

Bodman Lifts Energy Department Bonus Freeze. In its "Federal Diary" column, the Washington Post (2/23, D4, Barr, 690K) writes, "Bonuses are back at the Energy Department. The department got caught in a budget squeeze late last year when Congress failed to complete the annual spending bills funding the government on time." Last week, "President Bush signed a budget bill that included funds for Energy, and Secretary Samuel W. Bodman sent a memo to the workforce saying 'this new law has allowed us to lift the 'hold' on performance-based awards and discretionary pay adjustments.'"

NYTimes Urges Congress To Increase Oversight Of For-Profit Colleges. The New York Times (2/23, 1.16M) writes in an editorial, "The Democratic leadership in Congress plans to make college affordability a central theme of this legislative session. The pending bills that would increase federal aid to low-income students and lower the costs of student loans are good, as far as they go. But Congress must do more to ensure that scarce federal aid dollars are legitimately spent and not gobbled up by for-profit diploma mills that bilk the government and students alike." Congress "needs to take a harder look at for-profit colleges to make sure that students and the government are getting what they pay for."

NYTimes Backs "Passengers' Bill Of Rights." The New York Times (2/23, 1.16M) editorializes, "JetBlue's horrendous performance during the recent ice storms that paralyzed New York City's airports has reinvigorated calls for a 'passengers' bill of rights' to protect air travelers against what can only be deemed abusive treatment. JetBlue has moved rapidly to make amends, but its shocking failures and those of other airlines in recent months make a federal law the best solution." Sens. Barbara Boxer and Olympia Snowe "have introduced a bill that would require that passengers be provided with adequate food and water and sanitary bathrooms while delayed on the ground and be allowed to leave the plane after three hours. Representative Mike Thompson, also a California Democrat, will introduce a bill that would also require airlines to update passengers frequently on the cause and timing of delays. Both proposals would be strengthened if they required the Transportation Department to impose suitable fines or passenger compensation should an airline fail to comply."

DOJ_NMG_0135541

NYTimes Criticizes Cost Of Uncompleted Congressional Visitor Center. The New York Times (2/23, 1.16M) writes in an editorial, "If government had a department of irony, the mammoth, ever more expensive and still uncompleted Capitol Visitor Center would be renamed the People's Debt and Deficit Walk-Through Memorial. The three-story subterranean center being built (for nearly seven years) under the Capitol's East Plaza will have a 600-seat cafeteria, an interactive museum about the glories of democracy and the latest in security to screen out potential malefactors among the throngs who currently gather in snaking outdoor lines for tours. … The American taxpayers, who will pay for the project for generations to come, deserve to be treated to candor. And what better way than by turning the center into a teaching museum on the hyperbolic plans and procrastination of Washington life?"

OTHER NEWS:

Analysis Finds US Economy Leaving Millions In "Severe Poverty." Under the headline "US Economy Leaving Record Numbers In Severe Poverty," McClatchy (2/23, Pugh) reports, "The percentage of poor Americans who are living in severe poverty has reached a 32-year high, millions of working Americans are falling closer to the poverty line and the gulf between the nation's 'haves' and 'have-nots' continues to widen. A McClatchy Newspapers "analysis of 2005 census figures, the latest available, found that nearly 16 million Americans are living in deep or severe poverty. A family of four with two children and an annual income of less than $9,903 - half the federal poverty line - was considered severely poor in 2005. So were individuals who made less than $5,080 a year." The analysis "found that the number of severely poor Americans grew by 26 percent from 2000 to 2005. That's 56 percent faster than the overall poverty population grew in the same period. McClatchy's review also found statistically significant increases in the percentage of the population in severe poverty in 65 of 215 large U.S. counties, and similar increases in 28 states."

Stocks Mixed Yesterday. USA Today (2/23, 5B, Krantz, 2.27M) reports, "Weak earnings from a leading home builder, a $1.5 billion damage verdict against Microsoft and general concern that a market correction is overdue piled up to send stocks lower Thursday." The Dow Jones industrial average "fell 52.39 points to 12,686.02, making it the benchmark's second-straight down day. Still, the Dow remains up 1.8% this year." The Standard & Poor's 500 index lost 1.25 points to 1456.38. The S&P 500 remains up 2.7% for the year," while the Nasdaq composite index rose 6.52 points to 2524.94. The Wall Street Journal (2/23, C1, Anand, 2.04M), among other major newspapers, also reports the Wall Street numbers.

Jury Rules For UCLA In Psychiatric Sex Trial, But Awards No Money. The Los Angeles Times (2/23, Garrison) reports, "A Los Angeles jury today ruled against a former UCLA psychiatric resident who claimed the school unfairly rescinded its offer of a coveted job because he broke off an affair with his supervisor. … But jurors did not believe the supervisor's counter-charge that Dr. David Martorano had slandered her by making up the affair, which Martorano testified included oral sex in parked cars." The Times continues, "In the end, neither party was awarded any money after a two-week trial of their dueling lawsuits that featured the appearance of no fewer than nine psychiatrists, along with women testifying about their sex lives under code names to protect their privacy. … As Los Angeles Superior Court Judge Judith Chirlin said to the jury: 'You could have been here on some boring contract case.'" The Times adds, "Martorano, a handsome Columbia University-educated physician and a former psychiatric resident at UCLA's Neuropsychiatric Institute, alleged that he lost a coveted post as chief resident and that his reputation was ruined once rumors of the affair began to circulate after he broke off the relationship. He sued his former supervisor, Dr. Heather Krell, and UCLA. … Krell's lawyer accused Martorano of making the whole thing up to seduce yet another psychiatrist. Krell countersued Martorano for slander and invasion of privacy. … UCLA's lawyer, meanwhile, said it didn't matter from a legal perspective whether Martorano and Krell had an affair -- university administrators acted properly when they revoked the offer for Martorano to become chief resident after rumors began to fly because it was unacceptable for there to be even the perception that he was getting a job based on a sexual affair at the institute, one of the top facilities of its kind in the country."

High School Students Earn Lower Math And Reading Scores Yet Better Grades. ABC World

DOJ_NMG_0135542

News (2/22, story 7, :30, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "The government issued a disappointing report card today for the nation's high school seniors. In standardized national reading tests, 73% read at a basic level. That's down from 80% in 1992. And just 35% scored at a proficient level defined as competent with challenging subject matter. That's down from 40%. Then, there was a puzzling second report, as well. While the reading scores fell, graduating seniors are taking harder courses and getting higher grades. Education officials say they're not sure why."

NBC Nightly News (2/22, story 5, :40, Williams, 9.87M) reported, "Now to one of the issues that will be talked about in the next election. There is a new national report card out on how this nation's high school seniors are doing in reading and math. These grades are not good."

The New York Times (2/23, Schemo, 1.16M) reports the National Assessment of Educational Progress results in reading "were significantly worse than those of students in 1992" and also "showed that the overwhelming majority of high school seniors have not fully mastered high-school-level math." The Bush administration "seized upon the results as proof that high schools were not measuring up." Secretary of Education Margaret Spellings said, "Schools must prepare students to succeed in college and the 21st-century work force."

USA Today (2/23, Toppo, 2.27M) reports the results were "contradictory" because while, "a record 68% of the class of 2005 completed at least a standard curriculum with four years of English and three each of math, science and social studies" and "51% of students were doing college-preparatory work" yet, "the average high school senior doesn't read as well as those in 1992."

The Washington Post (2/23, Paley, 690K) reports the findings were called "evidence of grade inflation and the dumbing-down of courses" and "also prompted renewed calls for tough national standards and the expansion of the federal No Child Left Behind law." Spellings said, "If, in fact, our high school students are taking more challenging courses and earning higher grades, we should be seeing greater gains in test scores."

The Wall Street Journal (2/23, Tomsho, 2.04M) reports, "American educators have complained about grade inflation for years. But new findings suggest that U.S. high schools may also suffer from another type of inflation -- in the labeling of courses." Yesterday's NAEP results "aren't the only signs that college-prep courses may not be delivering all that they promise. The College Board…is in the midst of a nationwide audit of its high-school Advanced Placement Program courses, amid concerns that some districts aren't offering college-level content."

The AP (2/23, Zuckerbrod) reports that "It is unclear whether student performance has improved or whether grade inflation or something else might be responsible." Meanwhile, "the gap in reading scores between whites and minorities was relatively unchanged since 2002."

The Washington Times (2/23, Fagan, 88K) reports, "Lawmakers and education researchers agreed that improvement is needed but disagreed on the best way of getting there -- with some arguing the federal government should get more involved in high schools and some saying that is exactly the wrong approach."

Bloomberg (2/23, Basken) reports, "Business and education leaders said the latest results reinforce fears that the U.S. school system isn't preparing its students to be competitive in the global workplace." The results also "may reinforce fears that the quality of high-level courses suffers as more students are allowed into them."

On Campaign Trail, Giuliani Seen As Avoiding Unfriendly Audiences. The New York Times (2/23, Pérez-Peña, 1.16M) reports, "In a swing through South Carolina this week," ex-New York City Mayor Rudy Giuliani (R) "chose to campaign at a fire house, which is a little like Derek Jeter meeting with Yankees fans -- a most unlikely forum for hostility, or even much skepticism. Instead of the sometimes barbed give-and-take endured by the other candidates," Giuliani "fielded a few questions from the firefighters and police officers," which "stuck almost entirely to issues on which Mr. Giuliani is most comfortable, like airport security and border control. More than the other major presidential candidates, Mr. Giuliani has limited himself to events with narrowly defined, friendly audiences, avoiding the kind of uncomfortable interrogations his rivals have occasionally faced." Giuliani has "done little of the politicking that exposes candidates to random sets of people -- at shopping malls or train stations -- who might be of any political stripe, and can raise any issue." He's "yet to be questioned by voters about his support for abortion rights, same-sex civil unions and gun control, or about his marital history." However, Giuliani spokeswoman Maria Comella said the former mayor "was not avoiding difficult questions. … 'The mayor will be at a wide variety of events that will put him in front of voters where he will answer their questions,' Ms. Comella said."

Giuliani To Meet With K Street Lobbyists Friday. In a brief article in The Politico (2/23), Jonathan Martin reports that "Giuliani comes to Washington tomorrow to do a little lobbyist outreach. Lobbyists Dirk Van Dongen, Susan Molinari, Mike Zarelli and Willie Gaynor have helped put together the meet-and-greet, which is designed to familiarize Rudy with top K St. Republicans and vice-versa. There is no charge for the afternoon get-together, to take place at a downtown Washington hotel. … Because of the recess, members are not expected to attend. But Rudy is also making progress on that front and will soon roll out the backing of" PA Rep. Charlie Dent (R). Martin added, "I'm also told that Team Rudy is making progress with other members of both chambers of Congress and will soon be announcing additional endorsements from the sort of states (Pennsylvania being one) that his supporters think he could put in play in the general election."

DOJ_NMG_0135543

Huckabee Set To Announce Endorsements Of Two House Republicans. The Politico (2/23, Allen) reports that ex-Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee (R) "plans to make a splash on Capitol Hill on Friday with the surprising announcement that Rep. Don Young of Alaska has signed on as congressional chairman of his Republican presidential exploratory committee. In a letter to House Republicans, Young says Huckabee will help produce 'a reawakening of the conservative values that make our country a land of opportunity.' … Young, the third ranking Republican in Congress…has deep personal connections with almost every member because he was chairman of the Transportation and Infrastructure Committee, which put him in charge of massive amounts of pork." The Politico notes, "Also Friday, Huckabee plans to announce that Rep. John Boozman of Arkansas will be congressional co-chairman of his presidential exploratory committee. Boozman is a member of the Republican Study Committee, the conservative caucus, and so has ties to a group of members whose support could really help Huckabee."

The Washington Post (2/23, A8, Cillizza, 690K) reports, "Asked about winning congressional endorsements, Huckabee said 'it shows [that] people who are policy makers are willing to sign on,' but he added: 'Frankly, I don't think it's going to tip the election one way or another.'"

Obama Tries To "Clear The Air" As Dustup With Clinton Keeps Drawing Attention. Coverage of the clash between Democratic presidential rivals Sens. Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama continues, with a lengthy report on NBC and a front-page story in the New York Times. NBC Nightly News (2/22, story 4, 2:45, Williams, 9.87M) said an effort to "tamp down what has been an unusually early and bitter fight between two of the top contenders" for the Democratic nod is underway. NBC (Gregory) added that Obama was "on the campaign trail today trying to clear the air with Hillary Clinton." Obama: "It should be about the issues and not about personalities or what supporters say." Gregory: "The response, an attempt to overcome a rift started by Hollywood mogul David Geffen, longtime Clinton friend and fundraiser turned foe. His attacks this week caused her campaign to lash out" at Obama. While "the Democratic infighting has made headlines and comes as Clinton's opponents are attacking her for refusal to apologize for supporting the war in Iraq…it was the Clinton campaign's response to Geffen that revealed the tough tactics that Clinton will use against her opponents."

The New York Times (2/23, Nagourney, 1.16M) writes that "after weeks of watching in frustration" as Obama "presented himself as a fresh face gliding above partisan politics," Clinton" has drawn Mr. Obama onto a muddy political field, engaging him in a back-and-forth that recalls the kind of Washington bickering Mr. Obama has decried. Mrs. Clinton's effort to identify Mr. Obama with an attack made by one of his chief Hollywood supporters was widely viewed among Democrats as carrying some cost to Mrs. Clinton. The remarks at the heart of the dispute, by David Geffen, the Hollywood executive who was once a big fund-raiser for the Clintons, were a sharp reminder of Clinton family history that has led some Democrats to believe Mrs. Clinton cannot win a general election. But when it came to tallying the final score on the most intense engagement so far in the 2008 presidential race, even Mr. Obama, the junior senator from Illinois, seemed to acknowledge that he may have been outmaneuvered." In another story, the New York Times (2/23, A16, Steinhauer, Halbfinger, 1.16M) examines the "public unwinding of the relationship between the Clintons and David Geffen," saying that Geffen "has been telling friends for two years that he thinks that Mrs. Clinton is a divisive figure who would fail to bring the nation together."

Clinton Said To "Fall Prey To Missteps." An AP (2/22, Fouhy) analysis piece says the "Hollywood-style brawl" is just "the latest in a series of speed bumps tripping up Hillary Rodham Clinton's early presidential moves. From the Clinton team's decision to criticize -- and therefore publicize -- producer David Geffen's complaints about both Clintons to increasingly skeptical questions about Sen. Clinton's nuanced explanation of her 2002 vote authorizing the Iraq war, it became apparent even a battle-tested front-runner can fall prey to missteps."

LATimes Says Geffen "Has A Point" About "Dynastic Aspect" Of Clinton Bid. The Los Angeles Times (2/23, 850K) headlines an editorial "Geffen Has A Point About The Clintons," saying Geffen "was on to something with his passing mention of the fact that Obama is not from 'the Bush royal family' or the 'Clinton royal family.' Regardless of what you think of Bill Clinton's presidency, or his wife's talent, the dynastic aspect of Hillary Clinton's candidacy is an issue that will increasingly come to occupy center stage in this campaign. Is the country prepared to be governed, potentially, for 28 years by two families who alternate turns in the White House? The Clinton campaign appears unwilling to acknowledge this concern."

Dionne Says Tiff Bad For Both Clinton And Obama. In his Washington Post (2/23, A19, 690K) column, E.J. Dionne said the outbreak of the feud "was a good day for Joe Biden, Chris Dodd, John Edwards, Bill Richardson, Tom Vilsack -- and, what the heck, Dennis Kucinich. It was a bad day for Barack Obama, Hillary Clinton and David Geffen. It was a good day for the Republican Party, particularly George W. Bush, John McCain and Dick Cheney. It was a bad day for the Democratic Party, opponents of the Iraq war and advocates of national health insurance." Dionne warns Clinton and Obama to heed the example of the 1988 Democratic nomination contest, when two strong early candidates, Gary Hart and Biden, "were knocked out of the race, because of their own mistakes for sure, but also because of whispering campaigns and subterranean attacks by their opponents."

DOJ_NMG_0135544

Robinson Says Clinton Confirming Rivals' Caricature. In his Washington Post (2/23, A19, 690K) column, Eugene Robinson writes under the headline "Depends What The Meaning Of 'Mistake' Is," that Clinton's rivals "would love to paint her as inflexible, programmed, focus-grouped within an inch of her life and intent on bringing nothing less than a full-fledged Clinton Restoration to the White House. So why is she sitting for the portrait?" On Iraq, "Clinton may believe that being the front-runner for the nomination means never having to say you're sorry. She may believe that positioning herself at the hawkish end of the Democratic spectrum helps her project an image of toughness, dispelling any reservations voters may have about a woman as commander in chief. … It sounds like something a candidate has decided to say rather than something a candidate believes." As for the Geffen controversy, Robinson says "the impression that was left at the end of the week was of a touchy, grouchy Clinton Inc. and a candidate constrained by her campaign strategy."

Bill Clinton Has Collected Nearly $40 Million In Speaking Fees Since 2001. In a 2,100-word front-page story, the Washington Post (2/23, Solomon, Mosk, 690K) reports that ex-President Clinton, "who came to the White House with modest means and left deeply in debt, has collected nearly $40 million in speaking fees over the past six years, according to interviews and financial disclosure statements" filed by Sen. Hillary Clinton. In 2006, "one of his most lucrative" years since leaving office, the former president "earned $9 million to $10 million on the lecture circuit. He averaged almost a speech a day -- 352 for the year -- but only about 20 percent were for personal income. The others were given for no fee or for donations to the William J. Clinton Foundation."

Responding To Obama Request, FEC Proposes New Fundraising Option. The AP (2/23, Kuhnhenn) reports, "Presidential candidates may solicit contributions for a general election campaign even if they later decide to take public money for the race, federal regulators said Thursday in a proposed opinion. The draft document, which would have to be approved by the" FEC, "was in response to a request for FEC advice from Democratic presidential candidate Barack Obama, the Illinois senator." The AP notes, "If a majority of the six election commissioners support the opinion, candidates would have yet another incentive to seek double contributions this early in the presidential election cycle. Any candidate who then chooses to accept public money would have to refund money raised exclusively for the general election. The commission will meet March 1."

The Chicago Tribune (2/23, McCormick, 617K) reports that Obama, New York Sen. Hillary Clinton and ex-North Carolina Sen. John Edwards (D) "have indicated they would likely reject the public financing system that has governed presidential elections for more than three decades. … In its draft ruling, the commission said Obama may solicit and receive contributions for the general election if he meets certain conditions, including a requirement to keep the money in a separate escrow account and that the funds not be used for any other purpose other than general election activities. Under the draft proposal, if Obama were to win the Democratic nomination and then decide to accept public funding for the general election, he would need to refund all general election contributions within 60 days of certifying his eligibility for public funds."

The New York Times (2/23, Kirkpatrick, 1.16M) reports that "Obama, campaigning on pledges to clean up politics, argued in his filing with the commission that the public financing system had insulated candidates from a corrupting dependence on big donors. He asserted that the system could be preserved for the general election through bipartisan agreement if party nominees returned early contributions. The plausibility of such an agreement is not clear. One nominee is likely to have a financial edge on the other at the outset of the campaign, and accepting public financing would mean relinquishing that edge."

WPost Sees "Glimmer Of Hope" In FEC Draft Ruling. In an editorial, the Washington Post (2/23, A18, 690K) applauds the commission's draft ruling, saying, "The FEC's positive reaction yesterday offers a glimmer of hope that 2008 will not become the first presidential election since the Watergate scandal to be fully financed by private funds. … The solution of allowing a candidate to begin to raise general election funds now but opt to live within the system later isn't perfect, but it's far better than the alternative. Mr. Obama's competitors in both parties should join him in trying to salvage this broken system. As the FEC prepares to finalize its ruling, the candidates should support its interpretation -- and pledge, if they win the nomination, to help control the campaign arms race."

In State Senate, Obama Showed Pragmatism, Ability To Work With GOP. The Wall Street Journal

DOJ_NMG_0135545

(2/23, A4, Calmes, 2.04M) takes a look at Sen. Barack Obama's tenure as an Illinois state senator, when he "was a leader in helping to tighten state ethics laws -- up to a point. When a 2003 package seemed doomed in the Senate's final hours -- with his Democratic leader among the foes -- he left the chamber to tell advocates there was nothing more he could do." Illinois Campaign for Political Reform Director Cynthia Canary, "an admirer" of Obama, said, "He wasn't going to stand on the desk and pound his shoe. Barack is a political realist. You may know that in his heart he feels strongly, but he'll only go so far." She adds that "a compromise was salvaged" and Obama "helped to toughen it in subsequent legislative sessions. The accomplishment was emblematic of the picture that emerges of the eight years Mr. Obama spent here: of a lawmaker of lofty, liberal rhetoric who nonetheless pragmatically accepted bipartisan compromises that won over foes -- and sometimes left supporters dissatisfied." Republicans in the state "recall Mr. Obama as a committed liberal of no singular achievements, yet one they could work with to pass ethics, welfare and death-penalty revisions." GOP state Sen. Kirk Dillard said, "He's unique in his ability to deal with extremely complex issues, to reach across the aisle and to deal with diverse people. If he surrounds himself with good people, I wouldn't lose any sleep with him as my president."

Wilder Says Obama Smart To Not Rely Just On Black Leaders. The Washington Times (2/23, McLaughlin, 88K) reports L. Douglas Wilder, mayor of Richmond and former governor of Virginia, said Obama's "strategy of relying less on the black leaders of the civil rights era and more on a message of unity gives him the best chance of becoming the first Democrat in 44 years to win the state's electoral votes in a presidential election." Wilder said, "The civil rights movement was over 50-something years ago. … The worst mistake one can make, in my judgment, is to try to tailor a message to a group and to say: 'I am the person for your group.' He should be the person for the American people." Wilder, the nation's first elected black governor, briefly ran for president in 1992.

Daschle Explains Endorsement Of Obama. Former Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle was asked on CNN's The Situation Room (2/22, Blitzer) why he endorsed Obama, whom he never served with, for president over four Democrats he did serve with in the Senate. Daschle said, "I think they are outstanding United States senators, and I think they would make great presidents. … I didn't reject them. I simply said that I would like to help Barack, because I think he has got a unique ability to communicate with the American people, especially with younger people. I remember, back in the '60s, when I was just beginning to be interested in politics and government, how inspired I was by certain leaders at the time, the Kennedys and Martin Luther King. I think Barack has some of that same magical ability to communicate, to connect, to unify, to inspire."

Despite Broad Résumé, Richardson Bid Could Hinge On Record As Governor. In an article profiling New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson (D), the New York Times (2/23, Blumenthal, Frosch, 1.16M) reports, "With portfolios as a congressman, global troubleshooter and energy czar, Mr. Richardson, 59, may rightly claim the broadest résumé of the declared presidential candidates." However, "as he makes his case for the Democratic nomination, he is likely to be judged in large measure by his four years as governor, a record that has won him friends and foes." In his time as governor, "unemployment is down, to 3.8 percent from 5.8 percent, according to the federal Labor Department. New Mexico is 10th in economic growth, according to a report by the Federal Funds Information Service for States." He's also "positioned New Mexico for the private space age by carving a spaceport out of the desert alongside the White Sands Missile Range." However, "national studies show New Mexico continuing to lag in categories where the state has historically underachieved. … The Annie E. Casey Foundation ranked the state 48th in its 2003-4 Kids Count index of problem indicators. The foundation said more than a quarter of New Mexico children lived in poverty, among the highest rates in the nation. A Census Bureau study shows that from 2003 to 2005, an average of 21 percent of New Mexicans went without health insurance. Just Texas had a greater average rate in that period."

Democratic Hopefuls To Help Raise Funds To Finance South Carolina Primary. The Washington Post (2/23, A8, Cillizza, 690K) reports, "South Carolina may be a new addition to the early days of Democrats' presidential nomination fight, but the state is already showing veteran savvy when it comes to collecting cash for its Jan. 29, 2008, primary. Witness a fundraiser set for March 7 in Washington. The featured guests? The bulk of the 2008 Democratic field, including Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.), Joe Biden (Del.) and Chris Dodd (Conn.), as well as former senator John Edwards (N.C.) and former Iowa governor Tom Vilsack. … The event, which will be emceed by Clinton White House press secretary Mike McCurry, is being billed as a 'kickoff reception' for the state's presidential primary." South Carolina Democratic Party Chairman Joe Erwin "explained that his state is one of a handful where the party must raise all of the money to finance the primary. In 2004, Erwin estimated, the cost of South Carolina's Democratic primary was $285,000. He believes the price tag this time will be closer to $500,000."

GOP Rolls Out "Put-Downs" Of Democratic Presidential Hopefuls. In The Politico (2/23), Mike

DOJ_NMG_0135546

Allen examines "The New GOP Attack Machine," a "69-page playbook, posted on the national party's Web site" Wednesday that offers "put-downs – some clever, some blunt" -- of the Democratic presidential candidates. Sen. Joseph Biden is called "An Undisciplined, Self-Described Northeast Liberal, In Love With The Sound Of His Own Voice"; Sen. Hillary Clinton "A Calculating, Divisive, Lifelong Liberal With Political Baggage"; Sen. Christopher Dodd "A New England Liberal, Past His Prime, On An Unrealistic Vanity Run For The White House"; John Edwards "A Hypocritical, Inexperienced Liberal With A New Negative Attitude"; Sen. Barack Obama "An Inexperienced, Insulated, Arrogant, Unabashed Liberal"; Gov. Bill Richardson "A Self-Promoting, Washington Insider With A Controversial Record"; and Tom Vilsack "A Tax-Hiking, Mismanaging, 'Blip' Candidate With No Foreign Policy Experience."

Study Of Private Management Of Philadelphia Schools Criticized. Paul E. Peterson, director of the Program on Education Policy and Governance at Harvard University, writes in the Wall Street Journal (2/23, 2.04M) about a Rand Corporation study to be released today on the Philadelphia schools and particularly evaluating the performance of 45 schools that have been privately managed. Peterson faults the report for failing to identify schools it compares the privately managed schools with and for ignoring "the fact that the 45 schools assigned to the private managers were among the city's most challenging." He concludes, "if education policy research is going to make a solid contribution to school reform, it needs to be both objective and keep pace with rising standards in educational research."

WSJournal Praises Jobs For Criticizing Teachers Unions. The Wall Street Journal (2/23, 2.04M) writes in an editorial, "If Apple CEO Steve Jobs had praised teachers unions as the backbone of public education in the U.S., it would have made the front pages. Instead, at an education conference in Austin, Texas, Mr. Jobs offered some constructive criticism of teachers unions and barely anyone noticed." Jobs said that "the real crisis in public education…has nothing to do with the amount of technology in the classroom. It's the fact that union work rules prevent principals from firing the bad teachers and rewarding the good ones." Jobs "is right to point the finger at the union stewards of public education. And fellow business leaders, who have as big a stake in this matter, would do well to lend him public support."

Rice Warns Tehran As UN Report Points To Advances In Nuclear Program. ABC World News (2/22, story 3, 2:20, Gibson, 8.78M) reported on "Iran's march toward nuclear power and possibly nuclear weapons." The U.N. "had given Iran an ultimatum to stop its uranium enrichment program effective today. Iran not only ignored the ultimatum, it has stepped up production. That has brought a scathing response from the U.N. and raised the possibility of tougher sanctions against Iran." ABC (Raddatz) said the U.N.'s report on Iran's nuclear program "is damning in every way." But today, US officials said "major powers will meet on Monday to draft new sanctions resolutions. And while the US is already sending two carrier groups toward the region, President Bush insists the US has no plans to attack the country."

The CBS Evening News (2/22, story 3, 1:45, Couric, 7.66M) said the report "is making a tense situation even worse." The Washington Times/AP (2/23, Jahn) says that although the report's conclusions were "widely expected," they were "important because they could serve as the trigger for the [U.N. Security] Council to start deliberating on new sanctions."

USA Today (2/23, 6A, Slavin, 2.27M) reports Mohammad Saeedi, deputy head of Iran's Atomic Energy Organization, Thursday rejected the report, saying the U.N. demand for Iran to suspend its nuclear program "has no legal basis and…naturally, it could not be accepted by Iran."

NBC Nightly News (2/22, story 2, 1:40, Williams, 9.87M) said the U.N. report put the US "and indeed much of the world" in "a rough spot" as to it will how respond. NBC (Mitchell) noted that as diplomats prepare to meet Monday, "Secretary Rice says there are signs that some of Iran's leaders are not happy with President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's nuclear policy and that is because the economic sanctions are having a real impact on Iran's oil and gas industry. But Russia, Iran's ally will likely oppose any new economic pressure. So the US may find that it has to go it alone."

On its front page, the Washington Post (2/23, A1, Lynch, Linzer, 690K) reports Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice Thursday warned Iran "that it will face further punishment and isolation if it forges ahead with efforts to develop a uranium-enrichment program," but she said the US and other powers "are prepared to restart talks aimed at ending the standoff if Iran suspends its most controversial nuclear activities." Also Thursday, the State Department said Undersecretary Nicholas Burns will attend Monday's meeting in London. After meeting with her European counterparts in Berlin, Rice said, "We have the common goal to encourage Iran back to the bargaining table. The hope is that the sanctions show the Iranians the isolation that they are enduring, that isolation is likely to increase over time and that it is time to take a different course." However, the Post notes that Russia, China and several European countries "have become increasingly uncomfortable with the Bush administration's positions on Iran as tensions between Tehran and Washington have risen in recent months." Those concerns "have prompted renewed calls for direct dialogue with Iran."

DOJ_NMG_0135547

The AP (2/23, Gearan) reports Secretary Rice "said she and her counterparts made no decisions Thursday because they met before" the report was released. In Washington, State Department spokesman Tom Casey "said that Iran's refusal to curtail its nuclear program is a 'missed opportunity' for Iran's government and people," but he "is confident that the Security Council will approve additional sanctions against Iran." Separately, the AP (2/23, Gearan) reports Undersecretary of State Burns said Thursday he hoped the US and other Security Council members "can quickly draft a resolution," but "said it was too soon to say what provisions the resolution might contain."

The New York Times (2/23, A1, Sanger, Broad, 1.16M) reports on its front page that "in open defiance" of the U.N., Iran is "steadily expanding its efforts to enrich uranium," which has prompted the Bush administration to press "for more severe sanctions against the country, at a moment of greatly increased tensions between Washington and Tehran." Coming "on the heels of the Bush administration's accusations that Iran's Quds Force is sending deadly bombs and other weapons into Iraq, the report heightens what has become a growing confrontation." The report also comes "at a time of debate within the Administration over whether and how to find a way to negotiate with Iran without violating Mr. Bush's stricture that the country must first suspend its enrichment work." Officials say they are "trying to exploit fissures in Iranian society, as some Iranian groups are beginning to question whether the hard-line position taken by President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and some of the country's ruling ayatollahs is worth the cost in sanctions and isolation."

The Financial Times (2/23, Dombey, Bozorgmehr) notes the U.N. said Iran intends to "gradually" bring the 3,000 centrifuges it has installed "into operation by May 2007." The speed with which Tehran intends to pursue its program "adds to the tensions surrounding the dispute." However, privately IAEA officials "are skeptical of whether Iran can meet its timetable." But the Los Angeles Times (2/23, Drogin, 850K) warns, "If true…a facility that large conceivably could produce enough enriched uranium in a year to provide enough highly enriched uranium for a nuclear bomb."

Bush To Discuss Report With Rice Friday. Fox Special Report (2/22, lead story, 3:15, Rosen) reported President Bush "declined to answer a reporter's shouted questions about the report" during a visit to North Carolina Thursday, "but he was due to discuss [the report] over breakfast Friday with Secretary of State Rice."

Tensions Spark Renewed Concern Of US Military Action. McClatchy (2/23, Hutcheson, Strobel) says the increasing tensions with Iran "have fueled speculation that Bush may be paving the way for military action." Though with US forces "tied down in Iraq and Afghanistan, no one expects a ground invasion, but analysts at both ends of the political spectrum put little stock in Bush's insistence that he's focused only on diplomacy."

Wary Of Iran, Arab States Add To Their Arsenals. The New York Times (2/23, A10, Fattah, 1.16M) reports, "As fears grow over the escalating confrontation between Iran and the West, Arab states across the Persian Gulf have begun a rare show of muscle flexing, publicly advertising a shopping spree for new weapons and openly discussing their security concerns." The "typically secretive" gulf nations "have long planned upgrades to their armed forces, but now are speaking openly about them." American military officials say the countries, which are "normally prone to squabbling, have also increased their military cooperation and opened lines of communication to the American military" in the region. As tensions with Iran rise, many gulf countries "have come to see themselves as the likely first targets of an Iranian attack," while growing "more concerned that the United States may be overstretched militarily."

Iran Sending New Ambassador To UN. The Washington Post's (2/23, A17, 690K) Al Kamen reports in his "In the Loop" column that "in the midst of building tensions' between the US and Iran, Tehran "is withdrawing its long-serving ambassador to the United Nations, Javad Zarif." Iranian sources say Zarif will be replaced by Mohammad Khazai, the deputy minister of economics.

US Commander Reiterates Claim Iranian Forces Are In Iraq. In its "Inside The Ring" column, the Washington Times (2/23, Gertz, 88K) reports, "Army Lt. Gen. Ray Odierno, commander of multinational forces in Iraq, yesterday added his voice to the chorus of officials who identified the Iranian Quds force as working against US and allied forces by helping insurgents in Iraq." However, Odierno "stopped short of saying the Iranian agents are playing a vital role in backing Shi'ite insurgents but that they are assisting with weapons, training and 'some money' and "warned the Iranians that 'we will take action' against the Quds force."

McClatchy (2/23, Landay) says the Quds force is "at the center of the rising tensions between Washington and Tehran," and "many experts now warn that if the US-Iranian frictions over Iraq and Iran's nuclear program escalate into conflict, Tehran would use the Quds Force to launch terrorist attacks against US and allied targets around the world."

Hagel Says Diplomacy Is Best Option For Iran. The AP (2/23, Funk) reports Sen. Chuck Hagel said Thursday that Iran "should be held accountable for supporting terrorists through 'wise statecraft' instead of military force, and America should be careful not to follow the 'same destructive path' it did in Iraq." During an address at the University of Nebraska, Hagel warned that "in a hazy, hair-triggered environment, careless rhetoric and military movements that one side may believe are required to demonstrate resolve and strength...can be misinterpreted as preparations for military options."

DOJ_NMG_0135548

More Commentary. In an editorial, the Wall Street Journal (2/23, A10, 2.04M) writes, "Ultimately, whatever hope there might be of resolving the Iranian issue through diplomacy is going to require compromises by the Iranians themselves. Here's what Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad had to say about that: 'If we shut down other activities for 10 years and the country only focuses on nuclear energy it will be worth it because if we obtain this energy our people will advance as much as 50 years.' Maybe it's time the rest of us start taking Mr. Ahmadinejad at his word, and tailoring our expectations accordingly."

Meanwhile, Abbas Milani, director of Iranian studies at Stanford and a research fellow at the Hoover Institution, writes in the New York Times (2/23, 1.16M) that as Iran "has once again defied" the U.N., "simultaneously, Iranian officials have been sending a very different message -- one that has gone largely unremarked but merits close attention." For example, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei's chief foreign policy adviser, Ali Akbar Velayati, "declared last week that…the mullahs might be ready to agree to some kind of a suspension." Another "powerful insider," Ali Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani, "said much the same thing in a different setting." Therefore, Milani argues that "with prudence, backed by power but guided by the wisdom to recognize the new signals coming from Tehran, the United States can today achieve a principled solution to the nuclear crisis."

The Washington Post's (2/23, A19) David Ignatius writes that while "Western officials see various signs of an altered political balance in Tehran," a number of US and European officials say that does not "mean it's time to go back to the bargaining table." Ignatius says "the only way the Iranians can escape sanctions is to suspend enrichment and sit down at the table. If they do so, an array of goodies awaits. Meanwhile, the strategy of confrontation continues, and US and European officials -- who haven't had much to cheer about recently -- seem confident that it's working."

Hill Says "Long Way To Go" In North Korea Deal. AFP (2/23, Collinson) reports Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill Thursday said the US has a "long way to go" to implement the nuclear pact with North Korea and "warned tough talks loom on Pyongyang's suspected secret uranium enrichment program." In an address to the Brookings Institution, Hill also "defended the deal," saying, "I think there is a real sense among all the parties that we have a process going. We are very mindful of the fact that we have a long way to go." He "lavished praise' on China for its role in brokering the deal, and "confirmed that if things go smoothly," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will travel to Beijing in April "as required by the deal" for talks with her counterparts from North Korea, China, Russia, Japan, and South Korea. Admitting that the North Koreans "never acknowledged US accusations they had a program to manufacture highly enriched uranium (HEU) for nuclear bombs," Hill said, "They have been willing to discuss what we know and to try to resolve this...to mutual satisfaction."

The Financial Times (2/23, Dinmore) adds, Hill also warned Pyongyang "must stick to the tight deadlines of the new deal to freeze its Yongbyon nuclear facility in exchange for a modest amount of fuel oil."

The Washington Times (2/23, Sands, 88K) notes the US "will insist on strict deadlines to keep" the deal "from unraveling."

The AP (2/23, Schweid) reports Hill said the accord "could pay wide-ranging dividends for all sides, especially in the area of already improving US relations with China and America's allies." Other side benefits "might include a peace treaty formally ending the war on the Korean peninsula after more than a half-century, a cut in the force of 25,000 US troops in South Korea, a better life for impoverished North Koreans and the State Department's declassifying of the North as a sponsor of terror," Hill said.

North Korean Official To Meet With Hill In New York In March. In its "Washington Wire" section, the Wall Street Journal (2/23, Harwood, 2.04M) reports US diplomats are seeking meetings with North Korean officials "within two weeks, probably in New York, for unprecedented talks on normalizing relations and perhaps taking communist state off the list of terror sponsors." Meanwhile, AFP (2/23) reports North Korea's chief nuclear negotiator, Kim Kye-Gwan, "will visit New York early next month" to meet with Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill, a source told Yonhap news agency. "No date has been set for his visit, but it is likely to last from March 5 through 7," the source said.

Cheney Expresses Concern About Pyongyang's Commitment. The AP (2/23, Sullivan) reports Vice President Cheney, speaking in Sydney Friday, "expressed wariness about North Korea's commitment" to the deal, but "praised China for playing an 'especially important' role" in the six-party talks.

VOA To End Service In Several Languages. The Washington Post (2/23, A13, Schrank, 690K) reports, "For the second year running, the board overseeing the government-funded VOA has plans to wipe out news in several languages, including its flagship English-language 'News Now' programming." The Broadcast Board of Governors, which oversees VOA, "said this month that the cutbacks are being made in an effort to shift resources to new technology and 'critical audiences' in the Middle East, North Korea, Somalia and Cuba." The board's $668.2 million budget "request calls for a 3.8 percent increase from its anticipated fiscal 2007 level" to fund the expansion of programming to

DOJ_NMG_0135549

North Korea, Iran, Afghanistan and Pakistan, as well as to the Arab-language satellite network Alhurra TV and Radio Sawa. Board spokesman Larry Hart "said the decision to scrap the services largely reflects their diminishing audiences," but VOA employees and advocates "counter that their programming is a model of open media and a crucial source of trustworthy news and information for decision makers and influential figures worldwide, a demographic that is difficult to quantify."

Europeans Seek To Distance Themselves From US Policy. The Christian Science Monitor (2/23, Marquand, 59K) says the resignation this week of Italian Prime Minister Romano Prodi "underscores the difficulty in Europe of governments trying to support US foreign policy on terror while at the same time pleasing their own publics." Prodi's announcement "came hours after Britain and Denmark announced the start of troop withdrawals from Iraq," a move seen as "a blow to the White House as it deploys an additional 21,000 soldiers to stabilize Baghdad." Then in "a further departure from perfect alignment with US policy in the Middle East," British Prime Minister Tony Blair "also said this week that he will consider dealing with the Palestinian group Hamas."

Columnist Says Bush Has Created Anti-Americanism In UK. Nick Cohen, author and columnist for the Observer and the New Statesman, writes in a Wall Street Journal (2/23, A10, 2.04M) op-ed that it is "a measure of President Bush's failure that anti-Americanism has swept out of the intelligentsia and become mainstream in Britain." A country that "was once the most pro-American in Western Europe," Cohen says, "now derides Tony Blair for sticking with the Atlantic alliance."

Friedman Says Bush Now Trying To Remedy Foreign Policy Mistakes. The New York Times' (2/23) Thomas Friedman writes that "when the inside history of the Bush team is written, we will discover that, contrary to its carefully managed image of a disciplined core operating from consistent, conservative principles, it has actually been one of the most internally divided administrations -- ever." For example, he says the Administration "was divided for so long on Iran and North Korea, over regime change or behavior change, it got neither." President Bush, he continues, "obviously recognizes that and is now trying to remedy it." Friedman concludes, "I guess we should be thankful that Mr. Bush is trying to fix some of his mistakes, but we have paid a huge, unnecessary price for his learning curve. Which is why it's always best to get it right the first time."

US, Russia Play Down Missile Dispute. The Financial Times (2/23, Buckley, Williamson) reports senior US and Russian officials "sought to play down their differences on Thursday after two weeks that have seen a sharp cooling in relations between their countries." On a visit to Moscow, national security advisor Stephen Hadley "said he did not see a speech" by Russian President Vladimir Putin in Munich this month "that was sharply critical of US 'unilateralism' as a return to cold war-style confrontation." Hadley "also reiterated assurances that Washington's planned missile defense system…was not aimed at Russia but at a potential threat from Iran or other rogue states." For its part, Igor Ivanov, head of Russia's national security council, "acknowledged there were disagreements between the two countries, but said it was important that these should be resolved by dialogue." Hadley also held talks with President Putin "during a visit that seemed designed to project a more conciliatory stance after the sharp exchanges that have taken place since the Russian president's Munich address."

The AP (2/23, Danilova) notes that "US and other Western journalists were not invited to be present when [Hadley] made the remarks, which suggests they were aimed at a Russian audience."

Cheney Criticizes Chinese Missile Test. The AP (2/23, Sullivan) reports Vice President Cheney said Friday that China's recent anti-satellite weapons test "and a rapid military buildup were 'not consistent' with its stated aim of a peaceful rise as a global power." Speaking in Sydney, Cheney said, "Last month's anti-satellite test, China's continued fast-paced military buildup are less constructive and are not consistent with China's stated goal of a peaceful rise." The Chinese Foreign Ministry did not immediately respond Cheney's remarks.

Pentagon Says Test Was Part Of "Long-Term Program." In its "Inside The Ring" column, the Washington Times (2/23, Gertz, 88K) reports Air Force Lt. Gen. Henry Obering, head of the Pentagon's Missile Defense Agency (MDA), said yesterday the test "was part of a long-term space weapons program by Beijing's military that has been under way in secret for years." Gen. Obering added that although "the Chinese space weapons system currently does not threaten US missile defenses against North Korea or a future defense against Iranian missiles," possibly "it may do so in the future... based on what we have seen them...demonstrate."

Panel Accuses Philippines Military Of Political Killings. The New York Times (2/23, Times, 1.16M) reports, "A commission investigating political murder in the Philippines has found that members of the armed forces were responsible for 'an undetermined number of killings' and that senior officers could be held accountable." The report, released yesterday, "said military officials had allowed, tolerated and even encouraged the murders of political activists, and that the government of President Gloria Macapagal Arroyo had not done enough to stem the violence." The military chief of staff, Gen. Hermogenes Esperon, "called the commission's conclusions 'strained, unfair and a blank accusation.'" The Christian Science Monitor (2/23, Montlake, 59K) says the "government commission headed by retired Supreme Court judge Jose Melo" issued a "damning report," which "came one day after a visiting United Nations investigator said the military was in a 'state of denial' about its involvement in the killings."

DOJ_NMG_0135550

Venezuela Boosting Aid To Latin American Neighbors. The Washington Post (2/23, D1, Forero, Goodman, 690K) reports Venezuelan Hugo Chavez "recently announced that his government would build housing, a highway and an oil refinery in Nicaragua, part of an aid package that would benefit one of Washington's most tenacious Cold War adversaries, President Daniel Ortega. Farther south, Venezuela has pledged to provide Ecuador with $1 billion in credit, a gesture that would soften the blow if that country's leftist government follows through on its threat to default on foreign debt payments. And, along with President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad of Iran, a foe of the Bush administration, Chavez has announced a $2 billion international investment fund for Latin America." The Post adds, "Taken together, economists and others who track the country's affairs say, the investments signify an effort by Venezuela to curb the reach of the U. government, whose influence has waned in Latin America."

The New York Times (2/23, Romero, 1.16M) reports from Bolivia, "To understand Venezuela's growing influence here, consider that more than two dozen ambassadors are in this capital city, including those of Bolivia's leading trading partners like Brazil, the United States and Argentina. Yet none enjoy the direct conduit that the Venezuelan ambassador, Julio Montes, has established with President Evo Morales." Since Morales "became president little more than a year ago, Venezuela has quickly come to rival the United States as Bolivia's main patron. It has provided assistance for the army, cattle ranches, soybean cultivation, microfinance projects, urban sanitation companies and the oil industry. Perhaps most important to Washington, despite its opposition, Venezuelan financial assistance has helped Bolivia push ahead with plans to increase exports of its industrial production of coca, the main ingredient in cocaine." The Times adds, "A senior American official here, speaking anonymously out of concern that Bolivia's already fragile relations with the United States could erode further, said it was difficult to know the exact amount of Venezuelan aid because many of the agreements between Venezuela and Bolivia were not made public."

Congresswoman Says US Should Engage Chavez. In an interview with the Houston Chronicle (2/23, Otis, 530K), Rep. Sheila Jackson Lee discussed her recent trip to Venezuela, which she said was meant to "break the tension, to warm up a chilled relationship" with President Hugo Chavez. Jackson Lee said the Bush administration has "made a serious mistake in not engaging with President Chavez" and called on the administration to lift a ban on arms sales to Venezuela.

Cuba Refuses To Renew Two Foreign Journalists' Visas. The Wall Street Journal (2/23, A5, De Córdoba, 2.04M) reports, "The Cuban government refused to renew the visas of at least two resident foreign journalists, dimming hopes it will move forward with reforms as Fidel Castro fades from power. The refusals were 'part of a political tightening in the expectation that when Fidel dies they will have total control and there won't be any opposition or resistance,' said Jaime Suchlicki, an expert on Cuba at the University of Miami." Gary Marx, "who has been based in Havana for the Chicago Tribune since 2002," and Cesar Gonzalez Calero, "a reporter for the Mexico City daily El Universal, were told this week by Cuban officials that their visas wouldn't be renewed and they could no longer report from the island, according to the Chicago Tribune and El Universal."

Chadian Prime Minister Dies. The AP (2/23) reports Chadian Prime Minister Pascal Yoadimnadji died Friday at a Paris hospital "where he was being treated for cardiovascular problems," the African nation's embassy said. The cause of death was not immediately known. Embassy spokesman Kadallah Ousman said he had no immediate information on who would replace Yoadimnadji.

THE BIG PICTURE:

Headlines From Today's Front Pages.

Los Angeles Times:
"Back From Despair, In Her Words."
"Cramped And Old, LAX Is Losing International Flights To Newer Airports."
"Iran's Nuclear Effort In High Gear, U.N. Says."
"For Some, Beverly Hills Ballots Went Too Farsi."
"Anti-Doping Case Against Landis May Be In Jeopardy."

USA Today:
"Trans Fats: Infamous But Not The Only Villain."
"Car MPG Ratings Going Down."
"How Much Lower?"

New York Times:
"U.S. Used Bases In Ethiopia To Hunt Al Qaeda In Africa."
"Long Iraq Tours Can Make Home a Trying Front."

DOJ_NMG_0135551

"Officials Reject More Oversight of Hedge Funds."
"Iran Expanding Nuclear Effort, Agency Reports."
"Detour From High Road in Clinton-Obama Clash."
"Springtime for Hit's End: 'The Producers' Is Closing."
"MP3 Patents in Upheaval After Verdict."
"Wimbledon Agrees to Even Out Its Prize Money."

Washington Post:
"Test Scores, Grades at Odds."
"Rice Warns Iran It Risks More U.N. Sanctions."
"Dems Aim to Repeal Resolution."
"For Clinton, Wealth in Speeches."
"Brothers Survive Odds Together."
"Chefs Put Accents On Sushi."

Washington Times:
"Iran Defies Nuclear Ultimatum."
"Janitor-Service Chiefs Charged In Illegals Ring."
"Wilder Praises Obama Strategy."
"Children Can Travel Without Passports."
"Weepy Judge Rules On Body In Smith Case."
"Smugglers Raise Stakes In Fight Over Border Rule."
"Withdrawing From Banks."

Detroit Free Press:
"Sales Tax Could Be Waived At Cobo."
"Cosmetic Surgery Like Economy Needs A Lift."
"Ford Boss Urges Care In Buyouts."
"Detroit School Down But Not Broken."

Atlanta Journal-Constitution:
"Funding Problems Stall Nichols Trial."
"Animal Labs Earn Re-Accreditation."
"Good Weekend For Marta."
"Virtual CDC Spreads Like Flu."
"Grades, Test Scores Don't Jibe, Study Says."
"First Ancient Americans?"

Dallas Morning News:
"Does Perry Really Have The Power?"
"Harry's Wild About Serving His Country."
"Dems Seek Repeal Of '02 War Decree."

Houston Chronicle:
"Ex-Girlfriend Recalls Anna Nicole She Knew."
"Deputies Kill Pit Bulls That Attacked Schoolgirls."
"800-Plus-Pound Woman Risks Surgery For A New Life."
"Utopia Eluded Houston Terror Suspect In Somalia."
"FBI Agent Tells Of Texas Syndicate's Vicious Tactics."
"Metro Board OKs Acquisitions For Four Rapid Routes."

Story Lineup From Last Night's Network News:
ABC: Cervical Cancer Vaccine; Vaccine Analysis; Iran Nukes-United Nations; Iraq-Al Qaeda; Iraq Security; US Sick Pay; High School Seniors-Standardized Tests; Anna Nicole Smith Trial; Female Tennis Player Earnings, Movie Snacks.
CBS: Iraq-Chlorine Bombs; Iraq-Rape Charges; Iranian Nuclear Program; Food Inspections; Airport Security; Library For The Blind; Anna Nicole Funeral Hearing; Academy Awards.
NBC: US Security-Afghanistan; Iran Nukes-United Nations; Iraq-Chemical Bombs; Clinton-Obama Dispute; High School Seniors-Standardized Tests; Anna Nicole Smith Trial; TX Electric Company Raises Rates; Iraq-Prince Harry.

Story Lineup From This Morning's Radio News Broadcasts:
ABC: Senate Democrats-Iraq; Cheney-Australia; Bush-Iran; FL-Anna Nicole Smith's Body Released; Britney Spears Returns To Rehab; Wall Street.
CBS: Senate Democrats-Iraq; US Soldier Pleads Guilty To Raping Iraqi Girl; Iraq-Chemical Bombs; Peanut Butter-Salmonella Lawsuits; Latvia-Boarding House Fire; Atlanta-Fulton County Courthouse Shooting Trial Delayed By Judge; Doctors Say Jose Padilla Not Fit To Stand Trial.
NPR: White House-IAEA Report On Iranian Nuclear Program; NY-South Korean Sentenced For His Involvement In Oil-For-Food Scandal; Iraq-Chemical Bombs; US Soldier Pleads Guilty To Raping Iraqi Girl; Tokyo Stock Exchange; Egyptian Cleric Allegedly Abducted By CIA Claims He Was Tortured By Egyptians; Microsoft, Alcatel-Lucent Case.

WASHINGTON'S SCHEDULE:

Today's Events In Washington.
White House:

PRESIDENT BUSH — Meets with transportation fuel experts and researchers, closed, Roosevelt Room; views a demonstration of alternative fuel automobiles, South Lawn.

VICE PRESIDENT CHENEY — No public schedule.

US Senate: No Scheduled Events.

US House: No Scheduled Events.

Other: MEDICAID _ 9 a.m. The Urban Institute and Health Affairs hold a briefing on the future of Medicaid, with John Holahan of the institute, Alan Weil of the National Academy for State Health Policy, others. Location: Urban Institute, 2100 M St. NW.

AVIATION SAFETY _ 9:15 a.m. The National Air Disaster Alliance holds a news conference on ways to promote safety, security and survivability, with former FBI agent Coleen Rowley, and family members of people killed in air crashes and the 7/7 London subway bombings, along with former DOT Inspector General Mary Schiavo. Location: National Press Club.

EDUCATION _ 10 a.m. The American Federation of Teachers, Council for Exceptional Children, Easter Seals, Higher Education Consortium for Special Education, others, hold a briefing about Universal Design for Learning and its implications for reauthorization of the No Child Left Behind Act. Location: Room 430, Dirksen.

DOJ_NMG_0135552

HEALTH REFORM _ 10 a.m. The Heritage Foundation holds a seminar on whether tax policy is the key to comprehensive health reform, with John Goodman of the National Center for Policy Analysis, David Kendall of the Progressive Policy Institute, Tom Miller of AEI, Len Nichols of the New America Foundation, others. Location: Room S-207, Capitol.

PEACEKEEPING _ 10 a.m. The US Institute of Peace and the Stimson Center hold a discussion on the increasing use of peacekeepers in world hot spots, with Amb. Lakhdar Brahimi, Special Envoy for Sudan Andrew Natsios, William Durch of the Stimson Center, Amb. Carlos Pasacual, others. Location: 2nd floor conference room, 1200 17th St. NW.

WALTER REED _ 10:30 a.m. Secretary of Defense Robert Gates and Vice Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff Adm. Edmund Giambastiani hold a press briefing at Walter Reed Army Medical Center. Location: Walter Reed Army Medical Center, 6900 Georgia Ave. NW.

ARMY-BLACK HISTORY _ 12 p.m. The Army's Freedom Team Salute program marks Black History Month by honoring the Brooks family, the only African American family in Army history with three generals, a teacher who was nominated by her son serving in Iraq and others. Location: Madison Building, Library of Congress.

BROADBAND _ 12 p.m. The New America Foundation holds a discussion on the best way to bring broadband access to all Americans, with John Muleta of M2Z Networks, Chris Guttman-McCabe of the Wireless Association, Nextel Communications co-founder Morgan O'Brien, others. Location: Room 385, Russell.

GATES-KOREA _ 12 p.m. Secretary of Defense Robert M. Gates hosts an honor cordon to welcome South Korean Minister of National Defense Kim Jang-soo to the Pentagon. Location: The cordon will be held on the steps of the Pentagon Mall Entrance.

BULGARIA _ 2 p.m. Bulgarian Finance Minister Plamen Orescharski and Deputy Treasury Secretary Robert Kimmit, others, attend a tax treaty and protocol signing. Location: Room 3311, main Treasury.

NAPOLITANO _ 5 p.m. The National Italian American Foundation holds a private reception for Arizona Gov. Janet Napolitano. Location: Willard Inter-Continental Hotel, 1401 Pennsylvania Ave. NW.

Copyright 2007 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Attorney General's News Briefing is published five days a week for the Office of Public Affairs by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders and also publishes the White House Bulletin, Frontrunner and Washington Morning Update. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, or called at (703) 749-0040.

USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs

From:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Sent:	Friday, February 23, 2007 7:49 AM
To:	USDOJ- Office of Public Affairs
Subject:	Department of Justice News Clips for Friday, February 23, 2007
Attachments:	dojclips070223.pdf; dojclips070223.doc

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 23, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Experts: Padilla Unable To Stand Trial (NSDY/AP) 5
Psychiatrist: Solitary Confinement Has Made Padilla Unfit For Trial (USAT) 6
Defense Calls Padilla Incompetent For Trial (NYT) 6
Padilla Unfit For Trial, Defense Experts Say (LAT) 7
Lawfare (WSJ) 8
A Congressional Duty (WP) 10
Editorial: Figures Don't Add Up (VENTCS) 11
Terror Suspect's Statements Detail Time In Somalia (BOS/AP) 11

Homeland Response:

Independent Review Needed For Supermax (DENP) 12
Supermax Safety (PUEBCH) 13
Report Details Harassment That Followed 9/11 Attacks (MINNST) 13
In New Orleans, Progress At Last In The Lower Ninth Ward (NYT) 14
Senator Lott Floods The Zone (WSJ) 16

War News:

Senate Dems Move To Limit Iraq Mission (AP) 17
Democrats May Try To Limit Iraq Mission (USAT) 18
Senate Democrats Keep Pressure On Bush With Plan To Limit Iraq Mission To Counterterrorism (NYT) 19
Democrats Seek To Repeal 2002 War Authorization (WP) 20
Lieberman Says War Vote Could Prompt Party Switch (POL) 21
What Joe Lieberman Wants... (TIME) 22
Republican Critic Of Iraq Policy Vows Not To 'Starve' The War (MCT) 23
Rep. Sam Johnson Emerges As GOP Voice In War Debate (LAT) 23
No Way To End A War (WP) 25
Free Nations Can't Ignore Terror, Cheney Warns (WT) 26
Powell Backs Surge, Time Frame To Quell 'civil War' (JC) 26
Old Problems Undermine New Security Plan For Baghdad (NYT) 27
Insurgents Broaden Arsenal In Battles With U.S., Iraqi Forces (WP) 29
General Implicates Al-Qaeda In Copter Crashes (USAT) 30
Al Qaeda Believed Behind Copter Crashes (WT) 30
Iraq Rebels Expected To Use More Chlorine Gas In Attacks (NYT) 31
U.S. Troops Uncover "car Bomb Factory" Near Fallouja (LAT) 32
U.S. Unit Shoulders Burden At Police Station In Baqubah (WP) 33
Firefight Between U.S. Troops, Insurgents Kills At Least 12 (USAT/AP) 36
Baghdad 'Surge' Returns Chalabi To Center Stage (WSJ) 36
Rape Of Second Sunni Woman By Iraqi Security Forces Alleged (WP) 38
Withdrawing From Banks (WT) 39
Distrust, Fear A Year After Iraq Mosque Bombing (LAT) 40
Soldier Sentenced For Rape, Murder In Iraq (AP) 41
Long Iraq Tours Can Make Home A Trying Front (NYT) 42
Back From Despair, In Her Words (LAT) 45
South Korean Gets 5 Years For Dealings With Iraqis (NYT) 48
Park Sentenced To 5 Years In U.N. Oil-for-Food Bribery Scandal (WP) 48
Iraqi Embassy Upgrades Its D.C. Digs (WP) 50
U.S. Used Bases In Ethiopia To Hunt Al Qaeda In Africa (NYT) 51

Corporate Scandals:

US Judge Denies Motion To Delay Enron Lawsuit (AP) 53
Former Sadia CFO To Pay $364,000 In SEC Insider-trading Case (AP) 54
Panel Sets Voluntary Guides For Hedge Funds (USAT) 54
Call For More Oversight Of Hedge Funds Is Rejected (WP) 55
Officials Reject More Oversight Of Hedge Funds (NYT) 56

Criminal Law:

Jury To Continue Deliberations In Scooter Libby CIA-Leak Case (WSJ) ... 58
Still No Verdict In CIA Leak Trial (NSDY/AP) ... 59
Leak Trial Reveals Flaws In Note-taking (AP) ... 59
Fumo Trial Likely To Start Early '08 (PHI) ... 61
Meeting Offers Sneak Preview Of Fumo Trial (PHI) ... 61
Inside The Ring (WT) ... 62
Investigation Won't Stop Rep. Miller From California Dealmaking (AP) ... 64
Prosecutor Urges Public To Help Fight Corruption (NYT) ... 66
FBI: Sex Fugitive Captured In Livingston Parish (AP) ... 66
Man Pleads Guilty In Child Pornography Case (MH) ... 67
Man Sought In W.Va., Ohio Sex Attack (PPG) ... 67
Police Probe Ferry Offense (WHEELINT) ... 69
Three Indicted In Las Vegas In Katrina Relief Fund Fraud Case (BSH) ... 69
Oklahoma City Man Accused Of Falsely Claiming Katrina Funds (AP) ... 70
N.C. Man Convicted In Oregon In Multicountry Silver Scheme (AP) ... 70
Study Fails To Stem Gangs Debate (LAT) ... 71

Civil Rights:

EXCLUSIVE: Gonzales Talks On Civil Liberties (CBN) ... 72
DOJ Report Touts Bush Record On Rights (UPI) ... 73
Teel Avoids Death Penalty (BSH) ... 74
Urban League Chief Wants Justice Probe Of Katrina Shootings (AP) ... 75
Illinois Gay Marriage Bill Introduced (CHIT) ... 76
Nonprofit Litigates Largest Employment Discrimination Class Action Ever To Go To Trial (LAW) ... 77
Bark And Hold (WP) ... 78

Antitrust:

$1.75M Fine Ends Probe Of Concrete Price-fixing (INDYSTAR) ... 78
Plea Deal In Bid-rig Scheme (NSDY) ... 79
Sirius-XM Merger Faces Major Hurdle Over Antitrust Issues, Experts Say (BLOOM) ... 79
Sirius-XM Merger Would Send Wrong Signal (WP) ... 80
Reject Their Request (USAT) ... 81
Sirius And XM Together Makes Sense For Listeners (USAT) 82
Apple And Cisco Settle Dispute Over IPhone Name (FT) ... 82
South Korea Fines Four Refiners For Price-Fixing (WSJ) ... 83
Traverse Mountain Antitrust Suit Fails (SLT) ... 84
FTC Clears AIG Acquisition Of U.S. Ports (AP) ... 84
EU Clears ProSiebenSat.1 Acquisition (AP) ... 85
Planned Merger Angers Black Farmers (JCL) ... 85
Esmark: Deal For Weirton Is Dead (AP) ... 86
Microsoft Hit With $1.52 Billion Verdict In MP3 Suit (WSJ) ... 87
MP3 Patents In Upheaval After Verdict (NYT) ... 89
Microsoft Ordered To Pay $1.5B To Alcatel (USAT) ... 90
Microsoft Loses Big In MP3 Patent Suit (WP) ... 91
Microsoft Hit By $1.5bn Award (FT) ... 92
Jury Finds Against Microsoft In $1.5 Billion Patent Dispute With Alcatel-Lucent (AP) ... 92

Environment:

Bush Talks Energy (HDD) ... 93
Bush Stresses Fuel Technology (WP) ... 94
Bush Pushes His Energy Initiative At North Carolina Biofuel Plant (MCT) ... 95
Bush Makes A Pitch For Amber Waves Of Homegrown Fuel (NYT) ... 96
Bush Pushes Energy Initiative In N.C. (AP) ... 97
Bush Gets A Whiff Of Alternative Fuel (LAT) ... 98
Bush Visits Franklinton Biotech (RNO) ... 99
A Presidential Pat On The Back (DHS) ... 99
Where Bush Would Steer Energy R&D (CSM) ... 100
Car Mpg Ratings Going Down (USAT) ... 102
City To Pay $1.5 Million In Coal Gas Site Agreement (LMDS) 103
BP Employee Deleted Files From Computer (FT) ... 103
GAO: Fuel Tank Cleanup Could Cost $12B (AP) ... 104
A Conservative Conservationist? (WP) ... 105
Colorless Green Ideas (NYT) ... 106

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Detroit Dealer Gets 30 Years In Two Fentanyl Deaths (DN) 107
Drug Dealer Gets 30 Years In Fentanyl Case (FREEP) ... 107
Seller Of Lethal Drug Cocktail Sentenced (AP) ... 108
Official: 4 Officers Arrested In Sting (NSDY/AP) ... 108
Four Hollywood Cops Face Charges In FBI Sting (MH) ... 108
Medical Marijuana Activists Cite Little-known Law In Suit (SFC) ... 110
Advocacy Group's Suit Calls On U.S. To Acknowledge Pot's Medicinal Value (LAT) ... 110
Federal Charges In Home Pot-growing Operation (SFC) ... 111
U.S. Drug Czar Urges Canada To Crack Down On Pot Claims American Measures Have Lowered Drug Use In Teens (CP) ... 111
Canada Must Not Follow The U.S. On Drug Policy (OC) ... 112
Former Federal Agents Suing City, Charge Police Corruption (AP) ... 113

DOJ_NMG_0135556

ATF Agents Faced Cop Retaliation, Jury Rules (CHIT) 114
City Man Guilty Of 27 Crimes, All Violent (PHI).....115

Immigration:

Senate Hearing To Push Bush On Immigration (WT).....116
Smugglers Raise Stakes In Fight Over Border Rule (WT)....117
Homeland Security Strategy Hits Executives, Illegal Workers (WSJ) 118
Janitor-service Chiefs Charged In Illegals Ring (WT).....119
Janitorial Service Officials Charged In Sweep Of Illegal Immigrants (WP).....120
Cleaning Executives Indicted In $18 Million Fraud (NYT)....121
Cleaning Company Executives Accused Of Employing Illegal Workers (USAT).....121
Cleaning Service Owners Charged In Sweep Of Illegal Immigrants (AP).....122
Judge Dismisses Posada's Bid To Be Freed (AP) 123

Tax:

13 Charged With Fraud Over Tobacco Sales Taxes (MINNST) 124
Corporate Owners Hide Assets, Identities (USAT) 125
Bill Clinton's AMT Bomb (WSJ).....128

Congress-Administration:

Walter Reed Stories Factual But Unfair, Medical Chief Says (WP) 129
Painting Over The Problems At Walter Reed's Building 18 (WP) 130
Damaged And Adrift In The Shadows (NYT).....131
Senate Effort To Pass Intelligence Legislation Stalls Again (WT).....132
Pentagon Abandons Big Bomb Test (AP) 132
Agency Scraps Plan For Explosives Test (NYT).....134
McCain Raps Extraneous Pentagon Spending Requests (POL) 134
Labor Seeks Boost From Pro-Union Measure (NYT).....135
Fairfax Schools Could Lose Millions For Defying 'No Child' (WP) 136
Virginia Schools May Lose Funding (WT/AP) 137
Bush's Budget May Stifle Students' Loans (WT) 138
For Energy, A Budget Not Without Merit (WP).....139
Profiteering Colleges (NYT).....140
Trapped On An Airplane (NYT).....140
A Visit Worth The Time And Money (NYT).....141

Other News:

U.S. Economy Leaving Record Numbers In Severe Poverty (MCT) 142
Dow, S& P 500 Sink While Nasdaq Rises (USAT).....145
Stocks Ease As Oil Nears $61; Nasdaq Grabs A 6-Year High (WSJ).....146
UCLA Wins Psychiatric Sex Trial, But No One Gets Monetary Award (LAT).....146
Grades Rise, But Reading Skills Do Not (NYT).....148
Grades Rise, But Reading Skills Fall, Data Suggest (USAT)149
Test Scores At Odds With Rising High School Grades (WP)150
Report Raises Questions About High-School Courses (WSJ)151
Higher Grades Contradict Test Scores (AP).....153
High Schoolers' Scores Lag Despite Courses, Grades (WT)154
U.S. High Schools Raise Grades, Don't Test Better (Update2) (BLOOM) 155
Stepping To The Plate, Giuliani Is Seeing Only Softballs (NYT).....156
Giuliani To Court K Street (POL).....157
Huckabee: Don't Forget Me (POL).....158
Fundraiser To Help Underwrite S.C. Primary (WP) 159
Detour From High Road In Clinton-Obama Clash (NYT) 159
Et Tu, David? A Lucrative Friendship Sours (NYT).....161
Analysis: Early Bumps Trip Clinton Camp (AP) 162
EDITORIALS Geffen Has A Point About The Clintons (LAT)163
Clinton And Obama's Hollywood Scene (WP).....163
Depends What The Meaning Of "Mistake" Is (WP) 164
For Clinton, New Wealth In Speeches (WP) 166
FEC Drafts New Campaign Finance Opinion (WP/AP).....168
Obama's Funding Question To Get FEC Look (CHIT).....169
Proposal By Obama On Public Financing Appears To Gain (NYT).....169
Hope From The FEC (WP).....170
Statehouse Yields Clues To Obama (WSJ).....170
Wilder Praises Obama Strategy (WT) 172
Running On A Résumé Both Local And National (NYT) 173
The New GOP Attack Machine (POL).....175
The Philadelphia Story (WSJ).....176
Non-Union Jobs (WSJ).....178
Iran Defies Nuclear Ultimatum (WT/AP).....178
New Penalties May Loom For Iran's Nuclear Work (USAT) .179
Rice Warns Iran It Risks Further U.N. Sanctions (WP).....180
Rice Says Europe, Russia Want Iran Talks (AP).....181
Diplomats Trying To Restart Iran Talks (AP).....182
Iran Expanding Nuclear Effort, Agency Reports (NYT) 183
Iran Has Speeded Up N-plans, Says UN (FT).....185

DOJ_NMG_0135557

Iran Says Nuclear Fuel Is For Future (LAT) 186
Speculation Rages: Is Iran Bush's Next Target? (MCT) 186
Arab States, Wary Of Iran, Add To Their Arsenals But Still Lean On The U.S. (NYT) 188
A Presidential Candidate Bill Clinton Can Publicly Embrace (WP) 190
Secretive Force At Center Of Tensions Between U.S., Iran (MCT) 191
Hagel Says Diplomacy Is Best Option For Iran (FT) 192
Iran Misses Another Deadline (WSJ) 193
What Scares Iran's Mullahs? (NYT) 194
Signals From Tehran (WP) 195
'Long Way' To Go In North Korea Nuclear Pact: US (AFP) ... 196
Hill Warns N Korea On Deadlines (FT) 197
Nuke Timeline Key To Successful Deal (WT) 198
N. Korea Nuclear Deal Rife With Benefits (AP) 199
Top Democratic Hopefuls' Bickering Puts Focus On Candor And Personal Behavior (WSJ) 199
NKorea Official To US For Talks: Sources (AFP) 201
Cheney Criticizes China's Arms Buildup (AP) 201
VOA Says Goodbye To Uzbek, Other Tongues (WP) 202
Europeans' Chill Deepens On US Policy (CSM) 204
An Upside-Down World (WSJ) 205
A Foreign Policy Built On Do-Overs (NYT) 206
Russia And US Play Down Missile Dispute (FT) 207
Russia, US Advisers Pledge Cooperation (AP) 208
Philippine Military Is Linked To Killings (NYT) 209
Political Killings Traced To Philippine Military (CSM) 209
Chavez Builds His Sphere Of Influence (WP) 211
Venezuela Rivals U.S. In Aid To Bolivia (NYT) 213
Jackson Lee Tries To Smooth Chavez Ties (HC) 215
Cuba's Visa Denials Signal Reluctance On Reforms (WSJ) 216
Chadian Prime Minister Yoadimnadji Dies (AP) 217

DOJ_NMG_0135558

TERRORISM NEWS:

Experts: Padilla Unable To Stand Trial (NSDY/AP)

By Curt Anderson, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, February 23, 2007

MIAMI -- Accused al-Qaida operative Jose Padilla suffers from intense stress and anxiety stemming from his isolated years in military custody and cannot adequately help his lawyers prepare for trial, two defense mental experts testified Thursday.

Defense lawyers hope to delve more deeply into Padilla's treatment at a Navy brig in Charleston, S.C., later in the federal hearing, when they are allowed to question brig officials directly involved in his custody. Those officials have never spoken publicly about the case, and the hearing will continue Monday.

"He is immobilized by his anxiety," said Patricia Zapf, a forensic psychologist who administered tests on Padilla last October. "He believes he will go back to the brig and he will die there."

The hearing before U.S. District Judge Marcia Cooke on Padilla's competency is crucial in deciding whether he and two co-defendants will stand trial in April.

Padilla, a 36-year-old U.S. citizen, is charged with being part of a North American terror support cell that provided money, recruits and supplies to Islamic extremists around the world. All three have pleaded not guilty and face possible life imprisonment.

The Bush administration initially claimed that Padilla was on an al-Qaida mission to detonate a radioactive "dirty bomb" in a major U.S. city when he was arrested in May 2002 at Chicago's O'Hare International Airport.

He was designated an "enemy combatant" and was imprisoned by the military without criminal charges. But the dirty-bomb allegations are not part of the Miami case.

Padilla has claimed in court filings that he was tortured at the brig, which U.S. officials have denied. Prosecutors say he is competent for trial.

"It has always been our policy to treat all detainees humanely," Cmdr. Jeffrey Gordon, a Defense Department spokesman, said Thursday. "The government in the strongest terms denies Padilla's allegations of torture, allegations made without support and without citing a shred of record evidence."

Dr. Angela Hegarty, a forensic neuropsychiatrist, said she concluded after examining and testing Padilla for more than 22 hours last fall that he is mentally incompetent for trial because he has post-traumatic stress disorder. Zapf reached the same diagnosis and recommended that Padilla receive treatment.

Padilla's symptoms are most acute when he is asked to talk about his 3 1/2 years in the brig, including interrogations techniques used on him, or to review evidence in his criminal case, including transcripts of intercepted telephone conversations, Hegarty said.

"He doesn't want to because it hurts so much, and because it hurts so much he shuts down," Hegarty said.

When Padilla his asked about his case or the brig, Zapf said, he becomes noticeably tense, begins to sweat, tries to change the subject and rocks back and forth while hunched over. She said he was adamant that he did not want to testify in his own defense.

"He said he can't relive it, he can't go through it again, and he can't name names," Zapf said.

During cross-examination, prosecutor John Shipley pointed to a test administered by Hegarty in which Padilla scored zero on the portions indicating post-traumatic stress disorder. Those segments involved questions about flashbacks, nightmares, depression and other symptoms.

"Nothing in this test supports your diagnosis at all, isn't that correct?" Shipley asked.

"No," Hegarty replied, noting that the test answers were only one component of her decision.

DOJ_NMG_0135559

Psychiatrist: Solitary Confinement Has Made Padilla Unfit For Trial (USAT)

By Laura Parker

USA Today, February 23, 2007

MIAMI — A New York psychiatrist testified Thursday that Jose Padilla, a U.S. citizen accused by the government of being an "enemy combatant," developed so many mental ailments during three years of solitary confinement in the Navy brig in Charleston, S.C., that he is not competent to stand trial.

That view of the 36-year-old terrorism suspect, once accused of planning to detonate a radioactive "dirty bomb," emerged as Angela Hegarty took the stand as the first of three psychiatrists expected to testify at a hearing to determine Padilla's mental fitness. "He lacks the capacity to assist his counsel in this case," Hegarty said.

More revelations are expected next week when four officials from the brig, as well as four officials from the Miami Federal Detention Center take the stand. Their testimony will provide an unprecedented window into the U.S. military's treatment of terrorism suspects. Since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, officials responsible for the detention of terrorism suspects have been ordered by a federal judge to testify only a few times.

Padilla, 36, faces trial April 16 on federal charges of conspiring to murder, kidnap and maim people overseas and conspiracy to support terrorism by supplying money and materials. He was arrested in May 2002, and spent three years and eight months in the brig until he was transferred into federal custody after his indictment in Miami in November 2005.

Federal prosecutors have fiercely resisted defense efforts to call the brig officials for the hearing, arguing that Padilla's treatment at the brig is not relevant to the federal charges he faces. Defense attorneys contend that Padilla's treatment amounts to torture and caused his mental break.

U.S. District Court Judge Marcia Cooke ordered Defense Department attorney Mike Reheuser, brig technical director Sandy Seymour, brig psychologist Craig Noble and brig social worker Maj. Andrew Cruz to testify. Federal Detention Center officials Jorge Luis, Dr. Victor Shoukry, Dr. Lisa Feldman and Dr. Hoa Ngo also will testify.

Hegarty, who testified for the defense, was followed to the stand by Patricia Zapf, a psychologist hired by the defense. Both experts said Padilla suffers from post traumatic stress as a result of his confinement.

Prosecutors will call Rodolfo Buigas, a medical expert for the Bureau of Prisons, who examined Padilla and found him mentally competent. The hearing resumes Monday.

Defense Calls Padilla Incompetent For Trial (NYT)

By Deborah Sontag

The New York Times, February 23, 2007

MIAMI, Feb. 22 — In a highly unusual competency hearing in federal court here Thursday, defense lawyers began to lay out their argument that Jose Padilla, the Brooklyn-born former enemy combatant, was rendered incompetent to stand trial on terrorism conspiracy charges by what they characterize as crippling mistreatment by the government.

Two mental health experts, a forensic psychiatrist and a forensic psychologist hired by the defense, testified that Mr. Padilla, 36, suffers from post-traumatic stress disorder as a result of his isolation and scores of interrogation sessions during three years and eight months in a military brig in South Carolina.

“He’s unfit to stand trial,” said Patricia A. Zapf, the psychologist, describing Mr. Padilla as so “immobilized by his anxiety” and so distrustful that he is incapable of assisting his own lawyers — whom he at times suspects of being agents of the government — in preparing his defense.

Dr. Zapf said Mr. Padilla, a United States citizen who was initially accused of plotting a dirty bomb attack against the United States and held without charges by the military, believed that he would end up “back in the brig and that he would die there.”

Dr. Zapf continued: “He’d say, ‘What does it matter? It doesn’t matter. My fate has been decided. It’s better to let things be.’ ”

Mr. Padilla, who was indicted in late 2005 on terrorism conspiracy charges that do not include the dirty bomb plot but do carry a possible life sentence, sat calmly through Thursday’s hearing as lawyers and doctors discussed his facial tics, anxieties and feelings of hopelessness.

DOJ_NMG_0135560

Wearing a tan jumpsuit, sandals with socks, wire-rimmed glasses and a wispy mustache, Mr. Padilla occasionally chatted amiably with his lawyers and once turned around and gave his mother, Estela Lebron of Broward County, a broad, sustained smile. His leg irons were barely visible beneath the rolled-up cuffs of the pants that belong to the federal detention center where he is now being held in isolation.

In a recent motion to the court, Anthony J. Natale, a federal public defender and one of Mr. Padilla's lawyers, said, "Like many aspects of Mr. Padilla's case, his claim of incompetency is unique in that it is the government that is squarely to blame for his current mental state and his concomitant ability to stand trial."

Marcia G. Cooke, the federal judge presiding over the case, ordered a Bureau of Prisons evaluation of Mr. Padilla late last year when his lawyers raised the issue of his competency. That review, which was complicated by Mr. Padilla's refusal to submit to testing by prison psychologists, concluded recently that Mr. Padilla was competent to stand trial.

Prosecution lawyers urged Judge Cooke to accept that evaluation as neutral and final. They opposed a full-blown competency hearing that examined Mr. Padilla's treatment in the brig, calling the subject of his detention there a "sideshow." But Judge Cooke ordered officials from the brig to testify, and they are expected to do so when the hearing continues next week.

If Judge Cooke finds Mr. Padilla incompetent to stand trial, prosecutors have made it clear they will appeal that decision. If a ruling of incompetency were upheld, Mr. Padilla might then be transferred by the government to a psychiatric institution with the goal of making him capable of standing trial.

Mr. Padilla, according to the defense-hired doctors who examined him, is terrified of ending up in a psychiatric hospital and denies that he has any mental disorders. During their evaluations, they said, Mr. Padilla denied that he was anxious, while flushing, sweating, twitching and visibly manifesting his anxiety.

"Mr. Padilla is very, very anxious about quote-unquote appearing crazy," said Dr. Angela M. Hegarty, a psychiatrist.

The doctors testified that Mr. Padilla refused to discuss the details of his case with his lawyers, growing agitated when asked to review video recordings of his interrogations — 87 such tapes have been turned over to the defense — or to listen to wiretapped phone conversations.

According to the testimony, Mr. Padilla, a Muslim convert, also declines to answer his lawyers' questions about his whereabouts or activities after he left the United States in 1998 on what he told his family was a spiritual journey but what prosecutors see as a mission to conduct "global jihad." The questioning, according to the doctors, echoes the questioning of his interrogators.

"When asked, he shuts down and says, 'I can't, I can't,' " Dr. Hegarty said. Prosecutors challenged the idea that Mr. Padilla was incapable of communicating with his lawyers, noting that the lawyers had submitted an affidavit signed by him with a motion to dismiss the charges based on "outrageous government conduct." That motion contained detailed accusations by Mr. Padilla about abuses in the brig, including hooding, stress positions, assaults, threats of imminent execution and the administration of "truth serums."

Padilla Unfit For Trial, Defense Experts Say (LAT)

By Carol J. Williams, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 23, 2007

2 psychiatrists agree the terrorism suspect has post-traumatic stress disorder. His lawyers blame his treatment in custody.

MIAMI — Two forensic psychology experts testified Thursday that alleged Al Qaeda accomplice Jose Padilla suffered mental damage during his 3 1/2 years in U.S. military custody and was unfit to stand trial on terrorism charges.

Testing and evaluation of the 36-year-old former Chicago gang member revealed "strong indication of cognitive impairment" and a 98% probability of brain injury, said Patricia Zapf, a clinical forensic psychologist and associate professor at City University of New York.

"I believe he is not competent to proceed, that he is not fit to stand trial," Zapf testified as a witness for the defense.

U.S. District Judge Marcia Cooke scheduled the competency hearing after Padilla's defense attorneys filed a motion to dismiss the case because of what they called "outrageous government conduct" that amounted to torture.

Padilla's trial is scheduled to begin April 16.

DOJ_NMG_0135561

Forensic neuropsychiatrist Angela Hegarty told the court that Padilla wasn't competent to assist in his own defense because he exhibits profound anxiety and "shuts down" at any mention of his treatment at the U.S. Navy brig in Charleston, S.C.

Both defense experts diagnosed Padilla with post-traumatic stress disorder and acute anxiety, which they attributed to his prolonged isolation and treatment at the Charleston brig.

Padilla, shackled and dressed in a tan cotton jailhouse tunic and trousers, sat impassively throughout the day's proceedings. His only show of emotion was a wave and smile to his mother, who was seated in the back of the courtroom.

Padilla was arrested at Chicago's O'Hare International Airport upon his return from Pakistan in May 2002, on suspicion of having plotted with other terrorism suspects to unleash a "dirty bomb" on an unnamed U.S. city.

President Bush declared Padilla an enemy combatant, and he was held in the brig without charges until late 2005. The government then moved the case to the federal court system with an indictment alleging Padilla was part of a North American terrorist cell providing material assistance to Islamic extremists abroad.

Lead defense attorney Anthony Natale has called mental health professionals and interrogation personnel from the brig staff to testify to the conditions in which Padilla was held. Testimony from the brig personnel, expected when proceedings resume Monday, could shed light on the military's controversial and secretive practices in getting terrorism suspects to disclose incriminating information.

A Bureau of Prisons psychological evaluator, Rodolfo Buigas, is expected to testify for the prosecution that Padilla is competent to stand trial.

Hegarty, an assistant professor of clinical psychology at Columbia University, said Padilla suffered from a form of Stockholm syndrome in which a captive identifies with his aggressors because of a perception that they control his fate.

"When you are helpless and dependent on an all-powerful group, it takes away your anxiety when you line up with them," she said, recalling instances during her 22 hours of discussion with Padilla when he would object to contradicting the government for fear of reprisals.

"He thought he would go back to the brig and that he would die there," Zapf said. "He's very much living in the present. He doesn't want to talk about the past or think about the future."

Any attempts to get Padilla to discuss his custody left the defendant "immobilized by his anxiety," Zapf said.

Both witnesses reported that Padilla exhibited facial tics, flushing and perspiration, and that he evaded all questions relating to his solitary confinement. Defense attorneys say he was subjected to extreme temperatures and noise, fed LSD and other drugs, and made to endure hours of interrogation shackled in "stress positions."

Both also denied that Padilla was deliberately feigning psychological problems to evade prosecution.

Assistant U.S. Atty. John C. Shipley attempted to discredit Hegarty's post-traumatic stress disorder diagnosis by pointing out that Padilla scored "a perfect zero" on the segment of a standardized test designed to detect symptoms of the disorder.

But Hegarty countered that visible symptoms of anxiety as well as nightmares, depression and hallucination had been observed in the defendant, leading her to conclude he was exhibiting "minimalization" or denial, a classic indication of the disorder.

Asked how she reconciled Padilla's affidavit attesting to brutal treatment in the brig with his supposed mental alignment with his government jailers and accusers, Hegarty compared the defendant's situation to that of a battered woman who vacillates between defense of the abuser and short-lived efforts to escape him.

Zapf described Padilla as polite and apologetic about his inability to discuss his military captivity and, like Hegarty, quoted the defendant as saying he feared that his defense lawyers were part of a government plot against him.

Cooke repeatedly overruled objections from the prosecutors that Hegarty and Zapf were straying beyond the questions asked of them. The judge's latitude with the defense attorneys could signal that she will allow military jailers and interrogators to answer questions about their methods. Prosecutors in previous terrorism cases have stifled such testimony by deeming the techniques classified.

Lawfare (WSJ)

By David B. Rivkin, Jr. And Lee A. Casey

DOJ_NMG_0135562

The Wall Street Journal, February 23, 2007

The term "lawfare" describes the growing use of international law claims, usually factually or legally meritless, as a tool of war. The goal is to gain a moral advantage over your enemy in the court of world opinion, and potentially a legal advantage in national and international tribunals.

Al Qaeda, of course, is an experienced lawfare practitioner. Its training manual, seized by British authorities in Manchester, England, openly instructs detained al Qaeda fighters to claim torture and other types of abuse as a means of obtaining a moral advantage over their captors. That advice has been routinely followed by detainees at Guantanamo Bay, who have succeeded in generating incessant demands -- from European officials among others -- for the base's closure and their own liberation.

These efforts, however, pale to insignificance when compared to the blizzard of litigation initiated in the U.S. federal courts on behalf of al Qaeda and Taliban detainees. The suits range from habeas corpus petitions to free captured enemy combatants -- cases that were dismissed by the U.S. Court of Appeals in Washington, D.C. on Tuesday -- to tort suits seeking monies from U.S. government officials, to challenges regarding the detainees' conditions of confinement.

There was a quixotic attempt to save Saddam Hussein's life by asking a federal court in Washington, D.C. to "stay" his execution by the Baghdad government. Several suits seek to hold the U.S. liable for the alleged misconduct of other governments. Of these, the lawsuit by Canadian Maher Arar, ostensibly tortured after being "rendered" to Syria, is the best known.

The most significant common thread among all these actions is the clear desire to portray U.S. government actions as illegal and unprecedented. In fact, it is the claims for extensive due process rights for captured enemy combatants that are unprecedented.

Combatants, whether the regular soldiers of sovereign states, irregular guerillas or terrorists, have never enjoyed the right to contest the legality of their detention in the civilian courts, or to a criminal trial. The Supreme Court reaffirmed these traditional rules in Hamdi v. Rumsfeld (2004), where a clear majority held that captured al Qaeda operatives could constitutionally be held as enemy combatants for the duration of hostilities without the due process required for individuals accused of criminal violations. The only process the court considered necessary was an opportunity to contest, before military authorities, the factual basis of their classification as enemy combatants with a limited opportunity for judicial review.

Nevertheless, lawyers for the detainees continue to demand a full-fledged criminal process in the civilian courts for their clients. Former Clinton Attorney General Janet Reno has argued in a friend of the court brief that one detainee (Ali Saleh Kahlah al-Marri) should be entirely removed from the military justice system, even though he already has received far more extensive judicial process than that required by the Hamdi decision.

Similarly, in a grim echo of domestic prisoners-rights cases, lawyers for another detainee, Saifullah Paracha, have demanded that he be transferred from Guantanamo Bay to a civilian U.S. hospital for a common medical procedure -- a cardiac catheterization.

Perhaps the most pernicious ongoing lawfare example is the effort to hold U.S. officials financially liable for their wartime conduct based on the theories developed in Bivens v. Six Unknown Named Agents (1971). In that case, the Supreme Court permitted a civil damage suit against individual federal drug enforcement agents for allegedly violating the plaintiff's constitutional rights, in particular the Fourth Amendment guarantee against unreasonable searches and seizures.

Several Bivens actions have been filed on behalf of foreign combatants captured, detained and later released by U.S. forces. None have been particularly successful -- so far -- but the determined effort to use legal principles developed in the context of civilian law-enforcement operations on U.S. soil against officials directing an ongoing armed conflict overseas reveals an unsettling policy agenda.

These efforts are of a piece with a similar "progressive" movement -- ongoing at least since the end of World War II -- to remake the traditional laws of war, attempting to import into the area of armed conflict concepts and norms from the world of domestic law enforcement. Thus, leftist NGOs routinely demand that irregular enemy combatants like al Qaeda and the Taliban be treated as POWs or criminal defendants, claim that military force can be applied only to the minimum amounts necessary to neutralize a particular opponent (rather than with a view to achieving ultimate victory), and have sought to ban an increasing number of weapons and weapons systems as being "inherently indiscriminate."

DOJ_NMG_0135563

The effect of this lawfare effort, were it successful, would be to make it exceptionally difficult -- if not impossible -- for a law-abiding state to wage war in anything like the traditional manner, bringing the full weight of the national armed forces to bear against an enemy, without prompting charges of war crimes and efforts to intimidate individual officials with prosecutions on ersatz "war crimes" theories. In fact, the criminalization of traditional warfare seems to be the goal.

Unfortunately, the progressive humanitarians (as they would certainly describe themselves) have embarked on this campaign to criminalize warfare (a kind of judicially enforced Kellog-Briand Pact), without giving much thought to alternatives for ensuring the welfare and security of the civilian populations that the armed forces of states, and of the U.S. in particular, are raised and maintained to protect. To the extent that terrorist combatants are given the rights of criminal defendants, their ability to sustain long-term hostilities, and to reach their civilian targets, is increased.

Lawfare designed to delegitimize the use of American military force, and the American way of war, certainly has the potential to undermine public support for the war effort, both at home and abroad. Recognizing the stakes involved, the U.S. should be as committed to winning the lawfare battle as the ground combat in Afghanistan and Iraq.

Merely defending itself in court is not enough. The U.S. must go on both the legal and public diplomacy offensive, utilizing such aggressive litigation tactics as seeking sanctions against lawyers who make frivolous arguments or violate security regulations. Most important, the administration should strive to explain, tirelessly and at the highest levels, that its policies are both legal and legitimate and that it is the lawfare's practitioners who are the true radicals.

Messrs. Rivkin & Casey, who served in the Department of Justice during the Reagan and George H.W. Bush administrations, are writing a book on war's evolving legal architecture.

A Congressional Duty (WP)

The Washington Post, February 23, 2007

ON THE FIRST day of the new Congress, two leading senators announced they would join in an attempt to reverse the hasty and ill-considered decision of the previous Congress to deprive foreign prisoners at Guantanamo Bay of the ancient right of habeas corpus, which allows the appeal of imprisonment to a judge. One of the senators, Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), predicted that the courts would rule that the provision of the Military Commissions Act eliminating habeas corpus was unconstitutional; he nevertheless joined the incoming chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.), in sponsoring a bill restoring the appeal right.

Now Mr. Specter's prediction is looking less sure: The U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit ruled this week that Congress's act was constitutional, and it threw the cases of dozens of Guantanamo detainees out of federal court. That ruling will almost certainly be reviewed by the Supreme Court on appeal, but Congress should not wait for its decision. It should move quickly on the Habeas Corpus Restoration Act.

The Supreme Court has already twice overruled decisions by the D.C. Circuit denying Guantanamo detainees habeas rights, but it is hard to predict whether it will do so again. The court's composition has changed since those rulings, with the addition of justices more likely to be sympathetic to the arguments of the Bush administration. Congress has reversed part of the basis for the court's previous rulings by enacting a statute saying that persons found to be "enemy combatants" by military review panels, including detainees held at Guantanamo, have only a limited right of appeal.

The principal remaining question is whether Congress's action is permitted under Article I, Section 9 of the Constitution, which says, "The Privilege of the Writ of Habeas Corpus shall not be suspended" except in cases of "Rebellion or Invasion." Two judges of the three-member appeals court panel ruled that the provision does not apply at Guantanamo because it is not on U.S. territory and the detainees are foreigners. A dissent written by Judge Judith Rogers pointed out that one of the earlier Supreme Court rulings stated that giving appeal rights to Guantanamo inmates "is consistent with the historical reach of the writ of habeas corpus." But the court has not ruled squarely on the constitutional issue.

Rather than wait for the court's decision, Congress should correct its own mistake. The 51 to 48 vote rejecting Mr. Specter's previous attempt to restore habeas condemned hundreds of foreign prisoners to indefinite detention without trial at Guantanamo; only a few score are expected to be prosecuted by the military commissions. Since 2002 it has become clear that a number of prisoners at the facility were arrested in error, are not terrorists and pose no threat to the United States. Moreover, improvements in the prisoners' treatment have come about largely because of their court appeals. Congress has both a practical and a moral interest in ensuring that this basic human right is restored.

DOJ_NMG_0135564

Editorial: Figures Don't Add Up (VENTCS)

Ventura County (CA) Star, February 23, 2007

The Justice Department's post-9/11 statistics on terrorism cases have been deeply flawed, sometimes inflated, sometimes underreported — in any case, just highly inaccurate. Only two out of 26 sets of statistics reported between 2001 and 2005 were found to be accurate by the department's inspector general, Glenn Fine.

The most erroneous were figures on terrorism prosecutions collected by the department's Executive Office of U.S. Attorneys. In 2004, the department reported 379 terrorism-related convictions, but Mr. Fine said the actual number was 240.

Given the penchant of the department's political leadership for overhyping terrorism-related cases, the natural inclination is to think that the figures were intentionally padded.

Mr. Fine, reassuringly, says no. He blamed the errors on a "decentralized and haphazard" system of data collection and disagreements over the definition of an "anti-terrorism" case.

The result was that unrelated offenses like immigration violations, marriage fraud, drug trafficking and firearms violations were included in the terrorism figures.

Given the sensitivity of these numbers, it's surprising that the department was so careless. The Bush administration has portrayed itself as tough on terrorism — invoking these same statistics to prove it — and, by extension, the Democrats as weak. If it got this wrong, it makes you wonder what else it got wrong.

The audit concluded that, "it is essential that the department report accurate terrorism-related statistics." After five years of the domestic war on terror, that's not asking a whole lot.

Terror Suspect's Statements Detail Time In Somalia (BOS/AP)

By Juan A. Lozano, Associated Press Writer

The Boston Globe, February 23, 2007

HOUSTON --Handwritten statements released Thursday depict the frustration, confusion and deception that revolved around a U.S. citizen accused of receiving training from al-Qaeda in his efforts to help overthrow the Somali government.

The three sets of statements, which Daniel Joseph Maldonado gave to FBI agents after his arrest in Kenya last month, detail in the 28-year-old's words why he left the United States, his time in Somalia and the frantic last few days he and his family spent in the country before his capture by authorities.

In his initial handwritten statement, Maldonado wrote he moved from the United States because of anti-Muslim sentiment following the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks and heard that Somalia was emerging as a "true Islamic state."

"I would be able to live, pray, act, dress and be a Muslim without anyone yelling at me, calling me names, refusing me jobs or apartments," he wrote.

He also said in later statements that he wanted to "fight jihad" or a holy war in Somalia.

The statements first became public during Maldonado's two-day probable cause and detention hearing earlier this week. A federal magistrate judge ruled Wednesday there was sufficient evidence that Maldonado received weapons and bombmaking training at a Somali camp where al-Qaeda members were also present. Maldonado was ordered held without bond until his trial.

Maldonado, 28, a Muslim convert also known as Daniel Aljughaifi and Abu Mohammed, is accused of traveling in November to an al-Qaeda terrorist camp in Somalia, where he was trained to use firearms and explosives in an effort to help another group, the Islamic Courts Union, topple the government and install an Islamic state. He was captured by the Kenyan military while trying to flee Somalia on Jan. 21.

He faces charges of undergoing military training with a terrorist organization and conspiring to use a weapon of mass destruction, specifically a bomb. If convicted, he faces up to life in prison.

During the hearing, FBI agent Loretta Eglen-Anderson testified she and other agents had him write down what he had done in Somalia.

DOJ_NMG_0135565

Maldonado, who grew up in Pelham, N.H., and lived in Houston from August 2005 to November 2005, moved with his wife and three children to Cairo, Egypt, before going to Somalia in November.

Maldonado wrote that he didn't find acceptance in Egypt nor when he first got to Somalia, which has not had an effective national government since 1991.

Eglen-Anderson testified Maldonado initially lied to FBI agents about his reasons for going to Somalia. In later statements, Maldonado admitted he "left out the fact that I wanted to fight jihad."

After arriving in Somalia, Maldonado wrote he and his family were taken in by a man. In revised statements he said the man gave him a gun and ammunition.

Maldonado left his family in the Somali capital of Mogadishu and traveled to the southern port city of Kismayo, where FBI agents and federal prosecutors said he went to receive weapons and bombmaking training at an al-Qaeda camp. Maldonado later admitted he did go to get training.

In his statements, Maldonado never mentioned al-Qaeda and said he was sick for a week with malaria after arriving in Kismayo.

After recovering in a hospital, Maldonado said he was asked again "to join the jihad. But I was more concerned with my family in Mogadishu and still doubtful about weather it was a valid jihad."

Maldonado later admitted he lied about his doubts.

Maldonado wrote that after the fighting in Somalia intensified, he tried to get his family to come to Kismayo so they could leave the country. He was reunited with his family but was told he and his family would have to travel separately to Kenya.

In his worry and frustration, Maldonado wrote he called his parents and lied to make them feel guilty.

"So I decided to make them feel bad by saying that I was a soldier and I was going to fight jihad and possibly die," he wrote.

Prosecutors said they don't think he was lying.

Maldonado was able to travel with his family part of the way to the Kenyan-Somali border.

"We said very sad good by's hoping for each others safety and her and the children left," he wrote.

In his efforts to get to the border, Maldonado traveled by boat and truck, ending up in a camp in a wooded area. The camp was raided and Maldonado fled, eventually being captured by Kenyan troops.

Maldonado's wife died of malaria but it is not clear where or when she died. The couple's three children are now being taken care of by Maldonado's parents in New Hampshire.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Independent Review Needed For Supermax (DENP)

Denver Post, February 23, 2007

Colorado's congressional delegation has been pushing to identify and resolve the prison's shortcomings. A sweeping inquiry should be conducted.

It's hard to know what to believe when it comes to assessing the state of security at the Supermax federal prison in Florence, which holds some of the most dangerous inmates in the country.

During a tour of the facility Wednesday, Barb Batulis, a Supermax guard and union representative, said the prison isn't adequately staffed. But U.S. Bureau of Prisons chief Harley Lappin said he can safely manage the institution with the staff he has. U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said he thinks the facility is secure but could be improved, though he shared no ideas.

That won't satisfy worried neighbors who want Lappin to erect a $23 million fence - not so much to keep the inmates inside as to keep their accomplices from approaching Supermax from the outside.

There have been troubling signals from the maximum security prison for some time. The question of adequate staffing came into focus last fall with release of a report by the Department of Justice inspector general. It said Supermax didn't have adequate staff or language skills to monitor communications between inmates and the outside world. The investigation was sparked by March 2005 media reports that said three convicted terrorists involved in the 1993 World Trade Center bombing wrote about 90 letters to Islamic extremists with links to the Madrid train bombings. Prison officials said they've taken steps to address the shortages.

DOJ_NMG_0135566

But that wasn't all. Shortly thereafter, an arbitrator ruled that staffing at the prison had gotten so low that working there had become more hazardous. The prison smartly hired more staff; however, union officials say at least some of the hires were destined for other understaffed prisons and not replaced. It's difficult to know whether the situation has improved or if prison officials are robbing Peter to pay Paul. But we do know this: Despite watching over some of the nation's most diabolical criminals, Supermax staffing is actually down from when it opened in 1994. Prison officials say the addition of cameras and other technology has lessened the need for guards.

Perhaps that's true. Or perhaps it's a convenient justification. Trouble is, everyone defining the problems and creating solutions has a self-interest that could color their assessment.

Colorado's congressional delegation has been active in pushing to resolve the prison's shortcomings, and they must work to penetrate the veil of ambiguity. A sweeping review of the prison's security and staffing should be conducted by the Government Accountability Office. The sooner the better.

Supermax Safety (PUEBCH)

Pueblo (CO) Chieftain, February 23, 2007

HOW SAFE is Supermax? U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales toured the nation's most secure federal prison on Wednesday and was assured security measures have been taken to beef up safety.

Sens. Wayne Allard and Ken Salazar accompanied the AG on the tour, and afterward Sen. Allard expressed confidence that the Administrative Maximum Security U.S. Penitentiary in Florence has been improved with technological upgrades. He added that more employees and more security measures could be coming in the future.

Sen. Salazar said, "We are committed to making sure this is the safest and most secure for the protection of the people who work and live here." Both senators previously had toured Supermax, and Sen. Salazar noted that staffing has been improved since then, in addition to the technology upgrades.

This is not to say that Supermax has not been without growing pains. An Inspector General's report issued last year detailed relaxed phone and mail monitoring, particularly for the terrorists being held inside the lockup.

As a result of that report, the Bureau of Prisons has monitored 100 percent of the mail to or from inmates designated as terrorists. All of those prisoners' phone calls also are monitored, although sometimes due to staffing patterns the calls are recorded, then listened to later.

Officials of the American Federation of Government Employees, the union representing the rank-and-file prison staffers, say more should be done to beef up security. Particularly, they believe staffing levels should be bolstered.

We certainly don't believe the prison housing the nastiest of nasties in the federal system ought to be operated unsafely, so the union's concerns should get a fair hearing. On the other hand, the judgment of the professional managers should also be given due weight.

Sen. Allard said the government probably will not be able to address 100 percent of the staffers' concerns at least right away - such things are a matter of available funding - but he added that more employees and more security could be coming in the future. With a growing prison population, such measures will have to be considered by Congress.

Report Details Harassment That Followed 9/11 Attacks (MINNST)

By Jean Hopfensperger, Star Tribune

Minneapolis Star Tribune, February 23, 2007

Minnesota Advocates for Human Rights says concerns about terrorism are exposing innocent people to discriminatory treatment.

Imani Jaafar-Mohammed, a Muslim lawyer from Woodbury, endured a neighbor throwing chunks of pork in her yard and yelling "terrorist!" from his window.

Hyder Khan, an Indian from Bloomington, says he can't print out his airline boarding pass in advance because there is a name like his on a security list.

DOJ_NMG_0135567

Dipankar Mukherjee, an Asian theater director from Minneapolis, says he has heard airline passengers request that they be moved so they don't have to sit next to him.

"When I used to travel back into the United States, people would say 'Welcome home,' " said Mukherjee. "Now they say, 'Step aside,' or 'Please go to this room.' "

The terrorist attacks of 9/11 still are casting a shadow on Minnesota's immigrant and Muslim community, according to a report issued Thursday by Minnesota Advocates for Human Rights. Racial and religious stereotyping continues to this day, as do overt acts of discrimination, the report said.

The 94-page report was based on interviews with more than 100 Minnesota immigrants. The events of 9/11 fueled changes in public attitudes toward national security and immigration that continue today, it said. Those changes were also aggravated by subsequent political campaigns targeting immigrants and the public debate over immigration reform, the report said.

"This was not meant to be a scientific study, but to detail history and real life experiences," said Robin Phillips, executive director of Minnesota Advocates for Human Rights. "We want to make sure that history and experience is included in the public policy dialogue."

Mukherjee, who spoke at a news conference Thursday announcing the report, was most exasperated by how he was constantly pulled from airport lines during "random" passenger checks. Once, after being released from one interview, he was pulled out of line again, less than an hour later.

The Department of Homeland Security, which oversees the Transportation Security Administration, has a policy strongly discouraging racial or ethnic profiling in law enforcement activities.

But immigrants are also targeted in unofficial ways, Mukherjee said. He recalled trying to get a receipt from a tow truck operator in Uptown last year. He said the operator yelled at him, "Why don't you first give me a receipt from the World Trade Center?"

Jaafar-Mohammed, meanwhile, said she and her husband had looked forward to their first home together in Woodbury. But the harassment from their neighbor reached the point that she feared for her safety. The Minneapolis attorney said she obtained a restraining order last year on the man, who eventually left their suburban neighborhood.

Harassment aside, federal policies to contain terrorism also continue to leave their mark, the report said. For example, some Muslims continue to worry whether their charitable donations to Islamic organizations could be construed as "material support" to terrorists groups, which is prohibited by the Patriot Act. Islam requires its followers to donate 2.5 percent of their savings to charity.

Several incidents of alleged misconduct by the FBI are mentioned in the report. A Somali man employed by a Twin Cities school district says he received a visit from the FBI at his home a day after he inquired about bus rentals for a school event. One of the questions he was asked; "What do you think of Saddam Hussein?"

FBI spokesman Paul McCabe said he had not been informed about the incidents mentioned in the report, and that they would be impossible to verify without names, dates and places. The authors of report, however, offered confidentiality to those they interviewed.

If people have concerns about the FBI, they should contact the FBI or a trusted community organization, he said. "We will investigate," McCabe said.

Phillips said that the Minnesota Advocates is interested in learning about other experiences -- good and bad -- resulting from Sept. 11. To report those experiences, or to view the report, go to www.mnadvocates.org.

In New Orleans, Progress At Last In The Lower Ninth Ward (NYT)

By Adam Nossiter

The New York Times, February 23, 2007

NEW ORLEANS, Feb. 22 — The first new houses built in the Lower Ninth Ward since Hurricane Katrina were turned over to their owners on Thursday, creating a small island of hope in a sea of ruin.

DOJ_NMG_0135568

Side by side, sparkling and bright on Delery Street at the neighborhood's eastern edge, the two houses unveiled at a ceremony on Thursday stand out in a landscape grimly frozen since the storm. The twin pastel variants on traditional New Orleans architecture sit incongruously whole amid block after block of ruined shells with doors swinging open and windows gaping wide.

Empty during the day and dark at night, this area is a long way from being a neighborhood again, even though it has been the focus of intensive volunteer efforts and organizing since the storm. The destruction of the Lower Ninth Ward, which was working-class and black before the hurricane, and its subsequent failure to begin recovering, have become symbols for what some see as inequities in this city's halting revival.

That symbolism was much in evidence at the ceremony, a gathering of the homeowners and the varied volunteer forces that built the $125,000 solid pine houses, which officials said are elevated five feet and designed to resist hurricane-force winds. It was an occasion to look past the catastrophe that sent a wall of water rushing into the Lower Ninth Ward 18 months ago, at least for the moment. If the levees fail again and a similar volume of water comes through, the new houses will take only two feet of water, the contractor said.

There were promises on Thursday to bring the neighborhood back, particularly from Acorn, the nonprofit neighborhood group that organized the construction and helped finance the two houses. There was cheering, there were plaques for the volunteers, and there were speeches by politicians and preachers.

And there were the two sturdy women who had been next-door neighbors for 25 years until Hurricane Katrina blew their houses away, the owners Gwendolyn Guice and Josephine Butler, who received the keys to the new houses on Thursday.

Acorn and the volunteers built the houses on the same spot as the women's original ones, and both women seemed overcome at being back.

"I'm all over hoops," Ms. Guice said, switching between tears and smiles as she happily showed off her trim little green house, a subtle modification of the classic New Orleans front-to-back-hall style.

Looking out the back at a nearby school building with a collapsed roof and a muddy vacant lot where there was once a house, Ms. Guice was adamant that Thursday represented a hopeful beginning on a street that once sheltered many solid homeowners.

"A lot of people are just sitting back, waiting and seeing," Ms. Guice said.

Her re-installment and Ms. Butler's, she insisted, would help draw people back. And given the privations of her long exile, much of it spent in Houston, she would not be fazed by living in the ward's darkness and isolation, she suggested.

She showed no regrets about the fate of her old house.

"I never did find the den," Ms. Guice said. "It just shoved straight off. It might be floating in the gulf."

Still, the complications of the demonstration project on Delery Street raise questions about its usefulness as a prototype. The two houses were financed by Acorn and a California bank, and the two women are planning to repay their loans using their insurance proceeds and money they hope will be forthcoming from Louisiana's Road Home housing aid program. Louisiana State University's School of Architecture helped design the houses, students from the school helped build them, young people from Covenant House did odd jobs, a church provided landscaping, and even the novelist Richard Ford, who recently moved back to the city, pitched in.

How often this process could be replicated is unclear, though Acorn has money for more loans. Some believe that a neighborhood as destitute as this one cannot come back without large-scale intervention.

"I think we have a problem of quantity, and anything that can't be delivered in quantity is not a suitable prototype, regardless of the fantastic intentions," said Andrés Duany, the Miami architect and planner who has played a leading role in this city's efforts at rebuilding. "The verification is not aesthetics, not the degree of good will; it's quantity."

But under Thursday's bright sun, the focus was not on the hurdles.

"If you try not to focus on how bad everything is, you can focus on what is good," Allan Jones, an electrician who worked on the two houses, said as he surveyed the bleak landscape. "There is potential."

Mr. Ford spoke at the ceremony of the "valiant and hopeful house-raising," and those words captured the spirit of an enterprise that seemed as much a challenge to the future as a foundation for something new.

DOJ_NMG_0135569

When Ms. Butler moved to the area nearly 60 years ago, it was still a semi-wilderness, recalled Tanya Harris, her granddaughter and an Acorn official.

"This was a shot in the dark," Ms. Harris said. "This was a leap of faith."

Senator Lott Floods The Zone (WSJ)

By Kimberley Strassel

The Wall Street Journal, February 23, 2007

One big question when Democrats took over Congress was which industry would be first to feel the new majority's populist rage. Oil? Pharma? Banks? Corporate America just got its answer, direct from the angriest man to have been empowered in the past election: Republican Sen. Trent Lott.

The Mississippian was "infuriated" by the insurance industry's refusal to shell out for certain Katrina claims, most notably his own. So Mr. Lott is spearheading a ferocious campaign of political revenge that would make even Henry Waxman envious -- replete with investigations, voracious trial lawyers, ambitious state attorneys general and threats of punitive federal legislation. And like most personal grievances that get morphed into policy battles, it's ending badly for consumers.

Mr. Lott's beachfront property in Pascagoula -- one of three homes he owned -- was swept away entirely by Hurricane Katrina's waters. Like many Gulf Coast residents, Mr. Lott was soon reminded by his insurer, State Farm, that his policy only covered wind damage -- not flood damage. The senator surely knew that, which is why he'd also purchased federal flood insurance. According to his flood policy that was in effect when Katrina hit, he was covered up to $350,000 in flood damages, and he presumably collected in full. (Sen. Lott's office didn't return my call.)

State Farm, however, refused to cough up, inspiring Mr. Lott to embark on a campaign ripped straight out of the Democratic playbook. First was to pay a call to the favorite mob squad of the left, the plaintiffs' bar. Quicker than you can say "tort reform," Dickie Scruggs, the legal kingpin who engineered Mississippi's tobacco shakedown, was representing Mr. Lott in a high-profile lawsuit against State Farm.

Mr. Lott probably didn't have to do much special pleading, since Mr. Scruggs is his brother-in-law, and had also suffered Katrina damage. Mr. Scruggs is also a pal of Mississippi Attorney General Jim Hood, who within a few weeks of Katrina had filed a lawsuit against insurers over their "unconscionable" decision to not pay for damage they didn't cover. By December of 2005, the Lott-Scruggs-Hood triangle was proving a gale force storm for insurers.

For his part, Mr. Lott has been busy cranking up the pressure in Washington. Not that he didn't give fair warning. In July of last year, he placed a call to Chuck Chamness, the CEO of the National Association of Mutual Insurance Companies, to let the industry know what was coming. Mr. Chamness later sent a letter to Mr. Lott, summing up the call. The key passage: "Your comment that you will dedicate your next term of office to 'bringing down State Farm and the industry' through all means available to you, including legislation designed to harm the property/casualty insurance industry, was very unsettling, to say the least."

Mr. Lott has proven as good as his word. Since Katrina, he's slipped legislation into a Homeland Security bill requiring the inspector general of that agency to investigate insurers. He's put forward a bill requiring insurers to "state clearly" on their policies' "front page" what they don't cover. He's dropped another bill that would compel insurers to release more information about vehicles damaged by Katrina. Word is he's even been looking into the industry's tax rates.

But his big bomb came last week, when he introduced legislation that would end the insurance industry's exemption from certain federal antitrust regulations. Mr. Lott suggests this is to keep big insurance players from conspiring to do evil things, though the reality is that the exemption mainly benefits small insurers who use it to pool statistically reliable data. So in his wrath, Mr. Lott may end up kneecapping many of the hundreds of small insurers who offer some real competition to the so-called conspiring giants.

Democrats have been only too happy to assist in this fight, given their own ambitions of turning the Katrina mess to their political advantage. Mr. Lott's been getting his biggest help from fellow Mississippian and Democrat Gene Taylor -- who also has a beef with State Farm and was part of the Scruggs lawsuit. In January, Mr. Taylor asked Financial Services Committee chief Barney Frank for an investigation into insurers' Katrina practices. Mr. Frank was only too happy to take the first step and next week Mr. Taylor will be the star witness in a subcommittee hearing about insurers' decision not to pay claims. Next up: subpoenas.

DOJ_NMG_0135570

(Congressman Taylor, in a conversation with me yesterday, said he thinks it is "extremely appropriate" that he is in this insurance fight because "what happened to my constituents, my neighbors and my friends also happened to me.")

Meanwhile, Attorney General Hood has deftly used Messrs. Lott's and Taylor's Washington moves as a prod for his own agenda. In a public statement in January he noted that if insurers didn't settle with him, and continued "with their 'robber baron' mentality, I think that Congressman Taylor and [Congressman Bennie] Thompson and Senator Lott will see to it that we have national insurance reform." How's that for a threat?

Within a few weeks State Farm had agreed to settle with the Attorney General Hood and to review 35,000 claims, as well as agreed to pay off all those in the Scruggs lawsuit, including Messrs. Lott and Taylor. Any bets on just how big a slice of his contingency fees Mr. Scruggs will now donate to the Democratic National Committee for next year's elections?

Lost among all the politicians' war-whooping over the State Farm capitulation, is the effect this extortion has had on the private insurance industry. In recent weeks companies from State Farm to AllState have stopped writing policies in parts of Mississippi, which will result in consumers having fewer insurance choices, if they can find insurance at all.

Ah, but never fear: Washington has a solution for that, too. In the face of insurers exiting his state (in no small part because of the actions of politicians), Mr. Taylor earlier this month introduced yet another piece of insurance legislation. This one would expand the national flood insurance program to cover other hurricane-related damage. In other words, the Mississippian wants to create a new federal disaster insurance program that will put taxpayers -- rather than private insurers -- on the hook next time a storm hits. Revenge is a scary thing.

WAR NEWS:

Senate Dems Move To Limit Iraq Mission (AP)

By David Espo

AP, February 23, 2007

Determined to challenge President Bush, Senate Democrats are drafting legislation to limit the mission of U.S. troops in Iraq, effectively revoking the broad authority Congress granted in 2002, officials said Thursday.

While these officials said the precise wording of the measure remains unsettled, one draft would restrict American troops in Iraq to combating al-Qaida, training Iraqi army and police forces, maintaining Iraq's territorial integrity and otherwise proceeding with the withdrawal of combat forces.

The officials, Democratic aides and others familiar with private discussions, spoke only on condition of anonymity, saying rank-and-file senators had not yet been briefed on the effort. They added, though, the Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid is expected to present the proposal to fellow Democrats early next week for their consideration.

The plan is to attempt to add the measure to anti-terrorism legislation that scheduled to be on the Senate floor next week and the week following.

Jim Manley, a spokesman for Reid, declined to discuss the deliberations, saying only, "No final decisions have been made on how to proceed."

Any attempt to limit Bush's powers as commander in chief would likely face strong opposition from Republican allies of the administration in the Senate and could also face a veto threat.

The decision to try to limit the military mission marks the next move in what Reid and other Senate war critics have said will be a multistep effort to force a change in Bush's strategy and eventually force an end to U.S. participation in the nearly four-year-old war.

Earlier efforts to pass a nonbinding measure critical of Bush's decision to deploy 21,500 additional troops ended in gridlock after Senate Republicans blocked votes on two separate measures.

The emerging Senate plan differs markedly from an approach favored by critics of the war in the House, where a nonbinding measure passed last week.

Speaker Nancy Pelosi has said she expects the next challenge to Bush's war policies to come in the form of legislation requiring the Pentagon to adhere to strict training and readiness standards in the case of troops ticketed for the war zone.

DOJ_NMG_0135571

Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., the leading advocate of that approach, has said it would effectively deny Bush the ability to proceed with the troop buildup that has been partially implemented since he announced it in January.

Some Senate Democrats have been privately critical of that approach, saying it would have virtually no chance of passing and could easily backfire politically in the face of Republican arguments that it would deny reinforcements to troops already in the war zone.

Several Senate Democrats have called in recent days for revoking the original authorization that Bush sought and won from Congress in the months before the U.S.-led invasion that toppled Saddam Hussein.

That measure authorized the president to use the armed forces "as he determines to be necessary and appropriate ... to defend the national security of the United States against the continuing threat posed by Iraq" and to enforce relevant United Nations Security Council resolutions.

At the time the world body had passed resolutions regarding Iraq's presumed effort to develop weapons of mass destruction.

In a speech last week, Sen. Joseph Biden of Delaware, chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, said, "I am working on legislation to repeal that authorization and replace it with a much narrower mission statement for our troops in Iraq."

He added that Congress should make clear what the mission of U.S. troops is: to responsibly draw down, while continuing to combat terrorists, train Iraqis and respond to emergencies.

"We should make equally clear what their mission is not: to stay in Iraq indefinitely and get mired in a savage civil war," said Biden, a 2008 Democratic presidential candidate.

Along with Biden, officials said Sen. Carl Levin of Michigan, chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, and a small group of key Democrats were involved in the effort to draft legislation. Leadership aides are also playing a role.

It was not clear whether the measure would explicitly state that the 2002 authorization for the use of military force was being revoked. One proposal that had been circulated would declare that Bush was not authorized to involve U.S. armed forces in an Iraqi civil war, but it appeared that prohibition had been dropped as part of the discussions.

One Democrat said the legislation could remain silent on the issue of Bush's troop increase and noted that Reid had said he was ready to move beyond the deployment of more troops.

At the same time, several officials noted that any explicit authority for U.S. troops to confront al-Qaida would effectively bless Bush's decision to dispatch about 3,500 troops to the volatile Anbar Province in the western part of Iraq.

The balance of the 21,500 additional troops would go to Baghdad, where the administration hopes they can help quell sectarian violence and give the Iraqi government time to establish its authority.

Democrats May Try To Limit Iraq Mission (USAT)

USA Today, February 23, 2007

Senate Democrats are drafting legislation that would limit the mission of U.S. troops in Iraq, Democratic aides told the Associated Press on Thursday.

The aides said that the precise wording of the measure has yet to be determined but that one draft would restrict American troops in Iraq to combating al-Qaeda, training Iraqi army and police forces, maintaining Iraq's territorial integrity and otherwise proceeding with the withdrawal of combat forces.

The aides and others familiar with private discussions spoke on condition of anonymity because most senators had not yet been briefed.

U.S. cancels Nevada bomb test

The Pentagon canceled a planned explosion over the Nevada desert to test a conventional weapon intended for use on underground facilities that produce and store weapons of mass destruction. James Tegnelia of the Defense Threat Reduction Agency said, "It's time to look at alternative methods" that don't involve "this type of large-scale test." Indian tribes and state officials said the test could kick up radioactive material from earlier nuclear tests.

Ga. congressional election set

DOJ_NMG_0135572

Georgia Gov. Sonny Perdue set June 19 for a special election to fill the congressional seat left vacant by the death last week of Republican Rep. Charles Norwood. If no candidate receives a majority, a runoff between the top two vote-getters will be July 17. Norwood, 65, was in his seventh term.

Bush touts use of biofuels

President Bush, touting his plan to boost use of biofuels fivefold over 10 years, toured a Franklinton, N.C., laboratory that is working on ways to convert wood chips to ethanol. Bush's plan relies on advances in making ethanol from sources such as wood chips and switchgrass rather than just corn. Bush's trip is designed to promote energy initiatives he outlined in his State of the Union address.

Senate Democrats Keep Pressure On Bush With Plan To Limit Iraq Mission To Counterterrorism (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, February 23, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 22 — Senior Senate Democrats, stepping up their confrontation with President Bush over Iraq policy, are preparing legislation that would limit the role of United States troops there to counterterrorism efforts and prohibit them from interceding in sectarian violence.

Senate officials said Thursday that the proposal now being drafted would be a new turn in their attempts to force the White House to halt its troop buildup in Baghdad. They described it as more substantive than the nonbinding resolution of opposition to the increase that stalled in the Senate last Saturday.

The officials would speak only if not identified because the central proposal was still being drafted and needs to be presented to all Senate Democrats when they return from a weeklong recess next Tuesday.

They said the proposal was intended to essentially overturn the 2002 resolution granting Mr. Bush the authority to remove Saddam Hussein from power, and limit the military to combating Al Qaeda in Iraq, keeping Iraq from becoming a haven for terrorists and training Iraqi forces. The proposal's goal, officials said, would be to allow combat forces not engaged in those duties to be removed from Iraq next year.

The chief authors are Senators Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware, the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, and Carl Levin of Michigan, the chairman of the Armed Services Committee. The plan is to try to attach the proposal to an antiterrorism bill the Senate expects to begin considering Tuesday.

Lawmakers and senior aides said that such a plan was unlikely to pass Congress, and even if it did, it would certainly be vetoed by President Bush. But Democrats say their intention is to keep pressure on both Mr. Bush and Congressional Republicans who are facing a public frustrated with the war. Democrats say that other Iraq proposals are likely to emerge as well.

Senate Democrats say they prefer the emphasis on the mission of American troops over a plan by some House members to try to limit United States military involvement by putting restraints on troop deployments based on readiness and equipment availability.

Senate Democrats have been discussing such an approach in recent weeks and decided to forge ahead after Senate Republicans were able to block a vote on the resolution criticizing the troop buildup even though 56 senators, including 7 Republicans, voted last Saturday to debate the resolution.

In meetings with Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the majority leader, and other Democratic leaders, officials said a consensus emerged that trying to redefine the 2002 resolution was the best approach. Officials said lawmakers and senior aides were still refining the exact language that would be used and were uncertain whether the new proposal would explicitly repeal the initial Iraq war resolution, amend it or take another avenue. "We haven't crossed that bridge yet," one official said.

But he and others said they believed the initiative made good political and policy sense because the circumstances had changed so much since the 2002 vote, with Saddam Hussein executed and the search for weapons of mass destruction coming up empty.

Senator Biden foreshadowed his approach in a speech last week when he said that the "the best next step is to revisit the authorization Congress granted the president in 2002 to use force in Iraq. That's exactly what I'm doing."

DOJ_NMG_0135573

"We gave the president that power to destroy Iraq's weapons of mass destruction and, if necessary, to depose Saddam Hussein," he said. "The W.M.D. were not there. Saddam Hussein is no longer there. The 2002 authorization is no longer relevant to the situation in Iraq."

Republican leaders have already said they expected the new Democratic effort to be blocked. But Democrats said they saw it as the next step to building a case against Mr. Bush's war effort and that Republicans could be drawn to it if the war continued to go badly.

They said they believed that the initiative had the capacity to attract broad support from Democrats even though members of the party were splintered over how aggressively to confront Mr. Bush over the war. Officials said they were heartened that the Democratic senators Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts and Russell D. Feingold of Wisconsin, two strong war opponents, seemed open to the idea of embracing the new proposal by Senators Levin and Biden.

Jim Manley, a spokesman for Mr. Reid, would not discuss the plans that Democrats have for moving forward on Iraq policy next week, saying no final decisions had been made on how to proceed.

Democrats Seek To Repeal 2002 War Authorization (WP)

By Shailagh Murray And Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, February 23, 2007

Senate Democratic leaders intend to unveil a plan next week to repeal the 2002 resolution authorizing the war in Iraq in favor of narrower authority that restricts the military's role and begins withdrawals of combat troops.

House Democrats have pulled back from efforts to link additional funding for the war to strict troop-readiness standards after the proposal came under withering fire from Republicans and from their party's own moderates. That strategy was championed by Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.) and endorsed by House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.).

"If you strictly limit a commander's ability to rotate troops in and out of Iraq, that kind of inflexibility could put some missions and some troops at risk," said Rep. Chet Edwards (D-Tex.), who personally lodged his concerns with Murtha.

In both chambers, Democratic lawmakers are eager to take up binding legislation that would impose clear limits on U.S. involvement in Iraq after nearly four years of war. But Democrats remain divided over how to proceed. Some want to avoid the funding debate altogether, fearing it would invite Republican charges that the party is not supporting the troops. Others take a more aggressive view, believing the most effective way to confront President Bush's war policy is through a $100 billion war-spending bill that the president ultimately must sign to keep the war effort on track.

Last week, the House approved a nonbinding resolution that criticized Bush's decision to deploy an additional 21,500 troops, but the measure was blocked in the Senate by Republicans during a rare Saturday session. It is probable that Senate Democrats will encounter the same procedural roadblock in attempting to push through another resolution, in particular one with real teeth.

"I've had enough of 'nonbinding,' " said Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.), who is helping to draft the new Democratic proposal. The 2002 war resolution, he said, is an obvious target.

"The authorization that we gave the president back in 2002 is completely, completely outdated, inappropriate to what we're engaged in today," he said.

Senate Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.) began calling for a reauthorization of the war early last month and raised it again last week, during a gathering in the office of Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.). Participants included Kerry, Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl M. Levin (Mich.), Charles E. Schumer (N.Y.), Jack Reed (R.I.) and Russell Feingold (Wis.). Those Democratic senators have emerged as an unofficial war council representing the caucus's wide range of views.

"We gave the president that power to destroy Iraq's weapons of mass destruction and, if necessary, to depose Saddam Hussein," Biden said of the 2002 resolution in a speech last week before the Brookings Institution. "The WMD was not there. Saddam Hussein is no longer there. The 2002 authorization is no longer relevant to the situation in Iraq."

Biden and Levin are drafting language to present to their colleagues when the Senate reconvenes on Tuesday, following a week-long recess.

DOJ_NMG_0135574

The new framework would set a goal for withdrawing combat brigades by March 31, 2008, the same timetable established by the bipartisan Iraq Study Group. Once the combat phase ends, troops would be restricted to assisting Iraqis with training, border security and counterterrorism.

Senior Democratic aides said the proposed resolution would be sent directly to the Senate floor for action, without committee review, possibly as an amendment to a homeland security bill scheduled for debate next week.

Reid said no final decision had been made on the timing. Spokesman Jim Manley said Reid wants to present the idea to other Democrats before determining how and when to proceed.

Party leaders in the House are likely to present a proposal for binding legislation to the Democratic caucus next week, according to lawmakers in that chamber. But lawmakers and senior Democratic aides said Murtha's plan would have to be scaled back dramatically, after a week-long Republican assault.

Murtha, chairman of the Appropriations defense subcommittee and a leading critic of the war, had intended to fully fund Bush's $100 billion war request for the remainder of this fiscal year. But under his plan, those funds could be spent only to deploy combat troops deemed fully rested, trained and equipped.

After nearly four years of combat, most military units would not be able to meet those standards. Although the war would be fully funded, the policy would prevent some of the 21,500 additional combat troops from being deployed, and some troops already in Iraq would have to be sent home.

But that approach may be all but dead, according to several Democratic lawmakers. Murtha doomed his own plan in part by unveiling it on a left-wing Web site, inflaming party moderates.

"Congress has no business micromanaging a war, cutting off funding or even conditioning those funds," said Rep. Jim Cooper (Tenn.), a leading Democratic moderate, who called Murtha's whole effort "clumsy."

Cooper's position underscores the challenges now facing the House Democratic leadership. While the caucus's liberal wing is demanding legislation to end the war almost immediately, moderates such as Cooper say Congress should focus on oversight of the war and stay away from legislation that encroaches on the war powers of the president.

"I think Congress begins to skate on thin ice when we start to micromanage troop deployments and rotations," said Texas's Edwards, whose views reflect those of several other Democrats from conservative districts.

House Democratic Caucus Chairman Rahm Emanuel (Ill.) pointed out that Democrats still have public opinion strongly on their side and that a vote on any plan would place Republicans in more jeopardy than Democrats. A new, more restrictive authorization for the war also is gaining serious consideration in the House, Emanuel noted.

Several Democratic aides say the Iraq funding bill, due for a vote the week of March 12, may contain some of Murtha's demands for more training and better equipment for combat troops. But the proposals that set the toughest requirements are likely to drop out, such as a demand that troops be trained on and deployed with the combat equipment they will use in Iraq.

More important, the legislation may include a waiver that the president or defense secretary could invoke to deploy troops who are not fully combat-ready, Democratic aides said. That way, the commander in chief's hands would not be tied.

But under such a bill the president would have to publicly acknowledge that he is deploying troops with less than a year's rest from combat, that he is extending combat tours of troops in Iraq, or that he is sending units into battle without full training in counterinsurgency or urban warfare, the aides said.

Lieberman Says War Vote Could Prompt Party Switch (POL)

By Carrie Budoff

Politico.com, February 23, 2007

Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman of Connecticut told the Politico on Thursday that he has no immediate plans to switch parties but suggested that Democratic opposition to funding the war in Iraq might change his mind.

Lieberman, a self-styled independent who caucuses with the Democrats, has been among the strongest supporters of the war and President Bush's plan to send an additional 21,500 combat troops into Iraq to help quell the violence there.

"I have no desire to change parties," Lieberman said in a telephone interview. "If that ever happens, it is because I feel the majority of Democrats have gone in a direction that I don't feel comfortable with."

DOJ_NMG_0135575

Asked whether that hasn't already happened with Iraq, Lieberman said: "We will see how that plays out in the coming months," specifically how the party approaches the issue of continued funding for the war.

He suggested, however, that the forthcoming showdown over new funding could be a deciding factor that would lure him to the Republican Party.

"I hope we don't get to that point," Lieberman said. "That's about all I will say on it today. That would hurt."

Republicans have long targeted Lieberman to switch – a move that would give them control of the Senate. And Time magazine is set to report Friday that there is a "remote" chance Lieberman would join the GOP.

What Joe Lieberman Wants... (TIME)

By Massimo Calabresi

Time, February 23, 2007

In his 18 years in the U.S. Senate, Joe Lieberman has cultivated an image of himself as a lonely prude among the morally corrupt, that rare Washington official who places principle above politics. But with the Democrats' hold on power dependent on just one vote — in effect, his — and with Republicans courting him to tilt the balance in their favor, Lieberman has been indulging in some fairly immodest political footsie. Early this year he terrified fellow Democrats by skipping several of the weekly caucus lunches that cement party fidelity in the Senate. Recently he was spotted in the Republican cloakroom talking with South Carolina's Lindsey Graham about reforming Social Security. He even says he might vote Republican for President in 2008, a not-so-veiled hint that he would prefer John McCain, his fellow true believer in the Iraq war, to most, perhaps all, Democratic alternatives.

The Democrats' 2000 candidate for Vice President is the only party member in the Senate supporting President Bush's Iraq policy and says he is "very troubled about the direction the party is heading on foreign policy generally." With his re-election in November, many old allies now rue abandoning him after he lost the Connecticut Democratic primary to Ned Lamont last August. Both sides concede that bitterness remains. "It's still a little painful and awkward," says the majority whip, Dick Durbin, "but I think the caucus counts him as a friend."

Lieberman says leaving the Democratic Party is a "very remote possibility." But even that slight ambiguity — and all his cross-aisle flirtation — has proved more than enough to position Lieberman as the Senate's one-man tipping point. If he were to jump ship, the ensuing shift of power to Republicans would scramble the politics of the war in Iraq, undercut the Democrats' national agenda and potentially weaken their hopes for the White House in 2008. Those stakes are high enough to give Lieberman leverage with both parties no matter how slim the chance of his crossing the aisle. Which means Senate leaders aren't worrying only about whether Joe Lieberman will switch parties. They're wondering what, if anything, he plans to do with the power that comes from keeping that possibility alive.

So far, Lieberman is using his clout mostly in ways that discomfit his fellow Democrats, while his relationship with Republicans has involved more collaboration than coercion. When Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid said Bush's State of the Union proposal for a bipartisan terrorism panel was redundant, Lieberman, who supported the idea, privately sent Reid a letter saying he was "upset." Within days, Reid backed down and negotiated the panel's makeup with the White House. And last month, after Lieberman told Reid he had stopped attending the weekly Democratic lunch because he didn't feel comfortable discussing Iraq there, Reid offered to hold those discussions at another time. Lieberman has started attending again.

It stands to reason that Lieberman, a lifelong Democrat, would be interested in extracting concessions from Republicans as well. He describes himself as a hawk abroad, and lately his rhetoric has come to resemble the G.O.P.'s, notably when he said Democratic opposition to Bush's troop surge would "discourage our troops, hearten our enemies." But he's progressive at home; he has a long record of fighting for environmental concerns, prides himself on his early support for the civil rights movement and has earned strong ratings from labor. He's even working on a military mental-health bill with California liberal Barbara Boxer. His staff claims he votes with Democrats more than 90% of the time, if Iraq is removed from the calculation.

And Lieberman is uniquely positioned to influence the Bush Administration. In December 2004 the White House "sounded him out" for the job of U.N. ambassador, says a source close to Lieberman, and although he declined the offer, he remains in regular contact with the Executive Branch. Before Bush's State of the Union speech in January, National Security Adviser Stephen

DOJ_NMG_0135576

Hadley brought in Lieberman for a private consultation with the President. Lieberman says he talks with or e-mails Hadley, Homeland Security chief Michael Chertoff and White House legislative-affairs head Candida Wolff every week or two.

Lieberman's G.O.P. flirtation has its risks — and a time limit. By this time next year, the 2008 election cycle will overshadow anything that happens in the Senate. The longer he waits to capitalize on his moment, the greater the danger that he'll be tagged as one of those politicians for whom having power is more important than using it.

Republican Critic Of Iraq Policy Vows Not To 'Starve' The War (MCT)

By Renee Schoof

McClatchy Newspapers, February 23, 2007

WASHINGTON - A longtime Republican opponent of the Iraq war, Rep. Walter Jones of North Carolina, broke ranks Thursday with Democratic Rep. John Murtha over Murtha's plan to attach conditions to war funds.

The split signals that divisions among war opponents are likely to emerge next week when Congress returns from recess. Murtha and other Democrats have said they'll look at how they might use congressional power over military regulations and funding to pressure the Bush administration to redeploy U.S. forces out of Iraq.

Murtha, D-Pa., chairs the House Appropriations Defense Subcommittee. Last week he said he'd amend the bill funding the war so that U.S. troop deployments couldn't be extended beyond one year and so that troops would have at least one year at home between deployments and be certified as "fully combat ready" with training and equipment before being sent.

Murtha also said he'd try to prevent the military from using "stop-loss" orders to force soldiers to remain on active duty beyond the terms of their enlistments.

Murtha said those steps would effectively stop the troop increase.

"They won't be able to do the deployment," he said. "They won't have the equipment. They won't have the training."

Jones applauded Murtha's intention to require proper training and equipment, but he said he opposed any effort to "starve" the war.

"I believe that we must take great care to ensure that any effort to provide for our armed forces not be used as a proxy for resolving larger issues concerning the war in Iraq," Jones wrote in a letter to Murtha. "Any attempt to starve the war as a way of bringing it to a conclusion, rather than through a serious policy debate about the best way forward in Iraq, would be wrong."

Jones argued that until "elected officials in Washington" change the mission of the troops in Iraq, "their funding should be unfettered by appropriations strings."

Murtha didn't issue an immediate public response to Jones.

Jones was a co-sponsor of the nonbinding resolution the House of Representatives passed earlier this month that opposed President Bush's plan to send more than 21,000 additional U.S. soldiers and Marines to Iraq.

A conservative whose district includes the Camp Lejeune Marine Corps base, Jones voted in 2002 for the resolution that authorized the war in Iraq. Later, he concluded that pro-war administration officials had manipulated intelligence and that the war was unjustified. Jones called on Bush in 2005 to set a timetable to begin withdrawing troops by fall 2006.

Jones has personally signed more than 6,000 two-page letters to the families of all Americans killed in Afghanistan and Iraq.

In his letter to Murtha, Jones said he holds accountable "those institutions and individuals who have made serious misjudgments leading up to, and during, the war in Iraq." But he added that he had assured his constituents and members of the armed forces that he wouldn't vote to cut off funding for troops in the field.

Jones easily won re-election in November to his seventh term.

Rep. Sam Johnson Emerges As GOP Voice In War Debate (LAT)

By Richard Simon

The Los Angeles Times, February 23, 2007

WASHINGTON — When House Republicans needed a John McCain-like war hero to lead their fight against Democratic assaults on President Bush's Iraq strategy, they turned to another former POW, a Texas Republican named Sam Johnson.

DOJ_NMG_0135577

Though less known than Sen. McCain (R-Ariz.), his onetime cellmate in Vietnam, Johnson spent nearly seven years in a prisoner of war camp, about half of it in solitary confinement. When he took to the House floor during last week's emotional debate on the Iraq war, the 76-year-old former fighter pilot drew heavily on Vietnam experiences.

He spoke about his 2,494 days of "hell on Earth" in captivity and his "rat-infested 3-by-8 dark and filthy cell," while displaying the effects of injuries he sustained 34 years ago: a mangled right hand, stooped posture and slow gait.

Johnson has emerged as the House GOP's point man in an escalating fight in Congress over Bush's execution of the war — a position that puts him opposite another decorated Vietnam veteran, Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.). GOP leaders see Johnson as the Republican best suited to counter Murtha, an ex-Marine and defense hawk who has become a influential war critic. "I respect John Murtha as a Marine," Johnson said. "However, serviceman to serviceman, I think his efforts are misguided."

Johnson is preparing for the next phase of challenges to Bush's war strategy. Murtha, who heads the House defense appropriations subcommittee, is moving to attach strings to Bush's war-funding request that could thwart his plan to add 21,500 troops to the 135,000-plus already in Iraq.

Both parties have featured military veterans prominently to make their case in the debate over the 4-year-old war.

Johnson led a parade of congressional military veterans in the GOP's losing fight last week against a symbolic resolution, sponsored by the House's Democratic majority, that put the chamber on record against a buildup of U.S. troops in Iraq.

He marked the 34th anniversary of his first full day of freedom from POW camp during the debate.

And he gave the closing speech — one of the most impassioned during four days of debate — opposing the resolution.

"Let my body serve as a brutal reminder that we must not repeat the mistakes of the past," Johnson said. "We must not cut funding for our troops. We must stick by them. We must support them all the way."

He delivered a salute and returned to his seat as members of both parties applauded.

A Johnson staffer said the response to Johnson's stand had been overwhelmingly positive. "We've received phone calls from across America of grown men crying," said communications director McCall Avery.

But, said Texas state Rep. Lon Burnam, a Democrat who is director of the Dallas Peace Center, Johnson is going against public opinion on the war. "Sam Johnson is never going to pay attention to that because he is a hard-right, ideologically driven hawk," he said. "We don't bother to go to talk to him."

Liberal bloggers have also taken Johnson to task, posting remarks he made in 1995 in support of withholding funds from President Clinton's plan to send 20,000 American peacekeeping troops to Bosnia.

"I wholeheartedly support withholding funds from President Clinton's Bosnia mission," Johnson said then. "Although it is a drastic step and ties the president's hands, I do not feel like we have any other choice. The president has tied our hands, gone against the wishes of the American people, and this is the last best way I know how to show my respect for our American servicemen and -women."

Johnson defended his earlier comments Thursday, noting that in 1995 he opposed the deployment of troops to Bosnia "in the first place."

"In 2002, I supported sending our guys to Iraq, and I stand by that decision today," he said. "The Democrats who voted to go to war in Iraq in 2002 and just voted against our troops are the ones who are changing their tune."

Johnson made headlines in 2005 for suggesting that the weapons of mass destruction that U.S. troops failed to find in Iraq were in Syria and offering to drop a nuclear bomb on the country.

He later said he was joking.

Johnson was elected to the House in 1991 after serving six years in the Texas Legislature. Before that, he served in the Air Force for 29 years, once flying with the Thunderbirds, the Air Force's precision demonstration team.

He flew 62 combat missions in the Korean War in a plane named Shirley's Texas Tornado after his then-wife. On his 25th Vietnam mission, he was shot down in 1966 and captured.

"While in solitary confinement, my captors kept me in leg stocks, like the pilgrims, … for 72 days," he recalled during the debate. Next, he said, "they put me in leg irons … for 2 1/2 years."

Last week was not the first time Bush's allies called on Johnson because of his military background. In the 2000 presidential campaign, Johnson went to South Carolina to campaign for Bush against McCain. And during the 2004 campaign,

DOJ_NMG_0135578

Johnson called Democratic presidential candidate Sen. John F. Kerry, a decorated Vietnam veteran, "Hanoi John" — a comparison to actress Jane Fonda, who is still reviled by many for her trip to North Vietnam during the war.

But Johnson, a conservative, also has broken with Bush. He recently opposed a Vietnam trade agreement that was a presidential priority, and Bush's call to include a guest-worker program in an immigration overhaul.

No Way To End A War (WP)

By Charles Krauthammer

The Washington Post, February 23, 2007

The United States has fought many wars since 1941 but has never again declared one. No one abroad declares war anymore either, perhaps because it has the anachronistic feel of an aristocratic challenge. Whatever the reason, today Congress doesn't declare war; it "authorizes" the "use of force."

In October 2002, both houses of Congress did exactly that with open eyes and large majorities. Sen. Jay Rockefeller, a Democratic member of the Senate intelligence committee who had access to all the relevant information at the time, said, "I have come to the inescapable conclusion that the threat posed to America by Saddam's weapons of mass destruction is so serious that despite the risks -- and we should not minimize the risks -- we must authorize the president to take the necessary steps to deal with that threat."

Now, more than four years later, the Democrats want out of the resulting war. Most, such as Rep. John Murtha, want to do so for a simple reason: They think the war is lost. If you believe that, then getting out is the most reasonable and honorable and patriotic policy.

Congress has the power to do that by cutting off the funds. But Democrats will not, because it is politically dangerous. Instead, they are seeking other ways, clever ways. The House is pursuing a method, developed by Murtha and deemed "ingenious" by antiwar activist Tom Andrews of Win Without War, to impose a conditional cutoff of funds, ostensibly in the name of protecting the troops. Unless the troops are given the precise equipment, training and amount of rest Murtha stipulates -- no funds.

Unfortunately for the Democrats, Murtha is not disingenuous enough to have concealed the real motive for these ostensibly pro-readiness, pro-troops conditions. He has chosen conditions he knows are impossible to meet -- "We have analyzed this, and we have come to the conclusion that it can't be done," he told MoveCongress.org -- in order to make the continued prosecution of the war difficult, if not impossible, for the commanders in the field.

But think of what that entails. It leaves the existing 130,000 troops out there without the reinforcements and tactical flexibility that the commander, Gen. David H. Petraeus, says he needs to win.

Of course, the Democrats believe the war cannot be won. But if that's the case, they should order a withdrawal by cutting off funds. They shouldn't micromanage the war in a way that will make winning impossible. That not only endangers the troops remaining in the field, it also makes the Democrats' "the war is lost" mantra a self-fulfilling prophecy.

Murtha's ruse is so transparent that even Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl Levin, who opposes the war, will not countenance it: "I think that sends the wrong message to our troops."

Levin has a different idea -- change the original October 2002 authorization. "We . . . will be looking at modification of that authorization in order to limit the mission of American troops to a support mission instead of a combat mission," says Levin. "That is very different from cutting funds."

While this idea is not as perverse as Murtha's, it is totally illogical. There is something exceedingly strange about authorizing the use of force -- except for combat. That is an oxymoron. Changing the language of authorization means -- if it means anything -- that Petraeus will have to surround himself with lawyers who will tell him, every time he wants to deploy a unit, whether he is ordering a legal "support" mission or an illegal "combat" mission.

If Levin wants to withdraw our forces from the civil war in the cities to more secure bases from which we can continue training and launching operations against al-Qaeda, he should present that to the country as an alternative to (or a fallback after) the administration's troop surge. But to force it on our commanders through legalisms is simply to undermine their ability to fight the war occurring on the ground today.

DOJ_NMG_0135579

Slowly bleeding our forces by defunding what our commanders think they need to win (the House approach) or rewording the authorization of the use of force so that lawyers decide what operations are to be launched (the Senate approach) is no way to fight a war. It is no way to end a war. It is a way to complicate the war and make it inherently unwinnable -- and to shirk the political responsibility for doing so.

letters@charleskrauthammer.com

Free Nations Can't Ignore Terror, Cheney Warns (WT)

By Michael Keats

The Washington Times, February 23, 2007

SYDNEY, Australia --Vice President Dick Cheney warned today that the United States and a key ally, Australia, "simply cannot indulge" thoughts of an early withdrawal from Iraq because it would spawn a new wave of global terror.

Mr. Cheney, on a two-day visit to a staunch U.S. ally, praised Prime Minister John Howard's firm support of the U.S.-led war and its fight against terror, saying the only option for survival was to fight back ferociously.

"The notion that free countries can turn our backs on what happens in places like Afghanistan, Iraq or any other possible safe haven for terrorists is an option we simply cannot indulge," Mr. Cheney said in Sydney.

"We are determined to prevail in Iraq because we understand the consequences of failure. If our coalition withdrew before Iraqis could defend themselves, radical factions would battle for dominance over the country," he said.

Ahead of Mr. Cheney's Sydney visit today, anti-war demonstrators scuffled with police.

Mr. Cheney arrived with assurances for Mr. Howard in the face of mounting domestic criticism of the Iraq war.

Opposition leader Kevin Rudd, meanwhile, seized on Britain's decision to reduce its troop presence in southern Iraq, arguing that Australia should follow suit.

Hours before Mr. Cheney's plane touched down in Sydney last night, about 250 demonstrators defied a police ban to march through the city center to the Sydney Town Hall.

Authorities made at least 10 arrests when the demonstrators set out for the U.S. Consulate chanting: "Troops out now," "Jail Cheney," and "Free David Hicks" -- a reference to the Australian who has been languishing in the U.S. prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, since his capture in Afghanistan five years ago.

Hundreds of police are involved in a security operation that has locked down access to several areas of Sydney, where Mr. Cheney will stay before departing Sunday.

Mr. Cheney's visit comes at a testing time for Mr. Howard's Liberal-National coalition government, which faces a national election later this year.

The latest public-opinion survey, a Newspoll published Tuesday, has Labor Party leader Mr. Rudd ahead of Mr. Howard as preferred prime minister by 47 percent to 37 percent.

Mr. Howard has ruled out following Britain and Denmark in withdrawing forces from Iraq and has been at pains to stress that there are still 10 times the number of British troops remaining in Iraq than those from Australia -- with the U.S. commitment even greater.

Powell Backs Surge, Time Frame To Quell 'civil War' (JC)

By Dan Shaw

Journal and Courier, February 23, 2007

Former Secretary of State Colin Powell told an audience at Purdue University that he supports sending more American soldiers to Iraq.

But if the troop surge does not quell what he characterized as a "civil war" within a year, the United States should begin to leave, he said.

"The situation is getting more and more confused," he told an audience of slightly more than 1,000 people seated in the Loeb Playhouse on the Purdue campus Thursday.

Powell was invited to be the featured speaker during the university's annual celebration of National Engineers Week. Last year, Purdue brought another former secretary of state -- Madeleine Albright -- for the event.

Speaking about the conflicts in the Middle East, Powell said the United States was right to retaliate against Afghanistan after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001. But he was less certain when discussing the invasion of Iraq.

He conceded that the intelligence on Iraq's having weapons of mass destruction was misleading.

"But we were not wrong about the nature of this regime, and I am glad that it is gone," he said. "I hope the Iraqis will the seize the opportunity we have given them."

After Powell finished speaking, aeronautical engineering student John Wright said, "I liked that he was so direct and upfront about the intelligence they had. He owned up to the pitfalls and never backed down."

During the middle of the speech, Powell had to stop talking temporarily when a fire alarm sounded.

Jeanne Norberg, spokeswoman for the university, said the alarm was pulled accidentally and the interruption had nothing to do with a small group of protesters who had gathered outside the theater doors before Powell's speech.

Police officers ordered several of the protesters, who criticized Powell with signs and comments, to leave the Stewart Center shortly after the speech, saying they had become disruptive.

Powell took time during the interruption to sign books, drawing laughs when someone handed him a copy of an AARP magazine.

Much of Powell's speech was delivered with humor. He even affected a Texas accent to imitate President Bush.

Speaking of Russian President Vladimir Putin, Powell said Bush might say, "Colin I have looked into his eyes and seen his soul."

"OK," Powell said, reverting to his regular voice. "I have looked into his eyes and still see KGB."

Even so, Powell said he is hopeful that Putin is trying to move Russia in the right direction. And he takes heart that the United States is trading more and more freely with China and Asian countries. Commerce will make them so dependent on each other that they cannot afford to go to war, he said.

Turning to the United States, he said it can best serve the world by showing how having a free society can help make a nation happy and prosperous, he said. Americans must not let the fear of terrorism make them intolerant of people from different cultures.

"We are still like no other place in the world," he said. "We are still a place that people come to have their problems solved."

Henry Chou, a biochemistry student from Fishers, Ind., said the speech was perhaps the best he had ever heard.

"He has the message of hope," Chou said. "People still know what the U.S. stands for, and we have that to hold on to."

Old Problems Undermine New Security Plan For Baghdad (NYT)

By Richard A. Oppel Jr.

The New York Times, February 23, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 19 — It looked like a scene out of a counterinsurgency training video. Dressed in crisp uniforms with a computer-generated camouflage of blue, gray and brown, Iraqi national police officers joined United States troops on searches late last week through relatively calm districts of Shaab and Ur in northeast Baghdad in the first large operation of the Baghdad security plan.

But appearances in Iraq can often be deceiving. At least two of the national police officers who turned out for the operation were moving ahead of the American troops not to lead the security drive but to warn the residents to hide their weapons and other incriminating evidence.

Some policemen on the sweep advertised their Shiite sympathies. Infiltration by militias has always been a major problem for the Iraqi security forces, and particularly the police, viewed by many Sunnis in the capital as de facto Shiite militia fighters.

The much anticipated effort to wrest Baghdad streets from the control of militias and insurgents has been presented in news conferences and public statements as an Iraqi-led operation. Iraqi officials have been out front, announcing arrests, weapons finds and other details, as well as new decrees intended to halt two years of so-called sectarian cleansing. But on the streets, the joint patrols seemed little different from those of the past few years: A handful of Iraqis, acting at the direction of a larger group of Americans, opening drawers and closets and looking behind furniture as they searched for banned weapons or other contraband.

DOJ_NMG_0135581

For the first few days of the operation, about 2,500 American troops took part, compared with about 300 Iraqi forces, a mix of police and Army personnel, military officials said. The original plan called for Iraqis to work with United States troops throughout the night to enforce curfews and otherwise ensure that the gains of the previous day were not lost. But they were shifted to buttress the day force.

It was a translator working with the Americans, interviewed a day after the fact, who had overheard the Iraqi police tipping off the Iraqis. "They were telling people in the neighborhood to hide your weapons from the Americans," he said. The police were Shiites, he said, and inclined to favor others of their sect in the district, which is mostly Shiite but has a considerable Sunni population.

On another patrol, an American commander said, Iraqi residents told American soldiers that a national policemen had warned them to hide anything incriminating including paraphernalia about Moktada al-Sadr, the Shiite militia leader whose forces are targets of the Baghdad crackdown.

"Families told us he was warning people before we'd come in, 'If you have this or that, then hide it before they get here,' " said First Lt. Andy Moffit, who led a platoon through Shaab and Ur. The major problem with Iraqi forces is not their tactical skill, but their "loyalties and integrity," he said.

On that score, he said, "We've still got years to go."

Fearful of police ties to the militias, some residents questioned by the Americans about militia activity refused to say anything until the police were led out of the room.

Moreover, some Iraqi forces made little effort to hide their true allegiance. In one police truck an amulet stamped with the image of Imam Hussein, the revered Shiite martyr, swung from a rearview mirror. Next to it was a green Shiite flag, taped to the inside of the windshield. The truck's radio blared chants heard during Ashura, a Shiite religious holiday.

To many Sunnis the Iraqi forces remain little more than instruments of Shiite hegemony, and the Baghdad plan appears to have done little to change that view.

"They can't protect the Sunnis in the Shiite districts, and they will never fight the militias because they are from the same sect," said Ahmed al-Mashhadani, a Sunni resident of west Baghdad, where other Baghdad security operations took place last week. "We don't trust them, and if American troops leave, we will call back the resistance platoons to protect ourselves."

American troops in northeast Baghdad heard the same refrain from Shiites who said that only their own militias could protect them from Sunni insurgents. "Before, the Mahdi Army checkpoints used to check each vehicle that came in here," lamented one Facilities Protection Service guard, a Shiite, at a warehouse in Ur. "Now, the Iraqi police aren't really checking each vehicle."

American officials had long insisted that Iraqi forces were making great strides. But the torrent of sectarian killings that followed the Samarra shrine bombing last February made plain that most Iraqi troops were not up to the task and, in a frightening number of cases, were part of the problem.

Beginning in August, American troops increasingly returned to the front lines in Baghdad, facing roadside bombs and other threats. They have suffered an average of 85 deaths a month since then — a 50 percent increase over the previous six months. And those fatalities have increasingly occurred in Baghdad.

Lt. Col. Avanulas Smiley, commander of the First Battalion, 23rd Infantry Regiment, said he took heart in the performance of an Iraqi national police commander during the northeast Baghdad operations, citing the man's willingness to acknowledge and address concerns about militia infiltration.

He also said the number of police officers on the sweeps was not the total number of Iraqis working on the security push. That number would include others who operated checkpoints and worked independently of the Americans. He said he was disappointed that more Iraqi forces did not participate in the sweeps.

And he noted the flagging political support in the United States for the occupation. "We run the risk of losing popular support when there is the potential for getting this thing over the hump," he said.

For now, what the Bush administration has called its surge plan, widely seen as a last effort to rescue Baghdad from civil war, will bring more than 17,000 additional troops to Baghdad to carry out a new strategy that leaves United States forces clustered in outposts throughout Baghdad neighborhoods, close to the streets and to Iraqi police and troops.

DOJ_NMG_0135582

They will have plenty to do. Even routine security tasks performed by Iraqi forces, such as operating traffic checkpoints, are frequently undermined by laziness, American troops say, if not outright sabotage through complicity with the militias.

The thoroughness of the inspections can vary widely. In one hour at an Iraqi checkpoint in Karada, a mostly Shiite neighborhood, on Feb. 16, the police allowed more than 150 vehicles to pass while pulling over about 25. In only three cases did they open the trunks. They found nothing. At another checkpoint a mile away, near the Green Zone, most of the cars were pulled aside, and eventually traffic snaked for a mile.

Then a sedan containing six young men pulled up to barriers set up by interior ministry commandos. The driver, apparently referring to an unspecified militia, said, "I'm with the guys," said an Iraqi reporter for The New York Times who had heard the exchange. The car was immediately sent through.

Insurgents Broaden Arsenal In Battles With U.S., Iraqi Forces (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson And Joshua Partlow

The Washington Post, February 23, 2007

Insurgents in Iraq are employing a variety of new tactics -- from an unprecedented string of helicopter shoot-downs to unusual chlorine bomb attacks and direct assaults on U.S. military bases -- that American commanders say are intended to create chaos and undermine the U.S. and Iraqi military push to quell violence in Baghdad.

Lt. Gen. Raymond T. Odierno, the second-ranking U.S. commander in Iraq, said Thursday that he believed a U.S. Army Black Hawk helicopter that went down Wednesday north of Baghdad had been shot down -- which would make it the eighth U.S. military or civilian aircraft to be downed by insurgents since Jan. 20.

"Initial reports that I have seen indicate enemy fire," Odierno told Pentagon reporters during a teleconference from Baghdad. Helicopters are essential to U.S. military operations, he said, and will fly an estimated 400,000 hours in Iraq this year, making it vital to protect them.

Odierno said he believed that "al-Qaeda-associated cells" using similar tactics are behind at least some of the shoot-downs. He said U.S. raids in recent days have led to the capture of two suspected cell members, one of whom admitted he was involved in shooting down an aircraft. The Sunni insurgent group al-Qaeda in Iraq has asserted responsibility for several of the recent attacks on U.S. helicopters.

Chlorine-laced bombs are another new tactic. Four more people died Thursday in Baghdad after ingesting chlorine fumes from a blast the day before on the road leading to the capital's airport, raising the death toll in the attack to seven people, said Col. Sami Hassan of the Interior Ministry.

"This is just the first time that we've seen the chlorine used in this way," said Lt. Col. Christopher C. Garver, a U.S. military spokesman in Baghdad. He said he knew of no more than two or three people who died from ingesting the chlorine, a common industrial chemical used heavily in water treatment and not a "weaponized-chemical" agent capable of inflicting mass casualties.

Wednesday's bombing was the third time in a month that insurgents rigged chlorine tanks to their explosives to increase the deadliness of their attacks, military officials said. The day before, insurgents blew up a truck carrying chlorine gas tanks in Taji, north of Baghdad, in an attack that killed nine people. In late January, another truck carrying explosives and chlorine tanks exploded near Ramadi, killing 16 people.

Insurgents are attempting to "adapt in such ways where they can continue to create instability. And that's what they're doing, especially with these" vehicle bombs incorporating chlorine, Odierno said. He added that U.S. and Iraqi forces stationed around Baghdad were taking steps to keep car bombs out of crowded areas. U.S. troops discovered a car-bomb factory Tuesday outside Fallujah that contained chlorine cylinders, he said.

More aggressive, direct attacks by insurgents on bases housing the U.S. military are another troubling development. Last month, four American soldiers were killed after being kidnapped at their compound in Karbala, and a suicide bomb attack this week on a U.S. military facility in Tarmiyah north of Baghdad left three soldiers dead.

On Thursday, U.S. soldiers killed at least 12 suspected insurgents and wounded three others in a six-hour battle starting at 7:30 p.m. in eastern Ramadi, the capital of Anbar province in western Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0135583

Soldiers from Task Force 1-9 were attacked by small-arms fire and found insurgents in several buildings in the area, said 1st Lt. Shawn Mercer, a Marine spokesman in western Iraq.

Soldiers used heavy machine guns and one shoulder-fired rocket, and eventually "precision-guided munitions," which damaged buildings, he said. "We have no reports of civilian casualties, and there were no coalition casualties," he said.

General Implicates Al-Qaeda In Copter Crashes (USAT)

By Jim Michaels

USA Today, February 23, 2007

WASHINGTON — "Al-Qaeda-associated" cells may be behind a recent spike in downed U.S. helicopters in Iraq, a general said Thursday.

Lt. Gen. Raymond Odierno, the No. 2 U.S. commander in Iraq, said two suspects have been captured in connection with the helicopter attacks. One suspect, he said, admitted involvement in one attack.

Since Jan. 20, insurgents have shot or forced down eight U.S. helicopters, killing 28 troops and civilians. Enemy fire forced down a Black Hawk helicopter north of Baghdad on Wednesday.

Insurgents fire on Army helicopters an average of 100 times a month, Maj. Gen. James Simmons, deputy commander of Multinational Corps-Iraq, said earlier this month. Enemy fire hits helicopters in about 17% of those attacks, he said. Most are able to keep flying.

U.S. officers are studying the recent incidents to determine how best to adjust helicopter flying tactics and are attempting to uncover and destroy the groups behind the attacks, Odierno said.

Earlier this month, Odierno said he didn't think insurgents had greater access to sophisticated weapons, such as surface-to-air missiles. But insurgents have used similar tactics in recent attacks, suggesting they may be more effectively using machine gun and small-arms fire against helicopters.

"I think we see in a few cases … that there were probably some sort of ambush sites that were set up by some of our foes," Odierno said in a video conference from Baghdad. "I think they've probably been trying to do this for a long time, but my guess is we have a cell out there that's somewhat effective." He later clarified his remarks to say there may be several cells.

U.S. forces rely on helicopters more to move supplies and troops as roadside bombs make ground travel more dangerous.

The Army expects to log 400,000 flight hours in helicopters this year, up from 240,000 hours in 2005.

The Army has almost quadrupled its spending this year, from $7.5 million to $29.6 million, on equipment that protects helicopters from missiles and other attacks, Pentagon budget records show. That includes a laser warning system that alerts pilots to threats from the ground.

Changing helicopter flying tactics often means trading one threat for another. Low-flying helicopters are less vulnerable to surface-to-air missiles because they are hidden by terrain and buildings. However, helicopters flying closer to the ground are easier to hit with rocket-propelled grenades or with fire from assault rifles or machine guns.

Al Qaeda Believed Behind Copter Crashes (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, February 23, 2007

Two or three al Qaeda terrorist cells in Iraq are behind the recent series of helicopter shootdowns, a senior U.S. commander in Iraq said yesterday.

Army Lt. Gen. Ray Odierno, commander of the Multinational Corps, Iraq, told reporters that the downing of several helicopters involved common tactics, techniques and procedures used by terrorists.

"We're trying to understand what those are, learn about it so we can protect our aircraft, but more importantly, try to go after the cells," the three-star general said. "I believe they're al Qaeda-associated cells."

Eight helicopters in Iraq have been shot down or have crash-landed after ground fire since Jan. 20. Some of the attacks involved shoulder-fired surface-to-air missiles.

DOJ_NMG_0135584

Military officials at first sought to blame the downings on mechanical problems, but later information revealed most were hit by enemy fire. One attack on a UH-60 Black Hawk north of Baghdad resulted in the deaths of 12 soldiers. A third Black Hawk was shot down Wednesday and Gen. Odierno said initial reports indicate "enemy fire" was the cause.

"We are aggressively examining the conditions of each incident and adapting tactics and techniques to address the issue," Gen. Odierno said, noting that the military is increasing the use of helicopters because most casualties are occurring from improvised bomb attacks on ground vehicles.

Two persons linked to the helicopter attacks are being questioned, including one who took part in one of the shootdowns. The terrorist "admitted that he was involved in one of them," Gen. Odierno said.

"And we've done a couple of operations over the last few nights, and I think we've also gotten into another part of a cell who might have shot down another aircraft, one of the aircraft. So we continue to work this extremely hard," he said.

The aircraft attacks were carried out from "ambush sites that were set up by some of our foes," Gen. Odierno said, noting that "I think they've probably been trying to do this for a long time, but my guess is we have a cell out there that's somewhat effective."

The increase in the helicopters attacks comes as U.S. and Iraqi forces have launched a major, months-long program to pacify Baghdad, where much of the insurgency against the new Iraqi government and U.S.-led coalition forces is taking place.

Gen. Odierno said one breakthrough was the discovery by an Army airborne unit Tuesday of a car bomb factory near Karma, about 12 miles northeast of Fallujah.

"The unit discovered numerous artillery rounds, mortar rounds, bombs, rockets, gutted anti-aircraft shells, a pickup truck and three other vehicles that were already in various stages of preparations as car bombs, as well as much detonation material," he said.

The factory also contained material that is being used to enhance bombs, such as fertilizer and chlorine in cylinders.

"We also found the various components of a metal shop, including welders, burner stoves, circular saws, sanders and other items needed to build explosive devices," he said.

Asked about the insurgent's use of chlorine bombs, Gen. Odierno said over the past two years there have been attempts to use different chemicals to boost the lethality of improvised bombs and chlorine "is just another way to do it."

Iraq Rebels Expected To Use More Chlorine Gas In Attacks (NYT)

By Richard A. Oppel Jr.

The New York Times, February 23, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 22 — Insurgents are likely to continue combining car bombs with chlorine gas and other chemicals to launch attacks similar to three in recent weeks that spewed chlorine and sickened scores of Iraqis, the military warned Thursday.

American troops raided a car-bomb factory near Falluja and found chlorine cylinders and propane tanks among the bomb components.

The raid late Tuesday in Karma, an insurgent-dominated village between Falluja and Baghdad, led American officials to suggest that insurgents had planned to combine the materials found into a new round of chemical-laden vehicular bombs.

The latest chlorine bombing happened Wednesday in southern Baghdad and killed at least two people and wounded 32 others. Many exhibited symptoms of exposure to chlorine, a greenish gas that burns the skin and can be fatal after a few concentrated, deep breaths.

The Karma site was stocked with “numerous artillery rounds, mortar rounds, bombs, rockets, gutted antiaircraft shells, a pickup truck and three other vehicles that were already in various stages of preparations as car bombs,” said Lt. Gen. Ray Odierno, the second-ranking commander in Iraq.

“We also found ingredients to be used to devise or enhance explosives such as fertilizer and chlorine cylinders,” the general said.

The general insisted that the recent chlorine attacks did not suggest that the insurgency is “any more capable,” but said that militants were trying to “adapt in such ways where they can continue to create instability, and that’s what they’re doing.”

DOJ_NMG_0135585

Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV told CNN that the troops had found "five complete buildings full of these various types of things," including 65 propane tanks. "What we are seeing is a change in tactics, but the strategy has not changed."

Military officials are also acutely concerned that insurgents have adapted tactics to exploit vulnerabilities in flight patterns of military helicopters, which are expected to fly 400,000 hours this year in Iraq, a 20 percent increase over 2006.

At least eight helicopters have been downed in the last month, the latest on Wednesday when a Black Hawk crash-landed in Diyala Province after coming under fire from heavy machine guns and rocket-propelled grenades.

No one was wounded in the latest crash.

General Odierno said that in two or three of the helicopter shoot downs "ambush sites" had been set up by insurgents. "My guess is we have a cell out there that's somewhat effective," he said. He said two suspected of being insurgents, each believed to have played a role in separate helicopter attacks, had been detained in the past week, and one had admitted his involvement.

In Ramadi, the Anbar provincial capital, American forces fought a fierce battle with insurgents that officials at the Ramadi hospital said had left at least 27 Iraqis dead. One of the officials, Dr. Abdullah Salah, said four women and four children were among those killed. Witnesses said at least three houses had been attacked by American aircraft.

The marines, who patrol western Iraq, disputed the hospital casualty count, saying that the six-hour fight left 12 insurgents dead and that they had no reports of civilian or American military casualties.

A Marine spokesman, First Lt. Shawn Mercer, said insurgents attacked soldiers with small arms and rocket-propelled grenades Wednesday evening in east Ramadi. The American soldiers fired back at first with small arms and medium machine guns, then with heavy machine guns, a shoulder-fired rocket, and "precision guided munitions."

The Associated Press reported that photographs made available to the news agency showed "the bodies of two small boys wrapped in one blanket, one with a bloody face, the other ashen and with mud on his mouth, his hands crossed on his chest." Other pictures showed four or five bodies covered by blankets, and men searching through rubble.

On the heels of another rape allegation that has shaken Iraq's Shiite-dominated government, an Iraqi general in the northern city of Tal Afar told several news agencies that four Iraqi soldiers had been accused of raping a 50-year-old Sunni Turkmen woman about 10 days ago.

Brig. Gen. Nijm Abdullah told The Associated Press that a lieutenant and three enlisted men initially denied the woman's charge, but then confessed after being confronted by the woman.

An official from the Tal Afar hospital said the woman was raped after her husband was jailed by Iraqi soldiers, and she did not come forward until she was encouraged to do so by an official from the main Sunni political bloc.

One soldier from the 13th Sustainment Command (Expeditionary) was killed and three wounded by a roadside bomb attack near Diwaniya early Thursday morning, the military reported.

At least 14 bodies were also discovered throughout the capital on Thursday, an Interior Ministry official said.

U.S. Troops Uncover "car Bomb Factory" Near Fallouja (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 23, 2007

U.S. troops in Iraq uncovered a "car bomb factory" near Fallouja this week that contained multiple canisters of chlorine, a potentially lethal gas that has been used in three insurgent attacks over the last month, a top U.S. official in Baghdad told reporters Thursday.

Lt. Gen. Raymond T. Odierno, the Army commander responsible for day-to-day military operations in Iraq, said the Tuesday night raid outside the city west of Baghdad netted a wide array of munitions and three vehicles that were apparently being readied as car bombs at the compound, in addition to the chlorine cylinders.

The discovery of yet more chlorine following bombings Tuesday and Wednesday in which the chemical was used seemed to indicate a stepped-up effort by insurgents to use such choking agents to cause even more deaths and spread fear among Iraqi civilians.

At least 21 Iraqis and a U.S. soldier were killed or found dead around the country Thursday amid an aggressive security crackdown in the capital and rainy weather hampering travel across the region.

DOJ_NMG_0135586

Odierno noted that insurgents have for several months been trying to use various other chemicals to make car bombs more deadly, and characterized the use of chlorine as part of these efforts.

Such bombs are capable of spreading fear, but Odierno noted that deaths caused by the chemical have thus far been limited. The most recent attack, on Wednesday, sickened 25 Iraqis, killing two.

"Over the last year or so ... we have found attempts of them to try to use all different types of chemical mixtures in order to try to make [car bombs] more lethal, and this is just another way to do it," Odierno said in a briefing from Baghdad held for reporters at the Pentagon.

Army Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV, the chief U.S. military spokesman in Iraq, said in an interview on CNN that the cache of weapons found Tuesday night near the town of Karma, northeast of Fallouja, included "all kinds of ordinary chemicals" besides chlorine, a possible indication that insurgents have stepped up their efforts to use toxic substances in their attacks.

Although Odierno would not say who the U.S. believed was behind the chlorine bombs, Karma is in Sunni Arab-dominated Al Anbar province, home to both home-grown Sunni insurgents and foreign fighters linked to the group Al Qaeda in Iraq.

Despite the limited deaths in the chlorine attacks, White House spokesman Dana Perino said the use of chlorine appeared to be part of an effort by insurgents to pull off "spectacular events" that would kill civilians, and she called employment of the gas "disturbing and concerning".

Chlorine has been considered for use as a chemical weapon as far back as the U.S. Civil War. According to the 2003 book "A War of Nerves," proposals were made to President Lincoln's secretary of War to use chlorine against Confederate forces in 1862, but the suggestions were never acted upon.

The first documented use of the gas in warfare was by German troops against Allied forces during World War I; chlorine cylinders were first opened in April 1915, releasing the yellowish-green gas on French and Algerian troops defending the town of Ypres in Belgium.

Although Germany again employed chlorine during World War II, it has not been widely used in warfare since then. The U.S. Department of Health and Human Services lists chlorine as a "choking agent" that could be used as a weapon by terrorists.

On Thursday, an improvised explosive device, or roadside bomb, was blamed for the death of the American soldier near the southern city of Diwaniya. Three other soldiers wounded in the blast were evacuated to Baghdad for treatment, the U.S. military said.

In Baghdad, the bodies of at least 14 men were discovered. Mortar rounds struck a western neighborhood of the capital, killing one civilian and injuring three others. Elsewhere in Iraq, three bodies were found in Kirkuk, two in Mosul and one in Hillah.

U.S. and Iraqi forces northeast of Baghdad arrested a top police official on charges of running death squads. Brig. Gen. Qassem Khazaal, head of Diyala province's criminal intelligence division, and six others under his command were arrested on charges of kidnapping and murder.

U.S. Unit Shoulders Burden At Police Station In Baqubah (WP)

By Bill Murphy Jr.

The Washington Post, February 23, 2007

BAQUBAH, Iraq -- It took nearly a month to build the tiny bunker on the roof of this Iraqi police station. The U.S. soldiers worked at night to avoid snipers, carrying sandbags up four flights of stairs in the dark.

One day last week, several American soldiers arrived to begin their shift here, using the roof to scan the surrounding area for attackers. The soldiers were well armed, and they had cigarettes, coffee and soda with them, even beef jerky. But there was one thing missing from the roof of the station, and from the ranks of those who were there to defend it: members of the Iraqi security forces.

Similar U.S. units are embedded at other Iraqi police and army installations in Baqubah, a city of 300,000 about 35 miles northeast of Baghdad. Keeping these locations open and functioning is vital, military commanders say, if the Iraqis who live here are to have confidence in the government.

The police station houses a unit of the local police Emergency Response Force. The Americans call it "the ERF," so it rhymes with "surf." In theory, the ERF should be like a U.S. police SWAT team, but in practice, the Iraqis are simply outmanned and outgunned. The U.S. troops here, from Alpha Company, a unit in the 1st Cavalry Division, say the Iraqi police officers are loath even to leave the station.

DOJ_NMG_0135587

"Originally, it was designed like we were going to be training" them, said 1st Lt. Jason Brinkley, 23, of Palacios, Tex. But ever since insurgent attacks in late November, "we've just kind of been staying here, pretty much to keep the place from being overrun," he said.

In one room of the station that the Americans use, weapons, ammunition and rations were stacked alongside cases of soda and hundreds of bottles of water. A generator powered a microwave oven, and a freezer was stuffed with frozen hamburgers, hot dogs and breakfast sandwiches.

"It's like an infantryman's dream in here," said Sgt. Benny Alicea, 34, of Attleboro, Mass.

The ERF comes under fire almost every day, and most days, Brinkley said, his troops kill between one and six insurgents. "The standoff we've got is to our advantage, because we shoot better than they do," Brinkley said.

"You get used to it," said Spec. Monty Hesley, 27, of Hanover, Kan. "That's your job, is killing people and people trying to kill you. You can get into a zone. You have to, or you're going to drive yourself nuts."

Most of the troops at the ERF said they had no idea how their work might contribute to a larger effort, or even who the enemy is. And they said they do not trust the Iraqi police officers living one floor below them. At least one U.S. soldier stood guard with his rifle at all times, ensuring that none of the Iraqi police ventured into the American living area.

The core of this platoon is on its second tour together in Iraq. It fought at Najaf in August 2004 and alongside the Marines at Fallujah in November 2004.

"I just care about my friends -- this platoon, that everybody will come home," said Pfc. Stanislav Mykhaylichenko, 20, of New York, a Ukrainian immigrant whose father fought in the Soviet army in Afghanistan in the 1980s.

"The best bet is to pull back," said Sgt. Jerry White, 26, of Bell, Fla. "Sending more troops -- it's not working. You're sending more targets. That's all you're doing."

"They're going to have their civil war, and all we're doing is just being in the middle of it," Alicea said.Frustration and Death

"Everybody gets frustrated. Who the hell wouldn't be?" Lt. Col. Mo Goins, commander of the 1st Battalion, 12th Cavalry Regiment, said later. "We're all Type A personalities, Westerners, and we want it done right away."

"The soldiers see their small part of the war," said Col. David Sutherland, commander of 3rd Brigade, the 4,700-strong unit that includes the 1-12 Cavalry and other battalions, and has the entire province of Diyala -- home to about 1.6 million people -- as its area of operations. "We've been here for five months. The soldiers get frustrated. They think all they're doing is going out and getting hit with" improvised explosive devices.

"We've got hot spots," he said. Overall, he said, Baqubah has gotten more violent, but things have improved in the rest of the province. Since Feb. 4, nine U.S. soldiers have been killed in and around Baqubah.'We're Under Attack'

At 9:46 a.m. on the second day of the soldiers' three-day shift, small-arms fire erupted outside.

"Shooting from the south. They do that," said Spec. Patrick Pena, 24, of Midland, Tex.

Long bursts of automatic-weapons fire followed. Outside, bullets hit a damaged vehicle in front of the building. Not far away, a U.S. soldier refueling the ERF's generator took cover. It was unclear whether any of the Iraqi police officers were returning fire.

Two loud thumps echoed.

"Mortar rounds!" someone yelled.

"Yeah, mortars. Small arms," Brinkley agreed. "I think we're under attack."

The soldiers erupted in laughter.

"It's what they always do," Brinkley continued. "They just get out of a car, fire two rounds and get out of here. It's nothing accurate, just harassing fire."

Spec. Jeremy Anderson, 22, of Corpus Christi, Tex., stayed low on the roof, near the sandbag bunker, pointing out buildings from which insurgents often target the ERF and the small road that the soldiers call Sesame Street because they see the same odd characters there every day.

The shooting died down. Loudspeakers blared from nearby neighborhoods. None of the soldiers spoke Arabic, but they said they can sometimes make out words like "Ameriki," "Bush" and "jihad."

DOJ_NMG_0135588

Morning turned to midday. There were two more loud explosions. Mortars again, the soldiers said.

Downstairs, Brinkley sipped a Mountain Dew and walked into a room where several soldiers were resting. He had spent two hours in a sniper's nest over a shower stall that the men use as a makeshift urinal, and he had finally found a target. A man with an AK-47 assault rifle was trying to get into position about 500 yards away.

Brinkley squeezed the trigger and killed him.

"I'm still happy," Brinkley said. "The right thing to do is get dudes to stop shooting at you, especially that accurate fire."Engaging the Officers

Few of the U.S. troops have much contact with the Iraqi police here, but Staff Sgt. Thomas Blair, 22, of Boston, walked downstairs in the early afternoon.

"Mister Thomas!" a 21-year-old Iraqi officer called out.

A half-dozen Iraqi police officers spoke through an Iraqi interpreter employed by the U.S. Army. None would give their names for fear that their families would be killed if insurgents learned their identities. Most wore civilian clothes.

An officer who said he was 37 was eager to talk. "Insurgents have good weapons. [We] don't. No uniform, no ammunition."

Several officers said they wanted an armored Humvee. They drive around in pickup trucks now, they said.

The police showed off their living quarters. In one dusty room, five twin beds took up most of the space. Ten policemen sleep there, switching off on the beds, the men explained. An officer wearing a light sweater and sandals said he wanted boots and a uniform, but cannot afford them. All the officers said they were owed money, and one said he had not been paid for eight months.

A 26-year-old officer gestured at a bullet hole in the window. He traced a line through the air to another hole in the wall above one of the beds.

"I'm scared of any bad guy," the 21-year-old officer said. "I have no ammo."

"But you have me!" chimed in Blair. He struck an exaggerated pose with his M-4 rifle and laughed.

As the men talked, Blair shared his cigarettes with them. He said he feels bad for the officers, and he gives them food and cigarettes because their rations are so meager. But he acknowledged he has another motive. If the insurgents overrun the ERF, he said, he wants to be known as the nice, friendly American.

"They're not chopping my head off," he said.'Fire Danger Close'

Anderson came down from the roof. He and another soldier had spotted two men with an AK-47 trying to bury something on the road, a classic IED team. He opened fire with an M-14 sniper rifle, hitting one of them. It was the platoon's second suspected kill of the day.

At 4:20 p.m., troops who weren't on guard ate microwave oatmeal from foam plates. There was another loud explosion outside, followed by smaller booms.

"Fire danger close," came a radio report from the rooftop. "We've got our heads down, but it sounds like RPGs," or rocket-propelled grenades.

Two of the platoon's Bradley Fighting Vehicles went out to assist a U.S. tank that was immobilized after breaking a tread. As they returned to the ERF, a sniper opened fire. Brinkley's driver, Spec. Jeremy Mitchell, 26, of Rockmart, Ga., was nearly hit as he started to climb out.

Brinkley returned fire with the vehicle's 25mm gun, and there was no more activity in the building where the shots had come from. He counted it as their third kill of the day.

"Not the first time I've been shot at, and it won't be the last," Mitchell said afterward, though he clearly looked shaken.

Calls came over the radio. The platoon learned it would be given 12 hours back at the forward operating base the next day to do some much-needed maintenance on its Bradleys.

It would be the first such stand-down in three weeks.

"This is all normal, routine stuff," Brinkley said. "Dude with the AK that I shot in the street? That's routine. The dudes digging an IED? That's an everyday occurrence."

DOJ_NMG_0135589

"Let's see if we get shot at if we go out to grill," Mitchell suggested. The platoon keeps a barbecue on an outside landing, right off the third floor. On its last rotation here, a sniper fired at Brinkley while he was cooking about 5 p.m., so the platoon has learned to wait until dark to cook.

"It wasn't that close," Brinkley recalled. "Five or six feet away."

Firefight Between U.S. Troops, Insurgents Kills At Least 12 (USAT/AP)

The Associated Press

USA Today, February 23, 2007

Sunni insurgents attacked U.S. troops in the volatile city of Ramadi, setting off a six-hour firefight that killed at least 12 people, the U.S. military said Thursday.

The Ramadi battle broke out Wednesday evening when insurgents opened fire on a U.S. patrol. The Americans responded with precision-guided munitions that damaged several buildings and ended the fight, said a Marine spokesman, 1st Lt. Shawn Mercer.

There were no U.S. casualties. Twelve insurgents were killed, Mercer said. He said no civilian casualties were reported.

However, Hafidh Ibrahim of the Ramadi Hospital said the bodies of 26 people, including four women and children, were pulled from the rubble of three houses.

Frequent battles have taken place in Ramadi, the capital of Anbar province west of Baghdad. President Bush has ordered an increase of 21,500 troops in Iraq — 4,000 of them in Anbar province to try to quell violence there. The rest are bound for Baghdad.

The military warned that insurgents were adopting new tactics after a raid near Fallujah uncovered a car bomb factory with propane tanks and chlorine canisters. Insurgents have detonated three trucks carrying canisters of toxic chlorine since Jan. 28. The most recent attack, Wednesday in Baghdad, killed five people and sent more than 55 to hospitals.

U.S. troops "found ingredients to be used to devise or enhance explosives, such as fertilizer and chlorine cylinders," Lt. Gen. Ray Odierno, the No. 2 U.S. commander in Iraq, told Pentagon reporters by video link.

"What they're trying to do is … adapt in such ways where they can continue to create instability," Odierno said.

Chlorine, used as a weapon in World War I, can cause breathing problems and irritate the skin. At high levels, it can be fatal.

Also Thursday, at least 19 people were killed or found dead in Baghdad, and two bodies were discovered in the city of Kut. Three other people were shot to death in the northern city of Mosul.

Baghdad 'Surge' Returns Chalabi To Center Stage (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen

The Wall Street Journal, February 23, 2007

BAGHDAD, Iraq -- In his latest remarkable political reincarnation, onetime U.S. favorite Ahmed Chalabi has secured a position inside the Iraqi government that could help determine whether the Bush administration's new push to secure Baghdad succeeds.

In a new post created earlier this year, Mr. Chalabi will serve as an intermediary between Baghdad residents and the Iraqi and U.S. security forces mounting an aggressive counterinsurgency campaign across the city. The position is meant to help Iraqis arrange reimbursement for damage to their cars and homes caused by the security sweeps in the hope of maintaining public support for the strategy.

Mr. Chalabi's writ is supposed to be limited mainly to security, according to aides to Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, but he is already speaking ambitiously about playing a larger role in economic, health and reconstruction efforts as well. In his new capacity, Mr. Chalabi answers directly to Mr. Maliki and is already taking part in weekly planning meetings with senior American officials such as Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad and Gen. David Petraeus, the top U.S. military commander in Iraq.

Mr. Chalabi's position was created as part of a broad push by Mr. Maliki's government to capitalize on any positive momentum created by the addition of 21,500 additional American forces to Iraq, of which some 3,000 have arrived so far. In the weeks after President Bush disclosed his plans to "surge" additional forces to Iraq, Mr. Maliki created five new government committees charged with making the plan work on the ground. They include panels focused on economic development, the restoration of basic services such as electricity, and, in Mr. Chalabi's case, the critical task of maintaining public backing for the initiative.

DOJ_NMG_0135590

The new position is vaguely defined, and it is too early to tell how much power Mr. Chalabi will ultimately wield. How much money will be available to pay claims and how it might be awarded and disbursed remains to be finalized, too. But he is a skilled political infighter who has often shown a talent for making the most out of whatever hand he is dealt. Mr. Chalabi also maintains close ties with key political allies of Mr. Maliki such as radical Shiite Muslim cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, which gives him extra sway within Mr. Maliki's government. Indeed, U.S. Embassy officials suggest Mr. Chalabi's closeness to Mr. Sadr is a major reason he was offered the liaison post.

Already, some U.S. officials are expressing concern about Mr. Chalabi's new role, fearing he will undercut the elaborate system of elected and appointed local governments that American officials have been cultivating over the past three years. American and Iraqi critics also worry that Mr. Chalabi, a Shiite, will use his clout to ensure that Sunni Muslim neighborhoods of the city are hit hardest by the new security crackdown, a move that would further inflame Iraq's sectarian tensions.

"The question is whether he is really doing this to help, or whether he's trying to build himself a new political base in Baghdad or carry water for the Shiites," said a senior American official here. "And we simply don't know the answer to that yet."

In an interview yesterday, Mr. Chalabi said such concerns are unfounded, and stressed that he would use his position solely to help maintain public backing for the security push. "This is not about political parties, or about sectarian groups," he said. "We just want to motivate people to support the security plan, because otherwise it can't succeed."

Mr. Chalabi said he envisions helping Iraqis get the government to repair homes or furniture harmed in security raids, or to reimburse them for damage caused by the sweeps. He said he also plans to develop a way for Iraqis to report petty theft by security personnel, a common occurrence across Iraq. Mr. Chalabi insisted he would treat Sunnis fairly, and pointed to a recent series of conciliatory gestures he has made toward the embittered minority, which ruled for decades before the 2003 U.S. invasion that toppled Saddam Hussein.

In addition to leading the new "popular committee for mobilizing the people" in support of the Baghdad security push, Mr. Chalabi continues to head a government de-Baathification committee. That panel -- charged with expelling members of Mr. Hussein's ruling Baath Party from the government -- has come under fire for firing hundreds of thousands of mainly Sunni civil servants from their government posts. The mass unemployment and ill will resulting from the purge is widely believed to have helped swell insurgent ranks, and senior officials in the U.S. and Iraq have conceded the move was counterproductive.

Mr. Chalabi, too, has changed course in recent weeks and now says he wants to bring most former Baathists back into the government. Mr. Chalabi said he had helped draft legislation that would enable most of the ousted Sunni civil servants to reclaim their jobs or pensions, and said 14,000 former Baathists had already returned to their jobs. If the bill is signed into law, Mr. Chalabi said only 1,500 high-ranking former Baathists would be permanently barred from the government.

Despite such assurances, Mr. Chalabi remains a deeply divisive figure in Iraq, viewed skeptically by many U.S. as well as Iraqi officials. Critics see him as openly sectarian, and say they have little faith that he will treat Shiites and Sunnis equally in his new role.

"Chalabi is a very good politician, but we don't know his true intentions," said Mohammad al-Rubaie, who heads the district government in Baghdad's Karrada neighborhood. "We have to make sure that he doesn't have a free hand to do everything he wants, because otherwise his position can cause more harm than good, and create even more sectarian dangers."

Mr. Chalabi's return to prominence caps a remarkable turnaround for a man whose moment seemed to have passed after a string of political setbacks. He had spent decades in exile building ties with the neoconservative thinkers pushing for a U.S. invasion of Iraq. He returned to Baghdad after Mr. Hussein's ouster, but soon alienated many of his former backers by becoming a close ally of Mr. Sadr and making frequent trips to Iran. In December 2005 elections, Mr. Chalabi's party failed to win a single parliamentary seat.

Mr. Chalabi largely faded from public view, but he remained an active behind-the-scenes player in Iraq's chaotic political scene. He continued to run the powerful de-Baathification panel, made regular trips to Iran and recently returned from a trip to Syria undertaken at Mr. Maliki's behest, according to a senior Maliki aide.

DOJ_NMG_0135591

An aide to Mr. Chalabi said the vehicle for his latest renaissance was born of the realization that an aggressive counterinsurgency -- which involves breaking down doors, rifling through houses and making wide-scale arrests -- can quickly alienate the public.

Mr. Maliki tasked Mr. Chalabi with building a system of district committees that will work with American and Iraqi security forces operating in each area of the city, the aide said. The hope is that these committees will make it easier for residents to get restitution from the Iraqi government -- and possibly the American military -- if their property is harmed, and give them an incentive to approach Iraqi and American forces with information about insurgents.

Fueling speculation that he will expand his role, Mr. Chalabi invited dozens of political, tribal and religious leaders to a meeting in a Baghdad hotel Wednesday to explain how his new post would function and begin the process of choosing the members of the liaison committees meant to operate in Baghdad's 10 districts. During the meeting, Mr. Chalabi repeatedly told the crowd of his close ties to Mr. Maliki and described an ambitious plan to ban cars from the main market area of the Rusafa neighborhood for security reasons, a move he said would rejuvenate economic growth there.

In the interview, meanwhile, Mr. Chalabi said he would use his new position to identify shortfalls in the city's health system and basic infrastructure.

Even Mr. Chalabi's critics acknowledge he is an unusually skilled politician, a gift on full display as he made his way through a smoke-filled banquet hall in the Mansoor Hotel Wednesday, nattily attired and trailed by a retinue of bodyguards and aides. Mr. Chalabi glad-handed his way from table to table, exchanging handshakes and kisses with the local Iraqi political officials clamoring for a moment of his time. By the end of the meeting, he had won over at least some of the skeptics.

"It doesn't matter that he didn't win a seat in the elections -- this is a man who is better than most of the current people in parliament," said Muslim Ahmad Saleh, chairman of the district government in the Kadhamiya neighborhood.

Rape Of Second Sunni Woman By Iraqi Security Forces Alleged (WP)

By Ernesto Londono

The Washington Post, February 23, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 22 -- An Iraqi police official in the northwestern city of Tall Afar said Thursday that a military officer and three soldiers had admitted to raping a Sunni woman and recording the act with a cellphone camera.

The four soldiers told an investigative committee convened by the Iraqi army that they sexually assaulted the woman nearly two weeks ago, according to Gen. Najem Abdullah, a police spokesman in Tall Afar.

The soldiers' statement follows another Sunni woman's assertion this week that she had been raped in Baghdad by members of Iraq's predominantly Shiite security forces. Iraq's Kurdish president and its Sunni vice president said Thursday that a judge should investigate her case, which the Shiite-led government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has dismissed as groundless.

Iraqi President Jalal Talabani said in a statement that the courts were "the only legitimate place to examine such allegations" and that the government should avoid steps that would "inflame sensitivities and create mistrust."

Talabani's stance, echoed by Vice President Tariq al-Hashimi, is sharply at odds with Maliki's insistence that the 20-year-old Baghdad woman who contends three Iraqi policemen raped her Sunday is a criminal who fabricated the story to exacerbate sectarian tension and undermine a U.S. and Iraqi security plan to pacify the capital.

The case has caused a political uproar -- with Sunnis demanding justice and Shiites defending the officers -- in a society where public discussion of rape is rare.

"In this country, [rape] is more serious than any other crime," said Wamid Nadhme, a political scientist at Baghdad University. "The religious values and the honor values say that one should not violate a woman. This will have very serious implications in coming days if neither side is able to prove that they are right and the other side is wrong."

"Sexual violence is a well-documented tool of war," said Sarah Leah Whitson, director of the Middle East and North Africa sections of Human Rights Watch. But in Iraq, "this case is the first of its kind."

The day after the Baghdad woman's allegation came to light, Maliki said the accused officers deserved to be honored. He said the government would sue her for making the claim.

DOJ_NMG_0135592

The U.S. government has remained largely on the sidelines, even though many Iraqis view the Americans as the only potential impartial arbiter. The woman was treated at a U.S. military-run medical facility in Baghdad's fortified Green Zone.

Maliki's office e-mailed to reporters portions of her medical record, which showed health-care providers had documented signs of bruising on her inner thighs, groin and head. The document also included a handwritten note in English saying there were no signs of trauma in the patient's vagina.

U.S. officials initially said they would issue a statement on the case but later said discussing it would violate patient privacy guidelines.

Khalid Mohammed Hassan, a civic activist in Tall Afar, called the rape case there "a very dangerous crime and a very ugly crime."

"Such ugly practices will push the citizens to not cooperate with the security forces or the army, and they'll be afraid they'll be in the same position," he said.

The Islamic State of Iraq, a Sunni insurgent group, issued an audio statement on its Web site Thursday saying 300 insurgents have volunteered to conduct suicide operations to avenge the woman who came forward Monday. At least 50 are from the woman's tribe, and 20 offered to marry her if she is single, the statement says.

Withdrawing From Banks (WT)

By James Palmer

The Washington Times, February 23, 2007

There is nothing routine about a trip to the bank in Baghdad.

Confronted by criminal gangs on the streets and demands for bribes from tellers in the branches -- not to mention long lines, shortages of bank notes, and other inconveniences -- many Iraqis are opting simply to keep their savings at home.

Even without the security concerns, financiers and government officials say, there are not enough banks in Iraq to serve the population and finance sorely needed reconstruction, leaving companies and individuals struggling to secure their assets.

"You must keep it somewhere," said Abd Ali Radi, the 56-year-old owner of a modest bus company. "This is a problem for all Iraqis today."

Interviewed in a restaurant last month, Mr. Radi recalled a recent trip to his bank in which, while nervously edging ahead in line, he heard the familiar sound of an ammunition round being injected into the chamber of an automatic pistol. He quickly fled.

Ali Al-Ajeely, a 48-year-old travel agency owner, said he is so fearful of carrying large amounts of cash that he avoids the city's depositories altogether. "It's safer to stay away from the banks," he said.

And businessman Hamza Own, a 47-year-old waterworks contractor, called the banks insecure and inefficient. "I have better ways of storing my money," he said, adding he last held a bank account in 1990.

Several banks in Baghdad this year have suffered daylight heists in which millions of dollars were stolen from their main offices, branches and armored vehicles.

"Most banks handling cash have experienced large robberies -- a million here, another million there," said Foud M. Mustafa, the managing director of the Credit Bank of Iraq.

The robberies have forced some institutions to reduce the amount of cash they keep on hand. "Smaller is better now," said Zuhair Al-Hafidh, whose Ashur International Bank focuses on the investment sector.

Iraqi banks guarantee their deposits, but customers have few assurances while traveling to and from the institutions. And in a city where dozens of people are killed every day, many residents feel it is more practical to keep their savings at home.

"If anything happens to you, your family has the money," said Mr. Al-Ajeely, the travel agent.

Yet even in a society where an estimated 70 percent of business is conducted in cash, many Iraqis can't avoid banks.

Raad Mohammed Salman, whose company transports oil, said the volume of his business forces him to make deposits because "it's too much to keep at home." But he doesn't relish the experience.

Corrupt bank clerks commonly press for bribes of 50,000 dinars -- about $38.50 -- to complete a transaction valued at a little over $23,000. "They know I have good contracts with the oil ministry," Mr. Salman explained.

DOJ_NMG_0135593

Wa'al Abdul Mutalab, a 39-year-old money changer, said he handles tens of thousands of dollars daily and delivers cash deposits to his bank on a motorcycle to avoid thieves.

Once in the banks, Mr. Mutalab said, he must deal with long lines of government pensioners. "I have to arrange an appointment so I can finish quickly," he said.

Misgivings about banks date from the rule of Saddam Hussein, who would impose restrictions on banks without warning during times of unrest -- notably a $750 monthly limit on withdrawals after the 1990 invasion of Kuwait.

Saddam did open the banking sector to private institutions, and 21 such banking companies operate in Iraq today. But financial analysts say it is still not enough, especially as security problems have forced them to close branches and shelve expansion plans.

The Credit Bank of Iraq had planned to create 55 branches after Saddam's fall, but it recently closed two in Baghdad and now has only 12 open, according to Mr. Mustafa, its director.

During the nearly four years since Saddam was overthrown, five Iraqi banking companies have partnered with foreign banks. But companies outside Iraq still are hesitant to risk investments.

"We have no dealings with foreign banks now," said Farzdak Abdal Razak, a manager at the Middle East Investment Bank in Baghdad. He said merger talks with Citibank officials in Jordan collapsed last year.

Bank directors still dream of adding branches, welcoming foreign investors and having automated teller machines operating 24 hours a day. But most Iraqis would settle for a safe place to keep their money.

For those with just a little cash like Mr. Al-Ajeely, the matter is simple. "I keep it in my pockets," he said.

Distrust, Fear A Year After Iraq Mosque Bombing (LAT)

By Christian Berthelsen

The Los Angeles Times, February 23, 2007

BAGHDAD — On a gray, drizzly day in the mostly Shiite Muslim neighborhood of Karada, one of this capital's last bastions of relative stability, sheepherder Ahmed Jassim Safee reflected on how life has changed in the year since sectarian warfare erupted with the bombing of the Golden Mosque in Samarra.

"We used to go to sell our livestock in Fallouja, Ramadi and Rutbah," Safee said of Iraqi cities that are now Sunni hotspots practically off-limits to Shiites. "The shrine bombing has resulted in the drawing of borders, and now we cannot travel freely even within the limits of one city or town because you don't know when you're going to be targeted or for what reason."

The Golden Mosque held the tombs of imams who were descendants of the Muslim prophet Muhammad and regarded by the Shiite sect as his rightful successors. U.S. and Iraqi officials have committed to rebuilding the mosque's bomb-damaged golden dome, but it is in a Sunni-dominated area and the work is viewed as too dangerous to undertake at the moment.

Before the mosque bombing, anger and violence in Iraq had largely been focused on the U.S.-led forces occupying the country in the wake of the 2003 invasion.

But the Feb. 22, 2006, attack on one of the nation's holiest Shiite mosques overshadowed Western failures and transgressions, including the Abu Ghraib prison scandal and reconstruction lapses, that occurred after the fall of Iraqi President Saddam Hussein. It set off a convulsion of sectarian warfare that continues mostly unabated to this day and starkly divides Iraq in ways that were largely buried before.

Now, one year on, amid the latest version of a security plan intended to restore calm, bombed-out buildings scar Baghdad and Iraqis live in fear of one another. Several people asked to discuss their feelings on the shrine bombing and their hopes for the future declined to do so. Those who were willing to talk said they badly wanted the plan to work and for peace to return. But their faith in such an outcome varies widely.

As his 14-year-old son, Abbas, slaughtered a sheep for a customer and dozens of other animals milled around, Safee, 37, said he was pessimistic. He noted that hundreds of people have been killed even after the new security effort was launched early this month and that on Wednesday the government announced it had captured Sudanese militants entering the country.

DOJ_NMG_0135594

"What kind of security plan is this?" Safee said. "Life after the shrine incident in Samarra has become unbearable and worse than ever. It has become very dangerous to the extent that even a .50-caliber machine gun wouldn't do you good for protection."

The distrust is not limited to Shiites. Sunnis too believe sectarian tensions have long-lasting ramifications, and fear for the future.

"I don't think that the shockwaves of this incident have died down yet, and I don't think that they will unless a more secular government comes into power," said Zaid Jumaili, a 33-year-old electrical engineer from a predominantly Sunni neighborhood in west Baghdad.

"These explosions basically got rid of any inhibitions that the people had before it. It's all about revenge. Ordinary Shiites started attacking or killing ordinary Sunnis, and ordinary Sunnis who had nothing to do with [religious militants] started doing the same thing as a reprisal."

Still, many Shiites and Sunnis share the view that the attack was the work of foreign agents determined to foment a holy war in Iraq, and resent the way it has divided their country. Saif Lahaybi, a 23-year-old Sunni engineering student, said he had to end a relationship with a Shiite girl because of the divisions, and he and Shiite friends are no longer able to visit each other's neighborhoods to socialize.

"No doubt the bombing of the shrine in Samarra is not accepted, whether by Shiite or Sunnis," he said. "We were like one, living together and sharing neighborhoods."

But there are those who hold out hope.

Mohammed Thamir, 28, who on Thursday sat in his darkened luggage store without electricity, said he believed the new security effort would bring an end to the violence.

"It was a big tragedy and what happened is unfathomable, but I am optimistic that we will be able to surpass these hard times," he said as the light from a battery-powered fluorescent bulb glinted off the metal fixtures of his suitcases. Business was brisk after the bombing, as Iraqis bought baggage to flee the country. Now, he said, sales have slowed as people give the new plan a chance to work.

"'Hopefully this security plan will put an end to this violence," Thamir said. "I have faith that it will work. It's not just Iraqis; the whole international community has interest in the success of this plan."

Shujaa Abdul-Ilah, the 25-year-old owner of a store that sells leather shoes and coats, said the violence had forced him to close his shop five hours earlier each day, but that the crackdown had made him feel safer.

He said that despite the violence and sectarian tension, "I don't think that it will stay like that. We are all brothers regardless of our religion or sect. We have lived in Iraq for numerous generations."

Soldier Sentenced For Rape, Murder In Iraq (AP)

AP, February 23, 2007

FORT CAMPBELL, Ky. -- A U.S. soldier was sentenced to 100 years in prison yesterday for the gang rape and murder of an Iraqi girl and the killing of her family last year.

Sgt. Paul E. Cortez, 24, also was given a dishonorable discharge. He will be eligible for parole in 10 years under the terms of his plea agreement.

Cortez of Barstow, Calif., pleaded guilty this week to four counts of felony murder, rape and conspiracy to rape in a case considered among the worst atrocities by U.S. military personnel in Iraq.

In his plea agreement, he said he conspired with other soldiers from the Fort Campbell-based 101st Airborne Division to rape 14-year-old Abeer Qassim al-Janabi. The girl, her parents and a younger sister were all killed.

Earlier yesterday, tears rolled down Cortez's face as he apologized for the rape and murders. He said he could not explain why he took part.

"I still don't have an answer," Cortez told the judge. "I don't know why. I wish I hadn't. The lives of four innocent people were taken. I want to apologize for all of the pain and suffering I have caused the al-Janabi family."

DOJ_NMG_0135595

The military judge hearing the case, Col. Stephen R. Henley, issued a sentence of life in prison without parole, the maximum for the charges. Under military law, the defendant is given the lesser sentence unless he violates terms of the plea agreement, which requires Cortez to testify against others charged in the case.

Psychologist Charles Figley testified that Cortez and the other soldiers likely suffered stress brought on by fatigue and trauma.

"It eats you up," Figley said. "It's a horrible thing. This is not unique. We've seen this in other wars."

Five soldiers who served with Cortez in Iraq testified that his actions were out of character and described the hardships of war they experienced, including sleep deprivation and the lack of running water.

"I just never would have seen it coming," said Staff Sgt. Tim Briggs, who has known Cortez for five years and served with him in Iraq.

Prosecutors said the stress was no excuse for the actions of Cortez and the other soldiers from the 101st Airborne Division, based at Fort Campbell.

On Wednesday, Cortez described raping the girl in her family's home in Mahmoudiya last March, along with Spc. James Barker, 24. Barker pleaded guilty in November to rape and murder and was sentenced to 90 years in military prison.

Cortez said this week that former private Steven D. Green raped the girl in front of him; shot her father, mother and sister; and then shot her in the head. He also testified that the soldiers attempted to burn the girl's body; burned their own clothes; and threw the murder weapon, an AK-47, into a canal in an attempt to dispose of the evidence.

Cortez was found not guilty of more serious charges of premeditated murder and conspiracy to premeditated murder.

Pfcs. Jesse Spielman, 22, and Bryan Howard, 19, await courts-martial. Green, who is accused of being the ringleader but was discharged from the military before being charged, will be prosecuted in a federal court in Kentucky.

Long Iraq Tours Can Make Home A Trying Front (NYT)

By Lizette Alvarez

The New York Times, February 23, 2007

In the nearly two years Cpl. John Callahan of the Army was away from home, his wife, he said, had two extramarital affairs. She failed to pay his credit card bills. And their two children were sent to live with her parents as their home life deteriorated.

Then, in November, his machine gun malfunctioned during a firefight, wounding him in the groin and ravaging his left leg. When his wife reached him by phone after an operation in Germany, Corporal Callahan could barely hear her. Her boyfriend was shouting too loudly in the background.

“Haven’t you told him it’s over?” Corporal Callahan, 42, recalled the man saying. “That you aren’t wearing his wedding ring anymore?”

For Corporal Callahan, who is recuperating at Walter Reed Army Medical Center, and so many other soldiers and family members, the repercussions, chaos and loneliness of wartime deployments are one of the toughest, least discussed byproducts of the conflicts in Iraq and Afghanistan. Hundreds of thousands of soldiers and loved ones have endured long, sometimes repeated separations that test the fragility of their relationships in unforeseen ways.

The situation is likely to grow worse as the military increases the number of troops in Iraq in coming months. The Pentagon announced Wednesday that it was planning to send more than 14,000 National Guard troops back to Iraq next year, causing widespread concern among reservists. Nearly a third of the troops who have served in Iraq and Afghanistan have done more than one tour of duty.

Most families and soldiers cope, sometimes heroically. But these separations have also left a trail of badly strained or broken unions, many severed by adultery or sexual addictions; burdened spouses, some of whom are reaching for antidepressants; financial turmoil brought on by rising debts, lost wages and overspending; emotionally bruised children whose grades sometimes plummet; and anxious parents who at times turn on each other.

Hardest hit are the reservists and their families, who never bargained on long absences, sometimes as long as 18 months, and who lack the support network of full-fledged members of the military.

DOJ_NMG_0135596

"Since my husband has been gone, I have potty-trained two kids, my oldest started preschool, a kid learned to walk and talk, plus the baby is not sleeping that well," said Lori Jorgenson, 30, whose husband, a captain in the Minnesota National Guard, has been deployed since November 2005 and recently had his tour extended another four months. "I am very burnt out."

In the next couple of months, Ms. Jorgenson, who has three young children, has to get a loan, buy a house and move out of their apartment.

Even many active-duty military families, used to the difficulties of deployments, are reeling as soldiers are being sent again and again to war zones, with only the smallest pause in between. The unrelenting fear of death or injury, mental health problems, the lack of recuperative downtime between deployments and the changes that await when a soldier comes home hover over every household.

And unlike the Vietnam era, when the draft meant that many people were directly touched by the conflict, this period finds military families feeling a keen sense of isolation from the rest of society. Not many Americans have a direct connection to the war or the military. Only 1.4 million people, or less than 1 percent of the American population, serve in the active-duty military.

"Prior to 9/11, the deployments were not wartime related," said Kristin Henderson, a military spouse whose husband served as a Navy chaplain in Iraq and Afghanistan and whose recent book "While They're at War" explores the impact of today's deployments. "There were separation issues, but there was no anticipatory grief and no fear and no medical overload."

It is common for spouses to wind up on antidepressants, Ms. Henderson said, a situation made worse by the repeat deployments. The more deployments, the less time that families have to mend before the stress sets in again, she added.

Ms. Henderson recalled having a panic attack in church while her husband was away and crying in the shower most mornings so no one would see her. "The common misconception," she said, "is that the more you do this, the better you get. That is not true."

Some relationships grow stronger as distance and sacrifice help bring into sharp focus what is important. Before Robert Johnson's deployments to Iraq with the North Carolina Army National Guard, he and his wife, Dawn, faced difficult decisions about how to care for their seven children, including four living at home. They decided their two severely disabled teenage twin sons would be best cared for elsewhere, one in a group home, the other with grandparents.

But Ms. Johnson, 41, who works full time at a pharmacy, said she felt there had been an upside to the ordeal. "Now I know," she said, "that I can pretty much survive anything."

Other marriages, especially young marriages rushed by deployment, may have been destined to fail from the start.

Seeking Help

As the war stretches into its fourth year, more troops and their families are reaching out for help, turning to family therapists and counselors. The Army and the Marines, partly in response to a jump in the number of divorces and a rise in domestic violence reports, have created programs to help couples cope, including seminars and family weekend retreats. The Army has also improved the family readiness groups that often serve as a lifeline for spouses.

Divorces, which had hovered in the 2 percent to 3 percent range for the Army since 2000, spiked in 2004 to 6 percent among officers and 3.6 percent among enlisted personnel. The rate for officers dropped to 2.1 percent in 2006, but the rate for enlisted personnel has stayed level, at 3.6 percent.

Married women are having the hardest time. The divorce rate for women in the Army in 2006 was 7.9 percent, the highest since 2000, compared with 2.6 percent for men.

Demand for counseling has grown so quickly among military families and returning soldiers that the military has begun contracting out more services to private therapists. Reservists must rely largely on networks of volunteers.

"For a while a lot of soldiers coming back were not being seen because there was such an overload of patients and so few mental health providers on base," said Carl Settles, a psychologist and retired Army colonel who runs a practice near Fort Hood, Tex.

The military recently called him to ask how many of several hundred patients he could take on, Dr. Settles said.

Corporal Callahan, who is on the brink of divorce, said his marriage, his second, had been troubled before his deployment but became unsalvageable once he shipped out. His deployment also forced him to transfer guardianship of his children temporarily to their grandparents because of problems at home, he said.

DOJ_NMG_0135597

His injury, which has left him unable to walk, has now complicated his chances of remaining in the Army. "I felt like I had hit bottom," he said. "I had so much bitterness in me. I have been so angry. So many nights I have cried and tried to figure out what I can do and what I can't do."

Capt. Lance Oliver, Corporal Callahan's commander in Iraq, said he kept close track of Corporal Callahan's personal situation, and while disintegrating marriages are not uncommon, Captain Oliver said, Corporal Callahan's was the most dramatic.

"I can't think of one that is more heartwrenching," he said.

Spouses' Secrets

Extramarital affairs, hardly rare in other wars, are also a fixture now.

David Hernandez, who is in the Army and is based in Fort Hood, said his relationship with his wife of 10 years crumbled between his second and third deployments. She was frazzled and lonely, he said, with two children to care for; he came back moodier, quieter and more distant. Now his wife is living with another man, Mr. Hernandez said in e-mail messages from Iraq. He, in turn, has started a relationship with a female soldier, despite his hope for reconciliation.

"It was very stressful for her doing everything and worrying about me," he said, adding, "I spent so much time away; it drove us apart to seek other relationships."

"Now I'm back out here," he said. "I feel helpless. What can I do? It makes it a little easier being with someone out here. Temptation was the hardest, and I gave in."

Dr. Settles sees about 40 soldiers a week in private practice and says a majority of soldiers cope well. But those with problems feel them deeply.

"Infidelity and financial issues are major issues," Dr. Settles said, adding that there are abundant cases of wives who clear out their husband's bank accounts or soldiers who come home and go binge shopping. "Even a good mule needs a few oats once in a while," he said. " Some of these guys, they are kind of at their limit."

Some therapists say they are bracing for this year's divorces. Mary Coe, a marriage and family therapist working near Fort Campbell, an Army base on the border of Kentucky and Tennessee, said she was seeing "many, many divorces" right now. The 101st Airborne Division recently returned from its second deployment with an astonishing level of rage, she said. "Now we are seeing 15- to 20-year marriages not making it, and these are families that survived 20 years of deployments," Dr. Coe said.

Lei Steivers, whose husband is a senior noncommissioned officer at Fort Campbell, has been a military wife for 25 years. But it took her husband's second yearlong deployment to Iraq to cripple their marriage. They are now in counseling. A family leader on the base, Ms. Steivers, 46, also has two sons in the military. She said a number of men she knows came home last year for rest and relaxation and demanded a divorce.

Many spouses, she said, blame the presence of women alongside combat units. The blame may be misplaced, but the anxiety is not.

"They are side-by-side fixing an engine, the girls live upstairs, the guys live downstairs," Ms. Steivers said. "We are just more and more in awe, saying, What is going on?"

Some wives have uncovered their husband's pornographic pictures on Web sites like MySpace, she said, adding, "I've seen them because the wives show them to me."

Dr. Coe said she had been surprised by the number of soldiers who had come home and sought counseling for sexual addictions fueled by DVD's and Internet pornography.

While pornography is blocked by the United States military in Iraq, service members gain access to it with laptops through their own Internet service providers, Corporal Callahan said.

At the same time, spouses back home sometimes hook up with men on the Internet. When the relationship surfaces, it sometimes leads to violence, said Robert Weiss, who co-wrote "Untangling the Web," a book about Internet pornography, and who has been hired as a consultant by military family groups looking for guidance.

Family Trumps All Else

For some spouses, concerns about infidelity take a back seat to the demands of a household. Lillian Connolly's husband of 21 years, a staff sergeant in the Army Reserve in Massachusetts who now works at a Lowe's Home Improvement, was sent to Iraq twice. The first deployment, in 2003, lasted 11 months. The second one, for which he volunteered, was much harder on the family. Even before his father's second deployment, the couple's 12-year-old started having tantrums. When his father left their home in 2005, the boy started to misbehave at school, Ms. Connolly said. He and his sister were the only children with a deployed parent, and the school, she said, was mostly unsympathetic. If anything, Ms. Connolly said, she got the blame.

DOJ_NMG_0135598

"He really worried about his dad every day," Ms. Connolly said of her son. "They couldn't understand he had an anger problem because his dad was gone.

"That was more stressful and harder to deal with than my husband being gone."

Mary Keller, the executive director of the Military Child Education Coalition, a private nonprofit group that helps children and schools cope, said two million children had experienced deployments. Worst hit are those in schools that are isolated from military culture.

"It is highly likely that the teacher doesn't have a personal experience with the military," Dr. Keller said.

At home, spouses say, they try to keep their young children connected to their deployed parents. Ms. Jorgenson lets her three children pull Skittles out of a bowl to mark the passage of time. She buys them surprise gifts from their father, like boxes of Fruity Pebbles or camouflage sheets. Meanwhile, she thinks, "Will I ever get through bath time and get them to bed without screaming and losing my patience?"

Parents of young soldiers often appear the most tormented, counselors say, especially if opposed to the enlistment. There are also few resources for them.

"Mothers are in worse shape than wives," said Jaine Darwin, a psychoanalyst and co-director of Strategic Outreach to Families of All Reservists, a volunteer group that offers counseling to military families in many states. "Mom is not allowed to cry. And that is certainly a problem."

Esther Gallagher, 50, who works in a counseling office at a high school in Goodrich, Minn., has two sons in Iraq. She worries about both but frets most about her youngest, Justin, 22, a gunner who has seen a lot of violence in Falluja. He joined the Minnesota Army National Guard and has spent most of the past three years on deployment; the last tour was recently extended, which angered his mother and disheartened the soldiers in his unit.

When Sergeant Gallagher came home for two weeks last year, he walked out of the room any time anyone talked about Iraq.

"Every day, they are in harm's way," Ms. Gallagher said, her voice quavering. "I mean, that's your baby — to have him out there in harm's way, and not knowing. Your life has been to protect these kids."

Back From Despair, In Her Words (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 23, 2007

WITH her husband in a coma, unable to breathe on his own, Nancy Kules sat down at a computer and began to type. PRAY, PRAY, PRAY, she wrote.

It was Dec. 2, 2005. Nancy, a kindergarten teacher from Arizona, had flown across the Atlantic to be with her husband, Army 1st Lt. Ryan Kules, at a military hospital in Germany. His entire body was wrapped in bandages. All Nancy could see were his forehead, a toe and his blood-clogged ears.

Ryan's Humvee had been hit by a roadside bomb in Iraq three days earlier. His right arm and left leg were blown off. He nearly bled to death. He had severe brain damage. Doctors feared he would not survive.

Nancy wrote to friends and relatives: I wish I were logging on with better news…. I will give you all the cold, hard facts.

The ordeals of combat amputees in Iraq and Afghanistan have provided a familiar narrative after nearly four years of war. But less familiar are the stories of their spouses. For the next year, in 309 entries in an online journal, Nancy Kules laid out the facts and poured out her emotions.

Her journal opened a window on a searing experience shared by a growing number of spouses who have become collateral damage in America's overseas wars. What began as an attempt to keep loved ones informed became a unique personal account of recovery and accommodation, of suffering and redemption.

DOJ_NMG_0135599

"People think what a great story it is, and what blessings we've had, and how Ryan has overcome great odds," Nancy said outside the couple's Maryland home on a sunny winter morning. "But they don't think about the daily repercussions of it. The heart of the matter isn't something you can therapy away. It is what it is. It's our new reality."

For Nancy, and for thousands who have visited the site (www.caringbridge.org/visit/ryankules) to offer comments and contributions, the journal is an inspiration. But in its frank approach to tragedy, it is also a reminder that reality can be daunting, and that life for this couple can never be the same.

The story begins just after Nancy, 24, received the phone call that military families dread. Summoned to a phone at her elementary school in Ahwatukee, Ariz., she heard a faraway voice say, matter-of-factly, that Ryan, 25, had lost limbs in an explosion.

She left work, packed and headed for the airport — knowing that being told to fly to Germany meant that Ryan was too badly injured to make it back to the U.S.

"I honestly thought I was going to be bringing a body home," she said.

Nancy was bombarded with contradictory information. After one doctor described severe brain damage, she threw up. Other doctors had assured her there was minimal brain damage.

"I wanted to know the truth, and I wanted to kick whoever gave me bad information," she said.

On Dec. 3, 2005, the second day at the hospital in Germany, she wrote: It is easier to get the info to you this way, because it is difficult to talk about it out loud.

Between the grief, time changes, and jet lag, we are so unaware of time. I got to help clean Ryan up last night. I spent a good 4 hours taking a q-tip to his fingers, toes, ears and any other visible skin. It was somewhat therapeutic for me….

I want MY Ryan back, (past, present, and future) and all those memories that we share and I have been re-living for the past few days … I have faith that this will happen.

Dec. 7: I re-read the things that I have written, barely remembering some of it…. I find myself crying when I read these things. Not the kinds of sobs that shake my whole body, but a peaceful stream of tears running down my face.

With Ryan in a coma, Nancy spoke to him, hoping he would somehow understand that she was at his side.

"He was so badly broken," she recalled recently. "If he was hanging on until we got there, I wanted him to know, 'Baby, I'm here and I love you and if you gotta let go, it's OK.' "

HE did not let go.

Ryan was transferred to Walter Reed Army Medical Center in Washington, still in a coma and fighting a high fever. There, Nancy noticed that his eyes were no longer locked in a fixed stare. They moved slightly.

Dec. 10: I knew for the first time that Ryan is aware that I am here. He is still not following commands, but when I looked in his eyes, I just feel like he is still there, frustrated that he cannot show this to us yet …

The anguish of this discovery is startling. I feel like my time to deal with 'me' is over, and I now need to find the strength to focus on him …. I am scared of what Ryan will think. I am scared of what he already knows…. I think I need to go outside, stomp, scream, and cry a little.

Three days later, after a breathing tube was removed, Ryan spoke his first words since the explosion: "Hi, Nancy."

Nancy quizzed him. His name? "Ryan." His dog's name? "Peanut." Did he love Nancy? "Yes." Their wedding anniversary? "Um … April?"

Dec. 13: Ha ha. I'll take it …. It is a long, l o n g road ahead of us, but the progress of today helps us look toward tomorrow …

Dec. 14: This evening, Ryan told me "my legs and arms are broken." I just said "yes baby, but the doctors are working to help you. I have to go to the bathroom, I will be right back." Then, I stepped around the corner and cried. My poor Ryan. My heart aches for him …

I cannot imagine waking up and suddenly having to deal with the loss.

That same day, Ryan called his wife "Miss Nancy."

I got all teary eyed because of this … I don't know why he called me Miss Nancy. That was hard. I am sure he will get around to "baby" or at least Nancy soon enough but …

DOJ_NMG_0135600

The loss of his limbs weighed on Ryan. "I didn't freak out, but I would realize it all over again the next day, anew," he recalled. "People ask if I woke and started screaming because I'm missing an arm and a leg. Well, it was gradual — it happened over and over."

Doctors discovered mucous and blood clots in Ryan's lungs. Because of breathing problems, he was re-intubated and unable to speak.

Dec. 16: 2 steps forward, 100 steps back. We feel like we have lost a week+ of progress in one night.

Dec. 18: I am happy as a clam this evening. His vital signs are great, the clots have not presented any new problems as of yet, and he gives me kisses whenever I ask for them (mostly) :)

Ryan had not yet been told that two of his soldiers died in the explosion.

Dec. 23: Ryan told me that he had been waiting for us to have some time alone so he could ask … the question that I have been preparing for, but dreading. "What happened to the other men from my platoon?"

It broke my heart to tell Ryan, but he was understanding and lay in quiet contemplation after I broke the news. I cried.

The journal records Ryan's three dozen surgeries (he remembers only three) and his long medical odyssey from coma to intensive care to therapy to rehabilitation. It captures Ryan's first attempts to feed himself, his first "breakout" from the hospital for a day trip, his struggles to learn to walk on a prosthetic leg. He left the hospital as an outpatient in mid-January 2006.

July 12: Ryan is able to walk, AND drink a Slurpee at the same time. The small things in life …

The entries document with candor and passion the couple's "roller coaster ride."

Nov. 29, the one-year anniversary of the explosion: Even through times that felt very dark and lonely, this website has been a beacon of support, and a lifeline to others that were (and are) willing to share in our pain and concern, or joy and accomplishments …

I can honestly say neither of us has ever experienced anything more challenging, or demanding. Although things have been almost impossible to bear at times and even harder to understand, the number one thing … is to try our best to learn from the situation. What can we take away from all of this that will leave us stronger?

RYAN is among 100 Americans who have lost two limbs in Iraq or Afghanistan. An additional 448 have lost one limb, and four have lost three.

Promoted to captain in July, he is walking, with effort, on his prosthesis. He can drive a car. He has undergone therapy to become left-hand dominant. His right arm — he was right-handed — was severed too high up for a prosthetic arm to fit effectively.

Nancy says his brain function is as good as ever, though Ryan cracked, "Some would argue that I've always had reduced brain function."

He and Nancy have taken trips around the country in which Ryan has gone snowboarding, snow skiing, water-skiing, whitewater rafting, biking, fishing and canoeing. He visits Walter Reed twice a week for physical therapy.

"The neighbors know me as the guy with the left arm who walks kind of funny," he said. "They don't know me any other way. I'm kind of accepted as a normal member of society, and that's the goal in rehab."

Ryan plans to work as an intelligence analyst for a private company that does contract work for the federal government. "I can't get back into the fight on the ground anymore, so this is my way of getting back into it," he said.

Nancy plans to return to teaching someday, and is "slowing down" on the journal, she said.

"It's time to kind of get back our privacy," she said. "We still want to share the highlights of our life, but in a more normal way. Now, thank God, the updates are kind of ordinary. It's not do-or-die information anymore."

They are now "just a normal couple in their 20s, dealing with all the little things couples deal with," Nancy said.

"But for every day for the rest of hopefully Ryan's very long life, he will wake up every morning and face the challenge mentally, physically and emotionally, strapping on body parts in order to function," she said. "That doesn't go away."

Recently, the journal reported a new development: The Kuleses are expecting their first child, a girl, in May. They've already named her: Jillian Deme Kules. The "J" honors Sgt. Jerry W. Mills Jr., 23, and the "D" Sgt. Donald J. Haase, 28, the soldiers killed in the explosion.

"It was a relief to know there wasn't anything, uh, you know … well, you get blown up, you sort of wonder what else might not be working," Nancy said.

DOJ_NMG_0135601

"Yeah, you gotta make sure everything works," Ryan said.

"Well, everything's working fine," Nancy said. "It's not just for show."

"Good way to put it there, Nancy," Ryan said.

Nancy's journal no longer focuses on Ryan's recovery, or her own. The main topic now is the latest baby news.

Sept. 23: Ryan and I cannot wait until our little one is old enough to understand the meaning behind [her] name.

South Korean Gets 5 Years For Dealings With Iraqis (NYT)

By James Barron

The New York Times, February 23, 2007

Tongsun Park, a once flamboyant South Korean businessman convicted of illegally representing Saddam Hussein in trying to influence the United Nations oil-for-food program, was sentenced yesterday to five years in prison.

Judge Denny Chin of Federal District Court in Manhattan said Mr. Park had "blatantly disregarded the law" by taking more than $2 million for trying to lobby United Nations officials to ease sanctions against Iraq.

"You acted out of greed, acted to profit from what was supposed to be a humanitarian program," Judge Chin told Mr. Park. He also fined him $15,000 and ordered him to forfeit $1.2 million.

The judge called the sentence "harsh" for a 71-year-old man with health problems. But he also said it was "appropriate."

Mr. Park was found guilty last July. He was the first defendant to go to trial in connection with a scandal that involved cash from Iraq in diplomatic pouches, "back-channel communications" to the United Nations secretary general at the time, and even a scheme to bribe him.

The oil-for-food program was intended to ease some aspects of the sanctions imposed on Iraq after it invaded Kuwait in 1990. Under it, Mr. Hussein's government could use the money from limited oil sales to buy aid supplies — food, medicine and other nonmilitary staples.

Federal prosecutors said Mr. Park had even had a hand in influencing the negotiations that gave birth to the aid program in 1995. But they said he never registered as an agent for Mr. Hussein's government, as required under federal law.

Judge Chin focused on the money that passed through Mr. Park's hands, and on the money that he pocketed. The judge said Mr. Park had accepted "manila folders filled with $100 bills" and had once gone to Iraq to pick up $700,000 in cash.

Mr. Park's lawyer, Michael S. Kim, said Mr. Park had decided not to say anything in court because of "advanced age, frail health and his desire to get his life back on track." Mr. Park said at the time of his arrest that he had diabetes and high blood pressure and had just had a kidney transplant.

The sentencing came hours after Judge Chin refused a request from four other defendants to dismiss separate fraud and conspiracy charges. They have pleaded not guilty and are awaiting trial.

Mr. Park, who was also a central figure in a Congressional bribery scandal in the 1970s that became known as Koreagate, was arrested 13 months ago. Mexican immigration officials took him into custody at the Mexico City airport.

As prosecutors prepared their case against Mr. Park, an independent panel led by Paul A. Volcker, the former Federal Reserve chairman, concluded that at the time of his activities for Iraq, Mr. Park was something of an informal adviser to the United Nations secretary general at the time, Boutros Boutros-Ghali.

The report said Mr. Park and a business partner, Samir A. Vincent, had worked out an arrangement with officials of Mr. Hussein's government and would receive millions of dollars in cash.

Park Sentenced To 5 Years In U.N. Oil-for-Food Bribery Scandal (WP)

By Colum Lynch

Washington Post, February 23, 2007

NEW YORK, Feb. 22 -- South Korean businessman and influence peddler Tongsun Park was sentenced Thursday to five years in prison for his role in the bribery scandal surrounding the United Nation's oil-for-food program for Iraq a decade ago.

Park, 71, admitted taking more than $2.5 million from Saddam Hussein's government to bribe senior U.N. officials to persuade them to ease economic sanctions against Iraq after the 1991 Persian Gulf War. He was convicted in July of acting as an unregistered agent of Iraq; he was to have set up a back channel between then-U.N. Secretary General Boutros Boutros-Ghali and then-Iraqi Deputy Prime Minister Tariq Aziz.

DOJ_NMG_0135602

The sentence was the maximum possible. U.S. District Judge Denny Chin also ordered Park to forfeit $1.2 million of his assets and fined him $15,000. Chin said Park had "acted out of greed" and "blatantly disregarded the law."

"You either bribed a U.N. official or you were acting as if you were going to bribe a U.N. official," Chin told Park, who stood impassively in the courtroom. He was taken into custody after saying goodbye to friends.

Park's trial and a U.N. investigation exposed a secretive network of businessmen, Washington politicians and other insiders who joined forces in the early 1990s to ease U.N. sanctions imposed on Iraq after it invaded Kuwait in 1990. Their efforts eventually led to the $64 million oil-for-food program allowing Iraq to sell its oil to pay for humanitarian goods.

Park's role in the scheme marked an extraordinary comeback -- and another amazing fall -- for a man who was indicted in the 1970s "Koreagate" influence-peddling scandal that roiled Washington. He had funneled hundreds of thousands in cash from the South Korean government to influential members of Congress. After the case broke, Park fled to South Korea. But after bribery charges against him were dropped, he agreed to return to the United States and testify before Congress about his activities.

During that era, Park was a fixture in Washington political circles, hosting parties at his historic George Town Club. His friends and clients included the late House Speaker Thomas P. "Tip" O'Neill Jr. (D-Mass.), Rep. Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.) and William E. Timmons, an influential Republican lobbyist who once joined forces with Park in an unsuccessful attempt to prevent the U.S. ouster of Panamanian strongman Manuel Noriega.

"He was always known as a man who was willing to bring two people together for the right price," said Mark G. Califano, a former U.N. investigator who co-wrote "Good Intentions Corrupted," a book based on the findings of a U.N. probe led by former U.S. Federal Reserve chairman Paul A. Volcker.

Despite his past, Park insinuated himself with Boutros-Ghali in the early 1990s, acting as an unofficial intelligence adviser on issues including the Korean Peninsula and Japan. He provided "first-class information," "knew everybody" and was "an integral part" of Washington's political elite, Boutros-Ghali told a team of U.N. investigators probing corruption in the humanitarian program.

Park was also valued by Boutros-Ghali and U.N. insiders for his capacity to secure money and political support for a variety of U.N. causes, including the organization's 50th anniversary celebration.

He also set up meetings with influential political leaders, including Rangel, now chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, to reinvigorate Boutros-Ghali's unsuccessful 1996 reelection campaign after the Clinton administration decided to veto his candidacy.

"It was always interesting to talk to Tongsun, about the travels he had done, relationships with people, how he was seeking to build a better world, said George Dalley, Rangel's chief of staff. "Whatever purpose he might have had, he was good at masking it. That is my best explanation of why a person even with a shadowy past could remake himself and develop a relationship that would be a positive one with a guy like Charlie Rangel."

"I guess now it's for sure that his reputation and his memory is all going to be the fixer, the hustler," Dalley said. "For a while I guess I saw a guy trying to redeem himself from his past and doing something that was totally different. But apparently it wa sn't."

Park's foray into Iraq diplomacy began in 1992 when he joined forces with Samir A. Vincent, a former Iraqi Olympic athlete who had close ties to officials in Baghdad and Washington.

Vincent had been unable to persuade Iraqi officials to allow the American Red Cross to oversee a humanitarian relief program for the country.

Park and Vincent hatched a plan to solicit millions from the Iraqis to try to bribe Boutros-Ghali and other officials to develop an oil-for-food program that was favorable to the Iraqi government.

In 1996, Hussein's government agreed to pay $5 million to Park and $10 million to Vincent, a portion of which was to be used to bribe unnamed U.N. officials. But Park received only a fraction of his cut, more than $700,000, in old bills stuffed into shopping bags.

The following year, Park traveled to Baghdad to try to collect the rest. Aziz provided him with $1 million in a cardboard box, which he exchanged for a $988,885 check that was invested in a Canadian company controlled by a then-senior U.N. official.

DOJ_NMG_0135603

The federal investigation into the oil-for-food program has expanded into a wider probe of other corruption at the United Nations and has resulted in the indictment or conviction of 14 people. Vincent pleaded guilty and testified against Park at the trial.

But there was no evidence in Park's case that he and Vincent used the cash to bribe Boutros-Ghali.

Califano said a "fairly detailed review" of Boutros-Ghali's financial records yielded no evidence of inappropriate payments. "We think the Iraqis probably got ripped off," Califano said.

Iraqi Embassy Upgrades Its D.C. Digs (WP)

By Nora Boustany

The Washington Post, February 23, 2007

Iraq may be facing a deadly civil war, but the Iraqi government is initiating major, costly repairs to its diplomatic building in Washington and expanding its real estate holdings here.

The latest Iraqi government purchase for its U.S. mission is a $5.8 million mansion at 3421 Massachusetts Ave. NW in Observatory Circle, across the street from Vice President Cheney's official residence. The three-story, 1920 Tudor-style structure, with more than 7,000 square feet of space, will serve as Iraq's temporary embassy during renovations to its fading Dupont Circle mission. Plans are to eventually turn the Dupont Circle building into a cultural center for the exhibition of Iraqi art.

The mansion comes with bright skylights, inset lighting fixtures, a top-floor kitchenette with a built-in espresso machine, new hardwood floors and soft pistachio carpeting up the winding stairs. There are heated floors, a firefighting system, speakers for music throughout the building, and spacious bathrooms, one with a Jacuzzi.

"We have bathrooms coming out of our ears," said Iraqi Ambassador Samir Sumaidaie, inspecting the new digs.

A Washington design and restoration company, Skynear and Co., painstakingly repaired the building after a 2004 fire, replicating almost every detail. Original plaster moldings were recast and French chandeliers imported to replace the originals. "A lot of blood, sweat and tears went into it," said Lynn Skynear. "We think we resurrected it back from the dead."

The Iraqi government bought the building in October.

Overseeing the effort is Sumaidaie, an electrical engineer by training, a poet and Islamic art connoisseur by inclination. His soon-to-be-vacated Dupont Circle office is a study in good lighting and precision. There is chaos in Iraq, but his working space exudes maximum control: a sleek computer screen, a yellow pad, Mont Blanc pens in a wooden case, rows of rulers, cellphones.

"It is a tiny part of what I do here," he said last week, looking up from design plans spread over a desk buffed to gleaming perfection. "Bear with me, I have to watch this," he said as he watched President Bush, on a vast television screen, speak about the importance of success in Iraq.

Asked about spending oil revenue on embassy buildings while Iraq is in the throes of war, Sumaidaie turned off the television's sound. "Rebuilding is part of our recovery, regaining normalcy is part of our recovery," he replied. "It is building, not destroying."

Sumaidaie is the first Iraqi ambassador to the United States since Mohamed al-Mashat fled to Canada in January 1991 before the start of the Persian Gulf War. His hands are full, with requests for media interviews, meetings with U.S. officials and lobbying a newly critical Congress, in addition to the minutiae of sifting through plans submitted by five local companies vying for the embassy's renovation project. The embassy also tends to the local Iraqi community and is developing consular offices in other major American cities.

"I believe every person in charge of something should do his best," Sumaidaie said. "I am doing the best for Iraq from where I am sitting."

Sumaidaie has even bigger real estate expansion plans, once peace descends on Iraq: a new facility in a prime location in Washington that would be designed by one of Iraq's internationally renowned architects, such as Iraq-born, Britain-based Zaha Hadid. The Dupont Circle embassy would then become an Iraqi museum.

On this day, however, the daily reports of casualties, both Iraqi and American, are topmost in this thoughts.

DOJ_NMG_0135604

After a recent visit to Walter Reed Army Medical Center, he said, "These great young men and women are heroes, yet their lives will never be the same. Each one of their sacrifices is a personal tragedy. This has been a joint effort, like a baptism of fire. We will get to the other side of this war, hopefully."

In the meantime, he wants to repair Iraq's image in Washington -- or at least its public facade. After 15 years of neglect, the red-brick embassy off Dupont Circle is in disrepair, with corroding pipes, peeling gold-leaf ceilings and rusty wiring.

To repair the Dupont Circle building will take millions. Sumaidaie is currently soliciting bids. Once the renovation is underway, the Iraqi mission will decamp to the posh new quarters at Observatory Circle.

The new facility sits amid some of the city's major religious centers: across Massachusetts Avenue from St. Sophia Greek Orthodox Cathedral, next to a construction site for a Buddhist temple, and five blocks from the Islamic Center of Washington. The towers of Washington National Cathedral can be seen nearby.

But the colorful history of 3421 seems more earthly than divine.

The building became the embassy of Sudan in 1961, during the Kennedy administration. When Bangladesh gained independence from Pakistan in 1971, the mansion became its embassy. In the mid-1980s, at the peak of demonstrations against apartheid, South Africa moved part of its embassy there. In the early 1990s, Kazakhstan launched its U.S. diplomatic mission there after gaining independence from the former Soviet Union.

The most recent previous occupant was the diplomatic mission of Ivory Coast, which has since moved to a new building. During its years at the address, Ivory Coast endured a bloody civil war. In February 2004, days after the Ivorians moved out, the building was damaged by an electrical fire.

In addition to his other duties, Sumaidaie is collecting works by Iraqi artists to exhibit in the embassy's buildings, wise investments for the future, he said.

"It will take a long time for us to heal," he said. "I do believe that giving helps healing, doing something positive. It is the antidote to destruction. In the teeth of the most horrendous violence, there are people out there doing their jobs. This is the best way to deal with fear, a constructive way out. It is one of the ways of healing."

U.S. Used Bases In Ethiopia To Hunt Al Qaeda In Africa (NYT)

By Michael R. Gordon And Mark Mazzetti

The New York Times, February 23, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 22 — The American military quietly waged a campaign from Ethiopia last month to capture or kill top leaders of Al Qaeda in the Horn of Africa, including the use of an airstrip in eastern Ethiopia to mount airstrikes against Islamic militants in neighboring Somalia, according to American officials.

The close and largely clandestine relationship with Ethiopia also included significant sharing of intelligence on the Islamic militants' positions and information from American spy satellites with the Ethiopian military. Members of a secret American Special Operations unit, Task Force 88, were deployed in Ethiopia and Kenya, and ventured into Somalia, the officials said.

The counterterrorism effort was described by American officials as a qualified success that disrupted terrorist networks in Somalia, led to the death or capture of several Islamic militants and involved a collaborative relationship with Ethiopia that had been developing for years.

But the tally of the dead and captured does not as yet include some Qaeda leaders — including Fazul Abdullah Mohammed and Fahid Mohammed Ally Msalam — whom the United States has hunted for their suspected roles in the attacks on American Embassies in Kenya and Tanzania in 1998. With Somalia still in a chaotic state, and American and African officials struggling to cobble together a peacekeeping force for the war-ravaged country, the long-term effects of recent American operations remain unclear.

It has been known for several weeks that American Special Operations troops have operated inside Somalia and that the United States carried out two strikes on Qaeda suspects using AC-130 gunships. But the extent of American cooperation with the recent Ethiopian invasion into Somalia and the fact that the Pentagon secretly used an airstrip in Ethiopia to carry out attacks have not been previously reported. The secret campaign in the Horn of Africa is an example of a more aggressive approach the Pentagon has taken in recent years to dispatch Special Operations troops globally to hunt high-level terrorism suspects.

DOJ_NMG_0135605

President Bush gave the Pentagon powers after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks to carry out these missions, which historically had been reserved for intelligence operatives.

When Ethiopian troops first began a large-scale military offensive in Somalia late last year, officials in Washington denied that the Bush administration had given its tacit approval to the Ethiopian government. In interviews over the past several weeks, however, officials from several American agencies with a hand in Somalia policy have described a close alliance between Washington and the Ethiopian government that was developed with a common purpose: rooting out Islamic radicalism inside Somalia.

Indeed, the Pentagon for several years has been training Ethiopian troops for counterterrorism operations in camps near the Somalia border, including Ethiopian special forces called the Agazi Commandos, which were part of the Ethiopian offensive in Somalia.

Bryan Whitman, a Pentagon spokesman, declined to discuss details of the American operation, but some officials agreed to provide specifics because they saw it as a relative success story. They said that the close relationship had included the sharing of battlefield intelligence on the Islamists' positions — a result of an Ethiopian request to Gen. John P. Abizaid, then the commander of the United States Central Command. John D. Negroponte, the director of national intelligence at the time, then authorized spy satellites to be diverted to provide information for Ethiopian troops, the officials said.

The deepening American alliance with Ethiopia is the latest twist in the United States' on-and-off intervention in Somalia, beginning with an effort in 1992 to distribute food to starving Somalis and evolving into deadly confrontation in 1993 between American troops and fighters loyal to a Somali warlord, Mohammed Farah Aidid. The latest chapter began last June when the Council of Islamic Courts, an armed fundamentalist movement, defeated a coalition of warlords backed by the Central Intelligence Agency and took power in Mogadishu, the capital. The Islamists were believed to be sheltering Qaeda militants involved in the embassy bombings, as well as in a 2002 hotel bombing in Kenya.

After a failed C.I.A. effort to arm and finance Somali warlords, the Bush administration decided on a policy to bolster Somalia's weak transitional government. This decision brought the American policy in line with Ethiopia's.

As the Islamists' grip on power grew stronger, their militias began to encircle Baidoa, where the transitional government was operating in virtual exile. Ethiopian officials pledged that if the Islamists attacked Baidoa, they would respond with a full-scale assault.

While Washington resisted officially endorsing an Ethiopian invasion, American officials from several government agencies said that the Bush administration decided last year that an incursion was the best option to dislodge the Islamists from power.

When the Ethiopian offensive began on Dec. 24, it soon turned into a rout, somewhat to the Americans' surprise. Armed with American intelligence, the Ethiopians' tank columns, artillery batteries and military jets made quick work of the poorly trained and ill-equipped Islamist militia.

"The Ethiopians just wiped out entire grid squares; it was a blitzkrieg," said one official in Washington who had helped develop the strategy toward Somalia.

As the Islamists retreated, the Qaeda operatives and their close aides fled south toward a swampy region. Using information provided by Ethiopian forces in Somalia as well as American intelligence, a task force from the Pentagon's Joint Special Operations Command began planning direct strikes.

On Dec. 31, the largely impotent transitional government of Somalia submitted a formal request to the American ambassador in Kenya asking for the United States to take action against the militants.

General Abizaid called Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates and informed him that the Central Command was sending additional Special Operations forces to the region. The deployment was carried out under the terms of an earlier, classified directive that gave the military the authority to kill or capture senior Qaeda operatives if it was determined that the failure to act expeditiously meant the United States would lose a "fleeting opportunity" to neutralize the enemy, American officials said.

On Jan. 6, two Air Force AC-130 gunships, aircraft with devastating firepower, arrived at a small airport in eastern Ethiopia. American Special Operations troops operating in Kenya, working with the Kenyan military, also set up positions along the southern border to capture militants trying to flee the country.

DOJ_NMG_0135606

A Navy flotilla began to search for ships that might be carrying fleeing Qaeda operatives. Support planes were deployed in Djibouti. F-15Es from Al Udeid air base in Qatar also flew missions. Intelligence was shared with Ethiopia and Kenya through C.I.A. operatives in each country. American military planners also worked directly with Ethiopian and Kenyan military officials.

On Jan. 7, one day after the AC-130s arrived in Ethiopia, the airstrike was carried our near Ras Kamboni, an isolated fishing village on the Kenyan border.

According to American officials, the primary target of the strike was Aden Hashi Ayro, a young military commander trained in Afghanistan who was one of the senior leaders of the Council of Islamic Courts.

Several hours after the strike, Ethiopian troops and one member of the American Special Operations team arrived at the site and confirmed that eight people had been killed and three wounded, all of whom were described as being armed. After sifting through the debris, they found a bloodied passport and other items that led them to believe Mr. Ayro was injured in the strike and probably died. Several members of the Special Operations team were also in Somalia at the time of the strike, one official said.

The second AC-130 strike, on Jan. 23, had another of the Islamic council's senior leaders, Sheik Ahmed Madobe, as its target. Mr. Madobe survived and was later captured by the Ethiopians, Americans say.

American officials said that Fazul Abdullah Mohammed, the mastermind of the 1998 embassy bombings in Kenya and Tanzania and the alleged ringleader of Al Qaeda's East African cell, remains at large. Some officials caution that while the Ethiopians have said additional "high-priority targets," including Abu Talha al-Sudani, a leading member of the cell, were killed in their own airstrikes, American intelligence officials have yet to confirm this.

In late January, American officials played a role in securing the safe passage of Sheik Sharif Sheik Ahmed, the second-highest-ranking Islamist leader, from southern Somalia to Nairobi, Kenya. The exact role of American involvement is still not clear, but some American officials consider him to be a moderate Islamist.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

US Judge Denies Motion To Delay Enron Lawsuit (AP)

By JUAN A. LOZANO, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 23, 2007

(AP) - HOUSTON-A $40 billion (â,¬30.5 billion) lawsuit filed by former Enron Corp. shareholders and investors alleging investment firms and banks played key roles in the company's collapse will go to trial in April despite a pending appeals court decision on the case, a judge has ruled.

U.S. District Judge Melinda Harmon denied efforts by Merrill Lynch & Co., Credit Suisse First Boston and Barclays PLC to delay the trial while the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals rules on whether the case can proceed as a class-action suit.

She said in her ruling Wednesday that there should be no postponement, because of the uncertainty of when the appeals court would rule. Jury selection was set for April 9.

Attorneys for the shareholders and investors accused the banks and investment firms of trying to delay the case for several years. The trial has been rescheduled three times.

"There is no reason to wait indefinitely for a decision from the Fifth Circuit that likely will not impact the trial," attorneys for investors wrote in a motion last week. "Any delay simply benefits the banks and harms class members who have waited patiently for over five years for their day in court."

In their motion to delay the trial, the banks and investment firms argued the 5th Circuit's decision could significantly alter the definition of the lawsuit's class status as well as the claims and defenses to be presented at trial.

The banks and firms, which have denied any wrongdoing, also said they do not want to delay the trial for several more years.

"There is nothing sinister about the suggestion that since the Fifth Circuit will be ruling on that appeal, the court and the parties should take the time to apply the Fifth Circuit's guidance to the class definition, the parties, the claims and the defenses before sending class notice and embarking on a jury trial estimated to last many months," attorneys for Merrill Lynch, Credit Suisse and Barclays wrote in a motion.

DOJ_NMG_0135607

Spokesmen for Merrill Lynch and Credit Suisse both declined to comment Thursday, and an attorney for Barclays did not immediately return a call seeking comment.

Some former Enron officials have been dropped as defendants in the case, but a few remain, including former Chief Executive Jeffrey Skilling, who is serving a 24-year prison sentence.

So far plaintiffs have recouped $7.3 billion (â,¬5.57 billion), mostly from such financial institutions as Bank of America, JPMorgan Chase & Co., Citigroup and Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce.

Enron, once the seventh-largest U.S. company, entered bankruptcy proceedings in December 2001 after years of accounting tricks could no longer hide billions in debt or make failing ventures appear profitable. The collapse wiped out thousands of jobs, more than $60 billion (â,¬45.78 billion) in market value and more than $2 billion (â,¬1.53 billion) in pension plans. 2007-02-22T19:36:20Z

Former Sadia CFO To Pay $364,000 In SEC Insider-trading Case (AP)

AP, February 23, 2007

(AP) - WASHINGTON-The former chief financial officer of Sadia SA, a Brazilian chicken and pork producer, and a former employee of Brazil's Banco ABN AMRO Real SA have agreed to pay almost half a million dollars (â,¬381,500) combined to settle charges that they traded on inside information about the meat company's 2006 attempt to take over its largest local rival, Perdigao SA.

The Securities and Exchange Commission on Thursday announced the settlement with Luiz Gonzaga Murat Junior, the former chief financial officer at Sadia, and Alexandre Ponzio De Azevedo, the former banker. The two settled without admitting or denying wrongdoing. Their attorneys could not immediately be identified.

Murat agreed to give up $184,028 (â,¬140,415) and to pay a $180,404 (â,¬137,650) civil penalty. He also agreed to a five-year ban on serving as an officer or director of a public company. Azevedo agreed to give up $68,215 (â,¬52,049) and to pay a $67,165 (â,¬51,248).

Murat "is relieved to resolve this matter, and he is anxious to put this behind him and turn his attention to the future," said his attorney, Juan Marcelino. An attorney for Azevedo could not immediately be reached for comment.

The SEC accused Murat of buying Perdigao securities that are listed in the United States after an April 7, 2006, meeting with investment bankers who proposed that Sadia make an offer for Perdigao. Murat's holdings rose in value after Sadia announced its offer on July 2006, when the price of Perdigao's American depositary shares rose 21 percent to $24.50, the SEC said.

The SEC said that Azevedo learned of the possible offer on April 11, 2006, when he was assigned to the ABN AMRO tender offer financing team. He then bought 14,000 American depositary shares in June, and sold 10,500 of the securities shortly after Sadia announced its offer, the SEC said.

Sadia withdrew its hostile bid to take over Perdigao days after announcing its offer. Pension funds and investors holding 55 percent of Perdigao's voting stock chose not to accept a second offer.

The settlement agreements still face court approval.

Siobhan Hughes is a Dow Jones Newswires correspondent.

Panel Sets Voluntary Guides For Hedge Funds (USAT)

By Adam Shell

USA Today, February 23, 2007

A presidential group charged with devising ways to improve oversight of the secretive $1.2 trillion hedge fund world issued a list of self-policing guidelines Thursday that it asserts will be more effective in protecting investors than more stringent laws would be.

DOJ_NMG_0135608

Favoring a market-based solution over government regulation, the President's Working Group on Financial Markets (PWGFM) opted for a "principles-based approach" for dealing with the issues surrounding the fast-growing industry that now includes roughly 9,000 funds, uses exotic investment strategies and has a history of scandalous fund meltdowns.

"These guidelines should serve as a foundation to enhance vigilance and market discipline further, which will strengthen investor protection and guard against systemic risk," Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson, a member of the PWGFM, said in a statement.

Hedge funds are lightly regulated private investment pools geared toward wealthy and sophisticated investors.

They have been under the microscope amid a massive influx of cash and high-profile fund implosions, such as the $6 billion loss suffered by Amaranth Advisors last fall.

The guidelines released by the presidential group encourages:

•Hedge funds to enhance the amount of timely information they provide to investors.

•Investors to consider the suitability of these investments in light of their risk tolerance and investment objectives.

•Creditors (i.e., banks who lend money to hedge funds) to set aside enough reserves to minimize risks if big losses occur at a fund.

•Regulators to work together to maintain market integrity.

Critics say the guidelines don't go far enough.

"These vague recommendations lack substance and specifics, making them unenforceable," Connecticut Attorney General Richard Blumenthal said in a statement. Blumenthal said states may respond to the federal inaction with their own initiatives.

Micah Green, of the Securities Industry and Financial Markets Association, backed the group's plan: "Too often, regulators reach for new laws which can … stifle innovation and smother markets."

In an effort to keep not-so-savvy investors away from hedge funds, the Securities and Exchange Commission has proposed boosting the minimum net worth for investors to get into such funds to $2.5 million from $1 million.

Call For More Oversight Of Hedge Funds Is Rejected (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, February 23, 2007

Financial regulators yesterday rejected calls for more direct oversight of hedge funds and said that the current system for preventing market collapse and widespread investor losses is "working well" in their first policy statement on the issue in eight years.

Hedge funds are loosely regulated pools of private investment designed for wealthy individuals and institutions. Nearly 9,000 of the rapidly growing funds control more than $1 trillion in assets. On a given day, the funds may account for a third of the trading volume in major U.S. stock exchanges, according to industry estimates.

The funds' outsized returns are drawing interest from pension funds and less-well-heeled investors -- and concern from investor advocates and analysts who fear that excessive borrowing and risky trading bets by the funds could induce instability in the market.

The unanimous policy directive by the President's Working Group on Financial Markets comes weeks after pressure from allies in Europe and elsewhere to pay heightened attention to the hedge fund sector. Led by Germany, the Group of Seven nations pressed for more vigilance in policing the funds earlier this month. On Tuesday, Canadian authorities proposed forcing hedge fund managers in that country to register with regulators.

The approach in the United States has been far less direct. The Securities and Exchange Commission tried to impose a similar registration requirement in 2004, only to see it struck down by a federal appeals court as overreaching. The SEC is considering a separate proposal to raise the minimum net worth that would allow an individual to invest in a hedge fund to $2.5 million from $1 million.

DOJ_NMG_0135609

The strategy set out by the working group, made up of the heads of the SEC, Treasury Department, Federal Reserve and the Commodity Futures Trading Commission, places the greatest onus not on hedge fund managers but on sophisticated investors, banks that lend vast streams of money to the funds and brokers who process their trades.

To protect themselves, wealthy investors should evaluate a fund manager's experience, disciplinary history and potential conflicts of interest, the six-page policy statement said. Managers of pension funds should perform due diligence and ensure that their portfolios are properly diversified before investing in the funds. Investors including pension funds lost more than $6 billion in last year's collapse of hedge fund Amaranth Advisors.

Since June 1999, the SEC has filed more than 100 enforcement cases against hedge funds or their advisers over securities-law violations, according to public records.

Still, Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr., chairman of the working group, expressed reluctance to tamper with an innovative industry that has created billions of dollars in wealth and liquidity. In an interview with Bloomberg television yesterday, Paulson said that regulators do not have the ability or the desire to shield all investors from suffering losses, preferring to let the market operate without undue meddling from overseers.

In a separate interview, SEC Chairman Christopher Cox stressed that lenders and brokers, who are regularly policed by the Federal Reserve and the SEC, should monitor their tolerance for risks and losses.

The report stopped far short of creating any new rules, such as the imposition of limits on lending to hedge funds or barring their fast-moving trading strategies.

The Managed Funds Association and the Coalition of Private Investment Companies, the hedge fund industry's chief trade groups, said regulators had achieved an appropriate balance between oversight and preserving the funds' entrepreneurial benefits.

But former SEC commissioner Harvey J. Goldschmid, who had supported the agency's thwarted bid to register fund managers, expressed concern that regulators lack the authority to perform random inspections of fund operations.

In Connecticut, home to scores of hedge funds, Attorney General Richard Blumenthal criticized the recommendations as vague, insubstantial and "unenforceable."

"Opaque is the operative word for these investment pools . . . and these guidelines will do virtually nothing to make them more transparent," said Blumenthal, who created a unit last year to police the funds. "Federal inaction and inertia will invite -- indeed, fuel -- state initiatives."

House Financial Services Committee Chairman Barney Frank (D-Mass.) issued a statement calling the report "a first step" and pledged to invite the group's leaders to testify at a hearing this spring.

Officials Reject More Oversight Of Hedge Funds (NYT)

By Stephen Labaton

The New York Times, February 23, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 22 — The Bush administration said Thursday that there was no need for greater government oversight of the rapidly growing hedge fund industry and other private investment groups to protect the nation's financial system.

Instead, the administration, in an agreement it reached with the independent regulatory agencies, announced that investors, hedge fund companies and their lenders could adequately take care of themselves by adhering to a set of nonbinding principles.

The principles, many already being followed by the sharpest investors and best-run companies, say that investors should not take risks they cannot tolerate and should carefully evaluate the strategies and management skills of hedge funds. They also call for funds to make clear and meaningful disclosures to investors.

The decision came after months of study by a presidential working group of top officials and regulators. They looked at both the hedge fund industry, which has more than $1 trillion in assets, and the management of private equity firms, which take direct control and ownership of companies rather than relying on large numbers of outside stockholders.

DOJ_NMG_0135610

The group's conclusions reflected both the strong antiregulatory ideology of the administration and the formidable influence of Wall Street and the increasingly wealthy hedge fund industry among both Democrats and Republicans in Washington.

Three of the administration's most senior economic policy makers — Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr., his top deputy, Robert K. Steel, and White House chief of staff Joshua Bolten — are alumni of Goldman Sachs, which in the last decade has evolved into one of the most important players in the private equity market.

As hedge funds have grown both in the United States and globally, and as periodic collapses have shaken the markets and caused investors to lose money, pressures have increased to impose greater regulation on them. But supporters say that the hedge fund industry had grown more sophisticated in recent years, is well equipped to manage risks, and that none of the failures have harmed the nation's financial system.

The explosive growth in recent years of private equity investment and hedge funds has made their managers symbols of new wealth, a huge source of philanthropy to the nation's museums, hospitals and orchestras, and a major new force in political campaigns.

Millions of Americans do not qualify to make investments in hedge funds, which are pools of largely unregulated assets, but they are exposed to the risks associated with hedge funds through their pensions and personal retirement accounts.

The decision to avoid demanding more openness from private funds represents a starkly different approach to that undertaken by Washington for publicly traded companies, which in the last five years have faced a battery of new governance, auditing and disclosure rules following the scandals at Enron and other large companies.

The working group rejected any proposal that would give the government the ability to inspect the books and records of hedge funds or force the funds to make regular reports about their activities. Both banks and brokerage firms must adhere to stringent rules that give regulators great leeway in supervising them.

While the working group never considered anything as strict, many hedge funds oppose even minimal oversight because they say it could slow their ability to make lightning-fast investment decisions or reveal trading strategies to rivals.

A previous effort by the Securities and Exchange Commission to protect investors by requiring hedge funds to register with the government failed last summer. In June, a federal appeals court ruled that the agency did not have the authority to regulate them.

In leading a deeply divided commission to adopt those rules in the first place, its then chairman, William H. Donaldson, said that hedge funds had been central figures in a variety of market trading abuses and that registration was a modest and essential way for regulators to begin to understand them. Although he had the support of two of the four other commissioners for his efforts on hedge funds, Mr. Donaldson came under heavy criticism from Republican lawmakers and top administration officials for suggesting that regulators shine a light on what he called "a dark corner" of the market.

Under its new chairman, Christopher Cox, the commission decided not to appeal the court decision that struck down the rules. Instead the agency is preparing to write a new regulation that would require investors in such funds to have greater personal wealth. That proposed regulation is not affected by today's announcement.

On Thursday, the president's working group, led by Mr. Paulson, proposed a series of nonbinding principles that put the onus primarily on companies, investors and the buyers and sellers of their complex securities to impose a "market discipline" that should be adequate to protect investors and the marketplace. Officials said those principles would make the hedge fund companies more transparent and their investors and creditors more vigilant to shady operators and excessive risk-takers.

At a briefing Thursday, a senior Treasury Department official involved in drafting the principles suggested that any new regulations would discourage innovation and risk-taking. The official said he would only speak on condition that he not be identified because the new guidelines were the product of a group of agencies.

Officials acknowledged that many of the principles that were advanced by the administration and the regulators would seem obvious to smart investors and properly managed hedge funds.

"Private pools of capital can be an appropriate investment vehicle for more sophisticated investors," read one of the main principles that the officials and agencies agreed upon. "Because these pools can involve complex, illiquid or opaque investments and investment strategies that are not fully disclosed, the risk associated with direct investment in these pools are most appropriately borne by investors with the sophistication to identify, analyze and bear these risks."

DOJ_NMG_0135611

The report said that the concerns of less sophisticated investors in pension and retirement vehicles could best be addressed "through sound practices on the part of the fiduciaries that manage such vehicles."

The announcement was hailed by several trade groups for the hedge funds and other companies involved in trading complex financial instruments.

"The President's Working Group has taken a thoughtful and judicious approach to many of the investor protection and systemic risk issues which surround hedge funds," said Micah S. Green, co-chief executive of the Securities Industry and Financial Markets Association, which represents hundreds of Wall Street firms.

"Too often, regulators reach immediately for new laws or rules which can have the unintended consequence of stifling innovation or smothering markets," Mr. Green said. "By instead providing principles and guidelines, the President's Working Group has recognized the importance of flexibility and efficiency in a healthy marketplace."

But other experts said the guidelines would have limited effect.

"They are regulating around the peripheries," said Jay G. Baris, a securities lawyer with Kramer Levin Naftalis & Frankel in New York. "They are turning up the heat on disclosures, on fiduciaries to determine suitability, and on risk management. But they are going to stop short of substantive regulation of hedge funds or of unregistered hedge fund advisers."

The reaction in Congress, which is in recess this week, was largely muted.

Representative Barney Frank, the Massachusetts Democrats who heads the House Financial Services Committee, called the announcement "a first step in addressing questions presented by the significant growth of hedge funds."

"Steps are being taken to increase investor protection," Mr. Frank added, "and I believe the appropriate committee in the House and the Senate should be working with the Presidential Working Group and others for the further study and monitoring of both issues."

A similar statement was issued by Senator Christopher J. Dodd, the Connecticut Democrat who heads the Senate Banking Committee.

There is no expectation that Congress will adopt legislation on the subject any time soon.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Jury To Continue Deliberations In Scooter Libby CIA-Leak Case (WSJ)

By Evan Perez And Jay Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, February 23, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Jurors reached no verdict Thursday on whether former White House aide I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby obstructed the investigation into who leaked the identity of a CIA operative married to a prominent Iraq war critic.

The jury went home until Friday.

In a day and a half of deliberations, the jurors have issued only two brief written notes, which suggested they are methodically reviewing the evidence against Mr. Libby. They requested a large flip chart, masking tape, Post-it notes and a document with pictures of the witnesses.

The trial, which focused on efforts to leak classified information to the press, comes amid revived debate over intelligence in the newly Democratic Congress.

Already, the Senate Intelligence Committee has requested documents and interview transcripts from the Inspector General's office, while the Senate Armed Services Committee seeks further interviews with Mr. Libby, the former chief of staff for Vice President Dick Cheney, and National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley. "The bottom line is that the intelligence relating to the Iraq-al Qaeda relationship was manipulated by high-ranking officials in the Department of Defense to support the administration's decision to invade Iraq," committee Chairman Carl Levin (D., Mich.) said at recent hearing.

DOJ_NMG_0135612

The Libby trial put an especially bright spotlight on the debate. A jury of eight women and four men began were weighing a month of testimony from 19 witnesses in a case that began as a probe into the outing of former Central Intelligence Agency operative Valerie Plame and three years later ended up focusing on the trustworthiness of recall and the semantics of lying.

In court, Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald told jurors that Mr. Libby deliberately lied to Federal Bureau of Investigation agents and a grand jury to try to cover up the administration's efforts to respond to criticism of the Iraq war.

In response, Mr. Libby's attorneys highlighted "mis-recollections" by a number of prosecution witness, including several reporters, to bolster their argument that Mr. Libby didn't lie but simply had faulty memory when he made erroneous statements to investigators.

The roots of the Libby case lie in a debate over use of intelligence in the buildup to the Iraq war. It began when Ms. Plame's husband, former U.S. Ambassador Joseph Wilson, complained publicly that the Bush administration had misused or ignored intelligence he gathered that cast doubt on Iraq's alleged efforts to obtain weapons of mass destruction.

Mr. Wilson in July 2003 went public with his story of taking a CIA sponsored trip to Africa to check out claims of connections to Iraq's weapons program. In interviews and in an opinion article, he called into question Mr. Bush's use of since-discredited intelligence that alleged Iraq sought weapons materials in the African nation of Niger. In retaliation, prosecutors say, Mr. Libby and other officials sought to disclose Ms. Plame's identity to reporters, making the argument that her intelligence job was the only reason Mr. Wilson looked into Iraq's weapons efforts in the first place.

The administration subsequently backed off the Niger claim. However, Mr. Libby told the grand jury in the case that he continued trying to leak selective portions of intelligence reports to journalists in order to portray the Niger-Iraq link as true, under orders from Mr. Cheney. Administration officials complain that Mr. Wilson was the one misusing his role in the intelligence process by talking publicly about his findings.

Mr. Libby is charged with two counts of perjury, two counts of making false statements and one count of obstruction of justice. He faces up to 30 years in prison and $1.25 million in fines if found guilty.

Still No Verdict In CIA Leak Trial (NSDY/AP)

By Associated Press, February 22, 2007, 9:42 Pm Est

Long Island Newsday, February 23, 2007

The jury went home until Friday.

In a day and a half of deliberations, the eight women and four men have issued only two brief written notes, which suggested they are methodically reviewing the evidence against the former chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney.

They requested a large flip chart, masking tape, Post-it notes and a document with pictures of the witnesses.

In addition to obstruction of the leak investigation, Libby is charged with lying to the FBI and a grand jury about how he learned and who he told about CIA operative Valerie Plame.

Prosecutors say he concocted a story to avoid losing his job for disclosing classified information to reporters without authorization. Libby said he gave investigators his best recollection of what happened and any errors in that resulted from memory flaws.

Leak Trial Reveals Flaws In Note-taking (AP)

By Matt Apuzzo, ASSOCIATED PRESS WRITER

AP, February 23, 2007

I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby leaves Federal Court at the conclusion of the day's jury deliberations in Washington, Thursday, Feb. 22, 2007. Jurors reached no verdict Thursday on whether former White House aide I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby obstructed the investigation into who leaked the identity of a CIA operative married to a prominent Iraq war critic. (AP Photo/Gerald Herbert)

WASHINGTON -- Write this down: Your notes aren't as reliable as you think. That's true whether they're scrawled in the margins of a business meeting agenda, typed on a secretary's laptop, scribbled on a patient's chart or carefully recorded from a lecture hall blackboard.

And, as the monthlong trial of former White House aide I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby has shown, they're no more reliable if the notes belong to FBI agents, journalists or White House aides.

DOJ_NMG_0135613

That's a somewhat disconcerting thought. People are charged, front-page articles are written and public policies are decided in part based on those notes. If they are flawed, whose can be believed?

"Based on what I've heard in this trial, I don't know if notes are the best evidence of anything," U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton commented midway through the trial.

Jurors, who are due to begin their third day of deliberations in Libby's perjury and obstruction case Friday, must decide how much weight to put on notes that were sometimes sloppy and often inconsistent.

Researchers who have studied note-taking have known its flaws for years. Take college students, for example. Their memories are at their peak, their success depends largely on their note-taking abilities and they practice every day.

Yet only about 30 percent of important classroom information makes it into a typical student's notebook, said Kenneth A. Kiewra, a University of Nebraska educational psychology professor who studies note-taking.

Part of the problem, Kiewra said, is that words are filtered before they make it onto the page. Things we already know often don't get written, he said, nor do things we don't totally understand. And impressions can skew our notes. In that way, notes can become personal snapshots, useful for jogging memory, more than an official record.

Historians have reviewed multiple sets of notes from the same Middle Ages sermon and found that different people created different written records, said Harvard historian Ann Blair. Notes on early inquisitions similarly appear to be skewed by the inquisitor's impressions, she said.

In Libby's case, FBI agent Deborah Bond wrote a report saying Libby "adamantly denied" discussing CIA operative Valerie Plame. The original FBI notes, however, contain no record of that denial. Rather, they say he may have discussed Plame but couldn't recall.

"Adamantly might not be the perfect word," Bond acknowledged at trial.

Prosecutors say Libby told New York Times reporter Judith Miller that Plame, the wife of prominent war critic Joseph Wilson, worked for the CIA. As evidence, they point to Miller's note, set off by parentheses, that said, "Wife works for bureau?"

Miller testified that she believed Libby told her Plame worked for a bureau of the CIA. But she said she sometimes sets things off in parentheses when she already knows information and wants to ask about it. That's how Libby's attorneys want jurors to read those notes.

That's also how Libby handled his own notes as he scrambled from one high-level White House meeting to the next. Sometimes he made to-do lists. Other times his lists were things he'd just learned. And when he crossed things off, sometimes it meant he'd discussed them with the vice president. Other times it meant he decided not to. Only Libby knew for sure.

"Your notes are not X-rays. Your notes are a guide for you," said Roger W. Shuy, a Georgetown University linguistics expert who reviews documents and notes for court cases. "Notes are inherently not complete."

Former Time magazine reporter Matt Cooper testified that Libby confirmed for him that Plame worked at the CIA. That confirmation did not appear in Cooper's notes. Libby says he told Cooper only that he'd heard something like that but didn't know for sure.

Cooper could not explain a line in his typewritten notes that read: "had somethine about the wilson thing and not sure if it's ever."

Libby's lawyers believe that was supposed to read: "Heard something about the Wilson thing, but not sure if it's even true."

When it comes to the credibility of notes, however, Libby's attorneys sought to have it both ways. They told jurors that another FBI agent's notes, which seemed to contradict NBC reporter and government witness Tim Russert, should be believed. And attorneys made it a point to tell jurors that Libby had only one note mentioning Plame.

Ronald P. Fisher, a memory expert at Florida International University, said FBI agents and reporters have similar problems: Journalism schools and criminal justice classes focus heavily on interview techniques and investigative tactics but offer little in the way of actual note-taking instruction.

"I have a feeling people believe they take better notes than they do," Fisher said.

One of the few reporters whose notes were not dissected in the Libby trial was Washington Post reporter Bob Woodward. He spoke confidently about what he learned about Plame and when he learned it.

DOJ_NMG_0135614

Fumo Trial Likely To Start Early '08 (PHI)

By Michael Hinkelman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, February 23, 2007

The trial for state Sen. Vince Fumo and three co-defendants likely won't start before early next year, prosecutors and defense lawyers said at a federal court hearing yesterday.

U.S. Senior District Judge William H. Yohn Jr. did not set a trial date.

Prosecutors also said Fumo's trial could last three to four months. They plan to call at least 100 witnesses to testify for the government.

Defense attorneys said they couldn't reliably estimate how long a trial might take until they see what evidence the feds have.

The feds hit Fumo, 63, with a 139-count, 267-page indictment on Feb. 6 charging him with conspiracy, fraud, obstruction and tax felonies.

Also indicted were Ruth Arnao, 50, a former top aide to Fumo, and two ex-computer aides of Fumo. Arnao was charged with conspiracy, fraud and obstruction, and with filing a false tax return.

Earlier yesterday, the two ex-computer aides for Fumo, Leonard Luchko, 50, and Mark Eister, 37, were arraigned before U.S. Magistrate L. Felipe Restrepo on conspiracy and obstruction charges. They pleaded not guilty.

Luchko and Eister had been indicted on obstruction counts in June but were charged anew when Fumo and Arnao were charged in a superseding indictment.

Fumo and Arnao pleaded not guilty to all charges on Feb. 7.

All defendants are free on $100,000 bail, and their freedom to travel has been restricted.

During yesterday's hearing before Yohn, prosecutors agreed to turn over all their discovery in the case to defense attorneys within 45 days.

The feds have plenty to hand over: At least 100,000 documents, including e-mails, grand-jury transcripts, summaries of FBI interviews with witnesses, bills, bank-account statements and store receipts.

Prosecutors declined to say whether any of the discovery included wiretaps or video surveillance.

Defense attorneys asked Yohn for 45 days to review the discovery materials once all have been received.

Then Yohn is expected to hold another hearing, probably in late spring, when he may set dates by which all pretrial motions need to be filed and also set a trial start date.

In the meantime, both sides appear ready to rumble.

Prosecutors said they plan to file court papers soon asking Yohn to hold a hearing to determine whether lawyers for Fumo and Arnao should be disqualified because of potential conflicts of interest.

Fumo is being represented by the firm of Sprague & Sprague, and Arnao is being represented by Edwin J. Jacobs Jr., William H. Lamb and Joel L. Frank.

Yohn, directing a question to Sprague, said he understood Sprague might be filing court papers alleging prosecutorial misconduct.

Sprague said he wasn't in a position to comment on that yesterday.

One other thing left unresolved yesterday is whether the trial would be conducted four days a week or five days.

Sprague, 81, said courtroom proceedings move along more "efficiently" if lawyers and the jury have Fridays off.

Yohn said he preferred five days a week, 9 to 5, but would defer a decision.

Meeting Offers Sneak Preview Of Fumo Trial (PHI)

By John Shiffman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, February 23, 2007

Long before the government puts State Sen. Vincent J. Fumo on trial - an event that isn't likely to happen for a year - the senator's lawyers intend to put the government on trial.

Defense lawyers appear likely to accuse the government of illegally leaking grand jury material to the media or unduly pressuring witnesses, it was disclosed during a court hearing yesterday in U.S. District Court.

And the government, it would appear, hopes to win the right to tell jurors about 30-year-old allegations that Fumo put ghost employees on the Senate payroll and that he spied on rivals.

These were among the details that emerged during a pretrial meeting before District Judge William H. Yohn yesterday.

The South Philadelphia Democrat is charged with defrauding a multimillion-dollar charity, using Senate staff for personal and political errands, and engaging in a cover-up after the FBI and IRS began to investigate him.

The 139 charges against Fumo include mail fraud, conspiracy to defraud the United States, obstruction of justice, and aiding and abetting the filing of a false tax return.

Fumo and his three codefendants - former aides Ruth Arnao, Mark C. Eister and Leonard P. Luchko - did not attend yesterday's meeting. But 11 lawyers - two prosecutors and nine defense attorneys - participated.

Yohn convened the session to try to get a sense of what pretrial motions might be filed, and what the trial will look like.

For the most part, lawyers were reluctant to reveal strategies and did their best to keep their intentions vague.

One thing became clear yesterday: The case the FBI and IRS investigated for four years won't go to trial for a long time.

Yohn told lawyers that they would have at least six months to file pretrial motions. Prosecutors said they would be ready to go to trial by January. Fumo's lawyer, Richard A. Sprague, said he would probably need a few more months than that.

"I've never seen an indictment that is 267 pages," Sprague said.

The trial will probably last three to four months, prosecutors said. The government intends to call 100 witness, said Assistant U.S. Attorney John J. Pease. One potential witness has suffered a stroke, and her testimony may be videotaped soon, he said.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Robert A. Zauzmer said that the government intends to seek permission to tell jurors about Fumo's conduct in the 1970s - presumably, allegations about ghost employees and spying that are not part of the current indictment. Under the rules of evidence, prosecutors might be allowed to do this to try to show Fumo's motives or intents, or to try to demonstrate a long pattern of bad behavior.

Yohn indicated that Sprague may ask for the case to be split into two trials. Sprague didn't offer details, though he may be seeking to separate the fraud charges from the obstruction-of-justice charges.

Sprague also did not elaborate on his expected motion alleging government misconduct during the investigation. But at a recent news conference, Sprague accused the government of leaking to the press. In at least one pre-indictment motion, defense lawyers made similar accusations, and a judge rejected them.

Since the indictment, Fumo has resigned from several public posts, including ranking Democrat on the Senate Appropriations Committee and the Delaware River Port Authority board. He also has temporarily quit his $1 million-a-year post at Dilworth Paxson L.L.P.

Independence Blue Cross chairman M. Walter D'Alessio said yesterday that Fumo has stepped down from that board, too.

"Because of the press of other matters and the time needed to defend myself against federal charges," Fumo said in a letter, "I would not be able to devote sufficient time to my duties at IBC. It is my intention to resume these duties after my vindication in federal court."

As Fumo's lawyers appeared in court yesterday, Fumo spoke at ceremonies marking the 100th anniversary of the beginning of construction of the Benjamin Franklin Parkway.

"I intend to continue to do my job as a senator," Fumo told the crowd. "And I will be in Harrisburg on Monday, for those of you who care, working on the budget to make sure Philadelphia gets more than its fair share."

Inside The Ring (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, February 23, 2007

Spy release

Former Defense Intelligence Agency (DIA) analyst Ronald Montaperto, convicted last year on espionage-related charges that involved passing secrets to China, is scheduled to get out of federal prison Sunday. Prosecutors say he will be barred from meeting any Chinese intelligence personnel as a condition of his release.

Montaperto pleaded guilty in June to improperly storing classified intelligence documents and admitted as part of a plea deal that he verbally passed both "secret" and "top secret" intelligence to two Chinese military intelligence officers during 60 meetings over a number of years.

He spent three months at the minimum-security prison at Fort Dix, N.J.

The court order in the case states that Montaperto "shall have no contact with any foreign government or agents thereof, except with the express permission of [Department of Defense], and shall not seek or accept, personally or through another person or entity, any benefit from such foreign government or agent thereof."

If Montaperto is paid or receives benefits from the Chinese or their agents, he will have to turn them over to the U.S. government.

"There's also a provision in the plea agreement that prohibits him from disclosing classified information," one law-enforcement official close to the case said.

Montaperto's conviction was a major blow to a network of politically powerful pro-China intelligence officials and academics who share his views of China.

U.S. intelligence officials have said that Montaperto's disclosures to Chinese intelligence coincided with the loss of a major electronic eavesdropping program against China that had helped track Beijing's illicit arms exports.

Before sentencing, Montaperto received letters of support from several current and former intelligence officials, including DIA analyst and friend Lonnie Henley, who ultimately was reprimanded by the Office of the Director of National Intelligence for his defense of Montaperto.

Mr. Henley also had criticized the FBI for investigating Montaperto in an e-mail to a group of China specialists. The e-mail defended Montaperto as someone who only wanted to improve U.S.-Chinese relations and who was persecuted by the FBI as a result.

Despite the letter of reprimand, Mr. Henley recently was promoted to acting national intelligence officer for East Asia.

Montaperto was sentenced to three months in prison by federal Judge Gerald Bruce Lee, who said the light sentence was the result of the letters of support he received from current and former intelligence and military officials, despite what he called a "very serious charge."

Montaperto claimed the passing of intelligence to China was unintentional and the result of being tricked by two Chinese officers.

Quds in Iraq

Army Lt. Gen. Ray Odierno, commander of multinational forces in Iraq, yesterday added his voice to the chorus of officials who identified the Iranian Quds force as working against U.S. and allied forces by helping insurgents in Iraq.

"The bottom line is we believe that the Quds force has been involved in training and possibly providing funding and potentially weapons to some groups within Iraq," Gen. Odierno said, noting that "we watch that extremely carefully."

Gen. Odierno warned the Iranians that "we will take action" against the Quds force supporters helping insurgents.

"Their goal is to destabilize this government. So our goal is we want a stable government and we'll do whatever we can to keep them from destabilizing what's going on in Iraq here," he said.

The three-star general stopped short of saying the Iranian agents are playing a vital role in backing Shi'ite insurgents but that they are assisting with weapons, training and "some money."

Gen. Odierno declined to answer directly when asked whether a recent attack in Karbala included Iranian involvement, but said "we are looking at it extremely hard, and when appropriate, we will take the necessary action to bring those who were involved in it into custody."

China ASAT program

China's recent test of an anti-satellite missile warhead was part of a long-term space weapons program by Beijing's military that has been under way in secret for years, the head of the Pentagon's Missile Defense Agency (MDA) said yesterday.

"The Chinese launch represented years and years of work on their part in terms of what they demonstrated, even though their success in doing that was obviously a surprise, I think, around the world," Air Force Lt. Gen. Henry Obering told reporters.

DOJ_NMG_0135617

Gen. Obering said the Chinese space weapons system currently does not threaten U.S. missile defenses against North Korea or a future defense against Iranian missiles, but "it may do so in the future ... based on what we have seen them ... demonstrate."

He also said the MDA has a development program that will be able to deal with China's anti-satellite program but there are no current plans to deploy weapons against it.

In a provocative space weapons test, China fired a missile Jan. 11 that entered space, then released a nonexplosive warhead that tracked and destroyed a Chinese weather satellite. The test, the fourth attempt at destroying a satellite, contradicted the Chinese government's public advocacy of reaching an international treaty banning space weapons.

Moseley on China

Air Force Chief of Staff Gen. Michael Moseley told reporters in New York this week that the United States is not looking to make China a new enemy but must be prepared for the challenge of China in the future.

"I would not be looking for bad guys, I would be looking for ways to partner. I would be looking for ways to minimize uncertainty and to minimize miscalculations, I would be looking for ways to do that, as opposed for ways to find potential competitors," Gen. Moseley said when asked about earlier comments that the Air Force will have a major role in countering China's aggressive military buildup, including its space weapons.

While countering terrorism currently is a key priority, Gen. Moseley also suggested that China must be watched carefully as it could emerge as a threat.

"We're also dealing in a very uncertain global context," he said. "My job is to provide global intelligence, surveillance and reconnaissance. My job is to provide global mobility. My job is to provide global strike, and so it's not just about China, it is about an uncertain global setting."

The Air Force has been given a key role in the Pentagon's new "hedge" strategy against China, which calls for developing forces that can conduct very rapid strikes throughout China in any future conflict.

Air Force weapons being developed for the new strategy include a new long-range bomber and possibly new space-based missile systems that can strike China on very short notice.

• Bill Gertz covers the Pentagon. He can be reached at 202/636-3274 or at bgertz@wash ingtontimes.com.

Investigation Won't Stop Rep. Miller From California Dealmaking (AP)

By Erica Werner, The Associated Press

AP, February 23, 2007

WASHINGTON - Rep. Gary Miller grew up poor. Even though he's now worth more than $13 million, he says he's still worried about his family's financial security.

So, while federal authorities investigate some of his real estate transactions, he says he'll keep on making deals.

Miller, a fifth-term Republican representing conservative inland Southern California, said in an interview that he had put his real estate investment activities on hold upon entering politics, only to find that "I was worth less money every year."

"Some people are arguing I shouldn't have the opportunity to make an investment that every other American citizen has an opportunity to make," he said. "I've got kids, I've got grandkids, and it'd be nice, when I get ready to go, when they're older, if I can help them."

Miller, 58, who makes $165,200 as a congressman, is being scrutinized for the millions he made selling properties to two Southern California communities outside his district. FBI agents have interviewed officials in both towns.

Miller also faces accusations of using his staff for personal errands and pursuing federal funding for projects beneficial to properties that he and his campaign contributors owned.

He's denied any wrongdoing, and calls media reports about his activities "lies" and "trash." He said he has turned over documentation of his deals to the House Ethics Committee, and he defended himself at a meeting of House Republicans earlier this month.

An FBI spokeswoman declined on Thursday to confirm or deny if there's an investigation or to make any further comment.

DOJ_NMG_0135618

At the heart of the Miller probe is the 2002 sale of 165 acres to Monrovia, a town of 40,000 northeast of Los Angeles. Miller contended he was forced to sell the property when the city threatened to take it by eminent domain.

Under IRS code, that allowed Miller to defer capital gains taxes on his profit if he reinvested it in other property within two years. With a tax rate of more than 20 percent on a profit of at least $10 million, the deferment involved more than $2 million.

Miller used the proceeds from the Monrovia sale to purchase properties in Fontana from a campaign contributor in December 2004. He then sold the land to the city at a profit of $12,400, he said. He filed tax forms with the city describing the sales as forced, which gave him the right to again delay paying taxes.

Miller's spokesman, Scott Toussaint, said the congressman did not take advantage of the tax deferment on the Fontana deal and has now completed paying taxes on the transactions. Miller will not say how much he paid or release tax returns that would prove it, Toussaint said, because that goes beyond what he should have to disclose.

To Miller's defenders, the whole controversy amounts to a bum rap.

"Any good businessman's going to push the envelope from time to time," said Frank Williams, executive officer of the Baldy View Chapter of the Building Industry Association in California. "That's part of dealmaking. It's not illegal."

Miller is one of three California Republicans being investigated by the Justice Department. Rep. John Doolittle has drawn attention in the corruption investigation centered on jailed GOP lobbyist Jack Abramoff, and Rep. Jerry Lewis is being investigated over his ties to a different lobbyist.

After the Los Angeles Times and others published reports on the Monrovia deal and quoted city officials saying Miller was a willing seller, the congressman made public two letters from Monrovia officials describing the transaction as "eminent domain" and "friendly condemnation." His attorney sent a letter to city officials warning of "damages for which the city could be held accountable" if they did not stop making "misstatements."

Monrovia officials subsequently posted a detailed narrative on the city Web site explaining that eminent domain was never used in the sale but the threat did exist.

Miller's business dealings have drawn scrutiny before.

In the early 1990s, as a member of the Diamond Bar City Council, Miller faced a recall drive. Critics alleged that he lied about owning a company with business before the council and opposed a subdivision because the developer refused to hold a fundraiser for a council ally.

Miller denied the accusations and filed a libel lawsuit. The recall fell short of getting on the ballot, and Miller's suit was dismissed.

Hard feelings linger in Diamond Bar, the town 30 miles east of Los Angeles where Miller still lives. Eileen Ansari, a Democrat and former city councilwoman who challenged Miller in his first race for Congress, contends that Miller clocks little time in Washington and can claim few legislative accomplishments.

"It looks like he's in there for his own benefit. That's my disappointment in him," Ansari said.

Miller said being a congressman has hurt his business rather than helped, because of the time spent in Washington and the glare of public life. He said he'd rather be home in his district, where he said he can help constituents, and routinely takes the first plane home each weekend when House votes are over.

"I'm not a Washington politician," he said.

Miller, tall with thick, neatly combed red hair, has a consistently conservative voting record. He served three years in the California Assembly before running for Congress in 1998. He replaced GOP incumbent Jay Kim, who had pleaded guilty to taking illegal campaign contributions.

Miller got into politics, he said, because he wanted to do something about government regulation on businesses. He founded G. Miller Development Co. in his early 20s and now runs it with his wife, Cathleen.

Rep. Barney Frank of Massachusetts, one of Congress' most liberal members, praised Miller for his work on affordable housing on the Financial Services Committee that Frank chairs.

"I think he would personally like to stamp out every endangered species known to man," Frank said. "But he does care a lot about housing and helping build housing."

DOJ_NMG_0135619

The accomplishment of which Miller is most proud has nothing to do with business. A Civil War buff who made a cameo appearance as a Confederate general in the movie "Gods and Generals," he sponsored legislation to preserve Civil War battle sites that was ultimately signed into law by President Bush.

Prosecutor Urges Public To Help Fight Corruption (NYT)

By Laura Rivera

The New York Times, February 23, 2007

HACKENSACK, N.J., Feb. 22 — Christopher J. Christie, the federal prosecutor who has aggressively pursued New Jersey politicians believed to be corrupt, said in a speech here on Thursday that the public should help stem the tide of corruption by voting out officials who break the law.

Mr. Christie, the United States attorney for New Jersey, said that after domestic terrorism, his office's main priority was to hold the county and state leadership accountable.

He asked, "Wouldn't it be a shame to spend all this money" and endanger so many lives to protect a way of life from outside attack, "only to give away our way of life from the rot from within? And that's what political corruption is."

Mr. Christie, a Republican, said that his investigations had resulted in the arrest of more than 100 officials across the state, but he declined to discuss his latest high-profile move: the issuance of subpoenas last week to the leaders of the State Legislature. The subpoenas are for documents related to possible wrongdoing involving "Christmas-tree items" that lawmakers have added to budgets over the past three years.

The subpoenas have prompted speculation that a federal investigation into the activities of State Senator Wayne Bryant, a Camden Democrat who was chairman of the budget committee until last fall, may be expanding.

In a speech before 200 people at Fairleigh Dickinson University here, Mr. Christie refused to discuss the progress of negotiations between his office and the Office of Legislative Services, which provides research and legal counsel to the Legislature. He said that the federal judge handling the case had ordered him not to discuss it.

"I've made no public comment at all on Senator Bryant," Mr. Christie said. "What I will say is I just hope the issue will be resolved soon."

Monitors of a federal investigation said that Mr. Bryant, who announced last week that he would not seek re-election, was the subject of a federal investigation into the possibility that he routed $12.5 million in state funds to the University of Medicine and Dentistry of New Jersey in exchange for a job in which he was paid $38,000 a year but did little work.

In his speech, Mr. Christie said that 75 percent of his cases involved bribery of public officials. "It is a rogue's gallery," he said, "and I fear that we are just becoming numb."

As Mr. Christie's appointment, made by President Bush more than five years ago, nears completion, the prosecutor's increasingly public stance on issues like domestic terrorism and immigration has raised speculation that he may be considering a run for office. Many think he may challenge Gov. Jon S. Corzine in 2009.

"Do I think about it? Of course," he said. "My only focus right now is to do this job for as long as the president allows me to do it. But it's coming to an end. So at some point I'm going to have to do something else."

FBI: Sex Fugitive Captured In Livingston Parish (AP)

AP, February 23, 2007

LIVINGSTON, La. (AP) — A fugitive child molester, on the run for nearly a year, was captured Thursday at an auto auction business where he'd been working for most of the month, federal authorities said.

David John Sprong Jr., 47, a convicted felon and registered sex offender, is wanted in California on a variety of molestation charges involving young girls.

Authorities previously thought Sprong was living under an alias near Houston. Then his last known vehicle, a 1997 sport utility vehicle, was found at a bar on Monday in Hammond, said Brian Fair, a spokesman for the U.S. Marshals Service.

Last spring, Sprong skipped a $1 million bond in Sacramento, where he was charged with molesting girls. He could have been sentenced to life in prison if found guilty of being a habitual sex offender with multiple victims.

DOJ_NMG_0135620

The marshals' Crescent Star Fugitive Task Force, with help from the FBI and the Livingston Parish Sheriff's Office arrested Sprong at A to Z Auto Auction L.L.C in Holden, La., without incident, Fair said.

Sprong was working as a mechanic there under the alias of Thomas Turner and had been employed for about three weeks. He was booked into the Livingston Parish jail and will await extradition back to Sacramento, Fair said.

"When he's not molesting people, he's working on cars," said Mike Raifield, an agent with the FBI's Sacramento field office which was coordinating the search.

The FBI was also looking to Sprong's longtime girlfriend Lynn Rodaer and 10-year-old daughter Justine. Authorities said Sprong led them to his family after his capture.

On Saturday, Sprong was featured on the TV show "America's Most Wanted" for the third time.

"When he leaves, he disappears completely," Raifield said. "He never re-contacted anyone he knew in Sacramento. And, everybody we talked to disliked him. All his contacts, he owed money to. He burned every bridge.

"We do all the angles and find nothing for a long time. Then after the America's Most Wanted segment profiled him in January, we got a tip he was running an auto shop in Humble, Texas, but it came two days too late. Apparently he saw the same program and he disappeared."

Oprah Winfrey included Sprong on her list of child sexual predators. She said she would give a $100,000 reward for information leading to their arrests.

In addition to the charges in California, Raifield said Sprong may face charges of attempted molestation of two teen-aged girls who worked for him in Houston.

Man Pleads Guilty In Child Pornography Case (MH)

The Miami Herald, February 23, 2007

A 59-year-old man pleaded guilty Thursday in federal court in Fort Lauderdale to preying on children, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office.

Raymond George Bohning, of Hollywood, faces five to 30 years in prison for production of child pornography, enticing a minor to engage in illegal sexual activity, distributing child pornography to a minor to induce her to engage in sexual activity and possessing more than 600 images of child pornography.

Bohning also could face a fine of up to $250,000 for each count and a possible lifetime period of supervised release, according to the office of South Florida's U.S. attorney, R. Alexander Acosta.

A sentencing hearing is scheduled for May 11.

In November 2003, Bohning was arrested in the United Kingdom and charged with various offenses including possessing and distributing lewd images of minors.

Bohning pleaded guilty in the U.K. to possessing and distributing indecent images and publishing an indecent article and was sentenced to 30 months in prison. He was then extradited to the United States for prosecution.

An FBI investigation found that Bohning had an extensive collection of child pornography images depicting minors being sexually abused, including babies and toddlers.

Authorities say the defendant convinced a 15-year-old girl to engage in sexually explicit conduct to produce pictures, gave pictures to a minor in an effort to persuade her to engage in sexual activity with him, and created a list of 374 individuals' Internet screen or user names -- mostly minors whom he cataloged by physical attributes, state or country of residence and the nature of their sexual experiences.

The FBI in Miami and the West Midlands Police Department in the United Kingdom handled the investigation.

-- ANI MARTINEZ

Man Sought In W.Va., Ohio Sex Attack (PPG)

By Cindi Lash, Pittsburgh Post-gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, February 23, 2007

Police say same man accosted young woman in Martins Ferry before N. Wheeling abduction

DOJ_NMG_0135621

WHEELING, W.Va. -- Investigators believe a partially naked man who accosted a woman Sunday night in Martins Ferry, Ohio, was the same man who kidnapped and sexually assaulted a Wheeling girl two days later.

That man has not been identified, but FBI agents and police from the Ohio Valley have mounted a "significant" investigation to locate him, said Gary Wheeler, the FBI's supervisory agent for northern West Virginia. Police have increased patrols in Wheeling, Martins Ferry and other Ohio Valley communities and have pulled over and examined several vehicles that resembled the dark pickup truck the suspect drove during both incidents

An FBI artist also was summoned from Quantico, Va., to develop a composite sketch of the man and possibly a drawing of his truck. Investigators said they also are reviewing computer databases of sex offenders and may consult FBI profilers in an effort to identify the man.

Investigators yesterday said the circumstances of the 12-year-old girl's abduction Tuesday night from a street in North Wheeling were very similar to an incident Sunday night that may have been an abduction attempt. They warned parents in West Virginia, Ohio and Pennsylvania to be particularly cautious about allowing children to walk alone, saying they believe the incidents were rare examples of victims targeted by a brazen stranger.

"Stranger abductions are very rare occurrences," said Agent Wheeler, adding that kidnappings more often are committed by someone who knows the victim. "He struck twice in the same area that we know of. He is aggressive, and a little extra prudence on the part of parents [is warranted]."

Wheeling police said the man snatched the 12-year-old girl between 8:30 and 9 p.m. after parking his truck near a ramshackle garage near the intersection of North Fifth and Kenney Streets, barely a block from busy Main Street. The man, who was naked, walked up behind the girl and a friend who were walking together and asked for directions, Wheeling Lt. Gary Gaus said.

The girls "did what they've been told to do" and tried to run, but the man grabbed one of them and carried her a half-block to his truck, then drove away, Lt. Gaus said. The other girl ran to her home and her family called police.

The man sexually assaulted the girl before dropping her off about 40 minutes later at the Kirkwood Presbyterian Church in Bridgeport, Ohio, across the Ohio River from Wheeling. She walked to a nearby house and begged for help.

Investigators believe her attacker also sought directions from an 18-year-old woman around 9 p.m. Sunday in a residential neighborhood of Martins Ferry, about two miles from Wheeling. The woman was walking on Hughes Avenue when the man spoke to her while kneeling beside a parked vehicle, Martins Ferry Police Chief Barry Carpenter said.

When the woman replied that she didn't know how to get to the location he sought, the man opened his jacket and revealed that he was not wearing pants, Chief Carpenter said. The man began to masturbate and the woman screamed and ran to a porch.

The man chased her briefly before driving away in a dark pickup truck, Chief Carpenter said. He is described as white, between 5 feet 8 and 5 feet 10 inches tall, with short brown hair and a pudgy build.

The dark pickup truck he drove is possibly brown, with an extended cab and a 4-inch-wide white or light-colored stripe on the side that may fade as it reaches the back of the truck.

People who live and work in the North Wheeling neighborhood where the girl was abducted said they recall a truck like that parked near a Convenient Food Mart at North Fifth and Main streets and on adjacent streets.

"I have seen that truck up there. I have seen it in our neighborhood, in our parking lot," said Hattie Tamburin, who works at the Main Street Depot, a casino housed in the same building as the convenience store.

"The police haven't let up since day one on this, and hopefully they'll find him," said Ms. Tamburin, whose granddaughter attends school with the victim. "We're all afraid. I'm sure nobody will let the little girls out now."

Workers at those businesses said the victim of the abduction is a frequent customer at the convenience store and they were terrified by the attack.

"[The store] used to be full of children," said food mart cashier Robin Blum. "But it struck me when I worked [Wednesday night] that there were no kids in here unless they were with a parent or guardian."

Anyone with information about the man or his truck is asked to call the FBI in Pittsburgh at 412-432-4000, Wheeling police at 304-234-3661, Martins Ferry police at 740-633-2121 or their local police or sheriff's department.

DOJ_NMG_0135622

Police Probe Ferry Offense (WHEELINT)

By Gabe Wells

Wheeling Intelligencer, February 23, 2007

WHEELING — Police believe the man responsible for the abduction and sexual assault of a Wheeling girl is the same man who exposed himself Sunday to a Martins Ferry woman.

Martins Ferry Police Chief Barry Carpenter made the announcement Thursday at a news conference in Wheeling City Council Chambers. Wheeling police are seeking a suspect in Tuesday's abduction of a city girl, whose 12th birthday was Wednesday. Carpenter said a man matching the description of the suspect was involved in what may have been an abduction attempt at about 9 p.m. Sunday on Hughes Avenue in the south end of his city.

According to Carpenter, the man approached an 18-year-old woman as she returned to her home. He then asked her for directions, exposed himself to the woman and then began to masturbate, Carpenter said.

The woman turned and ran, and the suspect chased her for a distance before he got into a nearby truck and left the scene.

The truck also is similar in description to the vehicle used in Tuesday's abduction in Wheeling.

Wheeling Police Department Lt. Gary Gaus and FBI Supervisory Senior Resident Agent Mark Wheeler said the techniques are the same in both crimes.

In both cases, the suspect asked the victims for directions to an area location and then chased them after posing the question.

Also at the news conference, Gauss confirmed the young girl in Tuesday's abduction was sexually assaulted.

Wheeler then added that an FBI sketch artist currently is working with that victim to develop and release a rendering of the suspect.

That rendering may be released today, and an improved description of the vehicle is anticipated.

Wheeler, Gaus and Carpenter said the police presence already has been greatly increased in both cities.

And Wheeler is asking area parents to pay close attention to the whereabouts of their children.

''There's no need for hysteria,'' Wheeler said. ''There is a need for extra prudence.''

The suspect is a heavyset or ''chubby'' white male who is believed to be in his mid-20s. He is about 5 feet 10 inches tall.

The suspected vehicle is full-size pickup truck that is medium-brown in color. It has a stripe on its side that gets darker in color down the length of the body. The truck may have an extended cab.

Anyone with information regarding the alleged abduction or the vehicle believed to have been involved is asked to contact the Wheeling Police Department at (304) 234-3664.

Three Indicted In Las Vegas In Katrina Relief Fund Fraud Case (BSH)

Biloxi Sun Herald, February 23, 2007

LAS VEGAS - Two Nevada residents were arrested Thursday and a third person was named as a fugitive on charges they fraudulently obtained federal funds designated for victims of Hurricane Katrina, a prosecutor said.

Wilbert J. Bennett Jr., 31, of Henderson, and Sheila Ritter, 47, of Las Vegas, pleaded not guilty in initial appearances before a U.S. District Court magistrate judge following their arrests on charges of theft of government funds, U.S. Attorney Daniel Bogden said in a statement.

Renee Bellinger, 42, was indicted on charges of theft of government funds, identity theft and misuse of a Social Security number. She remained a fugitive, Bogden said.

Bellinger, who also used the name Renee McLoughlin, was identified in the statement as a secretary with the International Alliance of Theatrical Stage Employees. Union officials at the Las Vegas local and at international offices in New York City did not immediately confirm that account.

The indictment handed up Feb. 14 accuses Bennett of obtaining about $15,000 in Federal Emergency Management Agency disaster relief funds and Ritter of obtaining almost $21,000 in FEMA funds following Hurricane Katrina in August 2005, although both lived in Nevada.

DOJ_NMG_0135623

Ritter and Bennett were released Thursday on personal recognizance bonds. They had not yet been assigned public defenders.

Each faces up to five years in prison and a $250,000 fine if convicted, Bogden said.

Bellinger was accused of using her mother's identification as part of a scheme to obtain more than $23,000 in FEMA disaster relief money. If convicted, Bellinger faces up to 25 years in prison and $750,000 in fines, Bogden said.

Oklahoma City Man Accused Of Falsely Claiming Katrina Funds (AP)

AP, February 23, 2007

OKLAHOMA CITY (AP) — An Oklahoma City man was indicted in federal court on Thursday on charges of making false claims for Hurricane Katrina disaster relief funds.

A federal grand jury indicted Darryl Eugene Hayes, 31, on three counts of mail fraud and two counts of making false statements, U.S. Attorney John C. Richter said.

The mail fraud counts each carry a penalty of up to 20 years in prison plus restitution and a fine of up to $250,000. The other two counts are punishable by up to five years in prison and a fine of up to $250,000.

The indictment claims that Hayes defrauded the Federal Emergency Management Agency and the Louisiana Department of Labor of more than $10,000 by claiming unemployment benefits for supposed Hurricane Katrina evacuees under three false names, Richter said.

It also alleges that Hayes submitted a fraudulent application to FEMA, claiming that his home in New Orleans was damaged by the August 2005 storm and that he was living in a "mass shelter," and later faxed a letter to FEMA claiming he had sustained losses "from the hurricane" and had relocated to Oklahoma City, Richter said.

N.C. Man Convicted In Oregon In Multicountry Silver Scheme (AP)

By Tim Fought, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 23, 2007

PORTLAND, Ore. - A North Carolina man who bought one-ounce silver ingots for $10.50 and resold them to investors for $98 each and the promise of huge commission payments was convicted of federal charges in what a prosecutor called a classic "too-good-to-be-true" pyramid scheme.

About 5,000 victims lost more than $4 million in total, said Assistant U.S. Attorney Chris Cardani.

He said Richard Dompier of Vale, N.C., was convicted Wednesday of 29 counts in federal court in Eugene after a seven-day trial. He was accused of mail and tax fraud and money laundering.

Dompier, 48, faces a sentence of about 20 years under federal guidelines, Cardani said, and is free pending sentencing, likely in June.

Dompier used some of his gains to sponsor a NASCAR driver and start a motorcycle company, according to the indictment handed up in 2005.

He operated first out of Roseburg, Ore., and then later in Lincolnton, N.C., and the operation had offices in Park Rapids, Minn., and England, where Dompier hired a salesman, Cardani said.

Between 1998 and 2000, Dompier's New Millennium Group sold nearly 76,000 of the ingots, representing a promised payoff to investors of more than $1 billion, the U.S. attorney's office said in a press release.

The indictment said he bought the bars from the Franklin Mint and sold them through the mail and over the Internet, delivering the ingots along with promises of commission checks totaling $15,853.50 in 14 months.

A few customers lost as much as $20,000, buying up to 200 bars, but typically an investor would buy five or fewer, Cardani said.

As is typical in pyramid schemes, "he made a few payments early on as a way to lull investors into the program," using the payments of later investors to pay the earlier investors, Cardani said. The company had no legitimate business operation, Cardani said.

Often, Cardani said, pyramid schemes guarantee high returns, a tip-off to those who might be tempted: "If it sounds too good to be true, stay away."

DOJ_NMG_0135624

"This one was pretty good because he actually gave out the ingot bars," Cardani said.

After investors complained that they weren't getting payments they were promised, the Internal Revenue Service and FBI began an investigation in 2000, joined by British and Oregon authorities.

The bulk of the victims were in the United States, Canada and England, but the scheme also reached to Europe, Africa and Australia and was promoted in a total of 41 countries, the U.S. attorney's office said.

Study Fails To Stem Gangs Debate (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 23, 2007

L.A.'s biggest prevention and intervention program finds hope in data on participants' performance. Others say the effort is not effective.

Under pressure to show that the L.A. Bridges program actually works, the operators of the city's largest gang prevention effort released results of a study Thursday that sparked new debate about whether the city needs to rethink its anti-gang strategy.

The data from the city Community Development Department shows that although some middle school students targeted by L.A. Bridges have boosted or maintained their grades and attendance, most last year did not improve.

L.A. Bridges officials said they consider the findings encouraging given the types of students they are trying to help. But some city leaders said they were more skeptical, especially considering that gang membership and gang-related crime in Los Angeles are on the rise.

Amid new doubts about the program, which costs about $14 million annually, the city has replaced John Chavez as director of L.A. Bridges.

In addition, City Controller Laura Chick plans to audit the program, and Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa has put its operators on notice that he is providing funding only through September, by which time he expects that a new comprehensive gang strategy will be developed.

"I don't think it has been effective," said Alex Alonso, a scholar on gang issues who has taught at USC. "For all the millions of dollars we've spent, I haven't seen results."

The debate comes as Police Chief William J. Bratton has launched a new assault on gang activity in the city, a campaign criticized by some for not also including a more aggressive effort to keep kids out of gangs. The crackdown has involved the shift of resources by the Los Angeles Police Department and other agencies to focus on 11 specific street gangs that officials say cause the most problems.

But although there has been much focus on L.A.'s law enforcement push, the effort to keep youths from joining gangs has received less attention.

The report released Thursday indicates that of the 1,786 "at risk" kids in L.A. Bridges who turned in at least two report cards last year, about 45% improved their grades. Grades stayed the same for 23% and declined for the rest.

Among that same group, only 21% improved their attendance.

"Those numbers are not satisfactory," said Councilman Tony Cardenas, who heads a council committee considering an overhaul of L.A. Bridges. "If we got coordination and accountability, we could really get those numbers up dramatically."

Cardenas' committee is scheduled to receive the report from the Community Development Department, which oversees L.A. Bridges' contracts, and discuss it at a special meeting today at 8:15 a.m. at City Hall.

Even though the majority of students did not improve grades or attendance, Sharon Morris, an assistant general manager of the department, defended the results.

"For the number of kids we are serving, we are very satisfied," she said. "These are kids in low-income communities, and they have been identified as needing this program."

The city's premier gang prevention and intervention effort is being reevaluated because gang crime increased 15.7% in 2006 compared with the year before, including a 4% increase in gang-related homicides, with 272 killings, according to LAPD statistics.

Gang membership had been dropping but ended 2006 with an increase to 39,315 from 38,974 a year earlier. That means there were 341 more gang members.

DOJ_NMG_0135625

The original L.A. Bridges program, aimed at keeping kids out of gangs, funds centers serving 27 of the Los Angeles Unified School District's 73 middle schools.

L.A. Bridges targets middle school students ages 10 to 14 and is aimed at reducing their involvement in gangs. Goals include improving student performance and involving the community in helping the students.

Each caseworker is assigned 10 to 20 middle school students who are judged to be at risk, and the adults help the kids with homework, supervise them in after-school recreation, counsel their families and monitor their attendance at school.

L.A. Bridges II is an intervention program aimed at current and former gang members ages 14 to 25. The program has 64 gang intervention workers, who mentor 1,437 young people in gangs.

The results for Bridges II also sparked debate Thursday.

The Community Development Department reported that it managed 661 cases last year, including those of 175 people who were referred to city WorkSource job centers and 362 referred to other job training or placement.

Critics said the report fails to provide information that would better show whether the program is working — that is, how many gang members have quit gangs and how many middle school students have been kept from joining.

"How can you tell if you are reducing the gang problem unless you can tell how many young people you got out of gangs?" asked Connie Rice, director of Advancement Project Los Angeles, which last month released a city-financed study strongly criticizing L.A. Bridges and other city anti-gang programs as lacking focus, coordination and accountability.

The head of the department said his agency is improving its management and evaluation of L.A. Bridges. But General Manager Richard Benbow argued in the report to the City Council that as long as young people are being mentored and tutored after school, and referred to job training, they are less likely to be involved in a street gang.

"Any client connected to a departmental program represents a 'success,' because the alternatives — disconnection from social services and/or institutions — can lead to truancy, delinquency and criminal activity," he wrote.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

EXCLUSIVE: Gonzales Talks On Civil Liberties (CBN)

By Melissa Charbonneau

Christian Broadcasting Network, February 23, 2007

NASHVILLE, Tenn. - It's a day in the life of the U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales as he boards a plane to launch the first Freedom Initiative to protect religious liberties.

Along for the ride, we ask about a report that says discrimination against Muslims after 9/11 in part prompted this new program.

"It's something we worry about, naturally, when people see images on the television screen that these are the enemies of America, they may naturally assume anyone who looks like these people, or have the same religious belief - that, in fact, they constitute enemies of the United States. And that's just not true," Gonzales said.

Excerpts from Gonzales "The President sent a very clear message in the days following following the attacks of 9/11, going to a Muslim center, and expressing to the American people his clear belief in our country, we have many people of the Muslim faith that do not represent a danger to America and we need to be tolerant of the views of the people of the Muslim faith."

We asked Gonzales about "The Breach," the just-released film about the worst intelligence failure in the FBIs history - when it turned out an American was spying for the Russians.

Charbonneau: That was before your watch, but what has been done since that incident at the Justice Department to make sure spies like Robert Hanssen aren't still at the FBI?

Gonzales: Well, I can't tell you everything, otherwise I'd be tipping off someone about our efforts to ensure something like that doesn't happen.I think we're in much better shape today than we were just a few years ago.

Gonzales is at the center of the debate over much-publicized case of two imprisoned border patrol agents who were tried and found guilty for shooting an alleged illegal drug smuggler. He didn't say whether he will recommend a presidential pardon. He did say the facts in the case are not getting out.

DOJ_NMG_0135626

"I've heard people complain about how could these people be convicted for doing their jobs," he said. "It's not part of their job to shoot an unarmed man from behind. It's not part of their job to conspire to conceal what they did. It's not part of their job to lie about what they did, to hide it from their superiors. So all that occurred in this particular case. And that's why these individuals were convicted."

Now Gonzales himself may become one of the political targets in a string of investigations from the new Democratic majority in Congress.

Charbonneau: Are you concerned that in the last couple of years of the Administration that your efforts will be bogged down by endless hearings and investigations by Democrats?

Gonzales: I think that the American people lose if I spend all my time worrying about congressional requests for information, if I spend all my time responding to subpoenas, to things of that nature. We will work with Congress, and we will do the very best we can to reach an accommodation with Congress, to give them the information, the appropriate information, they need for oversight. But that's an important part of my job. But I also believe that the American people expect me to do my job as Attorney General to protect their kids and make their neighborhood safer.

DOJ Report Touts Bush Record On Rights (UPI)

UPI, February 22, 2007

In a 43-page document released by the U.S. Department of Justice Feb. 20, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales says the department takes seriously the protection of religious freedom and has worked vigorously during the Bush administration to protect them.

"Many came to America precisely because of the recognition of religious liberty and the protection of this most basic of human rights," the report, released in conjunction with the attorney general's visit to the Southern Baptist Convention Building in Nashville, Tenn., says. The document was labeled, "Report on Enforcement of Laws Protecting Religious Freedom: Fiscal Years 2001-2006," Baptist Press reported Wednesday.

The Civil Rights Division of the justice department was established in 1957 and is best known for its work toward ending racial discrimination. Early in the Bush administration, the department established a Special Counsel for Religious Discrimination to monitor the enforcement of religious freedom laws.

"Prior to 2001, except for prosecution of religious bias crimes and employment cases, the Civil Rights Division exercised its jurisdiction to enforce civil rights laws with respect to religion sparingly, and had never had an attorney charged with ensuring that these laws were comprehensively enforced," the report says.

Religious discrimination is a growing problem in the United States as the country is now home to more than 2,000 different faiths and denominations, the report says. From 1992 to 2005, complaints of religious discrimination in employment filed with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission increased 69 percent, compared to single-digit increases in complaints about sex discrimination and racial discrimination during that period.

Education discrimination cases involving religion increased from one case reviewed and no investigations during the period of 1995-2000 to 82 cases reviewed and 40 investigations from 2001-2006, according to the report.

In March 2005, the Civil Rights Division reached a settlement with a Delaware school district after a fourth-grade Muslim student was harassed by her teacher about her faith in front of her class, the report says. The student was ridiculed because her mother wore a headscarf, and other students joined in the criticism, causing the Muslim girl to miss several weeks of school because of emotional distress, according to the report. The settlement required religious tolerance classes for students and teachers, and the girl's teacher was monitored closely.

Regarding religious discrimination in the area of employment, the Civil Rights Division filed a lawsuit against the Los Angles County Metropolitan Transit Authority after it refused to accept bus driver applications unless the applicant was available to work 24 hours per day, seven days a week. The suit alleged that the transit authority's policy discriminated against Sabbath-observing Jews and Christians and others who must miss work for religious reasons. An agreement now allows drivers to swap assignments or take temporary leaves of absence for religious purposes, the report says.

DOJ_NMG_0135627

Another case the justice department took up involved an investigation of the city of Balch Springs, Texas, after the city-run senior center told senior adults they could no longer pray before meals, sing gospel songs or hold Bible studies, according to the report. All of the activities were initiated by the seniors themselves, but the city mistakenly believed that the separation of church and state required a ban, the report says. The city settled with the seniors in January 2004, and they won the right to continue their religious activities.

Religious freedom regarding land use is a growing issue in the United States, and in 2000 Congress passed the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA), citing widespread discrimination against religious institutions by state and local officials in land-use decisions.

Since 2001, the Civil Rights Division has reviewed 118 RLUIPA matters, opening 26 investigations resulting in 16 favorable resolutions before a lawsuit was necessary, the report says. The division has also filed four lawsuits.

In United States v. Maui County, the division sued the city of Maui, Hawaii, after it denied a permit for a nondenominational Christian church that has held services on Maui since 1960 to build a church on 5.85 acres of land in an agricultural district. The county allowed secular assemblies such as rodeo facilities, petting zoos and sports fields, but the church was denied, the report says. After the justice department intervened, the church was allowed to build in the Maui agricultural district, and the county paid it damages and attorney's fees.

A case brought by the Department of Justice in the area of crimes against persons and property based on religion was United States v. Bryant and Martin in 2004. Two men pleaded guilty to vandalizing a historic black church by breaking windows in the sanctuary and smashing items throughout the church, the report says, resulting in sentences of 27 and 21 months in prison.

"Experience in enforcing civil rights over the past 50 years has taught that a key to success is developing good working relationships with civil rights and community organizations," the report says. "It is such groups on the ground that bring many cases to the Department of Justice's attention, help identify trends and issues, and help spread the word about people's rights."

To facilitate that goal, the attorney general sought the help of the Southern Baptist Convention when he addressed its Executive Committee members Feb. 20 in Nashville. There he unveiled the "First Freedom Project," which is aimed at educating Americans about their religious freedoms and encouraging them to help identify and report abuses of those freedoms.

"We have seen too many churches burned, too many rocks thrown through stained-glass windows, too many swastikas painted on sanctuary walls, too many lives taken," Gonzales told Executive Committee members. "There are fewer of these attacks today, but still too many. And when faced with that kind of assault, the Department of Justice has responded, and will always respond, with force and conviction."

Teel Avoids Death Penalty (BSH)

By Robin Fitzgerald

Biloxi Sun Herald, February 23, 2007

GULFPORT - U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez decided against seeking the death penalty in the prosecution of Ryan Teel after an extensive review of the criminal case, according to U.S. Attorney Dunn Lampton for the Southern District of Mississippi.

Teel, a former Harrison County jailer, remains in custody pending trial in the Feb. 4, 2006, fatal beating of inmate Jessie Lee Williams Jr. A motion filed in court Thursday asks for a bond review so Teel could await his May 28 trial out of jail, as first reported on sunherald.com.

Teel was in charge of the booking room the night of the beating. He has been held at an undisclosed location since his arrest Aug. 28, 2006. Teel, 30, pleaded not guilty to charges of deprivation of civil rights under color of law and of falsifying records to obstruct a federal investigation.

Gonzalez decided against the death penalty after Teel's attorneys and federal prosecutors met with a U.S. Justice Department review panel in Washington.

"No reason was given," Lampton said.

"There's all kinds of arguments for it, but it was his call. I've tried a number of death cases and in this case, I think it's the right decision. It's better to start the case off without the jury or the judge having to deal with the death-penalty issue."

DOJ_NMG_0135628

Lampton called the review "a very serious, involved procedure. They look at all the possible factors like a jury would. With 94 (federal court) districts, I think that's the wise approach in fairness and consistency across the board. When a case goes through, you want the law to be enforced the same in Mississippi that it is in Minnesota and Montana."

The decision means Teel faces life in prison if convicted on the civil-rights charge.

Teel is relieved over the decision, said Jim Davis, lead defense attorney.

U.S. Chief Magistrate Judge John M. Roper denied bond for Teel after his arrest, saying Teel was a possible flight risk and danger to others.

Davis' motion for a bond review says Teel's detention was ordered before the death-penalty issue was decided.

The family of the 40-year-old Williams, who had been taken to jail on misdemeanors, has been informed, said Michael W. Crosby, lead attorney for Williams' estate.

"We continue to monitor developments in the criminal proceedings, but we don't want to say anything that could jeopardize the prosecution or the venue," Crosby said.

A change of venue would move the trial to another region of the state.

A wrongful-death civil lawsuit for Williams' estate has been placed on hold.

The scope of the criminal investigation broadened in public view three weeks before Teel's arrest when ex-jailer Regina Rhodes admitted she helped beat Williams. Rhodes and four other former jailers have entered plea agreements, admitting a conspiracy to deprive hundreds of inmates of their rights.

Rhodes awaits sentencing, as do former jailers Morgan Thompson, Dedri Caldwell, Preston Wills and William Jeffery Priest.

Urban League Chief Wants Justice Probe Of Katrina Shootings (AP)

By Mary Foster, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 23, 2007

NEW ORLEANS (AP) -- Police shootings that left two people dead at a bridge in New Orleans in the chaotic days after Hurricane Katrina should be investigated by the U.S. Justice Department, the president of the National Urban League said Thursday.

In a letter to the chairwoman of the Congressional Black Caucus, Marc Morial - a former New Orleans mayor - asked that the caucus support a federal civil rights investigation into the "circumstances surrounding the police killing of two unarmed African American men and the wounding of four others."

Six current and one former police officer have been charged in the case.

Sgts. Kenneth Bowen and Robert Gisevius Jr., Officer Anthony Villavaso II, and former officer Robert Faulcon Jr. were indicted in December on first-degree murder charges and attempted murder charges in the Sept. 4, 2005, shootings on the Danziger Bridge.

Conviction on a first-degree murder charge would mean mandatory life in prison. District Attorney Eddie Jordan said he would not seek the death penalty for the four.

Two other officers - Robert Barrios and Mike Hunter Jr. - were charged with attempted first-degree murder, and Officer Ignatius Hills was charged with attempted second-degree murder in the case.

Ronald Madison, a 40-year-old mentally retarded man, and James Brissette, 19, were shot and killed at the bridge.

"What's the matter he doesn't have faith in Eddie Jordan?" said attorney Frank DeSalvo, who represents Bowen. "I don't know what motivates these people to do what they do. I assume there is a political reason for it."

The New Orleans NAACP asked the U.S. Attorney and the civil rights division of the Justice Department to investigate the shootings after those charged were allowed to return to work in non-sensitive jobs away from the public. Danatus King, president of the New Orleans branch of the NAACP said the move smacked of favoritism.

U.S. Attorney Jim Letten at that time said his office, the Justice Department and the FBI have been monitoring the investigation. He described that as routine.

DOJ_NMG_0135629

"I think we have a suitable number of investigations under way," said Police Association on New Orleans President Michael Glasser. "The feds have had every opportunity to conduct an investigation from the day it happened to the present."

The officers have drawn strong support from the union and other police. When the men turned themselves in after being indicted, supporters lined the street, stepping forward to embrace the seven men and shake their hands. One sign in the crowd read "Support the Danziger 7." Another read "Thanks for protecting our city."

"I am especially calling for congressional oversight into the subsequent handling of this case by the New Orleans Police Department and the court," Morial's letter to Carolyn Kilpatrick, chair of the Black Caucus, said.

"I would certainly concur," said Nathan Fisher, who represents Ronald Madison's brother Lance Madison. "I certainly think the police department did a terrible job investigating."

Illinois Gay Marriage Bill Introduced (CHIT)

By Crystal Yednak, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, February 23, 2007

A state lawmaker fired up the gay marriage debate in Illinois Thursday by introducing a bill that would legalize marriage between same-sex couples.

"Illinois is a heartland state but has always been a leader in civil rights and social justice issues," said the bill's sponsor, state Rep. Greg Harris (D-Chicago). "It's the right thing to do."The proposal would eliminate wording in state law that marriage is between "a man and a woman" and substitute the phrase "two persons."

Massachusetts is the only state that recognizes same-sex marriages. Just this week, New Jersey became the third state to offer gay couples civil unions, joining Connecticut and Vermont.

Last year, opponents of gay marriage tried to head off just this sort of action in Illinois. They tried to put a question on the ballot asking voters whether marriage should be defined as a union between "one man and one woman." But the Illinois State Board of Elections ruled the group hadn't collected enough valid signatures.

David E. Smith, executive director of the Illinois Family Institute, which helped organize the drive, said the group is considering another ballot drive this year.

The proposed legislation could be the thing that mobilizes the group again, Smith said.

"We believe that government doesn't have a responsibility to promote or protect the homosexual lifestyle," he added.

Harris, who is openly gay, said a significant education effort would be necessary to get his bill passed, as was the case in 2005 when a gay rights bill passed in Illinois.

The gay rights bill was first introduced in the mid-1970s but it took decades to build legislative support, said Rick Garcia, director of public policy for Equality Illinois.

Garcia said the gay marriage bill is necessary to protect gay couples and their families so partners can make health decisions, qualify for pensions and benefits and have a say in the disposition of remains, among other things.

Still, advocates know the word "marriage" complicates the issue.

"When we use the word marriage, what people are really thinking of is the sacrament of matrimony. We're talking about civil marriage," Garcia said.

Harris said the title of the bill—the "Religious Freedom and Marriage Fairness Act"—is intended to calm the concerns of religious groups who worry they would be forced to recognize same-sex marriages as well.

"We wanted to reaffirm in this bill that there is no religion, no church, no temple, no mosque that we are trying to compel to consecrate marriages," Harris said.

Harris said supporters talked about the idea of pushing for civil unions instead. Civil unions offer many of the same protections of marriage, but not the title. But it was "decided that marriage is the fully equal term and that's where we want to begin," he said.

Garcia said advocates will have an uphill battle getting it passed.

"I cautioned people—don't start planning a June wedding in Illinois, it's going to take awhile for us to get the support legislatively," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0135630

cyednak@tribune.com

Nonprofit Litigates Largest Employment Discrimination Class Action Ever To Go To Trial (LAW)

By Sandhya Bathija, The National Law Journal

National Law Journal, February 23, 2007

Attorney Brad Seligman was on a hunt to find out whatever he could about Wal-Mart Stores Inc. after hearing about a potential claim of alleged sex discrimination against the retailer in 1999.

"I called up my friend, another attorney, and he immediately said, 'evil empire,' " said Seligman, executive director and founder of a nonprofit group called The Impact Fund, located in Berkeley, Calif. "Then I called another friend, who is an economist, and he also indicated the same."

Based on the advice of his friends and some statistical research of his own, the litigation began. On Feb. 6, the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals upheld a lower court decision making the case the largest employment discrimination class action to go to trial. Dukes v. Wal-Mart Stores Inc., No. 3:01-CV-02252 (N.D. Calif.).

The Impact Fund filed the lawsuit against Wal-Mart. The organization aims to provide funding, training and advice to lawyers who want to bring public interest impact lawsuits in civil rights, poverty and environmental justice. And its Equal Justice Litigation Program works as co-counsel on select cases, including the Wal-Mart case.

The Impact Fund has three attorneys: Seligman, Jocelyn Larkin and Julia Campins. The entire organization runs with 12 employees, said Larkin, and their workspace is a typical nonprofit office, full of "hand-me-down furniture." But their work, as the organization's name suggests, is anything but little.

The Impact Fund is currently involved in litigating six cases, including another gender discrimination class action against Costco stores. Ellis v. Costco Wholesale Corp., No. 3:04-CV-03341 (N.D. Calif.).

Wal-Mart will appeal the decision, said Theodore J. Boutrous, the company's chief counsel on appeal and a partner at Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher in Los Angeles.

"We feel we have excellent arguments for en banc review in the 9th Circuit and to the Supreme Court," Boutrous said, arguing that this ruling conflicts with class action certification laws in other jurisdictions.

"We do not feel it is fair for the plaintiffs to act that the court has made a decision on the merits," he said. "This ruling does not speak to the merits of the plaintiffs' claim."

A LIFE CHANGE

Seligman founded The Impact Fund after working 11 years as a plaintiffs class action lawyer in a small Oakland, Calif., firm, Saperstein, Seligman, Mayeda & Larkin. He became managing partner of the firm, and then realized his career was becoming too demanding.

"I was 40 and I was a single parent, and I realized it just wouldn't be as much fun for me, so I resigned," he said. "Then I realized I made more money than I planned to make and I wanted to find a way to give it away."

He thought of creating a fund from which he could give grants to attorneys who have clients and cases, but do not have enough money to go through litigation. He quickly learned that it wasn't just money that other attorneys sought. They also wanted to learn from his experience and expertise as a class action attorney.

"I started to spend much more time talking to people than giving away money," Seligman said.

And so he started a training program and working as co-counsel on certain cases. Seligman became interested in Wal-Mart when Stephen Tinkler, now an attorney with Tinkler & Firth in Santa Fe, N.M., called him for information on how he should best carry out a gender discrimination class action against the retailer.

Seligman's idea was to put together a unique team made up of a mix of nonprofit organizations and private firms to represent the class against Wal-Mart. The nonprofit groups, in addition to The Impact Fund, are Equal Rights Advocates in San Francisco, which specializes in sex discrimination cases, and Public Justice Center, a Baltimore nonprofit firm. The firms are Cohen, Milstein, Hausfeld & Toll in Washington; Davis Cowell & Bowe in San Francisco; and Tinkler & Firth and Merit Bennett P.C. in Santa Fe.

DOJ_NMG_0135631

Together, 18 attorneys worked through discovery, Seligman said.

Irma Herrera, executive director of Equal Rights Advocates, said the attorneys reviewed more than one million documents. "We were criss-crossing the country taking depositions of Wal-Mart employers and preparing the employees," she said.

Bark And Hold (WP)

The Washington Post, February 23, 2007

THE POLICE of Prince George's County deserve a pat on the back for mending their canine unit's ways. What for too many years had been a barrage of grisly brutality reports has given way to dramatically fewer injuries to suspects and other people. As reported last week by The Post's Ruben Castaneda, the canine unit, which had been operating under a Justice Department consent decree because of allegations of excessive force and lack of accountability, is being freed of federal oversight.

The statistics -- and the views of citizen groups that used to complain constantly about snarly, excessively ferocious dogs -- indicate significant improvement. During a seven-year period from the mid-1980s to the early 1990s, county police dogs were involved in nearly 800 biting incidents, according to an internal police report included in a federal civil lawsuit against a canine handler. Last year, county police dogs apprehended 55 suspects without biting them, a result of steady training of the dogs to "bark and hold," not bark and sink their teeth.

Police Chief Melvin C. High says his leaders and the rank and file have "worked really hard to get to this place." Better still, he acknowledges that "this is just the first step in what we're about," which he calls "constitutional policing." We call it encouraging news for all county residents.

ANTITRUST:

$1.75M Fine Ends Probe Of Concrete Price-fixing (INDYSTAR)

By Kevin Corcoran

The Indianapolis Star, February 23, 2007

Noblesville company, 1 of 4 fined a total of $35.2M in penalties, will pay over 5 years

A probe into concrete price-fixing in the Indianapolis area, which sent nine current or former executives to prison, ended after more than three years Thursday with yet another corporate fine.

The $1.75 million penalty levied against MA-RI-AL Corp. during a U.S. District Court sentencing completed a sweeping antitrust investigation into agreements among more than a half-dozen companies to limit discounts on bid work from July 2000 through May 25, 2004

MA-RI-AL, a Noblesville company doing business as Beaver Materials, agreed Thursday to settle its November conviction by paying the fine in installments over five years.

The company's co-owners, Allyn M. and R. Gary Beaver, who were not charged in the investigation, agreed to the settlement with representatives of the U.S. Department of Justice.

Chief U.S. District Judge Larry J. McKinney accepted the negotiated fine as a fair punishment that would send a message to other corporations about the risks of fixing prices without putting Beaver Materials out of business. The company also got five years' probation.

Companies involved in the conspiracy, including those whose executives cooperated with the Justice Department Antitrust Division and FBI, also face civil suits from customers to recover any overcharges.

Beaver's defense attorney, James Voyles, said an agreement was possible because the Justice Department's accountants and the company's experts were relatively close in assessments of the firm's ability to pay a fine.

Going into the sentencing hearing, Beaver Materials asserted it could afford no more than $1.1 million. Federal prosecutors were seeking a $2.5 million fine.

Beaver sells about $15 million a year of ready-mix concrete, mostly to homebuilders in fast-growing suburbs north and south of Marion County, and employs nearly 90 people.

In all, four Indianapolis-area companies paid $35.2 million in fines stemming from the case.

DOJ_NMG_0135632

The price-fixing scandal became public in June 2005, when federal prosecutors announced a $29.2 million fine against Greenfield-based Irving Materials Inc., the largest fine ever paid in a domestic price-fixing conspiracy.

Company operations manager Christopher A. Beaver, 42, Noblesville, who was convicted at the same November trial as his firm, filed notice Tuesday that he will appeal his 27-month federal sentence imposed Feb. 9 for price fixing and lying to the FBI.

He and his cousin, Ricky J. Beaver, 43, Noblesville, the company's sales manager, received stiffer prison terms than the leaders of the conspiracy, who pleaded guilty and cooperated with the government.

Ricky Beaver chose not to appeal his 27-month prison term. Both men have acknowledged lying to the FBI during surprise interviews, but said they did not participate in price-fixing.

Federal antitrust officials won't say whether more charges could result from alleged price-fixing schemes in Bloomington, Marion and Muncie, where Irving Materials officials have acknowledged participating in additional price fixing.

Plea Deal In Bid-rig Scheme (NSDY)

By Robert E. Kessler, Robert.kessler@newsday.com

Long Island Newsday, February 23, 2007

Pennsylvania execs admit they conspired with LI company in $200G contract to sell slings to Navy carriers

Two executives of a Pennsylvania defense contractor pleaded guilty yesterday in federal court in Central Islip to charges of bid-rigging in connection with a contract to sell the Navy slings that are used to move bombs and other munitions on aircraft carriers, officials said.

Thomas Cunningham, 61, the vice president of Total Industrial & Packaging Inc., of McKee's Rocks, Pa. - a Pittsburgh suburb - and Richard Barko, 44, the company's general manager, admitted they conspired with a Long Island company to criminally violate antitrust laws. The Long Island company involved in the $200,000 contract was not identified in court papers. The contract was to provide slings known as metal sling hoist assemblies, officials said.

According to officials, Barko and Cunningham, along with other unnamed conspirators, met between August 2003 and January 2004 and agreed on who would win the bid on the slings and that they all would submit non-competitive bids, officials said.

As part of a plea bargain, Cunningham and Barko agreed to cooperate with an ongoing investigation into bid-rigging by the Antitrust Division of the Justice Department and the Defense Criminal Investigative Service, officials said.

Neither their attorney nor the company could be reached for comment.

Thomas Barnett, the assistant attorney general in charge of the antitrust division, said in a written statement: "We will continue to seek out and prosecute those who subvert the competitive bidding process."

Barko and Cunningham each face up to 6 months in prison and a fine of $10,000 when they are sentenced.

Sirius-XM Merger Faces Major Hurdle Over Antitrust Issues, Experts Say (BLOOM)

Bloomberg, February 23, 2007

Sirius Satellite Radio Inc. and XM Satellite Holdings Inc. will have trouble persuading the U.S. Justice Department to approve their $4.84 billion merger because the combination appears to threaten competition, antitrust experts say.

Antitrust enforcers won't readily accept assertions by Sirius and XM that satellite radio competes for listeners with broadcast radio, iPods and music downloads by cell-phone users, said Herbert Hovenkamp, who teaches antitrust at the University of Iowa law school. The Justice Department probably won't agree with that "fairly common error," he said.

Satellite radio can be viewed as "a unique technology" controlled by "two firms that have been duking it out," Hovenkamp said. "Since they have the whole thing, that would make this a merger to monopoly."

The test for the Justice Department, he said, will be whether Sirius and XM could impose a price increase without losing customers.

How the Justice Department defines the market is crucial to the outcome of its merger review. The agency's guidelines say that determination hinges on whether the merging companies can impose a "small but significant and nontransitory" price increase on customers without forcing them to shift to other products.

DOJ_NMG_0135633

If enough customers switch products and thus cancel out any profit from a price increase, the market must include these other products, the guidelines say.

"XM and Sirius are competing for consumers' attention and entertainment dollars from multiple products and services in the highly competitive and rapidly evolving audio entertainment marketplace," Gary M. Parsons, XM's chairman, told investors in a Tuesday conference call. "Satellite radio is still a small player."

Parsons also sought to dispel fears the combined company would raise prices.

The merged company can't continue to grow unless it meets "consumer expectations on both price and programming," he said.

Sirius and XM declined to comment beyond citing public statements by Parsons and Mel Karmazin, chief executive officer for Sirius. Karmazin echoed Parsons' analysis on the conference call.

In recent government reviews of media mergers, antitrust officials have narrowly defined the markets in which the combining companies compete, said David Balto, a former Federal Trade Commission official.

Sirius-XM Merger Would Send Wrong Signal (WP)

By Steven Pearlstein

The Washington Post, February 23, 2007

Here's what to expect if the Justice Department and the Federal Communications Commission allow Sirius and XM to merge, creating a monopoly in the satellite radio business:

Clear Channel will start buying every radio station in America that it doesn't already own.

Apple will be able to buy any company that begins to challenge its dominance in the market for portable music players.

Comcast will begin merger talks with Time Warner Cable.

And there will be nothing standing in the way of a marriage of NBC and CBS.

All that will be possible because the government will have declared that there is so much competition between the different technologies in the market for digital material -- and the outcome of that competition is so uncertain -- that there is no reason to worry about consolidation of companies using the same technology.

This is the Powell Doctrine -- not the one about overwhelming force enunciated by Gen. Colin Powell when he was chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, but the one promulgated by his son, Michael Powell, while he was chairman of the FCC. The younger Powell was guided by this doctrine in giving the green light to consolidation in almost every corner of the telecommunications sector. In the one instance he deviated from that position -- blocking the merger of EchoStar and DirecTV -- it was narrowly, on the ground that there weren't enough broadband competitors in many rural areas.

There is something to the idea that antitrust regulators should use a lighter touch, and exercise greater humility in predicting what might happen, during periods of rapid technological change. But even discounting for that, there are plenty of reasons for the government to block an XM-Sirius merger, which would create a monopoly.

Let's start with the obvious, which is that that while there are now multiple sources for digital music, they aren't perfect substitutes for each other.

I like radio, my wife will listen only to CDs, my daughter prefers her iPod, and my son will enjoy the convenience of getting music on his cellphone when that service finally takes off. Any of us could switch if the other channels offered lower prices or superior quality, but the differences would have to be pretty significant to overcome habit and personal preference.

Moreover, people are somewhat locked into their current choice by the investment they've made in equipment or contracts with companies. In that way, too, customers are "sticky."

The different technologies also have different business models, complicating the terms of competition. Old-fashioned radio makes its money from advertising, so it is hard to see how it could discipline the XM-Sirius monopoly for raising prices. Nor could Apple, which makes its money selling devices and downloaded songs. And we don't even know yet what the business models will be for Internet radio or music over cellphones.

In fact, XM and Sirius really offer two services. One is music programming. The other is the delivery of that programming via satellites and ground stations. Most of their customers buy the package, but not all. I get limited XM service as part of my

DOJ_NMG_0135634

DirecTV subscription, and in the future one can imagine cellphone operators and cable companies and maybe even old-fashioned radio stations contracting with XM or Sirius for programming. A merger would reduce their choice of suppliers.

In the same way, XM and Sirius are engaged in furious bidding wars to get different auto companies to install their systems as standard features and options. Obviously, that kind of competition will disappear after a merger -- in fact, the companies say explicitly that would be a benefit of the merger. At the same time, it works to the detriment of car buyers.

As for consumer choice, the companies argue that by eliminating duplicative folk channels and '80s rock channels, the merger will give them the money and bandwidth to launch even more specialty channels. Of course, we have no assurances of that. And as anyone with 500 channels of cable knows, there is a diminishing return to that kind of "variety." My hunch is that music lovers would be better off if XM and Sirius continued to compete by providing the best and most innovative jazz channels, for example, than offering me only one jazz channel along with another specializing in East European folk dances.

Moreover, you can bet your Gilbert Arenas game jersey that XM-Sirius would try to use its new clout and financial resources to outbid competitors for the exclusive audio rights to major sporting events, including those of your local teams.

XM and Sirius are correct when they argue that we are about to enjoy a competitive free-for-all among various companies and technologies to determine which is the most effective in bringing digital music to consumers. It is a process that will foster innovation and greatly benefit consumers. But for precisely that reason, this is the wrong time to give one technology a leg up in that competition by allowing it to become a monopoly, while other companies are forced to compete on two fronts -- against other companies using the same technology, and against companies using different technologies. By approving the XM-Sirius merger, the government would be stacking the deck in favor of satellite radio.

Moreover, history suggests that one or two of the technologies will eventually prevail by proving itself more effective and efficient. And if one of the survivors is satellite radio, consumers will find themselves worse off because the government had allowed a monopoly.

What we have here, folks, is a case of two money-losing companies locked in what has become ruinous competition, from which they hope to escape by merging. It may be that, given the economics of the business, there is room for only one to survive and prosper. But if satellite radio is such a "natural monopoly," consumers will be better off if the companies are forced to duke it out until one prevails and the other dies. The antitrust laws were designed to foster competition, not to foreclose it by bailing out competitors that overpaid for talent, over-invested in plant and equipment or over-promised results to their investors.

Steven Pearlstein can be reached atpearlsteins@washpost.com.

Reject Their Request (USAT)

By Jimmy Schaeffler

USA Today, February 23, 2007

When the Federal Communications Commission approved the creation of satellite radio in 1997, it had an option: Provide an exclusive license to one company, or authorize competing licenses that ensured consumer choice and lower marketplace prices. It wisely opted for the latter, saying: "One licensee will not be permitted to acquire control of the other remaining satellite licensee. This prohibition on transfer of control will help assure continuing competition."

This wording stemmed from the commission's core DNA, which prompts it to act on behalf of consumers by embracing competition, localism and diversity deemed to be "in the public interest." Now, after XM and Sirius have fought ferociously for 10 years, they come on bended knee before policymakers, begging for a government-sanctioned monopoly.

Their request should be rejected, as was a similar monopoly merger proposed by satellite television providers DirecTV and DISH Network in 2001.

Let's review facts: Combined, XM and Sirius have about 14 million subscribers. They compete in a finite industry: satellite radio. Moreover, it is disingenuous, if not ludicrous, to suggest that XM and Sirius face financial woes because of threats from Internet radio, iPods or alternative music platforms.

XM and Sirius have no one to blame but themselves for their alleged financial worries. Now they seek a government bailout for their shockingly bad business decisions.

Paying individual talent hundreds of millions of dollars may make sense in the NBA or NFL, both established businesses. To pay it for individual talent in a fledgling entertainment start-up is preposterous. Yet that has been the XM-Sirius business model. Now they ask the government — and consumers — to cover the tab. And they ask consumers to settle for considerably less choice, which is what monopolies do.

It took DirecTV and DISH Network well over a decade to gain their financial legs in the satellite TV business. XM and Sirius have sustainable businesses that can operate quite well in satellite radio — right now — as separate entities. They don't need a monopoly; all they need is a class in Business 101 and a little common sense.

Jimmy Schaeffler is a senior analyst at The Carmel Group, a telecommunications and media consulting organization.

Sirius And XM Together Makes Sense For Listeners (USAT)

USA Today, February 23, 2007

Remember the "baseball, hot dogs, apple pie and Chevrolet" car ad from the 1980s? Turns out it was prescient. While the food is still sold separately, baseball now comes free with many Chevys, at least for a three-month introductory offer.

That's because General Motors has a deal to build XM Satellite radios into Chevys and its other cars. And XM has a deal with Major League Baseball.

Satellite competitor Sirius is frozen out of both. But it has the NFL and NBA contracts, which means that if there's a Ford in your future, football and basketball aren't far behind. Not a sports fan? Oprah is on XM; Martha Stewart is on Sirius.

As Stewart might say, that is not a good thing. It makes little sense that sports fans must decide between every single pro football game and no baseball games, or vice versa. Nor does it make much sense that people's listening preferences should enter into their car-buying decisions.

That's one reason the proposed XM-Sirius combination, announced this week, may be the rare merger that is good for consumers.

Before the federal government approves the deal, of course, it should be thoroughly vetted. The salient question for regulators is whether satellite radio is a market unto itself, in which case a merger would create a monopoly, or whether it is part of larger universe that includes broadcast radio and an array of existing and emerging technologies.

If it's the latter — and a strong case can be made that it is — the merged entity would represent a more potent competitor to entrenched broadcast interests, one that would offer its customers a more enticing and complete product.

Satellite clearly competes with ground-based radio. If it didn't, the National Association of Broadcasters wouldn't be trying to restrict the traffic and weather channels offered on the satellite services, nor would it be so concerned about an XM-Sirius merger.

Satellite competes at a disadvantage with traditional radio. Broadcasters can offer programs free in part because they don't pay the government for use of the airwaves. Sirius and XM had to pay about $90 million each for a tiny fraction of the space on the airwaves that broadcasters enjoy. If the government insists on maintaining such an uneven playing field, the least it can do for satellite is unshackle it.

Satellite listeners would end up paying more than the $12.95 a month they currently pay, as well they might expect if they get more content. But the merged company might offer à la carte pricing options and would face natural constraints. The more it charged, the more listeners would opt for free broadcast radio, MP-3 devices or new car-based Internet options being developed.

The case against the proposed deal would be stronger if XM, with 7.6 million subscribers, and Sirius, with 6 million, were strong and profitable companies. Both, in fact, have been big money losers, hemorrhaging $6 billion collectively in less than a decade.

The most pressing question is not whether XM and Sirius would be too powerful if they merged; it is whether they can survive if they don't. And the best way to ensure survival is to let them combine. Baseball goes with Chevrolet, so why not also with football, basketball, Howard Stern and Martha Stewart?

Apple And Cisco Settle Dispute Over IPhone Name (FT)

By Kevin Allison in San Francisco

Financial Times, February 23, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0135636

Shares of Apple and Cisco Systems were little changed yesterday after the companies settled their dispute over the use of the iPhone name by announcing an agreement to share the controversial trademark.

The accord put to rest a month-long dispute that began when Apple launched the iPhone, marking the computer maker's long-awaited foray into the mobile handset market.

Apple and Cisco said they had reached agreement to share the iPhone name, allowing each to apply the name to products sold around the world.

Under the agreement, both sides agreed to "explore opportunities for inter-operability in the areas of security, and consumer and enterprise communications".

Other terms of the deal were not disclosed. The agreement represented a concession on the part of Apple, which had originally resisted calls to make the iPhone compatible with other companies' hardware.

But Gene Munster, an analyst at Piper Jaffray, said he was sceptical over whether Apple was serious about making its hardware and software compatible with rival products. "It's good lip service from Apple," he said. "I don't know what's really in it for them."

Apple has long preferred closed, proprietary systems, which lock customers into using Apple hardware and software.

Music bought from the Apple's iTunes online music store, for example, will not play on music players other than Apple's iPod.

"Apple feel that by having a closed system they can have better products," said Mr Munster. "Their perspective is they can have a lot tighter experience if they control it and keep variability out of it."

Cisco filed a lawsuit seeking to block the computer maker from using the name iPhone shortly after Steve Jobs, Apple's co-founder and chief executive, unveiled the mobile handset at a January trade show.

Cisco, the world's biggest maker of data networking equipment, had earlier begun marketing its own line of iPhone internet telephones with the trademark it acquired seven years ago.

The iPhone settlement came weeks after Apple settled a long-running trademark dispute over the use of the Apple name with Apple Corp, the Beatles' record label.

It comes as Apple faces growing pressure to open iTunes by stripping out digital rights management software that limits the ability of music downloaded from the online store to play on rival music players.

Consumer rights groups and agencies in Denmark, Finland, France, Germany, Norway, the Netherlands and Sweden have filed complaints in recent months seeking to remove the software limitations.

Apple's shares fell fractionally yesterday to $89.17 by mid-day. Cisco's shares slipped 0.2 per cent to $27.33.

South Korea Fines Four Refiners For Price-Fixing (WSJ)

By Kyong-Ae Choi

Wall Street Journal, February 23, 2007

SEOUL, South Korea -- South Korea's antitrust regulator said it fined four domestic refiners a combined 52.6 billion won ($56.1 million) for colluding to fix the prices of light-oil products in 2004.

The country's top four refiners -- SK Corp., GS Caltex Corp., S-Oil Corp. and Hyundai Oilbank Corp. -- colluded to coordinate the prices of light-oil products diesel, gasoline and kerosene from April 1 to June 10, 2004, according to the Korea Fair Trade Commission.

"The collusion has incurred 240 billion won in damages to customers, which is equal to 15% of their combined sales worth 1.6 trillion won during the cited period," said Song Sang Min, a commission official.

During the 71-day period, international oil prices rose by the equivalent of 20 won a liter, but the four companies raised the prices of the three light-oil products by 40 won to 70 won a liter.

The commission said it has also filed a complaint with prosecutors for further investigation against the four refiners.

"We believe the FTC's decision today does not reflect the facts and the realities of the marketplace," said SK Corp. spokeswoman Katharine Kho. "Therefore, further administrative actions including an appeal will be carefully reviewed, so the commission's announcement today should not be considered the final judgment on this issue."

DOJ_NMG_0135637

A GS Caltex official said "we will appeal the FTC ruling because we were not involved in the collusion in 2004."

SK Corp., the country's largest refiner by capacity, was fined around 19.2 billion won, while GS Caltex was fined 16.2 billion won, Hyundai Oilbank 9.3 billion won and S-Oil 7.8 billion won.

Traverse Mountain Antitrust Suit Fails (SLT)

By Pamela Manson, The Salt Lake Tribune

Salt Lake Tribune, February 23, 2007

Allegations against home developer SunCrest don't meet criteria, judge rules

For the second time, a federal judge has thrown out a lawsuit that accuses the developer of a planned community on Traverse Mountain in Draper of antitrust violations.

U.S. District Judge Dee Benson ruled that U.S. General Inc. and DJ Investment Group failed to specify alleged conduct by developer SunCrest LLC that would be considered an antitrust violation.

"An antitrust claim requires harm to the competitive process, not simply harm to a particular competitor," Benson wrote in his Feb. 14 decision dismissing the suit.

He also wrote that Traverse Mountain does not constitute an economic market as defined in antitrust law.

SunCrest is building its community high atop Traverse Mountain, which is in an area that straddles Salt Lake and Utah counties. DJ Investment owns adjoining land and wants to build its own community with U.S. General, a construction company.

DJ Investment and U.S. General filed suit in November 2005, accusing SunCrest of conspiring with Draper city officials to shut them out of developing their land. They claimed that during secret meetings, Draper and SunCrest agreed to create protection strips that would limit access by the two companies to the DJ Investment property.

SunCrest and Draper strongly denied all of the allegations. In June 2006, U.S. District Judge Ted Stewart threw out the suit. Within days, DJ Investment and U.S. General filed a new lawsuit that made the same claims but had a more detailed argument about the alleged evidence in the case.

Advertisement

The latest suit described Traverse Mountain as unique and a market in itself.

"It is the only location along the Wasatch Front where its homes are primarily located above the winter inversion and summer smog," the suit said. "As such, many homeowners have purchased in that area solely for the purpose of escaping health hazards caused by those conditions, creating a unique market which involves only this area."

The amount of damages sought were unspecified. However, a claim letter sent to the city of Draper said DJ Investment's losses were at least $40 million.

FTC Clears AIG Acquisition Of U.S. Ports (AP)

AP, February 23, 2007

Federal Regulators Approve AIG Unit's Acquisition of U.S. Port Operations From Dubai Firm

WASHINGTON (AP) -- Federal antitrust regulators said Thursday they approved American International Group Inc.'s purchase of six U.S. port operations from Dubai Ports World.

DP World, which is owned by the government of Dubai, touched off a political firestorm over port security in early 2006 when it acquired the operations from a British firm.

The Federal Trade Commission cleared the transaction without requiring any changes to the deal.

AIG's Global Investment Group first announced it would buy DP World's U.S. port operations in December 2006. The deal stumbled earlier this month when the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey, which must consent to the sale, asked the two companies for tens of millions of dollars in cash and future infrastructure work at the Port Newark Container Terminal.

After Senators Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., and Robert Menendez, D-N.J., pressured the Port Authority, it reached a deal with AIG Feb. 16.

AIG's shares fell 35 cents to close at $69.34 on the New York Stock Exchange.

DOJ_NMG_0135638

EU Clears ProSiebenSat.1 Acquisition (AP)

AP, February 23, 2007

EU Clears Private Equity Groups to Buy German TV Network ProSiebenSat.1

BRUSSELS, Belgium (AP) -- The European Commission on Thursday cleared the sale of Germany's biggest commercial TV broadcaster ProSiebenSat.1 Media AG to a consortium controlled by private equity groups, saying it found no antitrust problems.

U.S. fund Kohlberg Kravis Roberts & Co. and British-based Permira plan to merge ProSieben with their other broadcasting asset, Dutch-Scandinavian SBS, with the aim of overtaking European industry leader RTL Group SA, which is controlled by media conglomerate Bertelsmann AG. Permira also controls British TV rights manager All3Media.

An antitrust investigation found ProSiebenSat.1 and SBS were not direct rivals and All3Media's TV content sales in Germany were negligible.

"The Commission concluded that there was no risk that the proposed transaction would allow the new entity to drive competitors out of the market or to discriminate against them," it said.

ProSieben owns the Sat.1, ProSieben, kabel eins and N24 networks in Germany and controls about 45 percent of Germany's $5 billion television advertising market.

The consortium will pay German Media Partners 3.1 billion euros ($4 billion) cash for the 50.5 percent stake in the company that it acquired in 2003 and has launched an offer to acquire the publicly traded shares.

Separately, ProSieben said Thursday that its fourth-quarter profit rose by 17 percent thanks to increased advertising, but the figure was still short of analysts' expectations.

It earned 113.4 million euros ($149.1 million) in the fourth quarter, up from 96.9 million euros a year earlier.

Analysts polled by Dow Jones Newswires had expected 122 million euros ($160 million).

Sales rose 3 percent to 657 million euros ($863.6 million), below analysts' expectations of 670 million euros ($880.7 million).

http://www.prosiebensat1.com/

Planned Merger Angers Black Farmers (JCL)

By Julie Goodman

Jackson (MS) Clarion-Ledger, February 23, 2007

Black farmers in Mississippi and around the country are bracing for a major seed company merger they say threatens to create a monopoly that will price them out of the farming business.

St. Louis-based Monsanto Co. is forging ahead with a plan to purchase Mississippi's Scott-based cottonseed company Delta and Pine Land, and a national black farmers group says its opposition to the deal has gotten lost in the mix.

"If this merger goes through, it's going to have a drastic effect on black farmers and small farmers around the country," said John Boyd Jr., president of the National Black Farmers Association.

"If this merger goes through, there is literally no competition for cottonseed, soybean seed and corn seed, genetically engineered."

The association represents 80,000 members around the country, primarily small producers, and has its biggest membership in Mississippi.

Delta and Pine Land operates the largest and longest-running private cottonseed breeding program in the world while Monsanto, one of the world's largest agricultural products companies, makes Roundup, the world's best-selling herbicide.

The deal, still awaiting U.S. Department of Justice approval, would mean a monopoly on the market, and seed prices would shoot up, Boyd said.

"It would be just like going to one supermarket and that supermarket sets the price for everything and we don't have any option but to go to that one supermarket."

Monsanto, which sells seeds and also licenses technology for insect protection and herbicide tolerance - one way farmers can help keep costs low - could not say whether prices would go up.

DOJ_NMG_0135639

"It's difficult to speculate on pricing decisions in the future, but I would say that bottom line is, we've always looked to price our technologies based on the value the technology and the seed is delivering to the farmer," said company spokesman Lee Quarles.

Monsanto broadly licenses the technologies to other cottonseed companies so farmers can access the technologies in the seed brands they prefer to plant, he said.

A portion of the money the company makes is reinvested into new technology for farmers, including cotton farmers.

Quarles said a monopoly is not in the works, pointing to other companies farmers will have access to, including Stoneville, which Monsanto currently owns and could become an independent brand if the merger goes through.

"Just as we have announced that we would have a proposed merger with Delta and Pine Land, we've also announced that we would divest of the Stoneville business if that's required by the Department of Justice."

Boyd, who raises corn, soybeans and wheat, said he has asked Congress to hold hearings on the issue, but has not yet heard back on a decision.

One farmer in Mississippi, Rodalton Hart, fears he will go out of business if the merger goes through.

"You ain't got no control over it and with the cost of fertilizer and chemicals and everything that goes in to it, ain't no way anybody can survive," said Hart, 56, a cotton farmer in Lexington with 1,500 acres.

"They can go up as high as they want to go and you ain't got no control over it. It's just like the airlines. You can't control it," he said.

"You have to pay labor; you have to pay rent; you got to pay for seeds and chemicals ... equipment. It just goes on and on and on. I mean, everything comes out of the farmer's pocket."

The stakes are already high in farming, Hart said.

"Farming is risky. You're already on the edge. You're already on the verge ... Ain't no way you can survive," he said.

"Unless the government steps in and regulates the prices, we're just messed up."

Esmark: Deal For Weirton Is Dead (AP)

By Vicki Smith

AP, February 23, 2007

CHARLESTON, W.Va. - A deal to sell the Weirton division of Mittal Steel Co. to Illinois-based Esmark Inc. is dead, Esmark President Craig Bouchard told The Associated Press on Thursday.

To comply with a federal Justice Department decree, Mittal was ordered this week to sell its Sparrows Point mill in Maryland instead of the former Weirton Steel, across the Ohio River from Steubenville, Ohio, where workers had volunteered to be sold and where Esmark had already made an offer.

The government said selling the mill near Baltimore was the best way to prevent a monopoly on the eastern U.S. market for tin-plated steel. The decree did not prevent Mittal from making a separate deal to shed Weirton, but Bouchard said the company told him Wednesday night that it would keep the West Virginia operations for now.

"As of right now, our deal with Mittal for Weirton is dead," he said.

Mittal spokesman William Steers said a January memorandum of understanding with Esmark is no longer valid because it was conditioned on the Justice Department's acceptance of the sale as a remedy to the antitrust concerns.

"At this point in time, we're focused on developing a global packaging strategy, and Weirton will be part of that," Steers said. "We want to focus on seeing whether we can improve its profitability, retain that business and develop its prospects."

The 1,250-member Independent Steelworkers Union said it has been assured Mittal "remains committed" to keeping a mill in West Virginia.

"The ISU leadership will continue to explore all ideas and strategies that will benefit the union membership," said spokesman Dave Gossett. "The men and women of Weirton are survivors and the steel business, with the cooperation of Mittal Steel USA, will remain alive and well in Weirton."

DOJ_NMG_0135640

Justice officials had initially ordered Netherlands-based Mittal to try to sell Dofasco Inc. of Canada to settle antitrust issues surrounding its merger with Luxembourg's Arcelor SA. But the Dutch trust that controls Dofasco rejected a plan to sell it to ThyssenKrupp AG of Germany.

That left Mittal with the choice of selling one of its two U.S. assets in the tin market, Sparrows Point or Weirton.

Justice ruled that Sparrows Point is "a profitable and diversified facility" with its own in-house supply of slab steel, while Weirton would have to develop new sources of slab after separating from Mittal.

Esmark, a steel supplier that has acquired 10 companies since its founding in 2003, is now looking at a possible deal for Sparrows Point, Bouchard said. Though the United Steelworkers has said it will fight any sale that is not in the best interest of its members, the union has a long-standing relationship with Esmark CEO James Bouchard.

The USW backed Esmark last fall when it led a successful proxy fight to seize control of Wheeling Pittsburgh Corp., rejecting the former management team's plan to merge with a Brazilian steelmaker.

The USW has the right to reject a potential change in ownership. However, the union cannot appeal the Justice Department ruling on behalf of its 2,100 union workers at Sparrows Point.

Mittal must sell the Maryland plant by May 21 or an appointed trustee will arrange a deal. That deadline could be extended by up to 60 days.

Mittal's $33 billion merger with Arcelor, which would create the world's largest steel company, cannot proceed without the sale of Sparrows Point.

Chief Financial Officer Aditya Mittal said this week he was disappointed he could not sell Weirton. So were the Bouchards, who set their sights on Weirton within hours of winning the battle for Wheeling-Pitt.

The independent union at Weirton wanted their mill to be sold because it had failed to thrive under Mittal's ownership, and Esmark saw the two West Virginia companies as a logical fit.

After years of deep losses, Weirton Steel filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy in May 2003 and was sold twice in 18 months, first to International Steel Group, then to Mittal. Almost immediately, Mittal shut down the blast furnace, stopping the production of raw steel and cutting more than 800 jobs.

Gov. Joe Manchin remains hopeful that Esmark and Mittal will continue to discuss a possible deal, spokeswoman Lara Ramsburg said.

Esmark is a leader in the consolidation of U.S. steel service centers and is aiming to dominate the Midwest market for steel by buying up distribution companies, steelmakers and finishing facilities.

It buys more than 750,000 tons of steel products every year and can produce more than 350,000 tons of electrogalvanized steel annually.

Microsoft Hit With $1.52 Billion Verdict In MP3 Suit (WSJ)

By Robert A. Guth And Nick Wingfield

The Wall Street Journal, February 23, 2007

A federal jury ordered Microsoft Corp. to pay $1.52 billion to Alcatel-Lucent SA for infringing patents on a fundamental technology for digital music.

The decision found that Microsoft's Windows Media software had infringed two patents related to MP3, a software technology for recording and playing digital audio.

The patent verdict, one of the largest on record, could have broad repercussions because of the widespread use of the MP3 audio format in technology and electronics products. Devices that employ the technology include Apple Inc.'s iPod, software from Macromedia and Internet services from Yahoo Inc.

Daniel Harris, an intellectual-property attorney at Clifford Chance in Washington, D.C., said the decision "has great consequence for the industry as a whole, not to mention every company that implements MP3 technology."

The decision came from the U.S. District Court in San Diego. The battle began with a 2003 lawsuit filed by Lucent Technologies Inc., which was bought last year by Alcatel. The complaint alleged that Microsoft customers Dell Inc. and Gateway

DOJ_NMG_0135641

Inc. infringed 15 patents related to the MP3 technology for encoding and decoding audio files. Those companies sell personal computers that include Microsoft's player technology, which uses MP3.

'Declaratory Action'

Development of MP3 technology was led by engineers at Bell Laboratories and Fraunhofer Institute in Germany, drawing on patents Bell held on methods for compressing data. (Bell Labs later became a part of Lucent). Microsoft said it paid Fraunhofer $16 million to license the technology.

In April 2003, Microsoft joined the case through a "declaratory action," a suit against Lucent that asked for a ruling that Microsoft and its customers didn't infringe any claims and that the patents Lucent asserted weren't valid. The patents are being reviewed in six separate jury trials in San Diego. The decision yesterday was the first.

Tom Burt, Microsoft's deputy general counsel said the verdict is "completely unsupported by the law or the facts." He said Microsoft will respond by asking the court for relief to set aside all or some of this verdict. "If we don't get relief from the trial court then we will definitely appeal this verdict," Mr. Burt said.

• The News: A jury ordered Microsoft to pay $1.52 billion to Alcatel-Lucent for infringing patents on the MP3 format widely used for digital audio.

• The Background: Inventors of the MP3 format include Fraunhofer and Bell Laboratories, whose patents are now owned by Alcatel-Lucent.

• What's Next: Microsoft hopes to get the ruling overturned by the trial judge or an appeals court; Alcatel-Lucent could sue others using the technology.

Joan Campion, a spokeswoman for Alcatel-Lucent, said, "We have made strong arguments supporting our view and we are pleased with the court's decision."

Mr. Harris, the attorney with Clifford Chance, said the case is "long from being over" given the likelihood of a Microsoft appeal. He said 40% to 50% of patent verdicts are reversed on appeal. Mr. Harris predicts Alcatel will wait until its battle with Microsoft is done before taking action against other companies in the market.

Format Is Lingua Franca

"It wouldn't make sense to start suing everyone else until this case is resolved on the merits," he said. Alcatel's Ms. Campion declined to comment on whether Alcatel intends to pursue licensing talks with or litigation against other technology companies in the digital-audio market.

The jury verdict involves an audio format that has become the lingua franca of music in the digital era, used in products from iPods to car stereos to videogame consoles. MP3 -- the shorthand term for Moving Picture Experts Group 1 Audio Layer 3 -- is a technology for converting audio into digital form and compressing it into a file size that makes it easier to transmit over data networks.

In the late 1990s, MP3s became almost synonymous with pirated music because the format's broad support in music-playback software on PCs made it the choice for the original Napster, a song-sharing network that teemed with illicit copies of music.

The format remains widely supported in software and electronics products today such as the iPod, though Apple sells music in a different format that comes with technology to limit copying. French electronics company Thomson SA handles the licensing of MP3 patents on behalf of the Fraunhofer Institute of Germany.

Microsoft's Mr. Burt argued Alcatel-Lucent was "laying in the weeds" -- while Fraunhofer licensed and the MP3 industry developed -- before jumping in to assert its patents. "Lucent has been asserting these patents against the computer industry since the 1990s," said John Desmarais at the law firm Kirkland & Ellis LLP, which is representing Alcatel-Lucent in the case.

Several patent lawyers said the damages were some of the largest awarded in a patent case. The damages were calculated based on the average selling price of Windows PCs that were shipped world-wide between mid-2003 and 2005. Microsoft's Mr. Burt, meanwhile, argued the damages were "outrageous" given that Microsoft paid just $16 million to Fraunhofer to license the MP3 patents.

Write to Robert A. Guth at rob.guth@wsj.com4 and Nick Wingfield at nick.wingfield@wsj.com5

DOJ_NMG_0135642

MP3 Patents In Upheaval After Verdict (NYT)

By Saul Hansell

The New York Times, February 23, 2007

Microsoft was ordered by a federal jury yesterday to pay $1.52 billion in a patent dispute over the MP3 format, the technology at the heart of the digital music boom. If upheld on appeal, it would be the largest patent judgment on record.

The ruling, in Federal District Court in San Diego, was a victory for Alcatel-Lucent, the big networking equipment company. Its forebears include Bell Laboratories, which was involved in the development of MP3 almost two decades ago.

At issue is the way the Windows Media Player software from Microsoft plays audio files using MP3, the most common method of distributing music on the Internet. If the ruling stands, Apple and hundreds of other companies that make products that play MP3 files, including portable players, computers and software, could also face demands to pay royalties to Alcatel.

Microsoft and others have licensed MP3 — not from Alcatel-Lucent, but from a consortium led by the Fraunhofer Institute, a large German research organization that was involved, along with the French electronics company Thomson and Bell Labs, in the format's development.

The current case turns on two patents that Alcatel claims were developed by Bell Labs before it joined with Fraunhofer to develop MP3.

"Intellectual property is a core asset of the company," said Joan Campion, a spokeswoman for Alcatel-Lucent. "We will continue to protect and defend that asset."

Thomas W. Burt, the deputy general counsel of Microsoft, said the company would most likely petition the judge in the San Diego case, Rudi M. Brewster, to set aside or reduce the judgment. If she does not, Microsoft will probably take the case to the federal appeals court in Washington, which hears patent cases.

Microsoft argued that one patent in question did not apply to its MP3 software and that the other was included in the Fraunhofer software that it paid to license.

Moreover, it argued that the damages sought by Alcatel were unreasonably high, pointing out that it paid Thomson, which represented the consortium in its dealings over the patent, a flat $16 million fee for the rights to the MP3 software.

"We think this is just plain wrong," Mr. Burt said. "They told the jury to measure damages, not on the value to Microsoft of one of the 10,000 features in Windows, but on the value of the entire computer."

Alcatel argued that the damages should be based on a royalty of 0.5 percent of the total value of Windows computers sold.

John M. Desmarais, a partner with Kirkland & Ellis who represented Alcatel, said the proposed damages were consistent with patent law. He said it was not appropriate to compare them with the $16 million Microsoft paid Thomson because the rights to the Bell Labs patents were far more valuable.

"It's like going to the supermarket and paying $1 for a bar of soap," he said. "That lets you use the soap. We were offering the equivalent of the right to make soap any way they wanted."

The jury supported Alcatel's arguments on every count except one. It deadlocked on the question of whether Microsoft willfully infringed on the Bell Labs patents. If the jury had found that it did, Microsoft would have had to pay triple damages.

"Microsoft has been and to some degree continues to be at a competitive disadvantage, as it did not file for patents for many, many, many years," said Jack Russo, a patent lawyer with Russo & Hale in Palo Alto, Calif.

That makes it harder, he said, to work out deals with other large companies in which they exchange the rights to each other's patents.

Large companies like AT&T and I.B.M. "have huge patent portfolios and that represents large and unpredictable risks for companies like Microsoft," he said.

The judgment is part of litigation by Alcatel to enforce claims related to Bell Labs patents. The case was initially brought against Dell and Gateway, which make computers using Microsoft software. Other trials are pending for technology related to speech recognition, user interfaces and video processing.

Microsoft has countered with a claim, filed with the International Trade Commission, that Alcatel is violating its patents related to messaging technology.

DOJ_NMG_0135643

The largest award for a patent infringement case to date was the $909 million that Kodak was ordered to pay in 1990 to Polaroid for violating patents related to instant cameras. That case also forced Kodak to exit the instant photography market and recall its cameras.

Mr. Burt said the appeals process might take another year or two. He said he did not expect that the courts would force Microsoft to remove the MP3 functions from Windows.

Ms. Campion of Alcatel declined to comment on whether that company would pursue similar claims against makers of MP3 players, like Apple.

An Apple spokesman declined to comment. A Thomson spokesman did not return calls or e-mail messages requesting comment.

If the judgment is affirmed, the damages payment would make only a modest dent in Microsoft's cash hoard, which totaled almost $29 billion at the end of last year.

News of the ruling surfaced just before the regular close. Microsoft's shares closed at $29.39, up 4 cents, and fell 11 cents after hours.

Alcatel-Lucent American depository receipts, each representing one ordinary share, rose 7 cents, to $13.14, in regular trading, and 34 cents after hours.

Microsoft Ordered To Pay $1.5B To Alcatel (USAT)

By Jon Swartz

USA Today, February 23, 2007

SAN FRANCISCO — A federal jury Thursday ruled Microsoft must pay $1.5 billion in patent-infringement damages to telecom equipment maker Alcatel-Lucent in what patent attorneys call one of the biggest judgments ever.

Microsoft says the patents involve converting audio into digital MP3 files on PCs. It plans to appeal.

The news came before markets closed. Shares of Microsoft closed 4 cents higher at $29.39 on Thursday. Alcatel-Lucent's U.S. shares were up 7 cents to $13.14.

"This verdict is completely unsupported by the law or facts," Tom Burt, Microsoft's deputy general counsel, said in a phone interview.

In 2002 and 2003, Lucent, which was acquired by Alcatel last year, filed 15 patent claims against computer makers Gateway and Dell. Microsoft sued Lucent over the claims and was countersued by Lucent. A judge has tossed out two of Lucent's claims and set six trials to consider the remaining patent disputes.

Microsoft says it properly licensed the MP3 technology from Fraunhofer-Gesellschaft, a German research company, for $16 million, in 1997 and 2004.

"We are concerned that this decision opens the door for Alcatel-Lucent to pursue action against hundreds of other companies who purchased the rights to use MP3 technology from Fraunhofer, the industry-recognized rightful licensor," Burt said in an earlier statement.

"We made strong arguments supporting our view, and we are pleased with the court's decision," said Alcatel-Lucent spokeswoman Joan Campion. She declined to discuss details of the decision.

The software giant, meanwhile, says damages were determined by multiplying Windows sales and average PC sales prices worldwide since May 2003.

The same federal court in San Diego will consider the next of the patent lawsuits, this time covering speech coding, in March and April, Microsoft said. Also at issue is video coding on both Microsoft's Xbox video game console and the Windows interface.

"This case could bode ill for the other five patent cases still in the pipeline," says Charles King, principal analyst at Pund-IT.

While the verdict is a public-relations blow to Microsoft, it isn't necessarily a financial one, patent attorneys and software analysts say.

Large jury verdicts on patent-infringement cases are typically appealed, and damages can be reduced significantly or reversed, says Jeff Berkowitz, a software-patent attorney.

DOJ_NMG_0135644

"This thing is far from over," says analyst Matt Rosoff of Directions on Microsoft. He notes Microsoft successfully appealed a $521 million patent-infringement award in 2003 for Eolas Technologies, which developed a Web-browser patent. The case is still in court.

Microsoft Loses Big In MP3 Patent Suit (WP)

By Alan Sipress

The Washington Post, February 23, 2007

A federal jury in San Diego yesterday ordered Microsoft to pay $1.52 billion to Alcatel-Lucent for violating two patents for a technology used by hundreds of companies that allows users to play digital music on computers, cellphones and other portable devices.

The judgment, which lawyers from both sides called the largest patent award ever, raised the prospect that scores of other companies could now be financially liable for using the popular MP3 format.

"Any of the companies that have licensed and implemented that technology have to have great concern about this verdict," said Thomas W. Burt, a Microsoft vice president and deputy general counsel.

Alcatel-Lucent argued that it held the rights to the technology because it was developed at Bell Laboratories, which later became part of Lucent. Alcatel bought Lucent last year. The company successfully argued that Microsoft infringed on the patents by including the digital music technology in its Windows operating system starting in 1998. The same technology later was used in Microsoft's Windows Media Player and is included in the Windows Vista operating system, which was released to the public last month.

Microsoft countered that it had properly licensed the technology from Germany's Fraunhofer Institute, which was involved with Bell Labs in developing aspects of the MP3 format. Only after Microsoft and other companies made licensing agreements with Fraunhofer did Alcatel-Lucent raise its claim, Microsoft argued.

"As a result of the verdict today, the jury determined the patents were developed by Bell Labs and not in conjunction" with Fraunhofer, said Joan Campion, a spokeswoman for Alcatel-Lucent. "We've made strong arguments supporting our view and we are pleased by the court's decision."

Alcatel-Lucent said it would ask for a larger judgment against Microsoft. The $1.52 billion in damages was determined by calculating 0.5 percent of all sales of computers equipped with Windows and lacking the proper licensing from mid-2003 through 2005. John Desmarais, Alcatel-Lucent's lead trial lawyer, said the company would ask that 2006 sales be included.

Burt said Microsoft not only would appeal the jury's findings of patent infringement but also would challenge the amount of the damages. He said it was improper to calculate damages based on the value of computer sales rather than the lesser value of sales of the Windows operating system. He also said that the jury improperly included overseas sales of computers in the calculations.

The issue of whether U.S. patent law can be extended to products made abroad figured prominently this week in arguments before the U.S. Supreme Court in a separate case pitting Microsoft against AT&T.

The verdict yesterday came in one of several patent lawsuits that Alcatel-Lucent brought against Microsoft. Others involve video-file, color graphics and computer interface technologies. Several billion dollars of additional damages could ride on the outcome of these suits, lawyers said.

The judgment surprised industry experts, who said they had not been following the case closely.

"Most of us thought this was going to go bye-bye," technology analyst Rob Enderle said. He said he expected Alcatel-Lucent to approach other companies using MP3 technology and use the verdict "like a club" to collect fees.

About 400 companies have similar licensing agreements with Fraunhofer, according to Thomson Technology, a San Diego company that identifies itself as the "licensing representative of MP3 patents and software of the Fraunhofer Institute." Those companies include Apple, Creative Technology, Real Networks, Palm and Samsung.

Alcatel-Lucent and its lawyers would not say whether they plan to target more companies, but Desmarais signaled that others using the audio-file technology could be vulnerable.

"For anyone who implements the standard, the same arguments would apply," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0135645

Staff writer Mike Musgrove contributed to this report.

Microsoft Hit By $1.5bn Award (FT)

By Richard Waters

Financial Times, February 23, 2007

Microsoft has been hit with a $1.52bn patent infringement award, one of the biggest on record, in a case that it warned would have sweeping implications for many technology companies involved in digital music.

The award was won on Thursday by Alcatel-Lucent after a jury in a US district court in San Diego agreed with its claim that the software giant had infringed two of its patents.

The dispute surrounded Microsoft's use of MP3 technology, a format for encoding and compressing digital music so that it can be transmitted over the internet.

Tom Burt, Microsoft's deputy general counsel, rejected the verdict as "completely unsupported by the law or the facts", and predicted the ruling would have implications for "hundreds of other companies who have licensed MP3 technology".

An Alcatel-Lucent spokesperson said there were no other lawsuits outstanding over the technology.

The large size of the award highlights the scale of the risk to Microsoft as it faces a series of other wide-ranging legal disputes with Alcatel-Lucent over some of the fundamental technology used in PCs and related devices.

Thursday's verdict, stemming from the use of audio coding technology in PCs, was the first of five due to be heard by the San Diego court in the coming months. The others relate to speech coding technology in Windows; user interface patents; technology in the Xbox games console; and video coding in other Microsoft software.

Given Microsoft's dominance of the desktop computing market, the potential losses are considerable. Thursday's award was calculated based on the number of Windows operating systems sold since May 2003, multiplied by the average selling price of a range of PCs.

Microsoft argued that it had licensed the necessary technology to use the MP3 format in its software from Fraunhofer Society, a German research concern, which was involved in the development of the format.

It paid just $16m for the privilege, but Mr Burt claimed it was "the industry-recognised rightful licensor".

Jury Finds Against Microsoft In $1.5 Billion Patent Dispute With Alcatel-Lucent (AP)

By Jessica Mintz, The Associated Press

AP, February 23, 2007

Microsoft Corp. must pay $1.5 billion in damages to telecommunications equipment maker Alcatel-Lucent SA for violating two patents related to digital music, a federal jury ruled Thursday.

The Redmond, Wash.-based software company said the patents in question govern the conversion of audio into the digital MP3 file format on personal computers.

In 2003, Lucent Technologies Inc., which last year was acquired by Alcatel, filed 15 patent claims against Gateway Inc. and Dell Inc. In April 2003, Microsoft added itself to the list of defendants, saying the patents were closely tied to its Windows operating system. The PC makers are still defendants.

Microsoft said a judge threw out two of the 2003 patent claims, and scheduled six separate trials to consider the remaining disputes. The case that was just decided went to trial in San Diego on Jan. 29.

"We think this verdict is completely unsupported by the law or the facts," said Tom Burt, a Microsoft deputy general counsel.

Microsoft disputed that Paris-based Alcatel-Lucent's patents govern its MP3 encoding and decoding tools, and said it licenses the MP3 software used by its Windows Media Player from Fraunhofer-Gesellschaft, a German company.

"We believe that we properly licensed MP3 technology from its industry recognized licenser -- Fraunhofer. The damages award seems particularly outrageous when you consider we paid Fraunhofer only $16 million to license this technology."

Microsoft said the damages were calculated by multiplying Windows sales volumes and PC sales prices worldwide since May 2003.

"We've made strong arguments supporting our view, and we are pleased with the court's decision," Alcatel-Lucent spokeswoman Mary Lou Ambrus said.

The court will consider the next of the patent suits, which relates to speech coding, in March or April, Microsoft said. Other areas in dispute include video coding on Microsoft's Xbox game console and Windows' user interface.

Shares of Microsoft slipped 3 cents to close at $29.32 on the Nasdaq Stock Market. Alcatel-Lucent's stock added 10 cents to end the day at $13.17 on the New York Stock Exchange.

ENVIRONMENT:

Bush Talks Energy (HDD)

By Reggie Ponder

Henderson Daily Dispatch, February 23, 2007

FRANKLINTON - President George W. Bush promoted a major reduction in gasoline use during a visit Thursday to a Franklinton biotechnology facility doing cutting-edge research in the production of ethanol, one of the fuels at the heart of the plan.

Against a backdrop that read "Innovation Leads to Energy Security" and ?0 in 10," Bush told an audience at the Novozymes facility outside Franklinton Thursday that the company's role in ethanol production was a key to American energy independence.

The 20 in 10 initiative is a new Bush administration goal to reduce gasoline consumption in America by 20 percent over the next 10 years.

Bush said ethanol would allow Americans to be "better stewards of the environment" while reducing dependence on foreign oil.

Novozymes, which employs some 435 people in North Carolina, is not directly involved in ethanol manufacturing, but is developing an enzyme technology that the company says will enable manufacturers to produce ethanol from a wide variety of materials, including wood chips and switch grass, in a cost-effective manner.

Bush also plugged free trade by pointing out that Novozymes, a Danish firm, was providing good jobs for people in North Carolina as well as helping the country with renewable energy. He said that as he toured the Franklinton facility and spoke to employees he learned that "a lot of people have been here 20-plus years."

He said it was an example of how free trade could be good for the American economy.

"There are interests that we have in free and fair trade," he said.

The president acknowledged the presence of Democratic Rep. G.K. Butterfield, who represents North Carolina's District 1.

"He's from a neighboring district but he has enough interest in making sure that we succeed in alternative energy that he's here today," Bush said.

Bush heralded the Novozymes technology, and the ethanol industry generally, as a centerpiece of the plan for energy independence and also as a way to stimulate America's rural economy.

"I know it sounds like a pipe dream to some - there goes the optimistic president talking again," he said.

But he said he had experts on hand to back him up.

Those experts included Kevin Wenger, research and development manager with Novozymes; Mike Pacheco, director of the Bioenergy Center of the National Renewable Energy laboratory; Ratna Sharma, assistant professor of bioprocess engineering at N.C. State University; Ryan Adolphson, director of the Biomass Pilot Program at the University of Georgia; and Terry Ruse, chief operating officer of Agri-Ethanol Products.

"We've got PhDs surrounding the president," Bush said. "We've got a lot of brainpower."

Cutting-edge research is being done by Novozymes, he said.

"They are developing technologies that will enable us to convert wood chips into fuels that will run our automobiles," he said, adding that it was a proper use of taxpayer money to support research into innovative energy technologies.

Bush also briefly mentioned the importance of clean coal technology and nuclear power.

But ethanol- and battery-powered cars may be the most important of all, he said. "If you really want to reduce dependence on foreign oil, what you've really got to do is change gasoline usage in the United States."

DOJ_NMG_0135647

Bush said Americans were now consuming seven billion gallons of ethanol a year made from corn. A lot of hog growers in North Carolina and around the country, and cattle producers in Texas and elsewhere, are worried about the effect of corn prices on their livelihood, he said.

He said making ethanol from wood chips and other materials would allow Americans to become less dependent on foreign oil "without breaking your hog raisers," though he acknowledged that "corn farmers happen to like" higher corn prices.

The push for energy independence combines national security concerns, energy security concerns, and environmental concerns, he said. "All these three concerns come together with technology as the solution,"

Bush acknowledged that a 20 percent reduction in gasoline consumption over the next 10 years was a challenge, but he was optimistic.

"I think it's possible to do it," he said.

The key, though, is to make ethanol more affordable, and the new technology can help with that, he said.

"Somebody's not going to fill up their car with ethanol if it costs a lot more than gasoline," Bush said.

Agri-Ethanol's Ruse said the company was developing a plant in Aurora, with plans to gradually move into the wood chip conversion technology. He said it could provide a very good market for pulpwood growers.

"The role of the government is to stimulate thought and investment and to set goals," Bush said. "I want to thank those of you who are on the front line of change."

Butterfield, who has been critical of much of the president's domestic agenda and foreign policy, said during a visit to Henderson Tuesday that he appreciated Bush's commitment to biofuels.

"I believe the president is serious about this," Butterfield said.

He said that in addition to its role in energy security, ethanol was a potential boost for America's rural economy. Butterfield said that was important to him as a representative of a largely rural district in eastern North Carolina.

Thursday's presidential visit indicates the importance of ethanol for America, Butterfield said, adding he hoped it would mark the beginning of a long-term commitment to biofuels.

At Novozymes Thursday, Butterfield said he was excited about the potential for the new ethanol technology to create manufacturing jobs in rural America.

How many jobs?

"Your imagination can just go wild," he said.

Bush Stresses Fuel Technology (WP)

By Michael A. Fletcher

Washington Post, February 23, 2007

FRANKLINTON, N.C., Feb. 22 -- President Bush touted his plan Thursday to reduce the projected consumption of gasoline by 20 percent over the next decade, predicting that alternative fuels such as ethanol made from wood chips and switch grass will play a major role in powering the country's automobiles.

Bush said the goal, which he outlined last month in his State of the Union address, is vital to the nation's future. "We are on the verge of breakthroughs to allow a pile of wood chips to become the raw materials for fuels that'll run your car," Bush said during a visit to a plant here that makes enzymes critical to ethanol production.

Using more alternative fuels not only will be good for the environment, Bush said, but also will reduce the nation's dependence on oil from unfriendly nations and insulate the U.S. economy from the shocks caused by sudden increases in oil prices.

Bush wants the country to be using 35 billion gallons of renewable fuels annually by 2017, and he would like to raise mileage standards for automobiles -- efforts that he said would allow the nation to meet his goal for gasoline consumption.

"I know it sounds like a pipe dream to some," Bush said, adding that the technology for increasing ethanol production is at hand. He said ethanol will be powering many of the nation's cars in the near future.

DOJ_NMG_0135648

Almost all of the 6 billion to 7 billion gallons of ethanol used annually in the country is produced from corn. While corn-based ethanol is becoming common, particularly in parts of the Midwest, it is causing corn prices to increase, affecting industries as diverse as tortilla production and hog farming.

Because of the fast-rising demand for corn, Bush said, the nation will soon have to rely on ethanol made from switch grass, wood chips and agricultural waste to produce a larger share of ethanol.

Before chairing a panel discussion on ethanol, Bush toured a plant run by Novozymes North America, which makes enzymes crucial to making corn-based ethanol. The company is researching ways to make the fuel from other materials. Bush said Novozymes received a federal grant that helped it develop processes that have dramatically reduced the price of enzymes used to make ethanol.

Wearing a white lab coat and safety glasses, Bush was led through a laboratory where researchers are developing enzymes. He also was taken to a production facility where the raw materials used for ethanol are fermented in vats. Bush peppered researchers with questions about potential bottlenecks in the production of cellulosic ethanol and seemed satisfied that the problems that remain will be ironed out.

At one point, Bush hoisted a beaker of the clear ethanol and joked, "I quit drinking in '86."

Bush's energy proposal is among the few items in his domestic agenda likely to receive support from Democrats in Congress. Although Bush has not submitted specific legislation, White House officials have said that they hope the principles he has laid out will guide lawmakers when they consider energy policy.

Bush Pushes His Energy Initiative At North Carolina Biofuel Plant (MCT)

By Barbara Barrett

McClatchy Newspapers, February 23, 2007

FRANKLINTON, N.C. - Enzymes culled from the microbial soups of the earth were mixed with plant scraps inside a laboratory here, fermented into a sugary liquid, dumped into a beaker and presented Thursday morning to the presidential nose.

"Would you like to smell it?" asked Novozymes laboratory technician Erin Quattrini.

President Bush, clad in a white lab coat and safety glasses, leaned over for a sniff. This, to his way of thinking, is the scent of progress.

Bush came to Novozymes in Franklinton on Thursday to tout his "20 in 10" proposal to reduce Americans' gasoline usage by 20 percent over the next decade. Landing amid a rotor wash of mowed corn stalks in a field on company property, he toured labs, posed for pictures with workers and led a panel discussion with scientists about new kinds of ethanol.

For Bush, it was another step in his tour across the country to pitch the priorities he outlined in his State of the Union address in January.

For Franklinton, the visit was a very big deal. Novozymes' CEO flew over from Denmark. The mayor was there, along with county commissioners. Sen. Richard Burr, R-N.C., Rep. G.K. Butterfield, D-N.C., and North Carolina Agriculture Commissioner Steve Troxler showed up. Signs around town welcomed the president, and a quartet of children on a nearby road manned a candy stand, hoping Bush might stop by for a $1 Snickers.

Alas, he arrived by helicopter.

Novozymes has become a leading supplier of the enzymes that help the United States create about 7 billion gallons a year of ethanol out of corn kernels.

But ethanol is pushing up corn prices, so Novozymes has created an enzyme cocktail that it says will significantly reduce the costs to mass-produce cellulosic ethanol, which is derived from tougher plant matters such as sawgrasses and wood chips. The ethanol can be blended with gasoline to run vehicles.

In the Novozymes laboratory, Bush moved from room to room to hear the process of how enzymes can be found, selected and converted. A man showed Bush a bottle of liquid in a glass bottle.

"Senator, don't drink this!" Bush hollered over his shoulder to Burr.

"I quit drinking in `86," Bush added. He would mention the date twice more in his tour through what is, essentially, a giant fermentation operation with the faint aroma of a brewery.

DOJ_NMG_0135649

In a room of two-gallon containers holding liquid the color of amber beer, Bush picked up a jar of straw to show off to the crush of journalists tagging along.

"Straw!" he proclaimed. Cameras clicked and whirred.

"Someday, you're going to be using this in your car," he said.

He picked up another jar. "Spruce chips!" He picked up yet another vessel, this one containing clear ethanol, and took another sniff.

Bush has called for increases in funding for research on alternative fuels. His administration's farm bill proposal includes $2 billion for loans for plants producing cellulosic ethanol.

Bush also has called for modernizing the mileage requirements for cars and trucks. Outside the plant, Bush checked out a Formula One race car that runs on ethanol.

"It may be hard for you to believe," he said. "It may be hard for Americans to believe, but someday we'll be taking piles of woodchips and, using technology developed here, develop fuel for automobiles. And when that happens, that'll make us less dependent on foreign oil and better stewards of the environment."

Bush Makes A Pitch For Amber Waves Of Homegrown Fuel (NYT)

By Edmund L. Andrews

New York Times, February 23, 2007

FRANKLINTON, N.C., Feb. 22 — President Bush put on a white coat and visited a laboratory here Thursday to promote his goals for making alternative fuels from switch grass, woodchips and other plant waste.

After touring the laboratory, which is developing enzymes to make cellulosic ethanol, fuel distilled from plant byproducts, Mr. Bush spoke buoyantly about new technologies that may reduce the nation's thirst for foreign oil.

"Doesn't it make sense to be able to say to our farmers, grow what you can grow so we become less dependent on oil?" the president told an audience at Novozymes North America, the subsidiary of a Danish technology company. "I like the idea of a president being able to say, wow, the crop report is in, we're growing more corn than ever before, which means we're importing less oil from overseas."

After listening to company executives describe the role of enzymes in reducing the cost of ethanol, Mr. Bush jumped in to ask a layman's question: "So is this like a distillery?"

The trip is the latest event this week in which Mr. Bush has stepped away from grim questions about the war in Iraq to focus on domestic themes like energy and health care.

He has called for reducing the nation's projected gasoline consumption by 20 percent over the next 10 years, and he has proposed a mandatory, fivefold increase in the production of gasoline alternatives to about 35 billion gallons a year by 2017.

Corn-based ethanol is the primary substitute for gasoline, and output is about seven billion gallons a year. But industry experts and administration officials estimate that corn-based ethanol can at most supply only half the alternative fuel Mr. Bush has proposed.

The future, many experts say, lies in cellulosic ethanol, but it remains in the development stage, and is competing for research money with technologies like biodiesel fuel, hydrogen fuel cells and liquefied coal. The largest cellulosic ethanol plant is a demonstration-scale facility in Canada built by the Ontario-based logen Corporation, which produces about one million gallons a year.

A commercial-scale factory would need an annual capacity of 40 million gallons or more, said Robert Dineen, president of the Renewable Fuels Association, which represents ethanol producers.

The president has proposed significant increases in spending for alternative energy development, including about $50 million a year for bioenergy research, $15 million a year for grants on biomass projects and about $2.1 billion in loan guarantees for companies building cellulosic ethanol plants.

But Democrats in Congress have criticized Mr. Bush for spending far more money on coal-based technologies and nuclear power.

DOJ_NMG_0135650

In his budget, Mr. Bush proposed spending $863 million on programs related to fossil fuels, a 33 percent increase over his request for 2007. That increase included more than $500 million for various forms of "clean-coal" technology.

Mr. Bush has also proposed spending $875 million for nuclear energy research and development, an increase of 38 percent. Of that, Mr. Bush has requested $405 million for his proposed Global Nuclear Energy Partnership, a plan to develop uranium enrichment with other countries. The administration's budget also calls for offering up to $9 billion in loan guarantees for a new generation of nuclear power plants.

Mr. Bush made almost no reference to global warming and climate change on Thursday, though his goal of reducing petroleum consumption is closely related to the reduction heat-trapping gases.

He kept his focus on the goal of energy security, and reiterated his support for more coal and nuclear power. "We've got about 250 years supply of coal in this country," he noted, adding that it "makes sense" to use it.

Some environmental groups complain about Mr. Bush's definition of alternative fuel including liquefied coal, which could produce even more heat-trapping gases than gasoline.

But the president appeared to show genuine enthusiasm for cellulosic ethanol, frequently interrupting Novozymes executives to boil down technical explanations into more simple sound bites.

At one point, Mr. Bush jumped in to explain that corn-based ethanol could not provide enough alternative fuel because ethanol demand was already outstripping supply.

"We got a lot of hog growers around the United States, and a lot of them here in North Carolina, who are beginning to feel the pinch as a result of high corn prices," he said. "The question, then, is how do you achieve your goal of less dependence on oil without breaking your farmers — without breaking your hog raisers?"

"Here's how: You develop new technologies that will enable you to make ethanol from wood chips, or stalk grass, or agricultural waste."

Bush Pushes Energy Initiative In N.C. (AP)

By Jennifer Loven, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 23, 2007

Franklinton, N.C. (AP) -- Trying to draw attention to his domestic agenda, President Bush on Thursday extolled the science of turning grasses and wood chips into ethanol to lessen the U.S. thirst for foreign oil.

"If you really want to reduce the amount of oil that you consume, you have to reduce the amount of gasoline you use," Bush said on a road trip to push energy initiatives he announced last month in his State of the Union address.

Bush has proposed ramping up the production of alternative fuels such as ethanol made from something other than corn. The president wants to require the use of 35 billion gallons a year of ethanol and other alternative fuels, such as soybean-based biodiesel, by 2017 — a fivefold increase over current requirements.

The call for sharp increases in ethanol use will get bipartisan support in Congress. But production of ethanol from corn is expected to fall far short of meeting such an increase. So Bush envisions a major speedup of research into production of "cellulosic" ethanol made from wood chips, switchgrass and other feedstocks.

Each year, the United States consumes about 7 billion gallons of ethanol, made primarily from corn. The demand for corn for agricultural uses as well as energy, however, is causing corn prices to rise.

"The problem is we've got a lot of hog growers around the United States, and a lot of them in North Carolina, who are beginning to feel the pinch as a result of high corn prices," said Bush, who participated in a panel on cellulosic ethanol at Novozymes North America Inc., which is researching enzymes to break down crops such as corn waste and spruce chips to produce ethanol.

"The question, then, is how do you achieve your goal of less dependence on oil without breaking your ... hog farmers?" Bush said. "Here's how: You develop new technologies that will enable you to make ethanol from wood chips, or stalk grass or agriculture waste."

DOJ_NMG_0135651

Bush also said that a lot of private money is being invested in new energy technologies, and the federal government is spending money to develop new battery technology that will allow motorists to drive short distances on battery power instead of gasoline.

"Someday you're going to be able to get in your car, particularly if you're a big city person, and drive 40 miles on a battery," he said. "And by the way, your car doesn't have to look like a golf cart. It could be a pickup truck.

"That technology is around the corner, and if we're able to drive the first 40 miles, or say 20 miles ... there are a lot of city folks who won't have to use a drop of gasoline on a daily basis."

Before the panel discussion, Bush toured laboratories at Novozymes. In one room, the president held up a beaker of nearly complete ethanol, sniffed it and laughed: "I quit drinking in 1986," he said.

Then he turned serious. "Someday you're going to be able to use this in your car," Bush said.

Outside, Bush was shown a blue and green stock car that runs on ethanol. He leaned down and fiddled with the wheel a couple times, but didn't climb down into the tiny driver's seat.

Bush Gets A Whiff Of Alternative Fuel (LAT)

By James Gerstenzang

The Los Angeles Times, February 23, 2007

FRANKLINTON, N.C. — President Bush, who frequently jokes about his undistinguished record as a history major at Yale, is devoting considerable time these days to matters scientific.

Four weeks ago, he toured a chemical plant in Delaware. Earlier this month he visited a Virginia computer-chip manufacturer. On Wednesday, at a hospital in Tennessee, he watched a video of a surgical robot excising cancerous tissue, prompting his host to ask, "You OK with the blood?"

And Thursday, he studied what it would take to put cellulosic ethanol in your fuel tank. It's made when enzymes or bacteria break down agricultural waste, switch grass, wood chips and other forms of biomass. Scientists hope the process that turns plants into a burnable liquid can be harnessed to economically produce at least a partial substitute for fossil fuels.

The president has been talking about this technology for more than a year and has made it a centerpiece of his 2007 domestic policy agenda, built around proposals to reduce U.S. gasoline consumption by 20% in 10 years by developing renewable and alternative fuels and increasing reliance on nuclear energy.

His proposals would require drivers to use 35 billion gallons of alternative fuels by 2017, up from the current 5 billion gallons. It would be a key to trimming U.S. reliance on foreign oil, which Bush sees as a national security liability, and to reducing carbon emissions, which are released when oil products are burned and are blamed by most scientists as a factor in global warming.

"I know it sounds like a pipe dream to some — you know, there goes the optimistic president talking again," said Bush, describing himself as having been "just a history major."

But the scientists alongside him during his visit to Novozymes North America Inc. "are providing the brainpower necessary to help plants like this develop technologies that will enable us to convert wood chips into fuels that are running automobiles," he said.

Bush toured the laboratories and factory where enzymes are produced and used to quicken the transformation of plant starch into fermentable sugars, a key step in producing ethanol.

The Union of Concerned Scientists, a nonprofit organization that focuses on environmental and other issues and often disagrees with Bush, said its analysis indicated that if Bush's energy goals were met primarily by using ethanol, global warming pollution could be reduced by 160 million metric tons in 2017 — an amount it likened to taking nearly 24 million current-model cars and trucks off the roads.

In recent weeks, Bush has made stops across the country in an effort to put the media spotlight on his domestic policies — he discussed environmental issues in Shenandoah National Park in Virginia and his healthcare proposals in Tennessee, for example — instead of the increasingly unpopular war in Iraq. Here in North Carolina, he spent about an hour and a half immersed in the efforts to expand the use of biofuels.

DOJ_NMG_0135652

Specifically, Bush focused on the potential, still under development, to use enzymes to help convert such agricultural waste as cornhusks and weed-like switch grass into cellulosic ethanol, rather than increasing the demand for corn.

"The demand for corn, because of agricultural use and now energy use, is causing corn prices to go up," he said, noting that hog farmers and cattle ranchers — both of whom use corn as feedstock — were feeling the pinch. "The question is, how do you achieve your goal of less dependence on oil without breaking … the people dependent on corn?"

The answer, he said, is the technology being developed at companies like Novozymes.

On his tour of the facilities, Bush said the fermentation smell and steel vats reminded him of a distillery.

As he held up a beaker of ethanol and sniffed it, he said with a laugh, "I quit drinking in 1986" — and then added: "Someday you're going to be able to use this in your car."

Bush Visits Franklinton Biotech (RNO)

Raleigh News & Observer, February 23, 2007

President Bush arrived at Novozymes, a biotechnology company about 20 miles north of Raleigh by helicopter this morning, landing in a mowed cornfield owned by the company.

Inside the company, he donned a white lab coat with his name and the company's name and went from room to room learning about how the company works to develop biotechnology.

Outside the building, he checked out of a life-size race car powered by ethanol, then made his way to a warehouse, where he led a panel discussion about alternative fuels and his "20 in 10" plan that urges every American to reduce fuel usage by 20 percent in 10 years.

In the audience were about 200 employees and guests in the company.

Afterward, he greeted people along the rope line and then boarded his helicopter just after 1 p.m.

A Presidential Pat On The Back (DHS)

By William West

Durham Herald-Sun, February 23, 2007

DURHAM -- Forgive Durham's Jamie Lathan if he feels humbled right now.

After all, it's not everyday someone gets to meet and chat briefly with the leader of the free world on the tarmac by Air Force One -- plus have President George W. Bush himself turn and wave to your mother, your father and your younger brother standing nearby in the crowd of spectators.

That's precisely what happened to Lathan, 28, a mentor who on Thursday joined an elite list of more than 500 people nationally who have received the President's Volunteer Service Award for making a difference in the lives of others.

Amid a morning burst of sunshine, Bush presented a ceremonial box containing a pin to Lathan moments before leaving Raleigh-Durham International Airport via helicopter to tour an alternative-energy plant in Franklinton.

"It was amazing. It was amazing," Lathan said immediately afterward, affixing the pin to the lapel of his dark suit jacket.

Lathan said Bush told him "America is what it is today because of people like me volunteering and giving their time and their efforts."

Lathan said he told the commander-in-chief he was praying for him.

Lathan is a mentor at the Youth Life Learning Center of Durham, an outreach program originally founded by King's Park International Church.

Lathan credited his parents, Arthur and Carrie Lathan; his younger brother, Ken Lathan; and the young people he serves.

He also praised all people who serve as volunteers.

"Words just can't express my feelings," Arthur Lathan said of Thursday's occasion.

"I'm absolutely elated -- elated," he father added, putting special emphasis on the word "elated." "We're just so excited and we're happy for him because he is just deserving of it."

"I am speechless, speechless," Carrie Lathan said. "I give God the glory."

She said a photo of Jamie Lathan with Bush is soon going to become a fixture in the family household.

Arthur Lathan, 59, was an engineer with the South Carolina Department of Transportation before retiring.

DOJ_NMG_0135653

Carrie Lathan, 57, worked for a textile company before retiring.

The couple, who have been married 33 years, made the trip from their home in Winnsboro, S.C., north of Columbia.

Ken Lathan, 26, made the trip from the Atlanta area, where he works as a guidance counselor.

"It's one of those things," he said. "As young people say, 'It's cool' to actually see my older brother and the president of the United States waving at us. It's something."

On Tuesday, Jamie Lathan had just finished teaching a U.S. history class at the N.C. School of Science and Mathematics when he received word of the award from the White House.

Lathan has been a mentor for four years at the Youth Life Learning Center, which benefits children and families living in low-income environments through after-school programs and leadership clubs.

Each week, he mentors at-risk youth in academics and character education.

And he takes students to cultural arts performances and lectures on leadership at N.C. Central University.

Additionally, he helped establish the Teen Leadership Club, an outreach program for young men from the Cornwallis community.

Through the club, Lathan mentors young men about the importance of education, leadership and decision-making skills and challenges students to take responsibility for their families and communities.

Lathan has become a center of much news and official attention.

Earlier Thursday at RDU, he visited with U.S. Sen. Richard Burr, R-N.C.

Lathan told Burr he believes "we need adults who have made it" need to go back and guide the young.

The two talked by a parcel company building amid security so intense that law enforcement officers were using dogs to sniff nearby conveyor belts and a forklift for any dangerous materials, while heavily armed security personnel stood on the building's rooftop.

Helicopters soon landed on the tarmac, and Burr would ride in one of them with Bush to Franklinton.

"As I try to tell school kids when they ask me what it's like to go to the White House and meet the president, it's like going to the principal's office," Burr said before leaving RDU.

Then he added with a smile, "You know exactly where you're going. You just don't know what the topic is yet."

Where Bush Would Steer Energy R&D (CSM)

By Mark Clayton

Christian Science Monitor, February 23, 2007

Some critics question proposed federal spending hikes for nuclear research.

If new technology is a key answer to global warming and America's addiction to oil, then President Bush's proposal to boost federal spending on energy R&D – by no less than 30 percent in fiscal 2008 – would seem a welcome step.

In the new $2.7 billion budget plan, R&D dollars allotted to the US Department of Energy (DOE) continue a transition toward research that will help cut greenhouse gases.

But overall federal spending on energy research in real dollars is only one-third what it was at its 1978 peak, according to a Harvard University analysis. Some also question the administration's emphasis on nuclear research, saying other promising technologies could be applied sooner to climate and energy-security issues.

"The new DOE budget doesn't reflect the big increase in public concern about greenhouse gases," says energy expert Richard Newell, formerly a senior economist on the President's Council of Economic Advisers, now at Duke University in North Carolina.

Because the federal government remains the largest investor in energy R&D, its spending priorities are of keen interest to scientists, environmentalists, energy entrepreneurs, utilities, and the general public – especially as concerns rise about both climate change and energy security. As might be expected, the new budget proposal has a host of critics. Among the concerns:

•Next year's budget request would boost funding for biofuel, clean-coal, battery, and solar technologies. But it eliminates research for hydropower and geo-thermal, two renewable energy sources.

DOJ_NMG_0135654

•Spending on energy-efficiency programs, which in the past led to low-power refrigerators and energy-saving compact fluorescent bulbs, would drop.

•There would be a fourfold increase from 2006 in spending for nuclear-fuel reprocessing, a practice that many experts say does little to replace oil and remains years from commercialization.

Taken together, the budget request breaks little new ground in terms of fighting global warming or the nation's reliance on foreign oil, many experts say.

"There simply is no new sense of urgency in this energy R&D budget," says Kelly Gallagher, director of the Energy Technology Innovation Project at Harvard University. "Growth for solar, biofuels, and clean-coal research is positive. But overall funding is not nearly equal to the challenge."

Resources devoted to climate change and energy security "are largely anemic," says Jason Grumet, executive director of the National Commission on Energy Policy, a group of energy experts that recommends doubling federal energy-research funding.

Energy Department officials disagree.

"This year's budget request supports the president's energy initiative to accelerate the deployment of renewable energy technology, such as biomass, hydrogen, and solar energy," says Megan Barnett, a DOE spokeswoman. The budget "builds on our commitment to strengthen global energy security by making investment to diversify our energy resources, expand our nation's scientific know-how, and continue to invest in energy that can reduce our carbon footprint," she says.

Is R&D government's job?

The overall decline in federal research dollars since the late 1970s is troubling to many, but not to everyone. Some argue that government is best left out of the energy research business because it's no good at picking winning technologies. The nation has received little in return for its massive investment in energy-technology research since 1978, these analysts say.

"If the utility industry wants clean coal, they can figure out themselves how to have cleaner coal," says Myron Ebell of the Competitive Enterprise Institute, a Washington think tank. "We don't think government-sponsored technology has a very good track record. Markets work better."

Others cite studies that indicate benefits to government involvement. A 2004 National Research Council (NRC) study calculated a historically good return on several categories of energy technology investment. Energy efficiency, for instance, showed a $30 billion return on investment of $7 billion – or $4 for every $1 invested in it since 1978, according to the report.

Innovations flowing from federal research include compact fluorescent light bulbs and refrigerators that use only one-third the electricity of earlier models. These and other gains have helped slash America's "energy intensity," the amount of energy spending per dollar of economic output, economists say.

Funding for energy-efficiency technology at DOE has seen a "substantial decline" during the Bush years, says Ms. Gallagher. Even renewable-energy funding has been only about flat, after inflation is considered, she says. She and others question whether funding for nuclear technology is robbing efficiency and renewable research budgets – and even funds for "clean" coal.

'Clean' coal's future

The ability to capture carbon dioxide (the major gas tied to global warming) from future coal-fired power plants and store it underground is critical to the future of using massive US coal reserves. If research doesn't reveal how CO2 can be held underground, then those reserves are at risk, experts say.

Even so, funding for "carbon sequestration" research is up a modest 7 percent since last year to $79 million. That's dwarfed by a $395 million budget request for nuclear-fuel reprocessing – a 400 percent jump from 2006. The request for nuclear-fusion research is up 34 percent from this year, to $428 million.

"There's no way fusion is going to be commercial even in decades – and we should not be robbing Peter to pay Paul," says Carol Werner of the Environmental and Energy Study Institute in Washington. "We should be deploying technology that can delivered now and over the next 15 years. Fusion is not one of those."

DOJ_NMG_0135655

Still, she's glad to see clean-coal research getting more funding. DOE plans to build an almost-emissions-free "FutureGen" plant, a $1 billion coal-fired power plant, in Texas or Illinois by 2012. It would capture carbon dioxide – a precursor to storing the gas underground.

FutureGen would get $109 million, double last year's request. Likewise, funding for biomass research, which includes ethanol made from switchgrass and crops other than corn, would double since 2006, and solar funding would rise 80 percent. It's good, but it's not enough, say experts.

Federal R&D funding is vital for pilot projects for noncorn-based ethanol and carbon sequestration, in particular, says Robert Nordhaus, an expert on energy technology research at Van Ness Feldman, a Washington law firm. "We're ... betting on carbon sequestration for keeping coal going without really moving quickly ahead on the sequestration project," he says.

A major problem has been that priorities and funding levels change continually, "which makes it difficult to have a coherent technology program," Mr. Nordhaus says.

A report last week by the Electric Power Research Institute, the industry's research arm, cited the urgency of energy research to addressing global warming. CO2 emissions from the coal-burning US electric-utility sector could be cut to 1990 levels within 25 years, the report said. But that can happen only with "accelerated investment in electric technology R&D and aggressive deployment of the resulting technologies," the EPRI report states.

Car Mpg Ratings Going Down (USAT)

By James R. Healey

USA Today, February 23, 2007

Fuel-saving gasoline-electric hybrid cars don't save as much fuel as thought, according to new government fuel-economy ratings available to the public for the first time.

The new ratings go into effect beginning with 2008 models, a few of which will soon be on sale. But now it's possible to tell what rating 2007 and older models would get using the '08 standards.

The government's fuel-economy website has a program than makes the comparison. The site: www.fueleconomy.gov. Click on the button that says "Compare Old and New MPG Ratings." It shows that vehicles typically bought for their fuel efficiency use significantly more fuel than the previous ratings have said.

Toyota's Prius, the best-known and best-selling gas-electric car in the USA, drops to 48 miles per gallon in the city under the '08 testing procedure, from a 60 mpg rating under the current system — a 20% decline. Its highway mileage rating falls about 12%, to 45 mpg.

The Ford Escape hybrid, which uses a gasoline-electric drive system similar to Toyota's, goes down about 12%.

"What the cars get hasn't changed. It's just the numbers on the sticker," says Toyota spokesman Mike Michels. The lowered Prius rating is "probably more reflective of real-world experience," he says. "We hear people getting 46 to 50. I have one, and I get 48.

"If the (new) numbers contribute to customer satisfaction, that's a good thing," Michels says.

"I got near 60 (mpg) on the first tank, then never anywhere near that after," says Martha Ehrenfeld, a teacher who lives in San Francisco. The 48 mpg rating "makes me feel better, because that's about what I get. I was wondering what I was doing wrong. It's still better than most cars."

Tests the government has used for mileage estimates were created in the 1970s and haven't reflected today's driving environment. They have assumed, for instance, that people don't use air conditioning and don't drive more than about 60 mph.

After years of complaints from motorists and environmental activists that the Environmental Protection Agency estimates were too optimistic, the agency announced last year that it had come up with tests that include faster driving speeds, quicker acceleration, hotter and colder temperatures, and the use of air conditioning. It said it expected mileage numbers to drop about 10% when all types of vehicles and drivetrains were considered.

The change is good news for hybrid owners, says Bradley Berman, editor of HybridCars.com and owner of a 2006 Prius and 2003 Civic hybrid.

DOJ_NMG_0135656

"It's great that consumers will have a better sense of what they may expect on the road," he says. Berman says he gets gas mileage in the 40s on his Prius in short city drives near his Berkeley, Calif., home and a bit less on his Civic.

City To Pay $1.5 Million In Coal Gas Site Agreement (LMDS)

By Jolene Stevens

Le Mars (IA) Daily Sentinel, February 23, 2007

Le Mars City Council members Tuesday approved an agreement with the U.S. Justice Department on the nearly five-year-old dispute centering on clean-up of contamination at the former Le Mars Coal Gas site.

The agreement, as outlined by City Attorney Joe Flannery, calls for the city to pay $1.5 million in clean-up response costs plus additional interest. Payments are to be made in three increments, the first $500,000 to be paid on or before July 31, 2007.

(Advertisement)

Two additional $500,000 payments will be made, upon final federal acceptance of the pact, by April 22, 2008 and April 22, 2008. MidAmerican Energy has agreed to pay $3.1 million in response cost stemming from the clean-up. The coal gas site is located at the northwest corner of the intersection of Fourth Avenue and First Street Northeast where currently the Le Mars street department building sits.

The agreement, after publication in the Federal Register, will then be ruled on in Federal Court in Sioux City. Councilman John Rexwinkle, a MidAmerican employee, emphasized during Tuesday's meeting that he had excused himself from any and all discussions that have taken place on the agreement talks.

Flannery told the council that had members not approved the agreement which stops all future costs, the city of Le Mars' could well "be pretty much out on a limb" with regard to future liability and costs The liability, he said, could well be expected to reach the $6 to $7 million dollar range with future court battles likely. At the same time, he said, the probability would also exist that MidAmerican would ask for the $3.5 million that is its share of the settlement.

Councilman Rex Knapp noted that some $6 to $7 million has already been spent by contractors in the clean-up, a figure paid in one way or another by citizens through either property tax, income tax or rising MidAmerican rates.

Responding to a question from Councilman Ken Nelson, Flannery said it was his opinion that should the city make future plans to remove a structure on the coal gas site, the property could most likely use the area for a green site if no invasive site work was performed there. However, Flannery added, if anything invasive was undertaken, officials of the DNR and EPA would have to be on hand and assume responsibility for the work.

BP Employee Deleted Files From Computer (FT)

By Sheila McNulty

Financial Times, February 23, 2007

A BP employee has admitted destroying documents after plaintiffs' lawyers subpoenaed her laptop on an anonymous tip that she had information useful in the lawsuits against the UK oil company arising from its fatal refinery explosion.

Court records show that on November 3 2006, plaintiffs' lawyers subpoenaed Susan Moore, BP regulatory affairs manager, requesting certain documents and the laptop she has used for the past two to three years in her work for BP.

The subpoena specifically instructed BP: "You are urged not to destroy or attempt to destroy, delete, erase, or otherwise alter any of the electronic data, data files, meta data, media, records, charts, forms, or other documents stored on Ms Moore's hard drive.''

When plaintiffs' lawyers questioned Ms Moore on January 26 2007, a transcript revealed, she said BP had not shown her the subpoena until earlier in the week, and that she had deleted e-mails in the two months after the subpoena.

She did not know if she had deleted text files, did not think she had deleted folders but did not recall whether she had wiped presentations.

"I can't speculate on why someone might think my laptop would be useful,'' Ms Moore said. "To the best of my knowledge, I have not deleted information relative to this case.''

Yet Joseph Gourrier, the plaintiffs' attorney questioning Ms Moore, responded, "It's not up to you to determine what would be relevant to this case.''

DOJ_NMG_0135657

The case was filed against BP by plaintiffs' lawyers on behalf of the 15 people killed and 500 injured when BP's Texas City refinery exploded in 2005.

Brent Coon, the lead plaintiffs' lawyer in the case, said judges had a tremendous amount of discretion in determining if there had been abuse of process.

Once a subpoena has been served, deleting documents created an inference that they were prejudicial, and the burden shifted to BP to prove the deleted files were irrelevant to the litigation.

Judge Susan Criss ruled that BP had to produce the deleted documents by Friday.

"We have agreed to deliver Ms Moore's hard drive to a third-party expert who will determine what has been deleted,'' said BP spokesman Ronnie Chappell. "If we find anything relevant to the case, we will turn it over to plaintiffs counsel or the court.''

"No one at BP has been instructed to delete relevant documents,'' he said, adding, "We have made it clear that staff are to preserve relevant documents, including relevant e-mails.''

GAO: Fuel Tank Cleanup Could Cost $12B (AP)

By John Heilprin, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 23, 2007

It will cost at least $12 billion to clean up contamination from tens of thousands of gasoline storage tanks that are leaking underground, congressional auditors say.

That is far more than the $72 million that Congress and the Bush administration have provided each year, according to the report Thursday from the General Accountability Office.

The Environmental Protection Agency, which oversees the cleanups, has already spent more than $10 billion to reduce the contamination over the past 20 years caused by hundreds of thousands of leaking tanks, many of them found at gas stations and convenience stores.

Yet some 117,000 faulty tanks still await cleanups, according to the latest figures current as of September 2005.

The GAO's $12 billion estimate would pay to remove 54,000 leaks from underground storage tanks that are either abandoned or no one can be held accountable for cleaning up. Another 63,000 leaking tanks would be paid for by pump stations, store owners or other operators of the leaking tanks, along with insurers and state funds, according to the GAO.

The problem is growing, however. Forty-three states said they expect to find 16,700 new leaks in the next five years, many requiring at least some federal money for the cleanups.

The lag in cleanups isn't necessarily due to lack of money, according to the GAO.

Every time a motorist pays for a gallon of gas, a tenth of a penny goes into a trust fund to remove the contamination. The fund now has about $2.6 billion and is expected to reach $3 billion before the end of 2008. Congress created the trust fund in 1986 because of concerns about contamination from leaking tanks at gas stations, but annually only a small fraction has been appropriated for cleanups. Most has sat in the Treasury to help counter federal budget deficits.

Rep. John Dingell, D-Mich., who chairs the House Energy and Commerce Committee and who released the GAO report on Thursday, called the situation an "inexplicable failure to use available resources to speed the cleanup of pollution that is likely to spread."

The failure to clean up the tank waste is "contaminating our water supplies with MTBE and other carcinogens, unnecessarily risking public health," said Rep. Hilda Solis, D-Calif., who along with Dingell had requested the report.

Leaking underground gasoline tanks for years have been blamed for much of the MTBE — or methyl tertiary-butyl ether — found in drinking water supplies in at least 36 states. More than 150 lawsuits have been filed seeking damages because of problems with MTBE, which until recently has been a widespread gasoline additive that helped curb air pollution.

The GAO report found some states' financial assurance funds lack the money to pay for timely tank cleanups. It said tank owners covered under the state programs usually pay only a small deductible when tanks leak, with the government picking up most of the tab.

DOJ_NMG_0135658

The Energy Policy Act of 2005 required underground storage tanks to be inspected every three years. The EPA is drafting guidelines for how the agency and states should comply with the new inspection requirements, said Susan Parker Bodine, head of EPA's Office of Solid Waste and Emergency Response, in a written response to the GAO report.

Only about one-third of states currently assure the EPA they are checking to see if tank owners are covered by insurance, the GAO said. Bodine said the agency also will consider studying better ways to distribute money from the trust fund and whether the state funds and insurance are effective enough.

___

On the Net:

House Energy and Commerce Committee: http://energycommerce.house.gov/

EPA: http://www.epa.gov/OUST/index.htm

A Conservative Conservationist? (WP)

By Mark Sanford

Washington Post, February 23, 2007

Why the Right Needs to Get Invested in the Search for Climate Change Solutions

When George W. Bush, The Post and the insurance giant Lloyd's of London agree on something, it's obvious a new wind is blowing. The climate change debate is here to stay, and as America warms to the idea of environmental conservation on a grander scale, it's vital that conservatives change the debate before government regulation expands yet again and personal freedom is pushed closer toward extinction.

The fact is, I'm a conservative and a conservationist -- and that's okay.

For the past 20 years, I have seen the ever-so-gradual effects of rising sea levels at our farm on the South Carolina coast. I've had to watch once-thriving pine trees die in that fragile zone between uplands and salt marshes. I know the climate change debate isn't over, but I believe human activity is having a measurable effect on the environment.

The real "inconvenient truth" about climate change is that some people are losing their rights and freedoms because of the actions of others -- in either the quality of the air they breathe, the geography they hold dear, the insurance costs they bear or the future environment of the children they love.

But like a polar bear searching for solid ice, many people seem ready to dig into the first solution offered to slow or reverse climate change. Cue former vice president Al Gore -- the politician turned screen star who could take home an Academy Award this weekend and a Nobel Peace Prize later this year -- whose call for greater government intervention is resonating with administrations in this country and across the globe: California may soon ban incandescent light bulbs; France wants to force the Kyoto-less United States to pay carbon taxes on exports; and the European Union is pushing automobile emission standards that would cost carmakers such as Volvo roughly $3,200 more per vehicle.

Make no mistake, the issue of environmental conservation sits squarely on the battle line between government and liberty. From light bulbs to automobiles, government will gladly expand its regulatory reach even if the result is a hamstrung economy and curtailed individual freedoms. Yet conservatives have remained largely absent from this debate, and by pulling back from the environmental battle they have conceded the high ground to those on the far left.

I believe conservatives have a window of opportunity, but that window is closing fast.

First, conservatives must reframe the environmental discussion by replacing the political left's scare tactics with conservative principles such as responsibility and stewardship. Stewardship -- the idea that we need to take care of what we've been given -- simply makes sense. It makes dollars as well, for the simple reason that our economy is founded on natural resources, from tourism and manufacturing to real estate and agriculture. Here in South Carolina, conservation easements are springing up across the state as landowners see the dual benefit of preserving the environment and protecting their pocketbooks.

Second, conservatives must reclaim lost ground from far-left interest groups by showing how environmental conservation is as much about expanding economic opportunity as it is about saving whales or replanting rain forests. When corporations such as BP and Shell America pursue alternative energy sources, they not only cut carbon emissions but help cut our petroleum dependency on OPEC nations. When South Carolina restaurants recycle their oyster shells, they not only restore shellfish habitat but take a job off local governments' plates and ensure continuing revenue streams for local fishermen.

DOJ_NMG_0135659

Third, conservatives must respond to climate change with innovation, not regulation. This means encouraging private research and implementation of more eco-friendly construction, more energy-efficient workplaces and more sustainable ways of going about life -- all of which cuts costs and protects God's creation. It means looking past the question of whether your car's exhaust melts polar ice caps and instead treating our environment as an investment our future depends on.

South Carolina is creating an advisory group that will study the effects of climate change on commerce and vice versa, with an eye toward crafting a plan that balances the needs of the business and environmental communities.

I am a conservative conservationist who worries that sea levels and government intervention may end up rising together. My earnest hope going forward is that we can find conservative solutions to the climate change problem -- ecologically responsible solutions based on free-market principles that both improve our quality of life and safeguard our freedoms.

For if conservatives cannot reframe, reclaim and respond to climate change with our principles intact, government will undoubtedly provide a solution, no matter how taxing it may be.

The writer, a Republican, is governor of South Carolina.

Colorless Green Ideas (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, February 23, 2007

The factual debate about whether global warming is real is, or at least should be, over. The question now is what to do about it.

Aside from a few dead-enders on the political right, climate change skeptics seem to be making a seamless transition from denial to fatalism. In the past, they rejected the science. Now, with the scientific evidence pretty much irrefutable, they insist that it doesn't matter because any serious attempt to curb greenhouse gas emissions is politically and economically impossible.

Behind this claim lies the assumption, explicit or implicit, that any substantial cut in energy use would require a drastic change in the way we live. To be fair, some people in the conservation movement seem to share that assumption.

But the assumption is false. Let me tell you about a real-world counterexample: an advanced economy that has managed to combine rising living standards with a substantial decline in per capita energy consumption, and managed to keep total carbon dioxide emissions more or less flat for two decades, even as both its economy and its population grew rapidly. And it achieved all this without fundamentally changing a lifestyle centered on automobiles and single-family houses.

The name of the economy? California.

There's nothing heroic about California's energy policy — but that's precisely the point. Over the years the state has adopted a series of conservation measures that are anything but splashy. They're the kind of drab, colorless stuff that excites only real policy wonks. Yet the cumulative effect has been impressive, if still well short of what we really need to do.

The energy divergence between California and the rest of the United States dates from the 1970s. Both the nation and the state initially engaged in significant energy conservation after that decade's energy crisis. But conservation in most of America soon stalled: after a decade of rapid progress, improvements in auto mileage came to an end, while electricity consumption continued to rise rapidly, driven by the growing size of houses, the increasing use of air-conditioning and the proliferation of appliances.

In California, by contrast, the state continued to push policies designed to encourage conservation, especially of electricity. And these policies worked.

People in California have always used a bit less energy than other Americans because of the mild climate. But the difference has grown much larger since the 1970s. Today, the average Californian uses about a third less total energy than the average American, uses less than 60 percent as much electricity, and is responsible for emitting only about 55 percent as much carbon dioxide.

DOJ_NMG_0135660

How did the state do it? In some cases conservation was mandated directly, through energy efficiency standards for appliances and rules governing new construction. Also, regulated power companies were given new incentives to promote conservation, via rule changes that "decoupled" their profits from the amount of electricity they sold.

And yes, a variety of state actions had the effect of raising energy prices. In the early 1970s, the price of electricity in California was close to the national average. Today, it's about 50 percent higher.

Incidentally, since someone is bound to mention it: the California energy crisis of 2000-2001 has nothing to do with this story. That crisis was caused by market manipulation — we've got it on tape — made possible by ill-conceived deregulation, not conservation.

Back to California's success. As the higher price of power indicates, conservation didn't come free. Still, it's striking how invisible California's energy policy remains. It's easy to see why New York has much lower per capita energy consumption than, say, Georgia: it's a matter of high-rises versus sprawl, mass transit versus driving alone. It's less obvious that Los Angeles is a much greener city than Atlanta. But it is.

So is California a role model for climate policy? No and yes. Even if America as a whole had matched California's conservation efforts, we'd still be emitting about as much carbon dioxide now as we were in 1990. That's too much.

But California's experience shows that serious conservation is a lot less disruptive, imposes much less of a burden, than the skeptics would have it. And the fact that a state government, with far more limited powers than those at Washington's disposal, has been able to achieve so much is a good omen for our ability to do a lot to limit climate change, if and when we find the political will.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Detroit Dealer Gets 30 Years In Two Fentanyl Deaths (DN)

Detroit News, February 23, 2007

A Detroit man who admitted selling a fentanyl-laced drug cocktail that killed two people was sentenced Thursday to more than 30 years in prison.

U.S. District Judge Lawrence P. Zatkoff, sitting in Port Huron, sentenced James Edgar Coleman to 365 months in federal prison. That sentence was at the top of the sentencing guideline range for Coleman, who has previous convictions for drug trafficking.

Coleman, 36, admitted to selling the fentanyl-laced heroin that killed Lauren Jolly, a 17-year-old Bloomfield Township high school student, and Daniel McElmurry, 30, of Madison Heights, last year.

The charge against Coleman was the first charge of selling a controlled substance causing death related to fentanyl-laced heroin and cocaine that killed an estimated 133 people in Metro Detroit in 2005-06.

Coleman had pleaded guilty and expressed remorse at his sentencing, lawyer Warren Harris said.

"He was not the person who mixed the drugs," Harris said. "Mr. Coleman would not know fentanyl right now if he saw it."

U.S. Attorney Stephen Murphy credited the work of the Drug Enforcement Agency and Oakland County.

"This significant sentence is the result of a robust federal response to the rash of overdose deaths caused by fentanyl-laced heroin," Murphy said.

Drug Dealer Gets 30 Years In Fentanyl Case (FREEP)

By David Ashenfelter, Free Press Staff Writer

Detroit Free Press, February 23, 2007

A 37-year-old Detroit man who sold the fentanyl-laced heroin that killed a Birmingham high school junior and a Madison Heights man last May was sentenced Thursday to 30 1/2 years in prison.

The sentence imposed on James E. Coleman by U.S. District Judge Lawrence Zatkoff was at the top of the federal sentencing guidelines.

DOJ_NMG_0135661

Coleman -- accused of selling the drugs that killed 17-year-old Lauren Jolly and 30-year-old Daniel McElmurry -- pleaded guilty in November to avoid a possible life sentence.

Coleman's lawyer, former Detroit police narcotics unit Cmdr. Warren Harris, urged Zatkoff to show leniency, saying Coleman had no idea that the drugs he sold contained fentanyl.

Fentanyl has been blamed for more than 100 deaths in metro Detroit since late 2005.

"I think the sentence was too severe," Harris said after the 10-minute hearing. Harris said Coleman grew up in a drug-infested neighborhood, was introduced to drug trafficking by family members and, despite prior drug convictions, wasn't a violent predator.

"He's not the villain who was the source of all of the fentanyl problem, and putting him away will not solve the fentanyl problem," Harris said. "In the total scheme of things, James Coleman is a small fry."

Detroit Drug Enforcement Administration Chief Robert Corso said, "Today's sentencing reflects a substantial sentence for a substantial violator" and should send a message to Detroit-area drug dealers.

Jolly's mother, Beth Jolly, declined to comment.

Jolly, a student at Birmingham Groves, and McElmurry bought drugs from Coleman's drug house in Detroit.

Seller Of Lethal Drug Cocktail Sentenced (AP)

AP, February 23, 2007

(AP) A man who pleaded guilty to selling heroin laced with a powerful painkiller that killed two people was sentenced Thursday to more than 30 years in prison.

U.S. District Judge Lawrence P. Zatkoff sentenced James Edgar Coleman, 36, to 365 months in federal prison. The sentence was the maximum possible penalty for Coleman, who has previous convictions for drug trafficking.

Coleman, of Detroit, admitted he sold the drug cocktail with fentanyl that last year killed Lauren Jolly, 17, and Daniel McElmurry, 30.

Coleman's plea to two counts of delivering a controlled substance resulting in death was the first related to fentanyl-laced heroin and cocaine that killed more than 100 people in metropolitan Detroit in 2005 and 2006, U.S. Attorney Stephen Murphy said.

Coleman expressed remorse at his sentencing, defense attorney Warren Harris told The Detroit News.

"He was not the person who mixed the drugs," Harris said. "Mr. Coleman would not know fentanyl right now if he saw it."

Official: 4 Officers Arrested In Sting (NSDY/AP)

By Curt Anderson, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, February 23, 2007

MIAMI -- Four police officers in Hollywood, Fla., have been arrested on suspicion of providing protection and running drugs and money for an organized crime group that was really an FBI sting operation, a law enforcement official said Thursday.

The source, who is familiar with the case, spoke on condition of anonymity because the matter is sealed until Friday. The source would not provide further details.

Police Chief Jim Scarberry said the officers are veterans, but he declined to comment further.

An FBI spokesman in Miami did not immediately return calls seeking comment.

The four officers were expected to appear Friday in federal court in Fort Lauderdale.

Four Hollywood Cops Face Charges In FBI Sting (MH)

By Todd Wright

The Miami Herald, February 23, 2007

Four Hollywood police officers were arrested by federal agents Thursday, accused of providing protection and running drugs and money for what they thought was an organized crime group but was instead an FBI sting operation, a law enforcement source said.

DOJ_NMG_0135662

It is unclear whether Kevin Companion, Jeff Courtney, Steve Harrison and Tom Simcox, all veterans of the police force, were being held in federal prison Thursday night, but word of the arrests sent shock waves through the department and City Hall.

"It's been really tough on all of us. Some of us just can't believe it," police spokesman Capt. Tony Rode said. ``It's really crazy."

Few details were released on the investigation or the charges, but City Manager Cameron Benson said he was told the FBI had been running the sting for about two years.

Mayor Mara Giulianti first heard of the investigation several weeks ago and said there was "pretty convincing and strong evidence" that the officers had been involved in wrongdoing.

The FBI has scheduled a press conference at 11 a.m. today in front of the federal courthouse in downtown Fort Lauderdale, where officials are expected to give more details on the case.

"The four individuals dishonored themselves and their colleagues," Giulianti said. ``This is going to be an embarrassment to the men and women that serve our city. This is very, very painful."

The on-duty FBI spokesman did not immediately return calls seeking comment.

Broward County Police Benevolent Association president Dick Brickman said he had heard about the arrests Thursday evening from other officers.

Brickman said he didn't know what the specific charges are but said they are unrelated to the officers' jobs and therefore they would not get union representation.

"From what I understand it's serious charges," Brickman said. ``It's a very, very touchy situation right now."

The alleged corruption in the police department comes as the city is dealing with similar accusations in City Hall.

Suspended Commissioner Keith Wasserstrom is facing five felony corruption charges stemming from his role in helping a sludge processing firm win an $18 million city contract in 2004. State prosecutors recently opened two more investigations of his business dealings.

A woman who answered the phone at Courtney's home Thursday night hung up after a caller identified himself as a Miami Herald reporter. Phone calls to Companion's house were not returned.

Harrison, 46, and Simcox, 50, could not be reached.

The Hollywood Police Department is no stranger to scandal.

The city's street crimes unit was disbanded in 1997 by then-Chief Rick Stone after officers were accused of brutality, making false arrests and sexual battery.

In 1998, a Miami Herald investigation found abuse in the system of off-duty shift assignments. As many as 500 times in a year, Hollywood officers scheduled themselves to work two or more off-duty jobs at the same time and could have been paid for working off-duty during their regular police shifts.

Several of the officers in question also have dealt with charges before.

Simcox, a 24-year veteran, was suspended without pay for four weeks in May 1997 after a complaint that he slapped a 9-year-old at a Palm Beach County day-care center while off-duty and fractured the child's jaw.

Articles in the Herald in 1995 and 1996 questioned the department's 1991 hiring of Courtney, 51, who had been arrested in the 1970s for issuing bad checks and driving while intoxicated.

At the time, he blamed the arrests on immaturity and a messy divorce.

Mothers Against Drunk Driving named him Officer of the Year in 1995.

Companion, who joined the force in 1986, was investigated several years ago after a Miami Herald investigation found that he was scheduled to work off-duty at multiple sites in a single day on as many as 111 dates.

Companion also was one of several people named in a 1994 sexual harassment lawsuit filed by a former Hollywood police officer.

"It looks bad. The news hit me like a ton of bricks, but I still think we have one of the best police departments in the state," Benson said.

``I was sick to my stomach honestly."

Miami Herald staff writers Jerry Berrios, Wanda J. DeMarzo, Hannah Sampson and Amy Sherman contributed to this report.

DOJ_NMG_0135663

Medical Marijuana Activists Cite Little-known Law In Suit (SFC)

San Francisco Chronicle, February 22, 2007

Medical marijuana advocates tried a new approach Wednesday in their tug-of-war with the federal government, filing suit under a law that requires the government to correct its own misstatements -- including, the advocates say, the assertion that marijuana has no medical value.

"Citizens have a right to expect the government to use the best available information for policy decisions," said Alan Morrison, a Stanford Law School lecturer and an attorney in the lawsuit by Americans for Safe Access.

The suit was filed in federal court in San Francisco under the Data Quality Act, a little-known statute signed by President Bush in 2001. It directs federal agencies to allow members of the public to "seek and obtain correction" of false or misleading government information that affects them.

Morrison said the law was originally pushed by businesses that objected to government statements taking dim views of products or entire industries, notably Clinton administration reports that listed industrial activities among the causes of global warming. He said he knew of only two lawsuits filed under the statute, neither of them successful.

Americans for Safe Access invoked the 2001 law in a complaint to the Department of Health and Human Services in October 2004, saying its members included seriously ill people who had been discouraged from using marijuana by the department's position that the drug has "no currently accepted medical use."

The federal government classifies marijuana among the most dangerous drugs and has won court rulings allowing it to prosecute suppliers and patients in California, where medical marijuana was legalized by a 1996 initiative.

The lawsuit said the agency was ignoring scientific studies, including a 1999 report by the National Academy of Sciences' Institute of Medicine that found that the active ingredients in marijuana could help relieve pain, nausea and loss of appetite associated with illnesses, though it cautioned that smoking marijuana can be harmful.

More recently, researchers reported last week that HIV-positive patients at San Francisco General Hospital experienced relief of searing pain in their hands and feet after smoking marijuana cigarettes in a state-funded study.

The suit said the department's only responses to the 2004 complaint have been perfunctory denials, in 2005 and 2006. Those responses did not address the scientific evidence and instead noted that the Drug Enforcement Administration was considering a separate request to reclassify marijuana, the suit said.

Morrison said the department could have complied with the law by explaining its current position and posting links to the medical studies on its Web site to promote public debate. The suit accuses the department of violating the law and seeks court orders requiring the department to stop asserting that marijuana has no medical value and to make "appropriate corrections" to past statements.

Health and Human Services spokeswoman Christina Pearson declined to comment on the suit. She referred a reporter to the Food and Drug Administration's April 2006 statement that federal evaluations have found "no sound scientific studies supported medical use of marijuana."

Advocacy Group's Suit Calls On U.S. To Acknowledge Pot's Medicinal Value (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 23, 2007

SACRAMENTO — A patient advocacy group sued the federal government Wednesday to try to force U.S. health agencies to acknowledge that marijuana has merit as a medicine.

The lawsuit by Americans for Safe Access follows a two-year effort to reverse what it calls a "misinformation campaign" by U.S. health agencies.

Americans for Safe Access is suing under the Data Quality Act, a little-known statute that lets citizens challenge the accuracy of government-disseminated information.

The Oakland-based group filed a petition in October 2004 asking the United States to reverse its staunch opposition to pot as medicine. After months of delays, the government rejected the petition.

A spokeswoman for the Department of Health and Human Services said the agency could not comment because of the litigation.

DOJ_NMG_0135664

For years, U.S. regulators have said marijuana has no accepted medicinal value.

Such statements are "false and misleading," Americans for Safe Access said in its lawsuit, filed in U.S. District Court in Oakland. The group cited peer-reviewed studies suggesting cannabis can be effective for AIDS wasting, muscle spasticity and chronic pain.

The government's stance ignores its own studies, activists say.

A 1999 report by the Institute of Medicine declared that marijuana showed medicinal promise and advocated the development of cannabis-based drugs.

Since then, the University of California has begun several rigorous studies to test marijuana's medical efficacy. Last week, a UC San Francisco researcher announced that clinical trials found marijuana helped treat HIV pain.

Meanwhile, British drug company GW Pharmaceuticals won Canadian approval for a marijuana spray for multiple sclerosis. The firm hopes to eventually market Sativex in the United States.

Federal Charges In Home Pot-growing Operation (SFC)

San Francisco Chronicle, February 22, 2007

SACRAMENTO -- Five suspects who allegedly grew marijuana in specially-outfitted homes in Oakland - including one across the street from an elementary school -- are facing federal charges for producing plants with a street value of $6 million, court records show.

Van Hung Vi, 42; his brother, Van Dat Vi, 57; Ivy Tran, 27; Tommy Ly, 23; and Van Hy Vi, 55, a relative of the Vi brothers, appeared Wednesday in U.S. District Court in Sacramento on a federal complaint charging them with manufacturing marijuana and conspiracy to manufacture marijuana.

The suspects were arrested Feb. 7 in Oakland and San Francisco by police and members of the Yolo County Narcotic Enforcement Team, a branch of the state Bureau of Narcotic Enforcement.

Authorities seized 1,500 marijuana plants during raids of homes in Oakland and West Sacramento, where the investigation began several months ago.

Each plant had a high content of the active ingredient THC and was capable of producing a pound of the drug, said Roy Giorgi, commander of the Yolo County team.

Acting on a tip, agents initially began watching a home in West Sacramento, Drug Enforcement Administration Special Agent James Sheeran wrote in a 30-page affidavit.

Agents saw Ly, Van Hung Vi and Tran at the home and identified them during traffic stops, checks of license plates or, in one case, an unspecified "ruse," Sheeran wrote.

Agents learned that Van Hung Vi and his brother lived at 3735 Lincoln Ave., across from Sequoia Elementary School, in Oakland. A search of that home uncovered 533 plants and 4 pounds of processed marijuana, the affidavit said, and authorities arrested the Vi brothers.

The narcotic agents' search led to another home, also associated with the Vi brothers, at 701 MacArthur Blvd. in Oakland. There, investigators found that every room had been converted to grow marijuana and seized 681 plants, the affidavit said.

Van Hy Vi was arrested at a home at 2514 Ninth Avenue in Oakland.

Tran, the ex-girlfriend of Van Hung Vi, was taken into custody at her place of business on Ninth Street in Oakland's Chinatown, Giorgi said.

Ly was arrested at an apartment on Pacific Street in San Francisco.

Authorities also found evidence of a marijuana-growing operation -- but no drugs -- at a home on the 1700 block of 11th Avenue in Oakland, Giorgi said.

Van Hung Vi was sent to the California Youth Authority in 1983 for manslaughter, and Van Hy Vi has a conspiracy conviction for a state Fish and Game violation relating to abalone, the affidavit said.

U.S. Drug Czar Urges Canada To Crack Down On Pot Claims American Measures Have Lowered Drug Use In Teens (CP)

DOJ_NMG_0135665

Canadian Press, February 22, 2007

OTTAWA — U.S. drug czar John Walters is in Ottawa touting America's anti-drug policy as a model for Canada.

Walters says a blend of treatment, prevention and tough law-and-order measures have lowered drug use among American teens.

But critics aren't buying it.

Lawyers, academics and a Liberal senator warned against a U.S.-style approach in Canada, saying it's hugely expensive and ineffective.

They say the Conservatives should reconsider any drug crackdown that focuses more on prison terms than prevention or treatment.

Walters says cross-border marijuana trafficking is still a major problem, but that the Tory government has eased tensions with Washington since taking power.

The Liberals had planned to decriminalize possession of small amounts of pot — a plan that has been scrapped by the Conservatives.

Canada Must Not Follow The U.S. On Drug Policy (OC)

By Ethan Nadelmann

Ottawa Citizen, February 22, 2007

The U.S. drug czar, John Walters, is in Ottawa today, trying his best to put a positive spin on one of the greatest disasters in U.S. foreign and domestic policy. Part of his agenda is to persuade Canada to follow in U.S. footsteps, which can only happen if Canadians ignore science, compassion, health and human rights.

The United States ranks first in the world in per-capita incarceration, with roughly five per cent of the earth's population but 25 per cent of the total incarcerated population. Russia and China simply can't keep up. Among the 2.2 million people behind bars today in the United States, roughly half a million are locked up for drug-law violations, and hundreds of thousands more for other "drug-related" offences. The U.S. "war on drugs" costs at least $40 billion U.S. a year in direct costs, and tens of billions more in indirect costs.

It's all useful information for Canadians to keep in mind when being encouraged to further toughen their drug laws to bring them in line with those of the United States.

What's most remarkable about U.S. drug policy is the way it endures despite persistent evidence that it is ineffective, costly and counterproductive. One report after another -- by the U.S. General Accountability Office, the National Academy of Sciences, independent agencies and even the Bush administration itself -- consistently fault federal drug-control programs for failing to achieve their objectives.

But funding nonetheless persists. The DARE (Drug Abuse Resistance Education) program, which relies on police to "educate" young people about drugs, keeps being funded despite an impressive run of studies demonstrating no effect on adolescent drug use. Ditto for the government's border interdiction and anti-drug ad campaigns, and its funding of federal-state anti-drug task forces, and much else.

Drug-policy reformers in the United States have been cheered by Canada's willingness -- at least until now -- to look to Europe rather than the United States for drug-control models. When HIV/AIDS started spreading a generation ago among people who inject drugs, both Europe and Canada were quick to implement needle exchanges and other harm-reduction programs, even as the United States opted instead to allow hundreds of thousands to become infected and die needlessly.

Heroin-prescription trials are now underway in Montreal and Vancouver, trying to determine whether what worked so well in Switzerland, Germany, The Netherlands and other countries can also work in Canada. The same is true of supervised injection sites, which have proven effective in reducing fatal overdoses, transmission of infectious diseases and drug-related nuisance. And most recently, Vancouver's mayor, Sam Sullivan, has broken new ground by proposing that cocaine and methamphetamine addicts be prescribed legal substitutes.

But I wonder whether Canada just can't help following in U.S. footsteps. DARE survives in Canada too, notwithstanding evidence of its lack of efficacy. Almost three quarters of Canadian federal drug-strategy spending is for law-enforcement initiatives, few of which demonstrate any success in reducing drug problems. "While harm-reduction interventions supported through the drug strategy are being held to an extraordinary standard of proof," the director of the B.C. Centre for Excellence in HIV/AIDS, Dr. Julio Montaner, recently observed, "those receiving the greatest proportion of funding remain under-evaluated or have already proven to be ineffective."

DOJ_NMG_0135666

The survival of Vancouver's supervised-injection facility is currently at risk, for reasons having everything to do with politics and nothing with science or health, while federal drug-enforcement authorities know that all they need to do to preserve funding is make arrests and avoid scandal.

What matters most to U.S. drug czar John Walters, though, is cannabis, which he occasionally, and absurdly, describes as the most dangerous of all drugs. Seventy per cent of Americans say cannabis should be legal for medical purposes, and one study after another points to its efficacy and safety as a medicine. A similar percentage also think personal possession of marijuana should be decriminalized (i.e., resulting in fines rather than arrest and incarceration) and 40 per cent say it should be taxed, controlled and regulated, more or less like alcohol.

But Mr. Walters will have none of it. He travels the country, railing against cannabis and urging schools to drug test all students, without cause -- and without any scientific evidence that testing will work. And when he visits or talks about Canada, it's typically to complain -- erroneously -- that Canada is a major supplier of marijuana for the U.S., never mind the fact that Americans now produce most of the marijuana consumed in the United States.

Canada needs to lead, not follow, the United States when it comes to dealing sensibly with drugs. Mr. Walters's Canadian hosts today should remind him of the 2002 report of the Canadian Senate Special Committee on Illegal Drugs, chaired by Conservative Senator Pierre-Claude Nolin.

It's probably the best, most comprehensive, most evidence-based report on drug policy produced by any government in the past 30 years. And its recommendations are all about dealing with drugs as if politics were an afterthought, and all that mattered were reducing the harms associated with both drug use and failed drug policies. Imagine that.

Ethan Nadelmann is the founder and executive director of the Drug Policy Alliance (www.drugpolicy.org), the leading organization in the U.S. promoting alternatives to the war on drugs, and co-author of Policing the Globe: Criminalization and Crime Control in International Relations.

Former Federal Agents Suing City, Charge Police Corruption (AP)

By Mike Robinson, The Associated Press

AP, February 23, 2007

CHICAGO - A jury awarded a husband and wife $9.75 million in damages Thursday for a smear and terror campaign aimed at them after they accused a police officer of corruption while working as federal agents.

Diane Klipfel and Michael Casali hugged and kissed their friends and their attorney after the jury delivered its verdict in the civil trial.

"I'm relieved that the ordeal is finally over and justice is served," Casali, an agent with the federal Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives, told reporters.

City Law Department spokeswoman Jennifer Hoyle said officials were disappointed and were reviewing appeals options.

The verdict ended a five-week trial focusing on Joseph Miedzianowski, sometimes described as Chicago's most corrupt police officer.

Miedzianowski was convicted in April 2001 of masterminding a Chicago-to-Miami cocaine pipeline and supplying guns and ammunition to the very street gangs he was supposed to be investigating. He is serving a life sentence at a federal prison in California.

Klipfel is a retired ATF agent and Casali still is an agent. They say Miedzianowski smeared them with misconduct allegations and terrified them with threats after they leveled corruption charges against him in 1992 while working in the Chicago ATF office. They say they were so frightened, their children slept in a closet in the interior of the house in case shots were fired through the walls.

DOJ_NMG_0135667

Jurors leaving the court scoffed at city officials' claim that they conducted an 18-month investigation of Miedzianowski but never interviewed Klipfel and Casali, and were unable to uncover evidence of corruption at the time.

"You run an investigation and never interview the main person who made the complaint?" juror Joe Karl said. He and other jurors also said they gave greater credence to testimony that Miedzianowski frightened people after seeing a tape of a deposition at his California prison.

"Joe Miedzianowski is a scary, scary guy, a frightening guy with a winning personality," said Sally H. Saltzberg, the lead attorney for Klipfel and Casali. She said he was able to use his personality to manipulate public officials and get away with corruption for 14 years.

Witnesses who testified during the trial included Chicago police Superintendent Phil Cline, who was once Miedzianowski's supervisor, and other police officials.

Cline testified that he suspected Miedzianowski of stealing police documents twice in the early 1990s. He said evidence of the second instance became part of the federal indictment against the officer.

"Joe Miedzianowski was an aberration in this department and a disgrace to his star," Cline testified.

The jury awarded Klipfel $7.75 million for violation of her rights by both Miedzianowski and the city. It awarded her $1 million for defamation of character by Miedzianowski while acting in his role as a city employee.

It also awarded Casali $1 million for Miedzianowski's violation of his rights while acting as a city employee.

Saltzberg said the city would have to pay the entire $9.75 million because Miedzianowski is believed to have no money. She said the couple's attorneys would ask the court to award them fees in the $1 million range.

ATF Agents Faced Cop Retaliation, Jury Rules (CHIT)

By Jeff Coen, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, February 23, 2007

Jurors awarded nearly $10 million in damages Thursday to a couple who said the Chicago Police Department retaliated against them after they tried to report corrupt former Officer Joseph Miedzianowski in 1992.

Diane Klipfel, a former agent with the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, and her husband, Michael Casali, a current agent, charged in their lawsuit that Miedzianowski turned internal probes against them and trashed their reputations after they came forward with allegations that the officer was stealing from drug dealers.

Juror Megan Cox said the key to the case was the Chicago Police Department's "incompetent, lazy and overall negligent" internal investigation into the corrupt officer.

The plaintiffs had argued that Miedzianowski was allowed to select witnesses and bring them in for questioning himself and that Klipfel wasn't interviewed.

Juror Joe Karl said that was especially outrageous given that the corruption was reported by a federal agent.

"How do you run an investigation and not interview the person making the complaint?" Karl said.

The largest part of the $9.75 million award came for the jury's decision that the city and Miedzianowski violated Klipfel's civil rights. Klipfel had testified she was forced from ATF after the Police Department retaliated against her and that she moved her children out of state at times, fearing for their safety.

Sally Saltzberg, lawyer for the couple, said she was happy the jury accepted her argument.

"This was not an investigation, it was a coverup," she said.

It was not until years later, in 2001, that Miedzianowski finally was convicted in federal court of running a Chicago-to-Miami drug ring and was sentenced to life in prison.

Miedzianowski was arrested a few months after federal investigators had tapped his home telephone. The probe captured a 1998 conversation between Miedzianowski and Raymond Risley, who was the head of the police internal affairs division when Miedzianowski was being investigated.

Jurors had listened this month as Risley spoke of Klipfel's suit and dismissed her allegations as the "ranting of a lunatic." He also could be heard telling Miedzianowski that he had kept evidence.

DOJ_NMG_0135668

A videotaped deposition of Miedzianowski also was compelling, jurors said, adding that they saw an intense man who was prone to explosive anger.

The city is expected to pay the entire award, as the panel found that even as an individual, Miedzianowski was acting within the scope of his city employment.

Jennifer Hoyle of the city's Law Department said the city is disappointed by the jury's verdict.

"We are reviewing all of our appellate options," Hoyle said.

City lawyers had argued that Klipfel had her own woes at ATF and said a police internal affairs officer brought information to federal authorities that brought Miedzianowski down.

Klipfel and Casali said they are glad to have the trial behind them.

Klipfel said all she ever wanted was for Miedzianowski to be investigated and for police who were supposed to stop him to be held accountable.

"I never dreamed Mike and I would not be believed," she said. "And that they could do to us what they did."

jcoen@tribune.com

City Man Guilty Of 27 Crimes, All Violent (PHI)

By John Shiffman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, February 23, 2007

A Philadelphia man secretly recorded on tape talking about a plot to detonate pipe bombs inside the Gallery at Market East mall was convicted yesterday of 27 unrelated violent crimes that are likely to send him to prison for life.

The verdicts against Andre L. Henry are significant, federal authorities said, because they represent a brazen case of a felon using women with clean records to make straw gun purchases, then using the weapons in a crime spree.

The jury found that shortly after the women helped Henry buy assault rifles, shotguns and handguns in 2003, he robbed two banks and seven fast-food restaurants, fired shots at a Philadelphia police officer and solicited the murder of grand-jury witnesses.

Henry, 29, also faces two decade-old state murder charges. He spent much of his federal trial wearing an electronic stun belt after U.S. marshals said they caught him trying to sneak a seven-inch homemade knife into the courtroom.

Near the end of the two-week trial, Henry testified that the person who confessed to the 27 crimes on a secret recording is actually his twin brother. Assistant U.S. Attorneys Michelle Rotella and Susan Fields presented evidence that Henry does not have a twin brother.

"His story is just absurd," Rotella told jurors.

U.S. District Judge Jan E. Dubois scheduled sentencing for May 24. Under the advisory federal guidelines, Henry probably faces life imprisonment.

Henry, who quietly stroked his chin as the verdicts were read, plans to appeal, said his attorney, Christopher Warren. As Henry was escorted from court, he said: "I'll be back."

John Hageman, a spokesman for the Bureau of Alcohol Tobacco and Firearms, said that the Henry case "truly exhibits the danger and violence brought to Philadelphia by these illegally purchased firearms."

"This case also shows that this is a regional problem," Hageman said. "All of the guns were purchased in Montgomery County."

Jurors in the federal case were not told directly about the alleged 2003 Gallery bombing plot because Henry was not charged with such a crime.

However, Henry brought it up unexpectedly on cross-examination. He made vague references to the Gallery and "domestic terrorism."

Henry's cellmate secretly taped Henry talking about a plot to set off pipe bombs in the food-court area of the Gallery during rush hour.

According to a portion of the transcript of the conversation in the cell - a portion not played for jurors - Henry said he was working with an unidentified man.

DOJ_NMG_0135669

Henry: "He thought it was a good idea to plant the explosives, so I did some recon and scoped them out."

Williams: "Do you know where the explosives was gonna be placed?"

Henry: "Yeah... the Gallery. Around three o'clock and see how see how busy it is because he said that might be a good target."

The alleged Gallery plot was first disclosed in an Inquirer article published Wednesday. Information in the article was based on transcripts of the Henry-Williams recording and of a grand jury proceeding. Neither transcript was used during the trial, but the transcripts had been part of the public case file. Yesterday, in response to The Inquirer report, the judge sealed both transcripts.

Henry was arrested in October 2003 for a parole violation, shortly after ATF agents conducted a compliance inspection at Abington Gun Sports Inc. and noticed that a young woman had purchased two 12-gauge shotguns and three rifles, including an AK-47, in one month's time. The woman acknowledged that she bought them for Henry, who could not lawfully buy them because he had a felony criminal record.

Soon after, federal and state authorities searched Henry's home, found the weapons and more: a Point Blank bulletproof vest, $14,000 in pink dye-stained cash and photos of Henry and others holding weapons.

Williams, who was serving time for a parole violation at the same state prison as Henry, wrote to ATF agents and offered to wear the wire.

Under the guise of helping Henry prepare his legal case, the cellmate got Henry to talk about his crimes. Besides speaking about the alleged Gallery plot, Henry was recorded speaking about other crimes.

"The robberies of the fast food joints was to buy the guns... so we can actually pull off the bank robberies," Henry said on the tape. "The purpose of the bank robberies was to buy fake identification to leave the country, after we were gonna set the explosives."

IMMIGRATION:

Senate Hearing To Push Bush On Immigration (WT)

By Charles Hurt

The Washington Times, February 23, 2007

Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick J. Leahy will hold a hearing next week that he hopes will get the Bush administration to confirm publicly that it wants "comprehensive immigration reform" this year.

"Chairman Leahy is looking for the Bush administration to walk the walk on comprehensive immigration reform," Tracy Schmaler, spokeswoman for the Vermont Democrat, said yesterday. "President Bush has publicly indicated his support for comprehensive reforms that would provide a realistic solution to bringing millions out of shadows, improve internal and border security and meet the pressing needs of employers for willing workers."

Commerce Secretary Carlos Gutierrez and Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff will testify at the Wednesday hearing.

The White House yesterday said Mr. Bush remains committed to comprehensive reform, which many Republicans fear will contain some sort of amnesty for illegal aliens and usher millions of new foreign workers into the country.

"In his State of the Union address, the president called on Congress to pass comprehensive immigration reform that will secure our borders, enhance interior and work-site enforcement, create a temporary-worker program and resolve -- without amnesty or animosity -- the status of illegal immigrants already here," Bush spokesman Scott Stanzel said.

"The president would like Congress to address immigration reform as soon as possible, as the issue is not getting any less complicated with the passage of time," he said.

Last year, Mr. Bush supported legislation that the Senate approved but was rejected by the Republican-led House. That bill offered a direct path to citizenship for most of the 12 million aliens in the country.

DOJ_NMG_0135670

With Democrats now controlling both chambers and Mr. Bush sharing their views on immigration, conservatives worry about what will come of legislation this year. But Democrats have been adamant that Mr. Bush take an active role in the immigration debate so that he will share equally any criticism over the legislation.

"As the Senate begins the process of considering bipartisan legislation, Chairman Leahy believes it is important for the committee to hear from administration officials, in clear and unequivocal terms, their commitment to passing comprehensive immigration reform this year," Miss Schmaler said.

Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat, plans to introduce a major bill sometime after next week, his office said yesterday.

Mr. Kennedy's staff has kept the administration informed on the developments of drafting the bill, according to Mr. Kennedy's office. And, after a Jan. 8 meeting at the White House on another matter, Mr. Bush pulled Mr. Kennedy aside to reiterate his support for comprehensive immigration reform this year.

Several Republicans on Capitol Hill who supported last year's comprehensive reform, however, now complain that they have been left out of negotiations. As a consequence, they and others worry that the bill is being pushed further to the left than last year's final bill.

Among those who complain of being left out of negotiations is Sen. Sam Brownback, Kansas Republican who supported last year's legislation and is running for his party's presidential nomination.

But Senate aides said yesterday that Mr. Brownback has skipped or canceled meetings at which he was invited to discuss the bill with Mr. Kennedy and Sen. John McCain, Arizona Republican and co-author of the bill.

"He's chosen not to be involved and canceled meeting after meeting," said one Senate staffer with knowledge of negotiations. "He's chosen to distance himself from a bill that he was an original co-sponsor of because of presidential politics."

Smugglers Raise Stakes In Fight Over Border Rule (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, February 23, 2007

Rival alien and drug smugglers on the U.S.-Mexico border are targeting each other in a wave of escalating violence to win control of smuggling corridors into the United States, with at least four recent killings tied to efforts to kidnap migrants for ransom.

Three of the killings took place Feb. 8 north of Tucson, Ariz., in what federal and state law-enforcement authorities have described as one of the nation's most popular alien- and drug-smuggling corridors. Another occurred Jan. 28, south of Tucson.

Authorities said gang members are kidnapping illegal aliens being guided into the United States, demanding ransoms of up to $2,500 a person and killing the illegals, along with gang rivals, who resist. The kidnappings save the gangs the cost of recruiting migrants in Mexico and hiring guides, or "coyotes," to bring them across the border.

They also said some gang members are thought to have targeted "stash houses" in Phoenix, where illegal aliens are taken to await transportation to cities across the country.

Violence on the U.S.-Mexico border has risen dramatically over the past three years in what U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) has called "an unprecedented surge." ICE has established intelligence and investigative operations along the border to combat the increased brutality.

In a recent report, ICE said the border gangs, which collect hundreds of millions of dollars annually in illicit profits, are becoming increasingly ruthless -- against their victims, rivals and federal, state and local police.

Much of that violence has targeted U.S. Border Patrol agents, who have seen a spike in incidents as the agency continues its efforts to bring larger areas of the border under operational control. Violence directed at agents has included physical and vehicle assaults, and shooting incidents.

Gunfire has become commonplace along the border, authorities said, particularly in the alien- and drug-smuggling corridors of southern Arizona. They said about 90 percent of the migrants headed north out of Mexico have hired a coyote to guide them into the United States.

DOJ_NMG_0135671

T.J. Bonner, president of the National Border Patrol Council, which represents all 11,000 of the agency's non-supervisory agents, said violence by gangs battling for control of smuggling routes into the United States has increased dramatically, and is now spilling over into some U.S. communities.

Mr. Bonner said that while much of the violence is directed at rival gang members, there is what he called an "inevitable spillover that touches innocent civilians and law-enforcement officials on both sides of the border." He noted that the number of assaults against Border Patrol agents has more than doubled over the past two years.

"Cartels are far more inclined to utilize violence as a means of achieving their goal of successfully smuggling contraband and people," he said.

In the Feb. 8 incident, three Guatemalan nationals in a truck carrying illegal aliens were killed and three others wounded. One man, identified as a coyote, was killed in the Jan. 28 ambush as he drove across the desert with a load of 15 to 20 illegals, who fled.

The February incident followed by a day the attack of illegal aliens being led out of Mexico near Sasabe, Ariz., about 70 miles southwest of Tucson, by four men carrying assault weapons and wearing ski masks. The aliens were robbed, but none was reported injured.

Men armed with assault rifles also approached a National Guard site on the border near Sasabe on Jan. 3. The armed guardsmen were ordered to relocate to a safer location. They called the Border Patrol, which responded 16 minutes later, but the intruders had fled. No shots were fired, and no one was injured. The armed men have not been identified.

State and local law-enforcement officials on the border have said they are outgunned and outmanned by drug- and alien-smugglers armed with automatic weapons, grenade launchers, bazookas, improvised explosive devices, and state-of-the-art communications and tracking systems.

The rising border violence also has been attributed by authorities to efforts by the street gang Mara Salvatrucha, or MS-13, to win control of drug- and alien-smuggling routes into the United States. The Border Patrol's field-intelligence center said MS-13 has aligned with drug cartels in Mexico and Colombia, and seeks unfettered access to smuggling corridors.

The intelligence center said the MS-13 presence has increased competition between rival gangs that must vie for areas where they can ply their trade. The result, it said, has been an increase in violence as rival gangs struggle for domination.

MS-13 members also reportedly have accepted contracts to assassinate Border Patrol agents to intimidate and frighten agents away from the border.

Homeland Security Strategy Hits Executives, Illegal Workers (WSJ)

By Robert Block

The Wall Street Journal, February 23, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Pressing ahead with its new strategy to "attack the economic engine" that fuels most illegal migration into the U.S., Homeland Security agents arrested three top executives of a national cleaning service for allegedly employing illegal immigrants and defrauding the government. The sweep also netted nearly 200 employees believed to be illegal immigrants.

Nevada-based Rosenbaum-Cunningham International Inc., or RCI, provided cleaning and maintenance services to popular hospitality venues and restaurants like Hard Rock Cafe, ESPN Zone and House of Blues, taking in more than $54.3 million between 2001 and 2005, Homeland Security officials said yesterday.

According to a 23-count indictment unsealed yesterday, the company knowingly hired illegal immigrants, intentionally failed to withhold taxes and created shell accounts to line the pockets of top executives. RCI co-owners Richard M. Rosenbaum and Edward Scott Cunningham and firm controller Christina Flocken face criminal fraud, immigration and tax charges.

Another 195 people working for RCI as cleaners were arrested on illegal-immigration charges in raids in 17 states and Washington, D.C. A message on an answering machine for RCI in Florida said it had ceased operations as of yesterday. The government said its investigation was ongoing.

U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement, part of the Department of Homeland Security, began the investigation 20 months ago over concerns about cleaning crews at the Grand Traverse Resort in northwestern Michigan.

DOJ_NMG_0135672

Janitorial companies competing for lucrative chain-store and office-building cleaning contracts are often magnets for undocumented workers. In 2003, federal agents rounded up 250 illegal immigrants working as cleaning crews in 61 Wal-Marts across 21 states. Twelve federal agents also descended on Wal-Mart Stores Inc. offices in Bentonville, Ark. Brandishing a search warrant, they made off with 18 boxes of documents from the company's operations department, mostly records related to cleaning contractors dating back to March 2000. In the end, Wal-Mart wasn't criminally charged for using the contractors companies but agreed to pay $11 million in fines in 2005.

More recently, DHS has decided to target company executives who may know about, and benefit from, illegal hiring practices.

"We know that targeting unscrupulous employers is crucial to deterring illegal immigration," Julie Myers, assistant secretary of homeland security in charge of ICE, said in a statement announcing the arrests. "Today's charges against RCI executives reflect the federal government's commitment to addressing the employment magnet for illegal immigration and ensuring businesses comply with our laws."

Earlier this month, Homeland Security Secretary Michael Chertoff promised that there would be more work-site enforcement arrests and promised to bring high-impact criminal cases against employers who systematically violate immigration laws.

He said that in 2006, DHS set a new record, in terms of work-site enforcement cases, with 716 criminal arrests and more than 3,600 administrative apprehensions. That was a 700% increase since 2002, before the department was created.

Janitor-service Chiefs Charged In Illegals Ring (WT)

By Jerry Seper

The Washington Times, February 23, 2007

Three top executives at a nationwide cleaning service were named in a federal grand jury indictment unsealed yesterday, charged with conspiracy, fraud and tax crimes in an ongoing investigation that has netted more than 200 illegal aliens who worked as janitors.

The illegal aliens, all of whom were employed by Florida-based cleaning contractor Rosenbaum-Cunningham International Inc. (RCI), were arrested in 17 states at 63 locations -- including the Hard Rock Cafe, ESPN Zone, Planet Hollywood, Dave & Busters and the House of Blues restaurants.

Homeland Security Assistant Secretary Julie L. Myers, who heads U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE), said RCI co-owners Richard M. Rosenbaum, 60, of Longwood, Fla., and Edward Scott Cunningham, 43, of West Palm Beach, Fla., and the firm's controller, Christina Flocken, 59, also of Longwood, were named in the 23-count indictment unsealed in U.S. District Court in Grand Rapids, Mich.

The indictment and arrests were the latest in a series of high-profile efforts by the Bush administration to strengthen its immigration-enforcement credentials as Congress and the White House begin debate on a new round of immigration legislation.

Much of that effort has been aimed at work-site enforcement, targeting and bringing administrative sanctions against employers who hire illegal aliens.

In the past 10 months, ICE and other federal agencies have raided, among others, Swift & Co., arresting 1,300 illegal aliens in six states and finding that 30 percent of the company's work force used fraudulent documents to be hired. Also, at IFCO Systems North America, seven company managers were charged with harboring illegal aliens for financial gain and 1,200 illegals were apprehended at 40 locations nationwide.

Cecilia Munoz, a senior vice president at the National Council of La Raza, which has called on the Bush administration to root out unscrupulous employers who hire and exploit migrant workers, applauded the government's targeting of the RCI officials, saying it was "the kind of immigration enforcement" the country needed.

"By the sound of it, these employers were taking outrageous advantage of these workers," she said.

The ICE-led investigation began 20 months ago, when agents focused on cleaning crews at the Grand Traverse Resort in northwestern Michigan.

"We know that targeting unscrupulous employers is crucial to deterring illegal immigration," Mrs. Myers said.

DOJ_NMG_0135673

According to the indictment, RCI, which is licensed in Nevada, operated a cleaning and grounds-maintenance service that contracted with theme restaurant chains and hospitality venues throughout the United States, most of which were predominantly staffed by illegal aliens.

The indictment said that the restaurant chains and hospitality venues paid RCI more than $54.3 million for janitorial services from 2001 to 2005 and that by failing to collect and pay federal income, Social Security, Medicare and federal employment taxes on the wages it paid to its work force, RCI was able to evade payment of more than $18.6 million in employment taxes.

Mr. Rosenbaum, Mr. Cunningham and Mrs. Flocken, according to the indictment, spent about $34 million of the firm's revenue to operate RCI and divided the remainder, about $20 million, among themselves. It said they disguised the true nature of their activities and obstructed the Internal Revenue Service by creating several shell companies and bank accounts to hide their excess funds.

The excess funds, according to U.S. Attorney Margaret M. Chiara in Michigan, were used by Mr. Rosenbaum, Mr. Cunningham and Mrs. Flocken to pay personal expenses for items such as luxury boats, vehicles, lavish homes and racehorses.

If convicted, the RCI officials face 15 years in prison and $18 million in restitution fees.

"This case is an excellent example of the cooperative efforts of federal law-enforcement agencies," Mrs. Chiara said.

RCI officials were not available yesterday. A message on the company's answering machine said it had ceased operations.

In addition to the indictment, ICE arrested more than 200 illegal aliens Wednesday night and yesterday morning as part of the ongoing operation.

The indictment is part of a continuing criminal prosecution against the principals and certain employees of RCI.

Santiago Echaniz, an ex-RCI supervisor, pleaded guilty to charges of harboring illegal aliens and making a false statement on a tax return. Former RCI employees Ofmara Maltos-Trevino and Miguel Martinez-Garcia pleaded guilty to aiding and abetting the unlawful employment of aliens, and Juanita Schlagel pleaded guilty to a two-count indictment charging trafficking in means of identification.

Janitorial Service Officials Charged In Sweep Of Illegal Immigrants (WP)

By Spencer S. Hsu

The Washington Post, February 23, 2007

Three top executives of a janitorial service used by such national restaurant chains as Hard Rock Cafe and ESPN Zone face charges of tax evasion, fraud and harboring illegal immigrants, U.S. officials announced yesterday, after overnight raids in 18 states netted about 200 undocumented workers.

Authorities unsealed a 23-count indictment returned Feb. 15 by a grand jury in Grand Rapids, Mich., against co-owners Richard M. Rosenbaum, 60, and Edward Scott Cunningham, 43, and controller Christina A. Flocken, 59, of Rosenbaum-Cunningham International Inc., of Palm Beach, Fla.

The trio allegedly failed to pay $18.6 million in federal employment taxes on $54 million in custodial and grounds-keeping contracts between 2001 and 2005 at the chains, which also included House of Blues, Planet Hollywood, Dave and Busters, Yard House and China Grill, U.S. officials said. The restaurants' parent companies were not charged.

Raids targeted 63 locations in 17 states and the District of Columbia, from California to Florida and New York, including ESPN Zone restaurants in Washington and Baltimore, U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement officials said. Illegal workers face administrative charges and deportation.

The case marked the latest wrinkle in a renewed campaign by the Bush administration to crack down on employers as Congress debates an overhaul of the nation's immigration laws. ICE arrested 716 individuals on criminal charges last year, up from a few dozen in recent years.

The government lost a criminal case against Tyson Foods employees in 2003, ended a criminal investigation against Wal-Mart in 2005 after negotiating an $11 million civil fine, and charged workers but not managers in raids against meatpacker Swift & Co. last year, but it continued to target smaller companies with criminal probes. Subjects included a California fence-building company, a Kentucky home-building firm, a Texas-based transportation pallet firm, and a temporary labor service in Ohio.

DOJ_NMG_0135674

Commercial cleaning services are a $100 billion U.S. industry employing nearly 1 million workers across the private sector. According to prosecutors, RCI supervisors and about 155 on-site managers allegedly hired hundreds of workers since 1997 without job applications, W-4 tax withholding or I-9 employment eligibility forms, or W-2 wage and tax statements. The company recruited through word of mouth and advertisements at job fairs, festivals and in Spanish-language newspapers. In one case, an employee allegedly bought 20 phony green cards.

The trio allegedly paid workers in cash and set up shell companies, with such names as Ricurt Inc., Monker and Sunchaser Service Corp., to hide assets from the Internal Revenue Service, the indictment said. Dividing nearly $7 million, defendants allegedly purchased "racehorses, fancy boats and lavish homes" in Florida and California, said Department of Homeland Security Assistant Secretary Julie L. Myers. Assistant U.S. Attorney Hagen Frank said Rosenbaum was arrested in central Florida. Cunningham and Flocken are expected to surrender to officials soon, an ICE spokesman said.

John Vandevelde and Jeffrey Rutherford, attorneys for Cunningham, released a statement noting that the use of undocumented workers "pervades many industries throughout the United States," and added that his client was cooperating fully and "expects to resolve this matter to everyone's satisfaction."

Vincent J. Marella and Evan Jenness, attorneys for Rosenbaum and Flocken, respectively, did not respond to requests for comment.

The investigation began 20 months ago after tips by a cleaning crew at the Grand Traverse Resort in Michigan. Earlier, a former RCI supervisor, two ex-employees and a state of Michigan employee pleaded guilty to related charges.

Cleaning Executives Indicted In $18 Million Fraud (NYT)

By Libby Sander

The New York Times, February 23, 2007

CHICAGO, Feb. 22 — Three executives of a national cleaning and maintenance company were indicted on Thursday on charges of defrauding the federal government of more than $18 million in employment taxes owed on behalf of hundreds of illegal immigrant workers.

The company, Rosenbaum-Cunningham International, performed janitorial services for theme-restaurant chains like the House of Blues, Hard Rock Cafe and Dave & Busters, as well as for the Grand Traverse Resort and Spa in Acme, Mich.

Nearly 200 immigrant workers at some of the restaurants were arrested early Thursday in 17 states and the District of Columbia as part of the investigation of the company, which is being conducted by United States Immigration and Customs Enforcement and the Internal Revenue Service.

The indictment says the executives hired illegal immigrants, primarily from Mexico, Honduras and Guatemala, and then constructed an elaborate scheme of shell companies, bank accounts and cash-only payroll procedures to avoid paying millions of dollars in federal taxes on the workers' wages from 1999 until today.

The executives are the company president, Richard M. Rosenbaum; its vice president, Edward Scott Cunningham; and its controller, Christina A. Flocken. The 23-count indictment was unsealed on Thursday in Federal District Court in Grand Rapids, Mich.

Mr. Rosenbaum, 60, of Longwood, Fla., was arrested on Thursday in Florida and was held in federal custody there. Mr. Cunningham, 43, of West Palm Beach, Fla., and Ms. Flocken, 59, also of Longwood, were issued subpoenas and are expected to appear voluntarily in Federal District Court in Western Michigan. No court dates have been set.

The company is incorporated in Nevada but operates primarily out of West Palm Beach.

From 2001 to 2005, the government says, Rosenbaum-Cunningham International received gross payments from its various clients of $54,327,845.

By failing to pay taxes on their employees' income, Social Security and Medicare, the three executives cheated the government of $18,640,345 and used about a third of the excess money to finance the "extravagant lifestyle costs" of lavish houses, luxury boats, racehorses and college tuition, the indictment said.

Cleaning Company Executives Accused Of Employing Illegal Workers (USAT)

By Donna Leinwand

DOJ_NMG_0135675

USA Today, February 23, 2007

WASHINGTON — The president of a nationwide cleaning company that counts Hard Rock Cafe and Planet Hollywood theme restaurants among its customers was arrested Thursday for allegedly hiring hundreds of illegal workers.

Federal agents arrested 195 allegedly illegal workers at 63 businesses in 17 states and Washington, D.C., as part of the investigation into RCI International, a janitorial contracting company owned by Richard Rosenbaum, 60, of Longwood, Fla.

An indictment made public Thursday charges Rosenbaum with conspiracy to defraud the United States, harboring illegal immigrants and evading employment taxes.

Also charged in the indictment filed in U.S. District Court in Grand Rapids, Mich., were company Vice President Edward Scott Cunningham, 43, of West Palm Beach, Fla., and Controller Christina Flocken, 59, also of Longwood.

Attorneys representing Rosenbaum, Cunningham and Flocken did not return phone messages left at their offices Thursday.

RCI allegedly hired hundreds of illegal workers from Mexico, Honduras, Guatemala and Haiti and, in some cases, provided them with false immigration papers, the indictment said. The laborers were allegedly paid in cash to avoid reporting the income to the IRS, court papers say.

Prosecutors say the business failed to pay more than $18 million in employment taxes. RCI had contracts to clean the Grand Traverse Resort & Spa in Acme, Mich., and theme restaurants, including House of Blues, Planet Hollywood, Hard Rock Cafe, Dave and Busters, Yard House, ESPN Zone and China Grill, the indictment said.

Rosenbaum, Cunningham and Flocken allegedly skimmed money from the company to finance a luxurious lifestyle that included multiple houses in Florida and California, race horses and boats, the indictment said.

"They were able to do this because these employees were basically off the books," federal prosecutor Hagen Frank said. "They became millionaires."

The investigation began two years ago when police in Grand Rapids arrested a man who provided fraudulent documents. That arrest led Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) agents to 23 other illegal laborers working at the Grand Traverse Resort & Spa, which had contracted more than $3 million in RCI cleaning services from June 1997 to March 2006, ICE Assistant Secretary Julie Myers said Thursday.

When the resort demanded proof that RCI employed legal workers, Rosenbaum authorized his site manager to acquire fake immigration papers, Myers said. The site manager paid $3,460 for the cards and was reimbursed and paid a $1,000 bonus by Flocken from company accounts, the indictment said.

Arrests were made in Arizona, California, Colorado, Florida, Georgia, Illinois, Maryland, Michigan, Missouri, Nebraska, Nevada, New Jersey, New York, North Carolina, Pennsylvania, Tennessee, Texas and Washington, D.C.

Cleaning Service Owners Charged In Sweep Of Illegal Immigrants (AP)

By James Prichard, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 23, 2007

(AP) - GRAND RAPIDS, Michigan-An investigation of cleaning crews working at a Michigan resort has led to federal fraud and tax charges being filed against three top officials at a U.S. janitorial service and the arrest of more than 200 illegal immigrants around the country, government officials said.

The detainees - mostly Mexican nationals - who were rounded up early Thursday were working as janitors for Rosenbaum-Cunningham International Inc., or RCI, a Florida-based cleaning contractor.

RCI co-owners Richard M. Rosenbaum, 60, and Edward Scott Cunningham, 43, and firm controller Christina A. Flocken, 59, all of Florida, face criminal fraud, immigration and tax charges in a 23-count indictment unsealed Thursday in U.S. District Court in Grand Rapids.

"This is not a case of bad bookkeeping or skirting the rules," said Brian M. Moskowitz, special agent in charge of the Detroit office of U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement. "It involved flagrant criminal behavior."

DOJ_NMG_0135676

Moskowitz said during a news conference in Grand Rapids that federal agents arrested Rosenbaum in Longwood earlier in the day. Cunningham and Flocken were expected to soon turn themselves in to federal authorities in Grand Rapids, where the case will be tried, he said.

Their practice of paying cash wages to their workers deprived the U.S. government of about $18.6 million (â,¬14.2 million) in employment taxes, according to the indictment.

"In this particular investigation, these defendants took advantage of illegal workers in order to enrich themselves by violating the internal revenue laws that were created specifically to protect the legitimate work force, all at a cost to taxpayers of approximately $18 million (â,¬13.73 million), all so that they could live a very lavish lifestyle and live the high life," said Sandra L. Carter, special agent in charge of the Internal Revenue Service office in Detroit.

About 203 illegal immigrants who worked for RCI were arrested and expected to be deported, Moskowitz said. Agents took them into custody at 63 business locations in 17 states and the District of Columbia.

An outgoing telephone message from RCI's headquarters in Palm Beach, Florida, said the company had "ceased operations" effective Thursday.

There was no home phone listing in Longwood for Rosenbaum and calls could not be completed to West Palm Beach homes listed under Cunningham's name. A woman who identified herself as Flocken hung up on a reporter who called her at home.

The joint ICE-IRS investigation began 20 months ago at the Grand Traverse Resort in Acme in Michigan's northwestern Lower Peninsula.

RCI contracted with the resort between June 1997 and March 2006, according to the indictment. Between 2002 and 2006 alone, Grand Traverse paid RCI more than $3 million (â,¬2.29 million) for grounds and maintenance services, kitchen cleaning and housekeeping duties.

Not only did RCI fail to pay employment taxes on its nationwide operations - its clients included such venues as Planet Hollywood, Hard Rock Cafe and ESPN Zone - but its top officials also had its supervisors procure and maintain a work force of illegal immigrants and authorized managers to provide them with fake resident cards, or green cards, according to the indictment.

Planet Hollywood founder and owner Robert Earl said Thursday evening that his restaurants never used RCI for cleaning. The company did contract with an earlier janitor firm that was operated by the RCI officials, but ended that relationship by 2001, Earl said in an interview with The Associated Press. He denied that janitors at any of his restaurants were included in the sting.

"I have phoned all the restaurants, and we have had no (federal) visits, and do not employ this company," Earl said in a telephone interview from Orlando, Florida.

Spokespeople with the U.S. Attorneys' office in Grand Rapids, Michigan, and U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement could not immediately clarify whether Planet Hollywood was linked to the illegal activity.

The three company officials facing charges also set up shell companies to hide excess assets, the indictment says.

Although the case is being prosecuted in Grand Rapids, none of the illegal immigrants picked up Thursday was arrested in Michigan. 2007-02-22T16:12:11Z

Judge Dismisses Posada's Bid To Be Freed (AP)

By ALICIA A. CALDWELL, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 23, 2007

(AP) - EL PASO, Texas-A federal judge on Wednesday denied a request by an anti-Fidel Castro activist to be released from jail while immigration officials figure out where to deport him to.

U.S. District Judge Philip R. Martinez threw out Luis Posada Carriles' lawsuit after federal prosecutors said immigration officials could not release him because he is in the custody of the U.S. Marshals Service.

Posada, an ex-CIA operative who is suspected of bombing a Cuban jet 31 years ago, left Department of Homeland Security custody after his indictment last month on suspicion of lying in a citizenship application.

DOJ_NMG_0135677

Posada, 79, was arrested two years ago on an immigration violation after he reported paying a smuggler to sneak him into Texas from Mexico.

An immigration judge later ordered that Posada be deported but ruled that he could not be sent to Cuba, where he was born, or Venezuela, where he is a naturalized citizen.

Several countries, including Mexico, have declined to allow Posada in. He sued last year, arguing that the U.S. government cannot hold him indefinitely while they look for a country willing to let him move there.

Governments of both countries want Posada sent to Venezuela to stand trial on charges that he was in Caracas when he plotted the deadly 1976 bombing.

Posada, who had a role in the failed Bay of Pigs invasion of Cuba, has denied any wrongdoing. 2007-02-22T01:31:53Z

TAX:

13 Charged With Fraud Over Tobacco Sales Taxes (MINNST)

By Rochelle Olson And Pam Louwagie

Minneapolis Star Tribune, February 23, 2007

They concealed more than $2.5 million in revenue from the state, the federal indictment says.

Thirteen people face federal charges of defrauding the state of more than $2.5 million in sales tax by concealing revenues from cigarette sales, according to a federal indictment unsealed Thursday.

The indictment, which according to attorneys in the case was unsealed by a U.S. District Court magistrate judge, cites numerous attempts to conceal earnings and wealth through fraudulent bookkeeping and tax returns, as well as property transfers and large cash transactions.

One defendant is accused of stashing $1 million cash in his ceiling, and another allegedly bought a BMW car with $20 and $50 bills.

Scott Tilsen, a federal public defender, said it is too early to know the full extent of what the government claims or what it can prove.

"They've charged a form of tax evasion over a four-year period involving a large number of individuals named and unnamed," Tilsen said. "Traditionally, there's always a few tax prosecutions brought ... as we approach April 15."

The case, the result of a joint investigation by the FBI and the Internal Revenue Service, includes one conspiracy count, 13 mail fraud counts and 26 wire fraud counts.

In addition to conspiracy charges, 11 of the defendants are accused of mail and wire fraud involving false or incomplete sales tax payments or filings.

All but one of the 13 defendants uses or has used the last name Wazwaz.

The defendants own 52 Twin Cities-area tobacco stores, including Wholey Smokes in Blaine, Coon Rapids and Minnetonka, and Mr. Discount Tobacco I in Fridley and II in Roseville.

Transactions date to 1996

The 58-page indictment alleges that the dozens of transactions date from 1996 through the present and details numerous transactions involving thousands of dollars.

The defendants also are accused of transferring nearly $1 million to Jordan, Lebanon and the Palestinian territories through checks, currency and wire transfers backed by the tobacco store proceeds.

An unindicted co-conspirator was caught at the Minneapolis-St. Paul International Airport in March 2003 with six cashier's checks worth $108,030 destined for Lebanon, the indictment said.

"There's millions of Americans who send funds to relatives overseas," Tilsen said, noting that the money can add up over time. He represents Yousef Mahmoud Wazwaz, also known as Joseph Mahmoud.

The indictment alleges that the defendants, in order to conceal their worth, transferred the ownership of the tobacco stores rapidly back and forth to "conceal from the United States the true owner of and who benefited from the stores."

DOJ_NMG_0135678

Despite substantial cash receipts in the stores, the defendants did not deposit a significant portion in their bank accounts but rather "used the cash to pay employees, to acquire inventory, to pay personal expenses or to hoard."

In 2000, the indictment claims, Tawfiq Othman Wazwaz stored $1 million in cash in the "suspended ceiling in the basement of his residence."

Another defendant, Raed Yassin Wazwaz, is alleged to have paid $32,825 in cash for a BMW in 2001, using $20 and $50 bills.

In April 2004, an unindicted coconspirator identified as B.W. "transported $17,500 in currency generated by stores under his control." The owner of Stillwater Tobacco also wrote a check to B.W. for $35,000 in May 2002, claiming it was a "gift," the indictment said.

Some defendants owned homes and cars in the names of others to impede calculation of their income, the indictment said.

Groups of brothers

Most of the defendants belong to four groups of brothers identified by their names: Othman, Mohamed, Yassin and Mahmoud.

They own tobacco stores in the Twin Cities and concealed the revenue and expenses of those stores or the identities of the people deriving economic benefit from their operation, according to the indictment.

At least two of the defendants already have pleaded guilty to federal charges in connection with cigarette sales.

Zuhair Wazwaz, also known as Anthony Stallone, pleaded guilty in 2004 to mail and wire fraud. Adel Salem pleaded guilty that same year to mail fraud. They pleaded guilty to ordering nearly $1 million in cigarettes with no intention of paying for them.

The other defendants are Houd Othman Wazwaz, Fares Othman Wazwaz, Taleb Mohamed Wazwaz, Kennedy Mohamed Wazwaz, Sabry Mohamed Wazwaz and Ziad Mahmoud Wazwaz.

Othman Majed Wazwaz and Kamil Madfoun Al-Esawi are charged only with conspiracy.

Defendant 'shocked'

Defense attorney Richard Kyle said his client Kamil Madfoun Al-Esawi simply worked as a cashier at one of the stores.

"My client is shocked that he's named in this indictment," Kyle said. "He's not a member of this Wazwaz family. ... He has no involvement. He's named in one of the 40 counts. We just don't get it."

Kyle said Al-Esawi had hired him during the investigation.

"Quite frankly, I thought, I was very surprised that he'd ever be named in an indictment."

Staff Writer Dan Browning contributed to this report. The writers are at raolson@startribune.com • 612-673-1747 and plouwagie@startribune.com • 612-673-7102

Corporate Owners Hide Assets, Identities (USAT)

By Kevin McCoy

USA Today, February 23, 2007

Roughly four miles from the famed Las Vegas casino strip, ABC Equity's corporate office is registered in a modest business suite located off West Sahara Avenue.

Great Fortune 600 is registered in the same suite. So are DK Financial, Hill 99, Stock Savant, ZZYZX Holdings — and more than 1,000 other corporations.

They share something in common besides their business address. Each lists the same man as its sole corporate officer in Nevada incorporation records. He is William Reed, a businessman with a suspended law license and the target of a Federal Trade Commission lawsuit that alleges he and a convicted felon teamed in a business that promoted forming Nevada corporations to shield assets "from 'capricious federal judges and any government agency.' "

A USA TODAY computer-aided review shows that the two men and their business, Asset Protection Group, are part of a thriving mini-industry that has capitalized on real or perceived gaps in domestic incorporation laws and virtually non-existent government oversight to promote some U.S. states as secrecy rivals of offshore havens.

DOJ_NMG_0135679

A multi-agency U.S. Money Laundering Threat Assessment issued in 2005 cited Nevada, Wyoming and Delaware as the states with laws most conducive to anonymous corporate ownership. USA TODAY's review, which examined databases of all Nevada and Wyoming incorporations but was unable to obtain comprehensive data for Delaware, found:

•A Florida man who served a federal prison term for an international currency trading scam used his secret ownership of a Nevada corporation to launch a similar fraud after he was released. More than 120 victims lost $8 million.

•Interpol or other international investigators probing suspected crimes overseas have contacted the Wyoming Secretary of State's office about corporations registered by a businessman whose Internet-based venture advertised using Wyoming firms to shield assets.

•The sole publicly listed officer for nearly 100 firms incorporated in Wyoming is a woman whose listed address is a postal box in the Republic of Seychelles, an Indian Ocean nation that has been the focus of corporate secrecy concerns.

USA TODAY's findings buttressed the money laundering report's warning that a "race to the bottom" among states vying to set minimal corporate information requirements has enabled companies to hide the identities of their owners, thereby making it harder for law enforcement agencies to track suspected tax evasion, money laundering and other crimes.

"The purpose of corporations originally was to provide limited liability, not anonymity," said Sen. Carl Levin, D-Mich., chairman of the Senate Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations, which held a recent hearing on the issue. "Now they're providing both limited liability and anonymity, and the law enforcement folks … are very upset. They want to know who it is that's behind these corporations."

Concern about camouflaged corporate ownership prompted the IRS to list the tactic this week in its 2007 "Dirty Dozen" tax scams. The IRS said anonymous entities are facilitating "underreporting of income, non-filing of tax returns … money laundering, financial crimes and possibly terrorist financing."

Most states don't require companies to provide ownership information when they incorporate. And they exercise virtually no oversight on the corporations' internal operations. In part, that's because most corporations operate legally, generate new jobs and fuel economic expansion, plus registration fees.

Nevada and Wyoming officials said their laws encourage legitimate businesses with reasonable registration requirements. "The law isn't unscrupulous. It's the individuals that use it in an improper manner," said Tom Cowan, head of the securities division in the Wyoming Secretary of State's office.

But law enforcement officials say relaxed state requirements let the mini-industry facilitate formation of shell companies that have no employees, exist chiefly on paper, yet conduct financial transactions.

Most states require companies to list the names of their officers in incorporation filings. However, a 2006 Government Accountability Office report showed most states do not bar the use of nominee officers, who may be straw men who camouflage the identities and activities of the real owners.

Secrecy marketers in the mini-industry provide nominee officers for Nevada and Wyoming corporations for an annual fee. They also tout the use of so-called bearer shares, an ownership system in which controlling shares may be physically transferred from one person to another in secret.

Referring to corporations whose owners are shielded by nominee officers, bearer shares and other tactics, the money laundering report said "Delaware, Nevada and Wyoming are often cited as the most accommodating jurisdictions in the United States for the organization of these legal entities."

The Nevada Secretary of State's website even proclaims: "No IRS Information Sharing Agreement."

Secretary of State officials in Nevada and Wyoming said in interviews that while they cooperate with law enforcement agencies, current laws in most cases don't let them challenge or investigate incorporations. "We're a filing office, and we don't make the law," said Nevada Deputy Secretary of State Scott Anderson, head of the Commercial Recordings Division.

Nonetheless, the officials said their state legislatures are expected to respond to law enforcement concerns by enacting changes as early as this year to close real or perceived loopholes.

That's welcome news for John Colledge, head of the Reno office of Immigration and Customs Enforcement. He complained that corporate anonymity, a "large stumbling block," thwarted him in 2004 when he checked a bank's tip about a Swiss man who had formed two Nevada corporations.

DOJ_NMG_0135680

The man had flown from Zurich to Reno and opened corporate accounts that received thousands of euros and quickly redirected the funds overseas, Colledge said. Although he suspected that the funds were being laundered, Colledge said he could not get enough information to determine for sure.

"To fly from Zurich to Reno for a long weekend is a very unusual sort of thing. I think most of us (in law enforcement) who have some experience in this international area historically would look at somebody flying from Reno to Switzerland to do something in reverse," said Colledge.

The operations of Asset Protection Group demonstrate the level of anonymous activity available under some states' incorporation laws. The firm attracted clients in part with a promotional video in which actor Robert Wagner warned that without asset protection, "You could lose everything you've worked so hard for, in a flash."

Wagner publicist Alan Nierob called the video "a one-shot deal," and said his client didn't endorse Asset Protection Group.

USA TODAY's analysis found that more than 1,000 Nevada corporations list William Reed, a 56-year-old executive identified in the Federal Trade Commission lawsuit as Asset Protection Group's operator, as the sole officer. Each corporation listed the firm's office address as its own.

A Colorado Supreme Court disciplinary panel suspended Reed's law license in 1997 for "dishonest" conduct in transferring purported ownership interests to employees of his former law firm, a court record shows. Reed did not seek reinstatement. Separately, under questioning in an October deposition for the Federal Trade Commission case, Reed said he was under IRS investigation.

Government lawyers in the case allege that Reed teamed with Richard Neiswonger, 55, who headed Asset Protection Group's marketing affiliate. Court records show Neiswonger was sentenced to 18 months in federal prison in 1998 after pleading guilty to money laundering and wire fraud charges. The case involved misleading marketing claims in a previous business.

The Federal Trade Commission lawsuit alleges Reed, Neiswonger and Asset Protection Group used misleading income projections to defraud scores of consultants who paid $9,800 each in hope of marketing the firm's privacy tactics.

Defense attorneys said Reed, Neiswonger and Asset Protection Group did nothing wrong. They have asked U.S. District Judge Stephen Limbaugh to dismiss the lawsuit. Limbaugh named a receiver to administer Asset Protection Group pending the outcome of the case.

The receiver, Robb Evans & Associates, alleged in court filings that Asset Protection Group may have facilitated money laundering by a suspected crime ring thousands of miles away. Police in Fairfax County, Va., notified Asset Protection Group in May that suspects in a string of identity thefts had used the company "to set up multiple corporations and open bank accounts," the receiver reported in a court filing.

"I have reviewed bank statements for two of the corporations, and over $500,000 in apparently stolen funds (from the suspected Virginia identity thefts) was deposited in these accounts," M. Val Miller, an attorney working with the court receiver, wrote.

Fairfax police said no arrests had been made in the case. Miller said detectives told the receiver's office the suspects were believed to have fled the country.

Anderson, the Nevada deputy secretary of state, said the agency did not know about the federal allegations against Reed, Neiswonger and Asset Protection group.

The Secretary of State's office became aware of another Nevada corporation, Par Three Financial, in 2005 after the Securities and Exchange Commission filed a federal court complaint that accused the firm and its secret owner of using a pyramid scheme to scam investors. In such a scheme, money from newly recruited investors is used to pay those who invested earlier.

Nevada records show Par Three was based in Las Vegas and at various times listed a Carson City businessman or a Nevada attorney as its sole publicly listed officer. But, the SEC lawsuit alleged, the company was secretly controlled by Melvin Ruth, a Florida felon who served nearly three years in federal prison after he pleaded guilty to conspiracy to commit mail and wire fraud in a scam involving stolen investments.

DOJ_NMG_0135681

In November 2003, shortly after he was released from prison, Ruth allegedly used Par Three to mount a similar scam. The firm offered potential investors a monthly return of at least 2% on loans to check-cashing stores, company and court records show. Par Three raised at least $8 million from more than 120 investors who were unaware of Ruth's role, the SEC alleged.

In December 2005, the SEC got a court judgment that permanently restrained Ruth and anyone working with him from violating securities laws. The judgment ordered Ruth to pay a civil penalty and give up ill-gotten gains, with interest. Ruth died last year of cancer complications amid efforts to recover Par Three assets that could repay investors, said his lawyer, Carl Schoeppl.

USA TODAY's review of incorporations found that Wyoming, like Nevada, has multiple examples where a single person is the sole officer for a string of companies.

Guillermo Jalil, for instance, runs AssetProfile.com, which sells Wyoming corporations and provides nominee officers. State records list him as an officer of more than 100 corporations, from A+ Shadow Systems to Yokohama Technologies.

Investigators from Interpol, the international law enforcement agency, have contacted the Wyoming Secretary of State's office about several of the corporations registered by Jalil, said Cowan, the securities division chief. None of the inquiries directly involved Jalil, who operates legally and sells corporations that typically may be used outside the USA, Cowan said.

In a recent interview, Jalil said he had not been contacted by Interpol and knew nothing about the inquiries to the Secretary of State. He said he conducts background checks on anyone seeking nominee officers for a corporation.

Jalil contended that the IRS and law enforcement investigators can check on any company by examining bank records. Claiming that corporation secrecy laws can block investigators "doesn't sound like reality to me," Jalil said.

But the internal workings of some corporations prove particularly resistant to transparency. Wyoming incorporation records show that at least 90 companies created since 2002 list Stella Port-Louis as the sole listed officer. Many of the firms, such as Export Deutschland AG and Motorcomsa S.A., have foreign corporate names.

The only address for Port-Louis listed in the records is a postal box in the Republic of Seychelles. A USA TODAY interview request mailed in January to Port-Louis' postal box could not be delivered. Port-Louis did not respond to a message relayed via Registered Agency Services, the Cheyenne company that is the local agent for the corporations that list her as an officer.

JoLyn Jordan, an official of Registered Agency Services, a firm that files incorporations, said she believed Port-Louis was a nominee for owners outside the USA. "I don't know who she is, or if she's for real," said Jordan. Asked how to determine if they were shell firms created for crime, Jordan said, "You don't know."

Jack Blum, an international tax expert and former special counsel to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, said money laundering investigations have historically focused on the Seychelles. While saying he had no information about the Port-Louis firms, he said the filings seemed designed to frustrate.

"Whoever's trying to research it will go batty," said Blum.

Bill Clinton's AMT Bomb (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 23, 2007

As tax season nears, Democrats in Congress are discovering they have an urgent political bomb to defuse -- the alternative minimum tax. The AMT already hits four million Americans, and without new legislation this year it will explode in the pocketbooks of 23 million taxpayers come April 15, 2008.

What's amazing is that many Democrats and reporters are trying to blame this looming tax increase on the 2001-2003 tax cuts. See if you can follow their argument: Taxpayers are obliged to pay the higher of their tax bill under either the regular IRS code or the AMT. And because the tax cuts reduced the regular income tax of the average family by $2,000 a year, more middle-class families are being bounced to the AMT system. Ergo, it's all President Bush's fault.

This logic requires overlooking that a taxpayer's bill under the AMT is still lower than it would have been without the tax cuts. But never mind: The political game here is to use the AMT as an excuse to justify repealing the Bush tax cuts.

In reality, the AMT is one more liberal monster that was created in the name of soaking the rich but has now come back to swallow the middle class. Democrats created the AMT in 1969, amid a political frenzy to capture a mere 21 millionaires who had paid nothing. And the politician most responsible for the AMT's relentless expansion in recent years is none other than William Jefferson Clinton.

DOJ_NMG_0135682

Remember the 1993 tax hike that was supposed to fall only on the rich? In addition to raising gas taxes and Medicare payroll taxes and income tax rates, the Democratic Congress that year also raised the AMT: from a 24% flat rate to a dual tax rate of 26% on AMT income up to $175,000 and 28% on AMT income above that amount.

It's true that the 1993 bill slightly increased the AMT's family income exemption, but Democrats refused to index those exemptions for inflation. So the combination of the higher rates and the failure to index for inflation has caught more and more middle-class taxpayers in the AMT's maw. From 1992 to 2002, this Clinton stealth tax hike increased sixfold the number of filers paying the AMT, to nearly two million from 300,000.

A Joint Tax Committee (JTC) analysis requested last year by Senator Charles Grassley of Iowa shows that about 11 million more Americans will have to pay the AMT next year thanks to the higher post-1993 AMT rates. The House Ways and Means Committee calculates that if you live in a high-tax state (such as California or New York) and have two or more kids, you're very likely to be hit with the AMT this year even if your income is as low as $75,000.

All of which means that if Democrats really want to spare Joe Lunchbucket from the AMT, the cleanest solution is to repeal the Clinton AMT rate hikes. The nearby chart, prepared by the American Shareholders Association based on Joint Tax data, compares the number of filers who will be hit by the AMT under current law and what would happen if the AMT rate was moved back to the pre-Clinton 24% and the exemption was indexed for inflation at the 2005 level of $40,250 ($58,000 for a joint return). Going back to the pre-Clinton rates would leave only about 2.6 million tax filers subject to an AMT penalty next year instead of 23 million under current law.

The estimated "cost" of this fix to the Treasury over 10 years would be some $632 billion, which is money Democrats in Congress would prefer to spend. But as Senator Grassley notes: "This tax was never meant to tax the middle class, so why should we count it as a revenue loss when we make sure they don't have to pay it?"

There's a larger policy lesson to keep in mind as the debate unfolds over both the AMT and the looming expiration of the Bush tax cuts in 2010: Beware politicians who say they only want to tax the rich. Sooner or later their tax schemes will soak the middle class because that's where the real money is. Regarding the AMT, Democrats are now saying they'll be glad to provide AMT relief for the middle class but they'll have to raise taxes on CEOs and other high-income Americans to do it. Where have we heard that one before?

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Walter Reed Stories Factual But Unfair, Medical Chief Says (WP)

By Steve Vogel, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, February 23, 2007

The Army's surgeon general yesterday criticized stories in The Washington Post disclosing problems at Walter Reed Army Medical Center, saying the series unfairly characterized the living conditions and care for soldiers recuperating from wounds at the hospital's facilities.

"I'm not sure it was an accurate representation," Lt. Gen. Kevin C. Kiley, chief of the Army Medical Command, told reporters during a news conference. "It was a one-sided representation."

The Medical Command oversees Walter Reed and all Army health care.

Until now, the Army had not challenged any aspect of the Post series. Army and Defense Department leaders have promised to eliminate squalid conditions in Building 18, a former hotel outside the Walter Reed gate where 76 wounded soldiers live as outpatients. They have also promised to address bureaucratic problems in the handling of wounded soldiers.

The two-part newspaper series reported that many soldiers spend 18 months or more at Walter Reed. It quoted many patients and their families describing a bureaucratic indifference to medical needs. And it described rooms in Building 18 with mold, leaky plumbing and holes in ceilings.

While acknowledging "pretty distressing" conditions in some rooms at Building 18, Kiley said the problems were neither widespread nor symptoms of a system that allows soldiers to languish. The building is not "emblematic of a process of Walter Reed that has abandoned soldiers and their families," said Kiley, who was commander at the hospital before becoming surgeon general in 2004.

DOJ_NMG_0135683

"I want to reset the thinking . . .," Kiley said. "While we have some issues here, this is not a horrific, catastrophic failure at Walter Reed."

Asked to elaborate on his comments after the news conference at the facility, Kiley said he does not dispute the facts in the Post stories. "It's not the accuracy question, it's the characterization," he said.

Kiley said the Army is beginning to study ways to streamline the medical bureaucracy, including the process by which soldiers are evaluated and either discharged or returned to active duty. "That's going to take more than a couple of weeks, but we're going to get at it," he said.

Kiley's comments came at the end of a media tour during which reporters and television camera crews were escorted through Building 18 to view conditions and repairs. Rooms had been painted, plumbing repaired and floors disinfected.

"It's not the Ritz-Carlton at Pentagon City, I'll grant you that," Kiley said, surveying the cleaned, repaired and repainted room where until recently Army Spec. Jeremy Duncan lived with black mold and a hole in the ceiling above the shower.

Duncan, who broke his neck while on patrol in Iraq last year, was moved to a new room after the Post story described his living conditions. He said he has not suffered any reprisals. "Believe it or not, people were actually happy about the fact that someone spoke up," Duncan said.

Kiley said that while repairs to Building 18 are nearly complete, the aging facility needs a top-to-bottom renovation. "That's tough to do while you're trying to take care of soldiers," he said.

In another development yesterday, the White House announced that President Bush plans to nominate S. Ward Casscells to replace William Winkenwerder as assistant defense secretary for health affairs. The Pentagon said Winkenwerder's departure was already planned and is not related to problems at Walter Reed.

Painting Over The Problems At Walter Reed's Building 18 (WP)

By Dana Milbank

The Washington Post, February 23, 2007

It's not every day one gets to witness a whitewash in action, but Walter Reed Army Medical Center provided just such an opportunity yesterday.

In Sunday's Washington Post, Dana Priest and Anne Hull described the woeful conditions of Room 205 in Walter Reed's Building 18: "Behind the door of Army Spec. Jeremy Duncan's room, part of the wall is torn and hangs in the air, weighted down with black mold. When the wounded combat engineer stands in his shower and looks up, he can see the bathtub on the floor above through a rotted hole."

The Army mobilized. Painters were deployed to cover the offending wall with a fresh coat of white semigloss. And television crews were invited in to inspect the result.

"Some of the paint is still wet against that wall, so be careful," Walter Reed public affairs officer Donald Vandrey, standing on the bed in his socks, advised the film crews. "They just finished repainting it about 10 minutes ago."

Mission accomplished?

Lt. Gen. Kevin Kiley thought so. After the media tour of Building 18, the Army's surgeon general gave a news conference. "I do not consider Building 18 to be substandard," he said of a facility Priest and Hull found full of "mouse droppings, belly-up cockroaches, stained carpets, cheap mattresses" and other delights. "We needed to do a better job on some of those rooms, and those of you that got in today saw that we frankly have fixed all of those problems. They weren't serious, and there weren't a lot of them."

Kiley might have had a stronger case if men wearing Tyvek hazmat suits and gas masks hadn't walked through the lobby while the camera crews waited for the tour to start, or if he hadn't acknowledged, moments later, that the entire building would have to be closed for a complete renovation. The general also seemed to miss a larger point identified by other officials: Walter Reed's problem isn't of mice and mold but a bureaucracy that has impeded the recovery of wounded soldiers.

DOJ_NMG_0135684

The Army's vice chief of staff, only 24 hours earlier, decried "a breakdown in leadership" for the conditions in the place. And Rep. Tom Davis (R-Va.) noted that "you could put all the wounded soldiers in the Ritz-Carlton, and it wouldn't fix the personnel management and recordkeeping problems that keep them languishing in outpatient limbo out there for months."

"We're not letting soldiers languish," came Kiley's reply.

For all the stagecraft, there was still broken glass in the driveway of Building 18 yesterday, a banana peel on the steps and an empty Budweiser can in the shrubbery. There were signs of hasty repairs: a plumber's truck outside, dust masks and spray cleaners on window sills, rat poison outside the dumpster, and a discarded box proclaiming "Emergency Exit Lighting Fixture." Construction workers came and went.

The base's public-affairs crew arrived 25 minutes late for the tour but got right to work. "Some of these people are not on our list and are not coming in," announced Lori Calvillo, Walter Reed's chief spokeswoman. "C-SPAN, you're not on the list. You're not coming in." She then attempted to evict a Washington Post reporter, who appealed, loudly, to Kiley.

The tour began in the game room, where soldiers shot pool and watched a plasma TV. From there, the tourists climbed a stairwell smelling of chlorine bleach to a floor smelling of fresh paint.

"In the next room, there's a little water drop on the ceiling; you can get a nice shot of it," Kiley joked. Inside Room 416, there was indeed some rainwater dripping into a wastebasket, a missing lampshade, some loose wallpaper and a mirror on the floor -- but neither rodents nor fungus were visible.

Then it was down to Room 205, crammed with Tilex, sealant, paint rollers, a dropcloth and ceramic tiles. Spokesman Vandrey spoke like a real estate agent: "There was no plumbing leakage in the bathroom. That was all condensation." Outside the room, a man spoke urgently into his cellphone: "The drywall has to dry before they can paint."

A few doors down was Spec. Duncan, in his new room. "Unfortunately, I had to stand up and tell them, 'Hey, the room is messed up,' " he told a Voice of America camera. "I got my point across."

He sure did -- and that's why Kiley, who was the commander at Walter Reed before assuming his current role in 2004, found himself staring into a bank of 12 cameras yesterday. Missing was Maj. Gen. George Weightman, the current Walter Reed commander -- "called away to important business," Kiley explained.

At times, Kiley appeared to acknowledge a systemic problem. He promised to "go at this thing soup to nuts," adding: "We're gonna get at it real quickly." But then he quibbled with the scope of the problem. "Some of this bureaucracy, as much as it frustrates us, I'm not sure that's a breakdown in leadership," he reasoned.

He then attacked the "one-sided representation" of the Post reporting. "I do not think that Building 8" -- he apparently meant 18 -- "is emblematic of a process of Walter Reed that has abandoned soldiers and their families," Kiley said. "I want to reset the thinking that while we have some issues here, this is not a horrific, catastrophic failure at Walter Reed."

Back in Room 205, the whitewash was almost dry.

Damaged And Adrift In The Shadows (NYT)

The New York Times, February 23, 2007

When the Senate next debates whether to debate the Iraq war, members would do well to visit Walter Reed Army Medical Center, just five miles to the north. There they can run a stark reality check on how the country is failing the war's wounded despite all those Capitol orations about unstinting support of our fighting troops.

As fine as the surgery wards have been through a five-year torrent of battle casualties, Walter Reed has seen the shameful growth of a parallel village of almost 700 traumatized and maimed outpatients. Far too many of these souls wait lost and wasted, abandoned by the post's and the Army's shambling bureaucracy.

This outpatient world has become a holding ground for desperation and dysfunction, according to a Washington Post investigative report. Some drift away unnoticed, AWOL, while others huddle in their rooms, depressed and forgotten. The scenes uncovered by The Post range from slumlord conditions in one residential building to drug abuse and suicide among desperate patients caught in a Catch-22, where psychologically damaged veterans are put in charge of fellow sufferers.

A staff sergeant who had his eye and skull shattered in Iraq stumbled about after his release from a surgical recovery room. He was handed a map and ordered to find his way across the sprawling post to the outpatient unit. After he found his room he sat for weeks like some accidental tourist, with no doctor appointments nor official concern. “Shouldn’t they contact me?” he wondered.

DOJ_NMG_0135685

The Army is promising to rush repairs and extra personnel. But the shameful neglect at Walter Reed is more proof of how America’s leaders — despite all the rhetoric about unlimited support for the troops — are failing the nation’s warriors in this disastrous war.

Senate Effort To Pass Intelligence Legislation Stalls Again (WT)

By Shaun Waterman, United Press International

The Washington Times, February 23, 2007

The annual legislation that governs the 16 U.S. intelligence agencies and their new boss, the director of national intelligence, is stalled again in the Senate, where efforts to pass it in the past two years also died.

"We're still working it," said a senior staffer from the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, which voted the bill out 12-3 last month, adding that the new committee chairman, Sen. John D. Rockefeller, West Virginia Democrat, continued to hope the bill could be passed after the Presidents Day recess.

The staffer, who was authorized to speak only on the condition of anonymity, said committee members were working on a unanimous-consent agreement -- a procedural measure whereby noncontentious bills are brought to the floor of the Senate and voted on without time-consuming debate.

"It's cleared on our side," said the staffer of the committee majority, adding that a provision in the bill temporarily suspending some federal privacy protections would be removed as part of the deal. Democratic Sens. Ron Wyden of Oregon and Russ Feingold of Wisconsin, said in additional views submitted with the bill that they believed this provision "merit[ed] further study and debate" before being passed into law.

The staffer said other Democrats had been prevailed upon not to force the issue of congressional access to the presidential daily briefings about pre-Iraq war intelligence.

But a unanimous consent agreement, as its name implies, can be halted by any objection, and the Senate's arcane rules allow the objector to remain anonymous.

In the previous two years, under the chairmanship of Sen. Pat Roberts, Kansas Republican, the committee's efforts to move the bill have been blocked by holds from Republican senators.

The same issues are behind the holdup this year, according to sources from both sides of the aisle: There is concern about what some Republican senators see as the bill's excessive reporting requirements, both on intelligence agencies about their detention and interrogation of terror suspects, and on the administration as a whole. The new law would require much wider congressional notifications about the most secret oversight briefings of all.

The staffer said the committee leadership hoped to address those concerns by "tweaking the language" in a couple of parts of the bill "to make clear that sources and methods will be protected."

"Our Republican colleagues [on the committee] are working on" overcoming Republican objections, said the staffer. The committee's senior Republican, Sen. Christopher S. Bond of Missouri, was traveling in East Asia this week and could not be reached. His staff declined comment.

Although U.S. intelligence activities are funded from a special secret annex of the vast defense appropriations act, the authorization law is the only vehicle for public legislative oversight and guidance to the sprawling and sometimes fractious collection of agencies dubbed by insiders as the "U.S. intelligence community."

The hiatus in the legislation has meant, for instance, that lawmakers have not yet been able to make a series of fixes and adjustments to the new intelligence structure they put into place in the huge 2004 Intelligence Reform and Terrorism Prevention Act.

The 2007 authorization bill contains additional clarified budget re-programming authority for the new director of national intelligence and creates an inspector general for his office.

Pentagon Abandons Big Bomb Test (AP)

By Jennifer Talhelm, Associated Press Writer

DOJ_NMG_0135686

AP, February 23, 2007

Facing stiff opposition from two Western states, the Pentagon on Thursday scrapped plans for a 700-ton non-nuclear test blast that would have produced the first mushroom cloud of dust over the Nevada desert in decades.

The Defense Department said it would find other ways to test the nation's ability to penetrate underground bunkers that produce and store weapons of mass destruction.

The cloud may have reached an altitude of 10,000 feet over the site about 90 miles northwest of Las Vegas, an eerie echo of long-ago open-air nuclear testing.

Originally scheduled for last June 2, the test blast — called Divine Strake — had been postponed indefinitely until the Defense Threat Reduction Agency finally canceled it.

"I have become convinced that it's time to look at alternative methods that obviate the need for this type of large-scale test," he said in a statement.

The decision was not based on any technical information that indicated the test would harm workers, the public or the environment, according to James Tegnelia, director of the Pentagon unit that works on technical aspects of how to destroy deeply buried enemy weapons.

It was in March 2006 that he had likened the spectacle of a test explosion to a mushroom cloud.

"I don't want to sound glib here, but it is the first time in Nevada that you'll see a mushroom cloud over Las Vegas since we stopped testing nuclear weapons," Tegnelia said at the time to reporters.

The United States stopped conducting aboveground nuclear tests in 1963.

In Nevada and Utah, there was concern that the blast would scatter decades-old radioactive material from previous Cold War-era tests. Other critics contended the explosion would mark a step toward new tests to develop "bunker buster" nuclear weapons.

Two months ago, the agency released a new environmental report that confirmed there is radioactive material about a mile from the blast site. Officials insisted any harm would be "extremely unlikely."

The agency said in a statement it would develop other ways to gather the kind of data that Divine Strake would have provided. "Such methods to assess capabilities to defeat underground facilities do not currently exist," it said.

The agency is committed "to help develop non-nuclear means to defeat underground targets. I am optimistic that we will succeed," Tegnelia said.

Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nev., and other lawmakers said they understood the need for tests to develop defense strategies.

But, Reid said, "there were still many questions left unanswered, including the possible environmental effects."

The loudest critics said the plan revived bitter memories of government "lies" during Cold War-era tests, when officials said there would be no danger.

Thousands of people who lived near the Nevada Test Site — called downwinders — were exposed to cancer-causing radiation from weapons tests.

Residents feared Divine Strake would spread more radioactive material or lead to further nuclear experiments there.

"If this announcement truly signals the end of Divine Strake, my hope is that DTRA would instead spend time and money on developing a conventional weapon that would actually be useful to our military in destroying deeply buried terrorist targets," said Rep. Jim Matheson, D-Utah.

John Wells, a Las Vegas carpenter and regional representative to the Western Shoshone National Council, said the blast would "compound wrongs" for the American Indian tribe.

The tribe fought the test in court and long has contested the government over the test site, now contaminated from years of nuclear tests.

___

Associated Press Writer Ken Ritter in Las Vegas contributed to this report.

___

On the Net:

DOJ_NMG_0135687

Defense Threat Reduction Agency: http://www.dtra.mil/

Agency Scraps Plan For Explosives Test (NYT)

New York Times, February 23, 2007

A federal agency announced yesterday that it had canceled a plan to detonate 700 tons of conventional explosives in the Nevada desert as part of a study of ways to target underground weapons facilities or bunkers.

The test, known as Divine Strake, at the Nevada Test Site would have been conducted near a place used for decades for atomic testing. Opponents said the explosion would create a two-mile-high mushroom cloud and release radioactive dust from long-undisturbed radioactive material.

Utah's Congressional delegation and thousands of Utah residents have written to the Defense Threat Reduction Agency of their opposition to the test. The agency said yesterday that it would look at alternative means of testing. A news release from the Department of Defense, which is seeking alternatives, said the decision "was not based on any technical information that indicates the test would produce harm to workers, the general public, or the environment."

McCain Raps Extraneous Pentagon Spending Requests (POL)

By Christian Lowe

Politico.com, February 23, 2007

Quarreling with Pentagon spending requests, Sen. John McCain has chided Defense Secretary Robert Gates and Air Force Secretary Michael Wynne for seeking three experimental aircraft in the Pentagon's emergency wartime funding bill.

The $93 billion funding request for military operations yet this year in Iraq, Afghanistan and other hot spots includes nearly $14 billion for two F-35 Lightning II fighter jets and a CV-22 Osprey tilt-rotor transport to replace aircraft lost in overseas combat operations. Both aircraft are still in development and years from being fielded.

"In an emergency supplemental, you are proposing to replace combat loss with unproven platforms that not only are not yet operational but will also ultimately cost a lot more than they do now," the Arizona Republican told Gates and Wynne in a Feb. 13 letter obtained by Politico.

McCain, the ranking member of the Senate Armed Services Committee, is a staunch supporter of President Bush's plan to send an additional 21,500 troops into Iraq. But he's also often criticized the military for slipping costly extraneous programs into emergency wartime spending bills.

The F-35, also known as the Joint Strike Fighter, has only recently begun test flights. The Air Force asked for two of the small, stealthy planes to replace an F-16 Falcon and an F-15 Eagle fighter lost during combat operations. The Air Force argues that neither fighter is being produced for the U.S. military anymore and that the F-35 is the only viable replacement option.

But the F-35 isn't in large-scale production either, McCain noted, and the replacements wouldn't reach the Air Force until 2013.

The CV-22, with a shaky safety record, is still in testing as well.

"Both the JSF and Osprey are controversial, next-generation programs that require considerable congressional oversight," McCain wrote. "Your including the requests to procure both aircraft types in an emergency supplemental effectively insulates these programs from this committee's routine oversight. This is inappropriate."

McCain's salvo was buttressed Thursday by the chairman of the House Armed Services Committee's Air and Land Forces Subcommittee, Rep. Neil Abercrombie, D-Hawaii, who fired off a news release outlining what he sees as additional inappropriate spending requests.

Abercrombie challenged the Army's request for $14 billion in tanks, transports and other armored vehicles that are not intended to replace combat losses. The vehicles are largely part of the Army's reorganization effort to carve "modular" brigades out of Cold War-era divisions. The smaller brigades are easier to deploy, but come with logistics and combat support requiring dozens of new vehicles.

"What they're trying to do here is a budget trick where they hide the spending 'pea' under the 'shell' of support for the troops," Abercrombie said in an interview. "This has to stop."

DOJ_NMG_0135688

In his release, Abercrombie complained that such purchases should be considered part of the annual Pentagon appropriations request subject to congressional oversight. His critique is his answer to a request by House Defense Appropriations Subcommittee Chairman John P. Murtha, D-Pa., for a list of items deemed inappropriate for consideration in the wartime funding bill.

Abercrombie said he found nearly 40 items in the emergency bill that could be cut or modified, representing a savings of about $4 billion.

Labor Seeks Boost From Pro-Union Measure (NYT)

By Steven Greenhouse

The New York Times, February 23, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 22 — Organized labor is fighting for a pro-union bill as if its life depended on it.

Some labor experts say the union movement's ability to reverse its slide could in fact hinge on its winning passage of the bill, which would make it easier for workers to join unions.

The United States Chamber of Commerce, the National Retail Federation and more than a dozen other business groups are mounting a fierce campaign to stop the bill, inundating Congress with more than 10,000 e-mail messages and letters. At the same time, labor unions are sponsoring demonstrations, conferences and meetings in 99 cities this month to push for the legislation. The two sides have also squared off with newspaper advertisements.

"The business community thinks the labor movement is at death's door, and they want to make sure they keep this bill from passing," said Charles Craver, a professor of labor law at George Washington University. "If it passes, it will give labor a big boost."

Labor unions represent only 7.4 percent of the nation's private-sector workers, down from 35 percent in the 1950s. That helps explain why labor's campaign for the bill, the Employee Free Choice Act, represents its biggest legislative push in 30 years.

Legislative aides say they expect the bill to be approved next Thursday in the House, where it has 234 sponsors, including seven Republicans.

Business lobbyists voice confidence that they can block the bill in the Senate, where opponents say a filibuster is likely. Vice President Dick Cheney said last week that President Bush would veto the bill.

"It's a huge issue," said Randel Johnson, vice president for labor policy at the United States Chamber of Commerce. "We've targeted this as our No. 1 or No. 2 priority to defeat."

The bill would give employees at a workplace the right to unionize as soon as a majority sign cards saying they want a union, a process known as a card check or majority signup. Under current law, employers can insist on a secret-ballot election to determine whether a majority of employees favors a union.

Last summer Unite Here, the union representing apparel, hotel and laundry workers, used a card check to organize 300 housekeepers and other workers at the Marriott Downtown Los Angeles. Unite Here's previous efforts to organize the hotel's workers through a secret-ballot election faltered in the late 1980s and in the 1990s in the face of an aggressive management campaign.

"It didn't take very long for us to get 70 percent of the workers to sign cards saying they wanted a union," said Bruce Raynor, Unite Here's president.

With card checks, unions can often win unionization drives in two to four weeks.

With secret-ballot elections, unionization efforts can drag on for months, often delayed by litigation. Unions also say that many corporations break the law during election campaigns by firing, intimidating and spying on union supporters.

"Secret-ballot elections often occur in an environment that is so poisoned by the anti-union campaign that they can't possibly be considered a free choice," said Bill Samuel, the A.F.L.-C.I.O.'s legislative director.

Mr. Samuel pointed to a National Labor Relations Board report that 31,358 workers received back pay in 2005 after their employers were accused of illegally retaliating against them for supporting a union.

Business lobbyists say the Employee Free Choice Act is antidemocratic and would deprive workers of their right to a secret ballot. They say union organizers will bully workers into signing pro-union cards.

DOJ_NMG_0135689

"This debate is not about free choice," said Jason Straczewski, director of human resources policy for the National Association of Manufacturers. "It's about a quick fix for union membership on the decline."

Business groups argue that if secret-ballot elections are good enough for American voters, they should be good enough for union members.

Joseph A. McInerney, chief executive of the American Hotel and Lodging Association, said, "It's simply un-American."

Labor Secretary Elaine L. Chao has also denounced the bill, saying, "A worker's right to a secret ballot election is an intrinsic right in our democracy that should not be legislated away at the behest of special interest groups."

Mary Beth Maxwell, executive director of American Rights at Work, a pro-union group, said it was surprising that corporations were defending workers' rights. "The notion that corporate lobbying coalitions and front groups are the new champions of workers' rights and democracy is laughable," Ms. Maxwell said.

Fairfax Schools Could Lose Millions For Defying 'No Child' (WP)

By Maria Glod

The Washington Post, February 23, 2007

The U.S. Education Department threatened yesterday to withhold more than $17 million from Fairfax County schools if the system continues to defy a federal mandate to give reading tests to thousands of immigrant children.

Other Virginia school systems would also be in jeopardy if they refuse to comply with the federal No Child Left Behind Act, and the state could lose $2 million in administrative funds.

The possible loss of millions of dollars raises the stakes in a months-long standoff between the federal government and a growing group of Virginia educators over the best way to test immigrant students learning English.

The dispute started last summer when federal officials rejected the test Virginia uses to measure the progress of many immigrant children. The exam shows how well students learn to read, write and speak English. But it doesn't, as the No Child law requires, test students on their understanding of grade-level reading material, which can include comprehension and such concepts as similes and metaphors.

The Fairfax County School Board passed a resolution last month to defy the mandate, saying it is unfair to give such an exam to students just beginning to grasp the nuances of English. School boards in Arlington County, the city of Fairfax and Harrisonburg passed similar measures. The rebellion appears to be intensifying, with Loudoun County school officials also considering such a step.

"The resolutions say we will do the fair and right thing," said Allen C. Griffith, vice chairman of the Fairfax City School Board. But he said the threat of sanctions means that school systems will have to make difficult decisions.

The Education Department has "got the hammer, and they've got the big stick," Griffith said. "I suppose they can force these districts to bend to their will. . . . But how have the children gained anything?"

Chad Colby, an Education Department spokesman, said that under the No Child law, systems must show that all students, including children learning English, are making academic progress. He said the federal government needs to know that the funds it distributes are being used wisely.

"If you don't assess students, you don't know which students need the most help and how to direct those resources," Colby said. "Prior to No Child Left Behind, we spent . . . and there was no accountability."

The rift in Virginia mirrors a nationwide debate over how to ensure that English-language learners, a fast-growing population in schools, are making progress. When the Education Department rejected Virginia's test, it also found problems with the way 17 other states test English-language learners. Testing programs in Maryland and the District have withstood federal scrutiny.

Federal education officials note that students who are in the country less than a year are exempt from the reading test. Other language learners are allowed accommodations, such as more time or use of a bilingual dictionary.

Virginia educators, who say it takes far longer than a year for most children to comprehend grade-level reading work, had asked for permission to use the old test this spring and develop an alternative for next year. That request was denied.

DOJ_NMG_0135690

Of the approximately 10,200 Virginia students affected by the testing dispute, about 4,000 are in Fairfax. Thousands more immigrant students who have made enough progress take the same reading tests as their native-speaking peers.

But in a meeting yesterday with state Superintendent of Public Instruction Billy K. Cannaday Jr., U.S. officials indicated that there probably will be a third alternative for Virginia schools. Federal officials said they expect to approve a state request to use a portfolio of a student's work over time instead of a test.

Fairfax County School Board member Stuart D. Gibson (Hunter Mill) yesterday said he does not think there is enough time to train teachers on the portfolio assessment and to collect assignments that show a student has mastered the material before the spring testing season.

Staff writer Michael Alison Chandler contributed to this report.

Virginia Schools May Lose Funding (WT/AP)

By Zinie Chen Sampson, Associated Press

The Washington Times, February 23, 2007

RICHMOND -- A top U.S. Department of Education official said yesterday that Virginia school divisions will lose federal funding if they do not comply with a federal law that requires children struggling to learn English take the same reading tests as their native-speaking peers.

Deputy Education Secretary Raymond Simon met with Superintendent of Public Instruction Billy K. Cannaday and other state education officials to discuss the provision of the No Child Left Behind law targeting those who are the least proficient in English. The Virginia Department of Education had unsuccessfully sought an exemption for another year, contending the rule is unfair.

Mr. Cannaday said after yesterday's meeting that he wanted school divisions to be aware that "no one is operating under the illusion that there will not be consequences for noncompliance," and that he expected school divisions to comply with the law "even though they question whether the tests are appropriate and the accommodations are adequate."

Immigrant-rich Fairfax County, the state's largest school division, stands to lose about $17 million, Mr. Cannaday said in a conference call with reporters. Officials have asked Mr. Simon to provide the state Board of Education figures on how much federal Title I funding school divisions stand to lose if they do not follow the law's provision.

Title I schools receive federal funds to serve children from low-income families and are the focus of most of NCLB's accountability measures.

School boards in Harrisonburg, Frederick, King and Queen and Amherst counties, and the D.C. suburbs of Fairfax, Prince William and Arlington counties recently signaled their intent to defy the NCLB mandates. Others are considering following suit.

Those boards have passed resolutions saying they will continue to evaluate all students' reading proficiency, but will only administer the state's grade-level Standards of Learning tests to students with an adequate grasp of English. Several school divisions said they wanted to continue using an alternative test to measure progress in nonnative English speakers.

Donald J. Ford, Harrisonburg's school superintendent, said yesterday that Harrisonburg's resolution stands, and the school board's next step is to determine how much Title I money the division could lose.

"Our school board isn't seeking to defy anything -- we're trying to determine how we can best meet the needs of children. It's simply unfair to proceed as we're being mandated to do," Mr. Ford said in a telephone interview.

"Whether there will come a time at all over the next month or six weeks that someone in authority at the U.S. Department of Education realizes how unfair and inappropriate their decision is something we're still looking for," he said.

While he empathized with local school divisions, Mr. Cannaday said the state can't risk losing money that will benefit more than just children who are learning English.

Mr. Cannaday also said the federal education department signaled it could let school divisions use the Virginia Grade-Level Assessment -- a portfolio of a student's work -- to measure the skills of low-English proficiency students. He also said state officials and Mr. Simon discussed the possibility of an option under a reauthorized NCLB that would give schools credit for making progress if they don't meet academic benchmarks solely because of the performance of English-language learners.

DOJ_NMG_0135691

The issue is part of a larger debate over the law, which seeks to have all students, regardless of race, poverty or disability, proficient in reading and mathematics by 2014. It calls for students to be tested in math and reading in the third through eighth grades and once in high school, and it requires schools to show annual progress in test scores.

If schools fail to show yearly progress by each of numerous student subgroups -- including children who have limited English proficiency -- they face being labeled failing.

Those schools can lose funding.

Bush's Budget May Stifle Students' Loans (WT)

By Tom Ramstack

The Washington Times, February 23, 2007

President Bush is trying to "right-size" the student loan industry with a proposed budget that would cut subsidies and drive out many private lenders by reducing their profits, the head of student loan giant Sallie Mae said yesterday.

"He put together something that would more than likely eliminate many of the players in the FFELP [Federal Family Education Loan Program student loan] industry," Tom Fitzpatrick, chief executive officer of SLM Corp., known as Sallie Mae, said during a meeting with editors and reporters at The Washington Times.

The Bush administration's proposed fiscal 2008 budget would reduce education subsidies for special programs, such as student loans, to $6.6 billion, from $9.7 billion this year. Lender subsidies would fall by 0.5 percentage points.

The White House said the $12.4 billion saved over five years by cutting subsidies would be used to increase the number of Pell Grants, which are given to the poorest college students. The grants do not need to be repaid.

Mr. Fitzpatrick's warnings about the Bush administration proposals were echoed by Prudential Equity Group financial analyst Charles Gabriel, who called the budget cuts a "shocker" in a research note to investors. The administration "may be doing the equivalent of throwing the student loan industry under the bus," the note said.

Meanwhile, the Senate is considering three bills on student loans. The proposals would create financial incentives for schools to participate in the government loan program by returning fees to them that otherwise would be paid to private lending institutions.

About 80 percent of student loans are given out by private lenders, while 20 percent are through the federal government, according to Sallie Mae, the nation's biggest provider of student loans.

The Reston company was formed as a government-sponsored enterprise in 1972 but completed a privatization in 2004.

Sallie Mae says giving the government more control over student loans would create a bloated bureaucracy and reduce competition among lenders to serve students and their families.

"The indicators are that the program actually costs the taxpayers money" by reducing competition among lenders, Mr. Fitzpatrick said.

A House bill approved Jan. 17 would cut interest rates on student loans in half, from 6.8 percent to 3.4 percent, over five years.

An estimated 5.5 million students who take out need-based federal loans would benefit from the lower interest rate.

Mr. Fitzpatrick said the 5.5 million students are about 27 percent of borrowers, but cutting rates would do little to reduce their college expenses. He called the idea of reducing interest rates "frivolous" and said it creates nothing more than a "headline sensation."

Mr. Fitzpatrick said he expects increases in Pell Grants to be approved, but that reduced interest rates on loans face a struggle in Congress.

The government pays interest on subsidized loans while students are in college. Afterward, the students pick up the payments.

The House proposal would cost the taxpayers nearly $6 billion, according to the Congressional Budget Office.

The costs would be offset by reducing the yield lenders can receive from the loans and cutting the guaranteed return banks receive when students default. Banks also would have to pay higher fees.

DOJ_NMG_0135692

Mr. Fitzpatrick said just a small reduction in the money banks earn from student lending would mean "no one makes enough money to even service these loans."

He also said, "The margin on these loans have been, and are, razor thin."

Sallie Mae Chairman Albert Lord faces an investigation after he sold 400,000 shares of Sallie Mae stock on Feb. 2, three days before President Bush announced his budget proposal. The company's stock fell nearly 9 percent the day the budget was announced.

Mr. Lord saved about $1.4 million by selling the stock, which prompted calls by Sen. Edward M. Kennedy, Massachusetts Democrat, and other members of Congress for a Securities and Exchange Commission investigation.

"I would say it's unfortunate timing," Mr. Fitzpatrick said. He added that Mr. Lord notified the board of directors Jan. 25 that he would sell some of his shares.

SLM Corp.'s stock, SLM on the New York Stock Exchange, closed yesterday at $44.04 a share, down 7 cents, or less than 1 percent, from Wednesday's closing price.

For Energy, A Budget Not Without Merit (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, February 23, 2007

Bonuses are back at the Energy Department.

The department got caught in a budget squeeze late last year when Congress failed to complete the annual spending bills funding the government on time. Worried that they would not be able to make ends meet and might even have to lay off employees, officials suspended bonuses normally paid at year's end until Congress wrapped up the fiscal 2007 budget.

Last week, President Bush signed a budget bill that included funds for Energy, and Secretary Samuel W. Bodman sent a memo to the workforce saying "this new law has allowed us to lift the 'hold' on performance-based awards and discretionary pay adjustments."

In his announcement Bodman called the matter "a subject I know has been on the minds of many."

The secretary thanked employees for their patience "while we steered our way through this budget process."

The hold on bonuses caused some stir in the department. The National Treasury Employees Union, which represents about 1,700 Energy employees, had filed two grievances over the matter. Yesterday, union president Colleen M. Kelley said she was pleased that the bonuses were back on track.

Energy was not the only agency concerned about funding this year. The Social Security Administration had cautioned Congress that it might have to send employees home without pay for up to 10 days if funding fell short. In the end, Congress cobbled together a big budget bill that averted temporary layoffs in government.

Bodman said Energy's funding "puts us in a solid position to achieve our goals this year," but the department will be operating more or less on the same footing as last year. The new budget provides $23.6 billion for the department, slightly more than the $23.5 billion in the 2006 budget.

Craig Stevens, the department's spokesman, said senior officials are reviewing programs and will make recommendations on their funding requirements to Bodman by mid-March. Even though Energy has not settled on program priorities for this year, Stevens said "there is enough money to support the bonuses."

He noted, "We did our best to be upfront and forthright with employees."Rally Time

Several hundred union activists will gather in Washington next week to attend annual legislative conferences sponsored by the American Federation of Government Employees and the National Treasury Employees Union.

AFGE's three-day conference begins on Sunday and features an address by former North Carolina senator John Edwards, a Democratic presidential candidate.

House Majority Leader Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.) will address the NTEU conference on its opening day, Tuesday. The three-day conference will conclude with a luncheon address by Rep. Chris Van Hollen (D-Md.), chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

DOJ_NMG_0135693

Both unions will ask their members to make visits to senators and House members to discuss issues important to federal employees, union officials said.Management Conference

The Federal Financial Management Conference, featuring Bush administration officials and a series of panel discussions, will be held in Washington on March 13.

Speakers include Clay Johnson III, deputy director for management at the Office of Management and Budget; Linda Combs~, controller at OMB; Linda M. Springer, director of the Office of Personnel Management; and David M. Walker, head of the Government Accountability Office.

The conference is sponsored by the Joint Financial Management Improvement Program, the General Services Administration's Financial Systems Integration Office and the Graduate School, USDA. For details, go to http://www.fsio.gov/fsio.Talk Shows

Margaret Baptiste, president of the National Active and Retired Federal Employees Association, and the association's legislative aides, Dan Adcock and Jill Crissman, will be the guests on "FedTalk" at 11 a.m. today on http://federalnewsradio.com and WFED radio (1050 AM).

Adm. Thad Allen, Coast Guard commandant, will be the guest on "The IBM Business of Government Hour" at 9 a.m. Saturday on WJFK radio (106.7 FM).

Stephen Barr's e-mail address isbarrs@washpost.com.

Profiteering Colleges (NYT)

The New York Times, February 23, 2007

The Democratic leadership in Congress plans to make college affordability a central theme of this legislative session. The pending bills that would increase federal aid to low-income students and lower the costs of student loans are good, as far as they go. But Congress must do more to ensure that scarce federal aid dollars are legitimately spent and not gobbled up by for-profit diploma mills that bilk the government and students alike.

Legitimate, well-run commercial colleges provide a crucial service for poorly prepared students who do not qualify for admission to traditional colleges. But not all schools are up to the job. Some rake in state and federal aid by recruiting marginally literate students who have no hope of ever graduating. Students who exhaust their aid find themselves burdened with debt and no closer to the degrees or the better lives they had hoped for.

The full scope of the problem is not yet known. But Congress got a glimpse of it two years ago, when the Office of the Inspector General at the United States Education Department reported that nearly three-quarters of its investigations had focused on problems at profit-making schools.

These problems have been especially evident in the state of New York, which has the most generous need-based student aid program in the nation. Faced with documented cases of student exploitation, the State Board of Regents declared a temporary moratorium last year on the opening of any more for-profit colleges, then beefed up the regulations governing their operation.

The Regents have closed down one commercial college and sanctioned three others, which could be closed if they do not meet performance targets. They are now scrutinizing the University of Phoenix, the for-profit giant that has been trying for years to enter the lucrative New York market. At issue are questions about academic quality, graduation rates and a pending federal lawsuit that charges the university with fraudulently obtaining hundreds of millions of dollars in aid.

New York's Board of Regents is right to keep a close eye on these schools. And as Congress prepares to reauthorize the Higher Education Act, it needs to take a harder look at for-profit colleges to make sure that students and the government are getting what they pay for.

Trapped On An Airplane (NYT)

The New York Times, February 23, 2007

JetBlue's horrendous performance during the recent ice storms that paralyzed New York City's airports has reinvigorated calls for a "passengers' bill of rights" to protect air travelers against what can only be deemed abusive treatment. JetBlue has moved rapidly to make amends, but its shocking failures and those of other airlines in recent months make a federal law the best solution.

DOJ_NMG_0135694

At the storm's worst, JetBlue had nine planes sitting on the tarmac at Kennedy Airport for six to 10 hours while passengers were trapped in sweltering cabins with only snacks for food and stinking toilets. The company's first big mistake was betting that the weather would quickly improve. It failed to cancel outgoing fights that were unable to take off while it allowed incoming flights to keep landing — creating gridlock at its gates. Meanwhile, some planes' wheels froze to the ground along with the equipment that moves and de-ices them.

The same lean organization that has allowed JetBlue to keep fares low collapsed under the strain. The airline ended up with large numbers of pilots and flight attendants far from where they were needed. Crew members who tried to call in failed to get through an overwhelmed communications system. The understaffed reservations system could not handle the flood of calls from passengers trying to figure out whether to go to the airport.

JetBlue seems desperately eager to make amends before it loses a huge chunk of its customers. It has said it will add staff members and improve training. It has also issued a "Customer Bill of Rights," which would compensate passengers kept waiting by the airline's own mistakes (including those affected by the recent ice storm) and allow passengers to get off planes if grounded for more than five hours.

That's a start but not enough. The code is voluntary and applies only to JetBlue, whereas other airlines have also treated passengers abusively. Last December, American Airlines kept passengers trapped aboard a diverted plane for more than eight hours — an incident of such notoriety that American now pledges to let passengers off after four hours.

Senators Barbara Boxer, a California Democrat, and Olympia Snowe, Republican of Maine, have introduced a bill that would require that passengers be provided with adequate food and water and sanitary bathrooms while delayed on the ground and be allowed to leave the plane after three hours. Representative Mike Thompson, also a California Democrat, will introduce a bill that would also require airlines to update passengers frequently on the cause and timing of delays. Both proposals would be strengthened if they required the Transportation Department to impose suitable fines or passenger compensation should an airline fail to comply.

Although the airline industry continues to oppose government intervention, Congress needs to ensure that passengers have the right to escape involuntary confinement, to be adequately fed and cared for, and to receive timely and accurate information about their prospects for taking off. These needs seem so basic it is hard to see why they should not be mandatory.

A Visit Worth The Time And Money (NYT)

The New York Times, February 23, 2007

If government had a department of irony, the mammoth, ever more expensive and still uncompleted Capitol Visitor Center would be renamed the People's Debt and Deficit Walk-Through Memorial.

The three-story subterranean center being built (for nearly seven years) under the Capitol's East Plaza will have a 600-seat cafeteria, an interactive museum about the glories of democracy and the latest in security to screen out potential malefactors among the throngs who currently gather in snaking outdoor lines for tours.

The center will also have a grand waiting hall — appropriately enough — since it handily missed its planned opening for President Bush's second inaugural. Official optimism has undergone annual readjustments, with Congress now informed that the center won't open this fall (as promised last year) but for sure will open in summer of 2008. Meanwhile, the cost has doubled, steadily rising somewhere "north of $600 million," as one government expert told lawmakers.

Congress put its thumb on the scale, ordering up extra hideaways — second offices for members who want more time to themselves — along with more conference rooms and an emergency debating auditorium. The 9/11 attacks have inevitably been cited as the cause for delays and additional costs as designers built in increased security. But specialists estimate that the project schedule continues to slip by two weeks every month.

The American taxpayers, who will pay for the project for generations to come, deserve to be treated to candor. And what better way than by turning the center into a teaching museum on the hyperbolic plans and procrastination of Washington life?

DOJ_NMG_0135695

Why not add exhibits saluting other grand cost overruns? The Top 10 list includes the still dysfunctional “Star Wars” missile defense, with a current estimated price tag of $130 billion-plus. And, of course, the Iraq war, consuming an estimated $10 billion in military expenses each month.

No need to rush, but there’s still time to make an honest sow’s ear out of this silk purse. Parents and kids alike will enjoy the tour.

OTHER NEWS:

U.S. Economy Leaving Record Numbers In Severe Poverty (MCT)

By Tony Pugh

McClatchy Newspapers, February 23, 2007

WASHINGTON - The percentage of poor Americans who are living in severe poverty has reached a 32-year high, millions of working Americans are falling closer to the poverty line and the gulf between the nation's "haves" and "have-nots" continues to widen.

A McClatchy Newspapers analysis of 2005 census figures, the latest available, found that nearly 16 million Americans are living in deep or severe poverty. A family of four with two children and an annual income of less than $9,903 - half the federal poverty line - was considered severely poor in 2005. So were individuals who made less than $5,080 a year.

The McClatchy analysis found that the number of severely poor Americans grew by 26 percent from 2000 to 2005. That's 56 percent faster than the overall poverty population grew in the same period. McClatchy's review also found statistically significant increases in the percentage of the population in severe poverty in 65 of 215 large U.S. counties, and similar increases in 28 states. The review also suggested that the rise in severely poor residents isn't confined to large urban counties but extends to suburban and rural areas.

The plight of the severely poor is a distressing sidebar to an unusual economic expansion. Worker productivity has increased dramatically since the brief recession of 2001, but wages and job growth have lagged behind. At the same time, the share of national income going to corporate profits has dwarfed the amount going to wages and salaries. That helps explain why the median household income of working-age families, adjusted for inflation, has fallen for five straight years.

These and other factors have helped push 43 percent of the nation's 37 million poor people into deep poverty - the highest rate since at least 1975.

The share of poor Americans in deep poverty has climbed slowly but steadily over the last three decades. But since 2000, the number of severely poor has grown "more than any other segment of the population," according to a recent study in the American Journal of Preventive Medicine.

"That was the exact opposite of what we anticipated when we began," said Dr. Steven Woolf of Virginia Commonwealth University, who co-authored the study. "We're not seeing as much moderate poverty as a proportion of the population. What we're seeing is a dramatic growth of severe poverty."

The growth spurt, which leveled off in 2005, in part reflects how hard it is for low-skilled workers to earn their way out of poverty in an unstable job market that favors skilled and educated workers. It also suggests that social programs aren't as effective as they once were at catching those who fall into economic despair.

About one in three severely poor people are under age 17, and nearly two out of three are female. Female-headed families with children account for a large share of the severely poor.

Nearly two out of three people (10.3 million) in severe poverty are white, but blacks (4.3 million) and Hispanics of any race (3.7 million) make up disproportionate shares. Blacks are nearly three times as likely as non-Hispanic whites to be in deep poverty, while Hispanics are roughly twice as likely.

Washington, D.C., the nation's capital, has a higher concentration of severely poor people - 10.8 percent in 2005 - than any of the 50 states, topping even hurricane-ravaged Mississippi and Louisiana, with 9.3 percent and 8.3 percent, respectively. Nearly six of 10 poor District residents are in extreme poverty.

'I DON'T ASK FOR NOTHING'

DOJ_NMG_0135696

A few miles from the Capitol Building, 60-year-old John Treece pondered his life in deep poverty as he left a local food pantry with two bags of free groceries.

Plagued by arthritis, back problems and myriad ailments from years of manual labor, Treece has been unable to work full time for 15 years. He's tried unsuccessfully to get benefits from the Social Security Administration, which he said disputes his injuries and work history.

In 2006, an extremely poor individual earned less than $5,244 a year, according to federal poverty guidelines. Treece said he earned about that much in 2006 doing odd jobs.

Wearing shoes with holes, a tattered plaid jacket and a battered baseball cap, Treece lives hand-to-mouth in a $450-a-month room in a nondescript boarding house in a high-crime neighborhood. Thanks to food stamps, the food pantry and help from relatives, Treece said he never goes hungry. But toothpaste, soap, toilet paper and other items that require cash are tougher to come by.

"Sometimes it makes you want to do the wrong thing, you know," Treece said, referring to crime. "But I ain't a kid no more. I can't do no time. At this point, I ain't got a lotta years left."

Treece remains positive and humble despite his circumstances.

"I don't ask for nothing," he said. "I just thank the Lord for this day and ask that tomorrow be just as blessed."

Like Treece, many who did physical labor during their peak earning years have watched their job prospects dim as their bodies gave out.

David Jones, the president of the Community Service Society of New York City, an advocacy group for the poor, testified before the House Ways and Means Committee last month that he was shocked to discover how pervasive the problem was.

"You have this whole cohort of, particularly African-Americans of limited skills, men, who can't participate in the workforce because they don't have skills to do anything but heavy labor," he said.

'A PERMANENT UNDERCLASS'

Severe poverty is worst near the Mexican border and in some areas of the South, where 6.5 million severely poor residents are struggling to find work as manufacturing jobs in the textile, apparel and furniture-making industries disappear. The Midwestern Rust Belt and areas of the Northeast also have been hard hit as economic restructuring and foreign competition have forced numerous plant closings.

At the same time, low-skilled immigrants with impoverished family members are increasingly drawn to the South and Midwest to work in the meatpacking, food processing and agricultural industries.

These and other factors such as increased fluctuations in family incomes and illegal immigration have helped push 43 percent of the nation's 37 million poor people into deep poverty - the highest rate in at least 32 years.

"What appears to be taking place is that, over the long term, you have a significant permanent underclass that is not being impacted by anti-poverty policies," said Michael Tanner, the director of Health and Welfare Studies at the Cato Institute, a libertarian think tank.

Arloc Sherman, a senior researcher at the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities, a liberal think tank, disagreed. "It doesn't look like a growing permanent underclass," said Sherman, whose organization has chronicled the growth of deep poverty. "What you see in the data are more and more single moms with children who lose their jobs and who aren't being caught by a safety net anymore."

About 1.1 million such families account for roughly 2.1 million deeply poor children, Sherman said.

After fleeing an abusive marriage in 2002, 42-year-old Marjorie Sant moved with her three children from Arkansas to a seedy boarding house in Raleigh, N.C., where the four shared one bedroom. For most of 2005, they lived off food stamps and the $300 a month in Social Security Disability Income for her son with attention deficit hyperactivity disorder. Teachers offered clothes to Sant's children. Saturdays meant lunch at the Salvation Army.

"To depend on other people to feed and clothe your kids is horrible," Sant said. "I found myself in a hole and didn't know how to get out."

DOJ_NMG_0135697

In the summer of 2005, social workers warned that she'd lose her children if her home situation didn't change. Sant then brought her two youngest children to a temporary housing program at the Raleigh Rescue Mission while her oldest son moved to California to live with an adult daughter from a previous marriage.

So for 10 months, Sant learned basic office skills. She now lives in a rented house, works two jobs and earns about $20,400 a year.

Sant is proud of where she is, but she knows that "if something went wrong, I could well be back to where I was."

'I'M GETTING NOWHERE FAST'

As more poor Americans sink into severe poverty, more individuals and families living within $8,000 above or below the poverty line also have seen their incomes decline. Steven Woolf of Virginia Commonwealth University attributes this to what he calls a "sinkhole effect" on income.

"Just as a sinkhole causes everything above it to collapse downward, families and individuals in the middle and upper classes appear to be migrating to lower-income tiers that bring them closer to the poverty threshold," Woolf wrote in the study.

Before Hurricane Katrina, Rene Winn of Biloxi, Miss., earned $28,000 a year as an administrator for the Boys and Girls Club. But for 11 months in 2006, she couldn't find steady work and wouldn't take a fast-food job. As her opportunities dwindled, Winn's frustration grew.

"Some days I feel like the world is mine and I can create my own destiny," she said. "Other days I feel a desperate feeling. Like I gotta' hurry up. Like my career is at a stop. Like I'm getting nowhere fast. And that's not me because I've always been a positive person."

After relocating to New Jersey for 10 months after the storm, Winn returned to Biloxi in September because of medical and emotional problems with her son. She and her two youngest children moved into her sister's home along with her mother, who has Alzheimer's. With her sister, brother-in-law and their two children, eight people now share a three-bedroom home.

Winn said she recently took a job as a technician at the state health department. The hourly job pays $16,120 a year. That's enough to bring her out of severe poverty and just $122 shy of the $16,242 needed for a single mother with two children to escape poverty altogether under current federal guidelines.

Winn eventually wants to transfer to a higher-paying job, but she's thankful for her current position.

"I'm very independent and used to taking care of my own, so I don't like the fact that I have to depend on the state. I want to be able to do it myself."

The Census Bureau's Survey of Income and Program Participation shows that, in a given month, only 10 percent of severely poor Americans received Temporary Assistance for Needy Families in 2003 - the latest year available - and that only 36 percent received food stamps.

Many could have exhausted their eligibility for welfare or decided that the new program requirements were too onerous. But the low participation rates are troubling because the worst byproducts of poverty, such as higher crime and violence rates and poor health, nutrition and educational outcomes, are worse for those in deep poverty.

Over the last two decades, America has had the highest or near-highest poverty rates for children, individual adults and families among 31 developed countries, according to the Luxembourg Income Study, a 23-year project that compares poverty and income data from 31 industrial nations.

"It's shameful," said Timothy Smeeding, the former director of the study and the current head of the Center for Policy Research at Syracuse University. "We've been the worst performer every year since we've been doing this study."

With the exception of Mexico and Russia, the U.S. devotes the smallest portion of its gross domestic product to federal anti-poverty programs, and those programs are among the least effective at reducing poverty, the study found. Again, only Russia and Mexico do worse jobs.

One in three Americans will experience a full year of extreme poverty at some point in his or her adult life, according to long-term research by Mark Rank, a professor of social welfare at the University of Wisconsin, Madison.

An estimated 58 percent of Americans between the ages of 20 and 75 will spend at least a year in poverty, Rank said. Two of three will use a public assistance program between ages 20 and 65, and 40 percent will do so for five years or more.

DOJ_NMG_0135698

These estimates apply only to non-immigrants. If illegal immigrants were factored in, the numbers would be worse, Rank said.

"It would appear that for most Americans the question is no longer if, but rather when, they will experience poverty. In short, poverty has become a routine and unfortunate part of the American life course," Rank wrote in a recent study. "Whether these patterns will continue throughout the first decade of 2000 and beyond is difficult to say ... but there is little reason to think that this trend will reverse itself any time soon."

'SOMETHING REAL AND TROUBLING'

Most researchers and economists say federal poverty estimates are a poor tool to gauge the complexity of poverty. The numbers don't factor in assistance from government anti-poverty programs, such as food stamps, housing subsidies and the Earned Income Tax Credit, all of which increase incomes and help pull people out of poverty.

But federal poverty measures also exclude work-related expenses and necessities such as day care, transportation, housing and health care costs, which eat up large portions of disposable income, particularly for low-income families.

Alternative poverty measures that account for these shortcomings typically inflate or deflate official poverty statistics. But many of those alternative measures show the same kind of long-term trends as the official poverty data.

Robert Rector, a senior researcher with the Heritage Foundation, a conservative think tank, questioned the growth of severe poverty, saying that census data become less accurate farther down the income ladder. He said many poor people, particularly single mothers with boyfriends, underreport their income by not including cash gifts and loans. Rector said he's seen no data that suggest increasing deprivation among the very poor.

Arloc Sherman of the liberal Center on Budget and Policy Priorities argues that the growing number of severely poor is an indisputable fact.

"When we check against more complete government survey data and administrative records from the benefit programs themselves, they confirm that this trend is real," Sherman said. He added that even among the poor, severely poor people have a much tougher time paying their bills. "That's another sign to me that we're seeing something real and troubling," Sherman said.

Dow, S& P 500 Sink While Nasdaq Rises (USAT)

By Matt Krantz

USA Today, February 23, 2007

Weak earnings from a leading home builder, a $1.5 billion damage verdict against Microsoft and general concern that a market correction is overdue piled up to send stocks lower Thursday.

The Dow Jones industrial average fell 52.39 points to 12,686.02, making it the benchmark's second-straight down day. Still, the Dow remains up 1.8% this year.

Injured by losses of stocks in the environmental services, specialized finance and construction materials industries, the Standard & Poor's 500 index lost 1.25 points to 1456.38. The S&P 500 remains up 2.7% for the year.

Tech stocks were the exception, with the Nasdaq composite index rising 6.52 points to 2524.94. The tech-heavy index got a lift from semiconductor maker Analog Devices, which reported strong quarterly results late Wednesday and issued a positive outlook.

Some were encouraged by the market's ability to recover from the day's lows. The Dow, for instance, had been down nearly 90 points during the day. "It was a test. It was a good test," says Joseph Saluzzi, trader at Themis Trading. "It was relatively stable," he says.

Investors need to block out the panic about whether a market correction is overdue and imminent, says Alan Skrainka, strategist at Edward Jones.

It's true that the current rally of the Dow and S&P 500 is the second longest without a 10% correction in more than 100 years, Skrainka says. But he adds the longest rally, in the 1990s, ran 1,000 days longer than the current one, which is about a week from the 1,000-day mark. "It doesn't pay to worry about a correction. That doesn't stop it from happening," Skrainka says.

Instead, know that corrections are frequent and normal, and be ready to buy stocks at lower prices if the opportunity comes. "It doesn't pay to time the market," he says.

DOJ_NMG_0135699

Highlights:

Microsoft rose 4 cents to $29.39 despite the software firm facing a $1.5 billion judgment for allegedly infringing digital music patents held by Alcatel-Lucent (story, 1B). Meanwhile, Google took on Microsoft by beginning to sell Web-based word-processing and spreadsheet software to businesses. Google fell 1 cent to $475.85.

•Analog Devices gained $3.48, or 10.4%, to $36.80. The company reported 37.5% higher first-quarter earnings.

•Home builder Toll Bros. fell 93 cents to $31.93. It reported 67% lower profit largely due to write-offs in the value of land it holds (story, 6B).

Stocks Ease As Oil Nears $61; Nasdaq Grabs A 6-Year High (WSJ)

By Shefali Anand

The Wall Street Journal, February 23, 2007

Stocks slipped, as oil zipped higher for a second straight day.

Crude-oil prices crossed the $61 mark in intraday trading, following news of a decline in supplies of some petroleum products. Crude-futures contracts for April delivery rose 88 cents, or 1.5%, to $60.95 a barrel at the New York Mercantile Exchange, the highest close in 2007 and only 10 cents below the start of the year.

The Dow Jones Industrial Average fell for a second straight day, closing down 52.39 points, or 0.4%, to 12686.02, up 1.8% this year.

The Energy Department reported that inventories of gasoline and natural gas fell more than expected in the week ended Feb 16. Supplies of crude oil, however, rose.

Traders also paid attention to a United Nations report that Iran wasn't cutting back its nuclear program, which raises the possibility of trouble in the Middle East that could affect the supply, and consequently, the price of oil.

Still, analysts aren't sure that oil's gains can be sustained for a long period. "Without further help, be it from weather or supply, [the price] may settle back a bit," said Jeffrey Grossman, president of commodities trading firm BRG Brokerage.

The broad Standard & Poor's 500-stock index slipped 0.1%, or 1.25 points, to 1456.38, up 2.7% on the year. But the technology-laden Nasdaq Composite Index, which began the day lower, closed at a fresh six-year high, rising 0.3%, or 6.52 points, to 2524.94. It is now up 4.5% year-to-date.

Some market professionals said they wouldn't be surprised to see more declines in the next few trading sessions, but remain bullish on stocks for the year overall. "We're overdue for a pause on the equity side because the markets have really been very strong," said Andy Brooks, head of stock trading at Baltimore investment-management firm T. Rowe Price.

Some semiconductor shares rose on the back of good company news. Microchip maker Analog Devices rose 10% to $36.80, following its announcement of better-than-expected first-quarter earnings after the market close Wednesday. National Semiconductor shares jumped about 7% to $25.39.

Shares of Whole Foods Market rose 14% to $51.74, after the firm announced that it would buy rival Wild Oats Markets for $565 million. Wild Oats stock was up 17% to close at $18.41.

Outside the U.S. Stocks rose in dollar terms. The Dow Jones World Stock Index, excluding U.S. shares, rose 0.35%, or 0.89 point, to 253.33.

In major U.S. market action:

Stocks were mixed. On the Big Board, where 2.6 billion shares traded, 1,534 stocks rose and 1,736 fell.

Bonds declined. The 10-year Treasury note fell 10/32, or $3.12 for each $1,000 invested, pushing the yield up to 4.730%. The 30-year bond fell 20/32, to yield 4.830%.

The dollar strengthened. Late in New York, it traded at 121.58 yen, up from 120.88 yen, while the euro fell slightly against the dollar at $1.3124 from $1.3139.

Write to Shefali Anand at shefali.anand@wsj.com1

UCLA Wins Psychiatric Sex Trial, But No One Gets Monetary Award (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 23, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0135700

A Los Angeles jury today ruled against a former UCLA psychiatric resident who claimed the school unfairly rescinded its offer of a coveted job because he broke off an affair with his supervisor.

But jurors did not believe the supervisor's counter-charge that Dr. David Martorano had slandered her by making up the affair, which Martorano testified included oral sex in parked cars.

In the end, neither party was awarded any money after a two-week trial of their dueling lawsuits that featured the appearance of no fewer than nine psychiatrists, along with women testifying about their sex lives under code names to protect their privacy.

As Los Angeles Superior Court Judge Judith Chirlin said to the jury: "You could have been here on some boring contract case."

Martorano, a handsome Columbia University-educated physician and a former psychiatric resident at UCLA's Neuropsychiatric Institute, alleged that he lost a coveted post as chief resident and that his reputation was ruined once rumors of the affair began to circulate after he broke off the relationship. He sued his former supervisor, Dr. Heather Krell, and UCLA.

Krell's lawyer accused Martorano of making the whole thing up to seduce yet another psychiatrist. Krell countersued Martorano for slander and invasion of privacy.

UCLA's lawyer, meanwhile, said it didn't matter from a legal perspective whether Martorano and Krell had an affair -- university administrators acted properly when they revoked the offer for Martorano to become chief resident after rumors began to fly because it was unacceptable for there to be even the perception that he was getting a job based on a sexual affair at the institute, one of the top facilities of its kind in the country.

Testimony was so explicit that Chirlin allowed several women to testify under code names, a decision she acknowledged was unusual but necessary to protect their reputations.

At times, the witness box seemed more like a psychoanalytic couch -- and not just because witnesses often faced not only a judge, jury and lawyers but also at least two psychiatrists.

Testimony and court papers included Martorano's depiction of himself zipping around Malibu on dates in a two-seater, as well as an internal UCLA report that said that people who worked with him said he "frequently spent his downtime ... talking about his sexual conduct." Jurors also heard his personal psychiatrist's assessment that he was "addicted" to having women fall in love with him.

At one point, UCLA's lawyer, Alan Zuckerman, asked Martorano, a former opera singer and the son of a psychiatrist, if he thought he had a narcissistic personality disorder. As Zuckerman later told the jury, narcissists have a grandiose sense of self, lack empathy for others and take advantage of them.

Martorano replied that he would never call himself narcissistic but that "there are traits of narcissism that I possess."

In his closing argument, Zuckerman went point by point through the nine attributes of narcissistic personality disorder in the Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders and explained how each attribute fit Martorano. He then accused the doctor of filing the lawsuit because his narcissistic personality couldn't handle that Krell would not admit that she had slept with him.

In response, Martorano's lawyer, Robert Scott, said that "some lawyers want to become psychiatrists." Later, he referred to Krell's lawyer, Donald Garrard, as "Dr. Garrard."

Garrard, meanwhile, enthusiastically endorsed the diagnoses of Martorano as a raging narcissist, offering several examples of his own.

Then he turned to evolutionary psychology in his attempt to impugn Martorano's testimony, saying that it wasn't believable that Martorano couldn't recall details of sex he allegedly had with Krell. "The genes we come with are programmed for little else," he said as the judge and members of the jury and gallery burst into laughter.

He also argued that jurors should not believe Martorano's claim that Krell had performed oral sex on him parked in an Audi in front of her apartment, because a 35-year-old physician would obviously choose to go to her apartment rather than stay in the car.

Garrard urged jurors to punish Martorano for acting like "a 14-year-old boy" by awarding Krell punitive damages.

DOJ_NMG_0135701

Martorano's attorney, however, argued that the evidence that Martorano and Krell had an affair was hard to dispute. He pointed to dozens of phone calls, social events they attended together and testimony that they watched a movie about a porn star titled "The Fluffer."

Then, when rumors of the affair emerged, he said, Krell created a hostile work environment for Martorano by criticizing him excessively and by spreading rumors that he was a liar, a misogynist and manic depressive. He also was denied the job of chief resident. Then, Scott said, UCLA tried to "sweep it all under the rug" to protect itself.

This is not the only sexual harassment claim facing UCLA's medical school and its psychiatry department.

Krell has also filed a separate sexual harassment suit against UCLA, alleging that she was subjected to an onslaught of sexual comments and sexually degrading and demeaning behavior and gestures from Andrew Leuchter, another psychiatrist at UCLA.

She also alleged that department administrators retaliated against her when she complained. UCLA denies the allegations. The case is to go to trial next fall.

The university recently lost an appeal of a third, unrelated sexual harassment and discrimination case in which a female psychiatrist was awarded $2.9 million.

Martorano now runs a psychiatric practice out of his home in Malibu, where one of the things he specializes in, according to his website, is couples therapy. But that has not been trouble-free.

He and his new wife are embroiled in a legal dispute with a neighbor.

His next-door neighbor recently accused him of killing his dog and videotaping his children. In a countersuit, Martorano denied the allegations and accused his neighbor of telling his patients he was a dog-killer and child molester.

Grades Rise, But Reading Skills Do Not (NYT)

By Diana Jean Schemo

The New York Times, February 23, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 22 — High school students nationwide are taking seemingly tougher courses and earning better grades, but their reading skills are not improving through the effort, according to two federal reports released here Thursday that cite grade inflation as a possible explanation.

The National Assessment of Educational Progress, an exam commonly known as the nation's report card, found that the reading skills of 12th graders tested in 2005 were significantly worse than those of students in 1992, when a comparable test was first given, and essentially flat since students previously took the exam in 2002.

The test results also showed that the overwhelming majority of high school seniors have not fully mastered high-school-level math.

At the same time, however, grade-point averages have risen nationwide, according to a separate survey by the National Assessment, of the transcripts of 26,000 students, which compared them with a study of students' coursework in 1990.

"There's a disconnect between what we want and expect our 12th graders to know and do, and what our schools are actually delivering through instruction in the classroom," David W. Gordon, the superintendent of schools in Sacramento, said at a news conference announcing the results.

The reports offered several rationales for the disparity between rising grade-point averages and tougher coursework on the one hand and stagnant reading scores on the other, including "grade inflation, changes in grading standards" or the possibility that student grades were being increasingly affected by things like classroom participation or extra assignments.

The National Assessment of Educational Progress is considered the yardstick for academic performance because it is the only test taken all across the country. The test of 12th-grade achievement was given to a representative sample of 21,000 high school seniors attending 900 public and private schools from January to March 2005.

It showed that the share of 12th-grade students lacking even basic high school reading skills — meaning they could not, for example, extract data about train fares at different times of day from a brochure — rose to 27 percent from 20 percent in 1992.

The share of students proficient in reading dropped to 35 percent from 40 percent in 1992. At the same time, the gap between boys and girls grew, with girls' reading skills more than a year ahead those of boys.

DOJ_NMG_0135702

In math, only 23 percent of all 12th graders were proficient, but the exam has been revamped, so the results could not be compared with those from earlier years, officials said. The new test has fewer questions requiring arithmetic and more using algebra and geometry. Some 39 percent of 12th graders lacked even basic high school math skills.

These results came about even though the separate study of transcripts showed that 12th graders in 2005 averaged 360 more hours of classroom instruction during their high school years than students had in 1990.

Their overall grade-point average was 2.98 — just shy of a B. That was one-third of a letter grade higher than in 1990. The share of students taking a standard curriculum or better, intended to prepare them for college, jumped to 68 percent from 40 percent.

In math, girls had higher grades than boys, and closed the achievement gap, scoring about as well as boys did on the national assessment. Boys who had taken advanced math and science courses, however, scored higher than girls who had also taken such courses.

The Bush administration, which has been pressing to expand testing in high school under the federal education law, No Child Left Behind, seized upon the results as proof that high schools were not measuring up.

"The consensus for strengthening our high schools has never been stronger," Margaret Spellings, the secretary of education, said in a statement released in advance of the report. "Schools must prepare students to succeed in college and the 21st-century work force."

Just how students can be getting better grades in classes that are supposedly more challenging yet lag in reading may become clearer in the future. Mark Schneider, the commissioner of the National Center for Education Statistics, the branch of the Education Department that administers the exams, had also collected a warehouse full of course descriptions, reading lists and textbooks to investigate the actual content of classes students are taking.

The Education Trust, a nonprofit group representing urban schools, attributed the disparity to a kind of academic false advertising, saying that schools may seem to offer the same courses to all students, but that the content of those courses is sometimes less demanding for poor and minority children.

For example, the group found, a ninth-grade English teacher at one school assigned students a two- to three-page essay comparing the themes of Homer's "Odyssey" to those in the movie "O Brother, Where Art Thou?" At the same school, assignments in another class covering the same material were considerably less demanding. There, students broke up into three clusters, with one designing a brochure for "Odyssey Cruises," another drawing pictures and the third making up a crossword using characters from the "Odyssey."

"Just slapping new names on courses with weak curriculum and ill-prepared teachers won't boost achievement," Kati Haycock, the Education Trust's president, said.

Grades Rise, But Reading Skills Fall, Data Suggest (USAT)

By Greg Toppo

USA Today, February 23, 2007

WASHINGTON — High school seniors are taking more challenging classes and earning higher grades than ever, but their reading skills have actually worsened since 1992, data released Thursday by the U.S. Education Department suggest.

Education Secretary Margaret Spellings said the results show that "we must act now to increase rigor in our high schools." The No Child Left Behind law, up for reauthorization this year, currently applies only minimally to high schools.

The report brought mixed — and contradictory — results:

A record 68% of the class of 2005 completed at least a standard curriculum with four years of English and three each of math, science and social studies. That's a huge jump from 1990, when only 40% did the same, according to the study of 26,000 public- and private-school transcripts.

In 2005, 51% of students were doing college-preparatory work, up from 31% in 1990. And 10% were earning college credit, up from 5% in 1990.

DOJ_NMG_0135703

•The average high school senior doesn't read as well as those in 1992, the first year the National Assessment of Educational Progress (NAEP) was given to 12th-graders. In 2005, 35% of seniors scored "proficient" or "advanced," down from 40% in 1992.

Reading at a "proficient" level means students can make critical judgments — for instance, describing how two editorials argue different viewpoints. "Basic" means students can read and retrieve information from a document and recognize a sequence of plot elements.

The government has no comparable long-term data on math scores since it changed the test in 2005. But the 2005 scores show that, overall, 12th-graders' skills are basic at best.

"Clearly we need to look at some major changes in the way schools are organized and how teaching is delivered," Massachusetts Education Commissioner David Driscoll said.

The Brookings Institution's Tom Loveless, who researches the NAEP and course content, said that the reading results "should really be an area of concern" — and that perhaps even the brightest students don't read as much as they used to.

Critics have long said the NAEP is a poor measure of how well 12th-graders do, and the new data could give them ammunition: Even students whose transcripts show they took calculus score only, on average, "proficient" in math.

Loveless noted that the test includes no calculus, which forces advanced students to do math work they haven't done in three or four years.

Education researcher Gerald Bracey said 12th-graders take the NAEP in the last semester of their high school careers, and they have no real incentive to do well. Poor results are "senior slump writ large," he said.

Test Scores At Odds With Rising High School Grades (WP)

By Amit R. Paley

The Washington Post, February 23, 2007

High school seniors are performing worse overall on some national tests than they did in the previous decade, even though they are receiving significantly higher grades and taking what seem to be more rigorous courses, according to government data released yesterday.

The mismatch between stronger transcripts and weak test scores on the National Assessment of Educational Progress, often called the nation's report card, resonated in the Washington area and elsewhere. Some seized upon the findings as evidence of grade inflation and the dumbing-down of courses. The findings also prompted renewed calls for tough national standards and the expansion of the federal No Child Left Behind law.

"We have our work cut out for us," Education Secretary Margaret Spellings said in a statement. "If, in fact, our high school students are taking more challenging courses and earning higher grades, we should be seeing greater gains in test scores."

About 35 percent of 12th-graders tested in 2005 scored proficient or better in reading -- the lowest percentage since the test was launched in 1992, the new data showed. And less than a quarter of seniors scored at least proficient on a new version of the math test; officials called those results disappointing but said they could not be compared to past scores. In addition, a previous report found that 18 percent of seniors in 2005 scored at least proficient in science, down from 21 percent in 1996.

At the same time, the average high school grade-point average rose from 2.68 in 1990 (about a B-minus) to 2.98 in 2005 (about a B), according to a study of transcripts from graduating seniors. The study also found that the percentage of graduating seniors who completed a standard or mid-level course of study rose from 35 to 58 percent in that time; meanwhile, the percentage who took the highest-level curriculum doubled, to 10 percent.

"The core problem is that course titles don't really signal what is taught in the course and grades don't signal what a kid has learned," said Kati Haycock, president of the Education Trust, a D.C.-based nonprofit group that supports No Child Left Behind. She added hyperbolically, "What we're going to end up with is the high school valedictorian who can't write three paragraphs."

Some experts say these educational mirages, which obscure low student achievement with inflated grades and tough-sounding class titles, disproportionately harm poor and minority students.

DOJ_NMG_0135704

A visit to two ninth-grade English classes in Prince George's County this week showed that instruction can vary immensely even in classrooms -- just 15 miles apart -- that share the same champagne-colored textbook, the same course title and the same syllabus.

In Room 101 at Bowie High, a racially diverse school in one of the county's more affluent areas, the assignment was: Compare and contrast the themes of disillusionment, poverty and frustration in George Orwell's "Animal Farm" and the poems of Langston Hughes.

In Room 31 at Suitland High, which has more poor and black students, the assignment was: What are your immediate goals? How would you feel if no one close to you supported you in reaching your goals?

The teacher at Suitland, R'Chelle L. Mullins, walked around the classroom and repeated the assignment several times to the students, some of whose heads were slumped on their desks. "What are your immediate goals?" she asked one boy again.

"To pass the ninth grade," he finally answered.

After class, Mullins said she had "stuck very close to the curriculum" and "was doing exactly what the county wants me to do." But when told of the more complicated questions asked in the Bowie High class, Mullins acknowledged that she sometimes modifies assignments based on the background of her students.

Mullins, 24, who began teaching two years ago because she wanted to help underprivileged children, said she had "a different caliber" of students in her classroom. "Not to dumb my kids down," she added. "I hate the bad reputation that they get, and I don't think it's fair at all. . . . Not to pass the blame, but some of these kids should never have been allowed to graduate middle school."

County Superintendent John E. Deasy said he is working hard to reduce inequities among schools and cited uneven teacher quality as a key issue. He said that the county curriculum has been standardized and that the challenge now is to ensure an equal level of instruction in every classroom by investing in teacher training and increasing the number of Advancement Placement courses.

"This is the civil rights issue of our time," Deasy said.

The potential for grade and course-title inflation is not confined to low-performing schools. Julie Greenberg, a math teacher at Montgomery Blair High School in Silver Spring, said she was under such pressure to raise grades that she used to keep two sets of books in her statistics class: one for the grades students deserved and one for the grades that appeared on report cards.

"If a teacher were to really grade students on their true level of mastery, there would be such extraordinary levels of failure that it would not be tolerated, so most teachers don't do that," she said.

At a news conference yesterday near Capitol Hill, education experts expressed concern that white and Asian students continue to score consistently higher than black and Hispanic students in all subjects. They also said the overall discrepancy between the test scores and transcripts deserves close examination. Darvin M. Winick, chairman of the National Assessment Governing Board, which oversaw the exams and the transcript study, called the gap "very suspicious."

"For all of our talk of the achievement gap amongst subgroups of students, a larger problem may be an instructional gap or a rigor gap," said David W. Gordon, superintendent of Sacramento County schools in California. "There's a disconnect between what we want and expect our 12th-grade students to know and do and what our schools are actually delivering through instruction in the classroom."

Lawmakers said the low test scores would reinvigorate the debate over high school reform as Congress considers the renewal of No Child Left Behind.

Rep. George Miller (D-Calif.), chairman of the House Education and Labor Committee, said "disappointing" results underscore the need to recruit first-rate teachers to low-performing schools.

Report Raises Questions About High-School Courses (WSJ)

By Robert Tomsho

The Wall Street Journal, February 23, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0135705

American educators have complained about grade inflation for years. But new findings suggest that U.S. high schools may also suffer from another type of inflation -- in the labeling of courses.

Under pressure to produce graduates better prepared for college and the workplace, dozens of states have stiffened high-school graduation requirements in recent years, pushing a broader array of students to take more years of core subjects and eliminating less rigorous lower-tier courses altogether.

Reflecting these efforts, a review of high-school transcripts by the staff of the National Assessment of Educational Progress shows that high-school students are taking, and receiving higher grades in, more college-prep courses than ever.

Yet just-released test results for 12th graders on the NAEP, a widely respected barometer of educational achievement known as the "nation's report card," indicated that students are graduating with mediocre math skills and reading abilities that have tumbled to their lowest level since the early 1990s. The 12th-grade tests are designed to measure the sorts of high-level thinking demanded in college work.

The findings raise questions about whether college-prep courses are as tough as their titles indicate, and, if so, whether high schools and their instructors are adequately prepared to teach such courses to a rapidly changing mix of students.

U.S. Education Secretary Margaret Spellings expressed disappointment with the findings, saying: "If, in fact, our high-school students are taking more challenging courses and earning higher grades, we should be seeing greater gains in test scores."

Other observers said the results suggest that some school districts are teaching watered-down versions of everything from history to trigonometry. "A course title alone does not make rigor," said David Conley, a University of Oregon professor who studies high-school course content.

The NAEP results are likely to fuel calls for reform measures as the federal No Child Left Behind act approaches a reauthorization debate. The Bush administration has proposed requiring states to conduct additional reading and math achievement tests at the high-school level.

In December, the Commission on the Skills of the American Workforce, a private group that includes former governors and cabinet secretaries from both political parties, called for such radical measures as ending high school after 10th grade for some students and denying entry to public colleges and universities to any who can't pass so-called board exams in core subjects.

The NAEP review of high school transcripts, released yesterday, found that 51% of the graduating class of 2005 completed at least a midlevel college-prep curriculum that included four years of English; three years of math, including geometry and algebra; and three years of science including at least two of biology, chemistry and physics. In 1990, only about 31% of seniors completed a similar curriculum.

The NAEP review also found that the class of 2005 received about 360 more hours of instruction in high school than their 1990 counterparts and earned higher grades. On a zero-to-four point scale, the 2005 seniors had a cumulative grade point average of 2.98 points, or about a B, up from 2.68 points in 1990. But the benefits of such changes weren't evident in the results of NAEP reading and math achievement tests for the class of 2005.

On a zero-to-500 point scale, their average reading score was 286 points. That was down a point from 2002, the last time the test was given, and was the lowest average score since 1992, when the average was 292 points. About 40% of the test takers scored at or above the proficient range, down from 44% in 1992.

On the math side, the average score was 150 on a zero-to-300 point scale and only 23% of the seniors were scored at or above the proficient range. NAEP officials said results of the 2005 math test aren't comparable with those from previous years because of recent changes in the exam's structure and content.

Reflecting demographic changes in society, the sorts of students taking the NAEP test have changed significantly in recent years. Hispanics accounted for 14% of all 12th graders in 2005, up from 7% in 1992. The scoring gap between them and white students has changed little since 1992.

Since 1998, when NAEP began allowing accommodations such as longer testing times, more English-language learners are also taking the NAEP. In 2005, they accounted for about 4% of all seniors taking the NAEP reading test and posted an average score of 247. The effect was to lower the overall average score by two points, to 286, which NAEP officials said was statistically significant.

DOJ_NMG_0135706

The decline in reading abilities was not a complete surprise. A recent study by ACT Inc., the nonprofit testing concern based in Iowa City, Iowa, found that only about 51% of high school graduates who took the ACT test in 2005 were prepared to tackle college-level reading, down from 55% in 1999. ACT also found a decline in reading skills through the high-school years, with more eighth- and 10th-graders on track for college reading than seniors. "Reading just drops off the radar in high school," said Jon Erickson, ACT's vice president for educational services.

And the NAEP results aren't the only signs that college-prep courses may not be delivering all that they promise.

The College Board, the New York nonprofit that gives the SAT admissions test, is in the midst of a nationwide audit of its high-school Advanced Placement Program courses, amid concerns that some districts aren't offering college-level content.

Meanwhile, a recent study by the state of Maryland found that 30% of its 2005 high-school graduates who completed a college-prep curriculum needed remedial math in college, up from 26% for the class of 2000.

States may require students to take more upper-level courses, but content is still largely left up to local school boards and varies widely. And few states have instituted mandatory end-of-course tests to measure what is actually being taught in high-school classrooms or taken concrete action to ensure that high-school graduation standards are aligned with what colleges and universities expect incoming freshmen to know.

Hodan Janay, of Boston says she earned B's during four years of high-school English, took a college-prep literature course her senior year and passed the state English exams required to graduate. "But I wasn't as ready as I thought," says the 21-year-old, who is now enrolled in a remedial English course at Boston's Bunker Hill Community College.

Write to Robert Tomsho at rob.tomsho@wsj.com3

Higher Grades Contradict Test Scores (AP)

By Nancy Zuckerbrod

AP, February 23, 2007

WASHINGTON — Large percentages of high school seniors are posting weak scores on national math and reading tests even though more of them are taking challenging courses and getting higher grades in school, say two new government reports released Thursday.

"The reality is that the results don't square," said Darvin Winick, chair of the independent National Assessment Governing Board, which oversees the national tests.

Nearly 40 percent of high school seniors scored below the basic level on the math test. More than a quarter of seniors failed to reach the basic level on the reading test. Most educators think students ought to be able to work at the basic level.

The reading scores show no change since 2002, the last time the tests were given. "We should be getting better. There's nothing good about a flat score," Winick said.

The government said it could not compare the math results to old scores because the latest test was significantly different.

The National Assessment of Educational Progress — often called the nation's report card — is viewed as the best way to compare students across the country because it's the only uniform national yardstick for how well students are learning.

The tests were given in 2005. The government released the scores Thursday along with a report examining the high school transcripts of 2005 graduates.

The transcript study shows high school students are earning more credits, taking more challenging courses and getting higher grade-point averages than in the past.

In 2005, high school graduates had an overall grade-point average just shy of 3.0 — or about a B. That has gone up from a grade-point average of about 2.7 in 1990.

It is unclear whether student performance has improved or whether grade inflation or something else might be responsible, the report said.

More students are completing high school with a standard curriculum, meaning they took at least four credits of English and three credits each of social studies, math and science. More students also are taking the next level of courses, which generally includes college preparatory classes.

DOJ_NMG_0135707

But the study showed no increase in the number of high-schoolers who completed the most advanced curriculum, which could include college-level or honors classes.

On the math test, about 60 percent of high school seniors performed at or above the basic level. At that level, a student should be able to convert a decimal to a fraction, for example.

Just one-fourth of 12th-graders were proficient or better in math, meaning they demonstrated solid academic performance. To qualify as "proficient," students might have to determine what type of graph should be used to display particular types of data.

On the reading test, about three-fourths of seniors performed at or above the basic level, while 40 percent hit the proficient mark.

Seniors working at a basic reading level can identify elements of an author's style. At the proficient level, they can make inferences from reading material, draw conclusions from it and make connections to their own experiences.

As in the past, the math and reading scores showed large achievement gaps between white students and minorities.

Forty-three percent of white students scored at or above proficient levels on the reading test, compared with 20 percent of Hispanic students and 16 percent of black students.

On the math test, 29 percent of white students reached the proficient level, compared with 8 percent of Hispanics and 6 percent of blacks.

The gap in reading scores between whites and minorities was relatively unchanged since 2002.

The federal No Child Left Behind law has put added emphasis on math and reading, largely in the elementary- and middle-school grades. It also requires states to separate out their test scores by race so officials can track and try to narrow achievement gaps between groups of students.

High Schoolers' Scores Lag Despite Courses, Grades (WT)

By Amy Fagan, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, February 23, 2007

More 2005 high school graduates took challenging classes and got higher grades than their peers a few years prior, but overall, large percentages of high school seniors are scoring poorly on reading and math tests, two new reports found yesterday.

Education Secretary Margaret Spellings said these results mean "we have our work cut out for us," in providing quality education.

"If, in fact, our high school students are taking more challenging courses and earning higher grades, we should be seeing greater gains in test scores," she said, after the release of the National Assessment of Educational Progress (NEAP).

These reading and math tests, released by the government yesterday, were given in 2005 to a representative sample of more than 21,000 high school seniors from 900 schools. Accompanying that report was a separate study examining the transcripts of 2005 high school graduates.

According to the NAEP, nearly 40 percent of high school seniors didn't perform at the basic level on the math test and 23 percent performed at or above proficient level.

The average reading scores didn't change much since 2002 but declined since 1992. Seventy-three percent of 2005 high school seniors performed at or above basic reading level, meaning more than a quarter of seniors didn't reach that threshold.

In 2000, about 13 percent of high school graduates completed standard course work, and 36 percent went beyond and completed midlevel course work, according to the transcript study. Those percentages increased in 2005, to 17 percent and 41 percent.

The 2005 graduates also carried a slightly higher grade point average -- about a 3.0 -- than 2000 graduates and notably higher than the 2.7 GPA in 1990. The study noted "many possible reasons" for the increase, including grade inflation, changes in grading standards and practices, and growth in student performance.

Lawmakers and education researchers agreed that improvement is needed but disagreed on the best way of getting there -- with some arguing the federal government should get more involved in high schools and some saying that is exactly the wrong approach.

DOJ_NMG_0135708

"The No Child Left Behind Act is working to improve our nation's elementary and middle schools, and we must act now to increase rigor in our high schools and improve graduation rates," Mrs. Spellings said, touting President Bush's proposal for more testing and improved curricula in high schools as part of his suggestions for renewing the law.

House education panel Chairman Rep. George Miller, California Democrat, called the scores a "disappointment" and said that as lawmakers work to renew federal education law for younger students "part of our charge will be to develop strategies for helping our struggling high schools," such as recruiting better teachers and ensuring all students have access to advanced courses.

Neal McClusky, education policy analyst at the Cato Institute, noted that the disappointing scores come despite "huge increases in per-pupil expenditures, the installation of 'standards and accountability' mechanisms all around the country, and ever-greater federal intervention" in America's schools.

"With all this in mind, the lesson from the latest NAEP scores is clear: American education needs fundamental restructuring away from the top-down, government control that has wrought regular academic failure, to a system that empowers parents to take their children and tax dollars out of broken public schools and put them into institutions that work," he said.

U.S. High Schools Raise Grades, Don't Test Better (Update2) (BLOOM)

By Paul Basken

Bloomberg, February 23, 2007

Feb. 22 (Bloomberg) -- U.S. high school students are showing no overall improvement on a nationwide achievement test, even as they take more challenging courses and earn higher grades, the U.S. Education Department reported.

Nationwide, 73 percent of 12th-grade students achieved a ``basic" reading score in 2005, down from 80 percent in 1992, according to the National Assessment of Educational Progress, a sampling test the government calls the ``nation's report card." Sixty-one percent scored at or above the basic level in math.

At the same time, 68 percent of high school graduates completed at least a ``standard" curriculum, up from 59 percent in 2000, with the overall grade point average about one-third of a letter grade higher than in 1990, the department said in a report. The figures raise questions about the quality of the courses being taught at U.S. high schools, it said.

``If, in fact, our high school students are taking more challenging courses and earning higher grades, we should be seeing greater gains in test scores," U.S. Education Secretary Margaret Spellings said in a statement. The results ``show that we have our work cut out for us," she said.

In May, NAEP said there were declines in science scores for high school students. Among 12th-graders, 54 percent were at or above the basic level in science in 2005, statistically similar to 2000 and a decline from 57 percent in 1996, the report said.

`Disappointing' Results

Business and education leaders said the latest results reinforce fears that the U.S. school system isn't preparing its students to be competitive in the global workplace.

``It's disappointing and unacceptable," said Susan Traiman, director of education and workforce policy at the Business Roundtable, a Washington-based association of chief executive officers of U.S. companies including General Motors Corp., Exxon Mobil Corp. and Citigroup Inc.

``These numbers perfectly book-end the rating of employers last fall," who in a nationwide survey said more half of companies are finding workers inadequately training in math or reading, said Linda Barrington, labor economist and research director at the Conference Board, a New York-based business group.

Bush Budget

Today's report on reading and math follows President George W. Bush's release earlier this month of his fiscal 2008 budget recommendation, in which he again asked Congress to devote a greater share of federal funding toward raising high school achievement levels.

Congress hasn't endorsed that plan in the past, in part because Democrats opposed Bush's calls for financing high school improvements through spending cuts in other parts of the federal education budget.

DOJ_NMG_0135709

Representative Buck McKeon, the California Republican who headed the House education committee last year, believes the NAEP results mean Congress must continue to demand more from schools, spokesman Steve Forde said.

The NAEP report ``is a further indication that backing away from that commitment would be a huge mistake," Forde said.

Others were more cautious. Some of the lower performance at the 12th-grade level could be due to older students realizing their scores on the NAEP test have no effect on their personal records, said Antonia Cortese, executive vice president of the 1.3 million-member American Federation of Teachers, the nation's second-largest teacher union.

`No Child' Testing

The federal No Child Left Behind law currently requires schools to test students in grades 3 through 8, then once in high school. Researchers including Bruce Fuller, an education professor at the University of California, Berkeley, have suggested that states may be weakening their tests to help raise their passing rates under the federal law.

The NAEP reports today may reinforce fears that the quality of high-level courses suffers as more students are allowed into them, the Education Trust, a Washington-based research and advocacy group, said in a statement. ``This pattern is undoubtedly playing out in some schools," Education Trust said. ``But we know that it doesn't have to be this way."

The NAEP tests for 2005 were given to a nationally representative sample of more than 21,000 high school seniors in 900 schools.

The results show 35 percent of 12th-grade students scored at or above ``proficient" in reading in 2005, down from 40 percent in 1992. Only 23 percent of 12th-graders achieved the proficient rating in math in 2005.

Math Scores

The math scores aren't comparable with previous years because NAEP introduced a new assessment test in 2005, the report said. A separate analysis provided by NAEP of common math questions, however, showed a ``statistically significant increase," to 44 percent in 2005 from 42 percent in 2000, in the percentage of students answering each question correctly.

The scores released today also showed persistent gaps among racial and ethnic groups, including white students scoring 31 points higher than black students in math and 24 points higher than Hispanic students.

The comparisons to high school transcripts were based on data from 26,000 graduates of about 640 public schools and 80 private schools. The report defined a ``standard curriculum" to mean the student has taken at least four credits of English and three each in social studies, mathematics and science.

In addition to more students enrolling in such a curriculum and receiving higher grades, the NAEP study found that U.S. high school graduates in 2005 earned about three credits more than their 1990 counterparts. That translates to about 360 additional hours of instruction during their high school years, it said.

Possible reasons for the increase in high school grades include ``grade inflation, changes in grading standards and practices and growth in student performance," the report said.

Stepping To The Plate, Giuliani Is Seeing Only Softballs (NYT)

By Richard Pérez-peña

The New York Times, February 23, 2007

SPARTANBURG, S.C., Feb. 21 — In a swing through South Carolina this week, Rudolph W. Giuliani chose to campaign at a fire house, which is a little like Derek Jeter meeting with Yankees fans — a most unlikely forum for hostility, or even much skepticism.

Instead of the sometimes barbed give-and-take endured by the other candidates, Mr. Giuliani, the former mayor of New York, fielded a few questions from the firefighters and police officers who gathered to hear him here. The questions, which began with comments like, “Being in your presence here is just unbelievable,” stuck almost entirely to issues on which Mr. Giuliani is most comfortable, like airport security and border control.

More than the other major presidential candidates, Mr. Giuliani has limited himself to events with narrowly defined, friendly audiences, avoiding the kind of uncomfortable interrogations his rivals have occasionally faced. Aside from a couple of brief swings through diners, including one yesterday in Delray Beach, Fla., he has done little of the politicking that exposes candidates to random sets of people — at shopping malls or train stations — who might be of any political stripe, and can raise any issue.

DOJ_NMG_0135710

Senators Hillary Rodham Clinton, John McCain and Barack Obama and others have held forums in Iowa and New Hampshire that were open to anyone and were widely advertised in advance — Mr. McCain did three on Saturday alone. People who were clearly skeptical pressed the candidates — Mrs. Clinton and Mr. McCain on their Iraq war positions, and Mr. Obama on his relative inexperience.

Mr. Giuliani has had no such events so far. He has yet to be questioned by voters about his support for abortion rights, same-sex civil unions and gun control, or about his marital history.

Party officials say Mr. Giuliani will have to face greater scrutiny from voters in primary states.

"For now it's O.K., but he can't follow that strategy indefinitely," said Fergus Cullen, the Republican chairman in New Hampshire. "People in New Hampshire, Iowa and a couple of other places really demand a chance to hit you between the eyes, and to ask a pointed follow-up if you don't give a straight answer. And there's a curveball in every group."

A spokeswoman, Maria Comella, said Mr. Giuliani was not avoiding difficult questions, noting that it was still early in the campaign and that "the mayor's travel has just started to pick up."

"The mayor will be at a wide variety of events that will put him in front of voters where he will answer their questions," Ms. Comella said.

She would not say whether there were plans for an open forum in the near future.

Difficult issues have come up, raised by journalists if not by others, and all candidates like to go before sympathetic groups and take agreeable questions. President Bush made a habit of it in 2004. Conversely, Mr. Giuliani was known for his frequent sparring with combative New York City reporters during his years as mayor.

The traditions of states with early presidential contests call for taking a few risks in front of voters. Dick Bennett, an independent pollster based in New Hampshire, said after Mr. Giuliani's last trip to that state that he was surprised at how little unscripted exposure to voters there was and wondered if they would hold it against him.

"People here expect to be able to see you, up close, more than once," Mr. Bennett said.

Mr. Giuliani recently spoke to state Republican conventions in New Hampshire and California, but he did not take questions, so there was little opportunity to address his views on social issues that set him apart from many in his party.

In the last month, Mr. Giuliani has had three brief public exchanges with groups of business people who were more interested in economic issues than social ones. At an agricultural fair in Central California he was asked about farm policy, and at a Chamber of Commerce dinner in New Hampshire, he was asked about budget deficits.

The Giuliani campaign billed the stop Wednesday in South Carolina, an early primary state, as a town-hall meeting. But only "first responders" had been invited, and Mr. Giuliani's speech was devoted to the heroism of police officers and firefighters on Sept. 11 and the threat of terrorism.

Many of those present described themselves as religious and more conservative than Mr. Giuliani, but they also said they attended because they were fans — and after hearing him praise them as the nation's heroes, they were in no mood to challenge him.

As much as the audiences he chooses, it is Mr. Giuliani's reputation as the icon of Sept. 11 that has shielded him during his early campaigning. At every stop, he is greeted more like a celebrity than a candidate and is asked in reverential tones about his handling of the attacks on the World Trade Center.

The social issues "carry some weight, but you have to look at the big picture," said Brian Lawson, the assistant fire chief in Chesnee, S.C., who attended Wednesday's event. "9/11, everybody knows what a job he did there, that he showed some great leadership. That's why we're here."

And of all the presidential candidates who have visited upstate South Carolina, Mr. Lawson said, "he's the first one to ask to speak with this group."

Giuliani To Court K Street (POL)

By Jonathan Martin

Politico.com, February 23, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0135711

Former New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani comes to Washington tomorrow to do a little lobbyist outreach. Lobbyists Dirk Van Dongen, Susan Molinari, Mike Zarelli and Willie Gaynor have helped put together the meet-and-greet, which is designed to familiarize Rudy with top K St. Republicans and vice-versa. There is no charge for the afternoon get-together, to take place at a downtown Washington hotel. First there will be a general reception, followed by a series of smaller meetings.

Because of the recess, members are not expected to attend. But Rudy is also making progress on that front and will soon roll out the backing of Rep. Charlie Dent of Pennyslvania. Dent, who represents an Allentown-area district, is only in his second term but is a respected member of the GOP conference. He served for years in the state legislature and knows the Lehigh Valley and Keystone State politics well. I'm also told that Team Rudy is making progress with other members of both chambers of Congress and will soon be announcing additional endorsements from the sort of states (Pennsylvania being one) that his supporters think he could put in play in the general election.

Huckabee: Don't Forget Me (POL)

By Mike Allen

Politico.com, February 23, 2007

Exclusive: Former Arkansas governor Mike Huckabee plans to make a splash on Capitol Hill on Friday with the surprising announcement that Rep. Don Young of Alaska has signed on as congressional chairman of his Republican presidential exploratory committee.

In a letter to House Republicans, Young says Huckabee will help produce "a reawakening of the conservative values that make our country a land of opportunity."

Huckabee, who moved out of the mansion in Little Rock in January, is rushing to catch up with the front-runners' massive organization and plans to officially announce his candidacy in the next few months. He said in a telephone interview that the debates – including the Politico-MSNBC debate on May 3 at the Ronald Reagan Library – will be critical to his chances of breaking out.

"Best I can determine, the floor is the same level for everybody at the debates," Huckabee said on his cell phone as he ran errands in Little Rock on Thursday. "This election will eventually become focused not just on rhetoric but the results behind the rhetoric."

Huckabee noted with a chuckle the disadvantages of being the front-runner this early in the campaign. "There's only one direction you can go, and it's not a good one," he said.

His campaign got a critical boost in South Carolina, which has one of the earliest nominating contests, when he was endorsed earlier this month by former South Carolina first lady Iris Campbell. Her youngest son, Mike Campbell, will serve as a senior national adviser to the campaign. The late Gov. Carroll Campbell and his family played a critical role in helping Ronald Reagan, George H.W. Bush, Bob Dole and George W. Bush win the South Carolina primary.

Young, the third-ranking Republican in Congress, is no diplomat but he has deep personal connections with almost every member because he was chairman of the House Transportation and Infrastructure Committee, which put him in charge of massive amounts of pork.

Young said in an interview from Puerto Rico that Huckabee is "a man of character and a hell of a speaker." Young said he'll travel on Huckabee's behalf. "He may be a long shot now," Young said. "But when this settles down, people will see that a governor is best positioned to bring the country together. They have the experience of bringing the opposite sides of a legislature together. People always ask me who I think I going to win, and when I say Governor Huckabee, they say, 'Who?' So we just need to convince people that he's a leader with great character."

Also Friday, Huckabee plans to announce that Rep. John Boozman of Arkansas will be congressional co-chairman of his presidential exploratory committee. Boozman is a member of the Republican Study Committee, the conservative caucus, and so has ties to a group of members whose support could really help Huckabee.

Boozman said in an interview that Huckabee "has a tremendous ability to communicate" and has positioned himself well as a conservative. "This thing is wide open," Boozman said. "His greatest challenge is going to be coordinating a national campaign."

DOJ_NMG_0135712

Fundraiser To Help Underwrite S.C. Primary (WP)

By Chris Cillizza

The Washington Post, February 23, 2007

South Carolina may be a new addition to the early days of Democrats' presidential nomination fight, but the state is already showing veteran savvy when it comes to collecting cash for its Jan. 29, 2008, primary.

Witness a fundraiser set for March 7 in Washington. The featured guests? The bulk of the 2008 Democratic field, including Sens. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.), Joe Biden (Del.) and Chris Dodd (Conn.), as well as former senator John Edwards (N.C.) and former Iowa governor Tom Vilsack. Reps. Jim Clyburn and John Spratt -- the only Democrats in South Carolina's congressional delegation -- are also set to appear.

The event, which will be emceed by Clinton White House press secretary Mike McCurry, is being billed as a "kickoff reception" for the state's presidential primary.

Joe Erwin, chairman of the South Carolina Democratic Party, explained that his state is one of a handful where the party must raise all of the money to finance the primary. In 2004, Erwin estimated, the cost of South Carolina's Democratic primary was $285,000. He believes the price tag this time will be closer to $500,000.

"It's a great honor to seek and successfully garner the first-in-the-South primary; it's a heck of a challenge to put it on," Erwin said.Breaux to the Rescue?

One question dominated the political chatter at this week's Washington Mardi Gras celebration: Will he or won't he? The "he" in question being former senator John Breaux (D-La.), who is looking seriously at running for governor in November.

Breaux, who served in Congress for more than three decades, is widely seen as Democrats' strongest statewide candidate and is being pushed to make a run by party regulars who don't believe Gov. Kathleen Babineaux Blanco (D) can win reelection. Blanco faced widespread criticism for her handling of the response to Hurricane Katrina, and private polling has shown her badly trailing Rep. Bobby Jindal (R), who has already declared his candidacy.

"Really, only John and Lois Breaux know the real odds of his decision-making process right now," said Rich Masters, a former senior aide to Louisiana Sen. Mary Landrieu (D). "But the odds of remaking New Orleans and the state would be much better with John Breaux as governor, so personally I hope he runs."

Breaux did not return a call seeking comment. He has until Sept. 6 -- the state's filing deadline -- to make up his mind.Huckabee Gets a Hand on the Hill

Former governor and current presidential candidate Mike Huckabee (R-Ark.) isn't a household name inside the Beltway. He's hoping to change that today as he announces the congressional co-chairs of his national bid.

Reps. Don Young (Alaska) and John Boozman (Ark.) will lead Huckabee's efforts to make inroads among the opinion leaders on Capitol Hill.

Asked about winning congressional endorsements, Huckabee said "it shows [that] people who are policy makers are willing to sign on," but he added: "Frankly, I don't think it's going to tip the election one way or another."

Detour From High Road In Clinton-Obama Clash (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney

The New York Times, February 23, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 22 — After weeks of watching in frustration as Senator Barack Obama presented himself as a fresh face gliding above partisan politics, Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton has drawn Mr. Obama onto a muddy political field, engaging him in a back-and-forth that recalls the kind of Washington bickering Mr. Obama has decried.

Mrs. Clinton's effort to identify Mr. Obama with an attack made by one of his chief Hollywood supporters was widely viewed among Democrats as carrying some cost to Mrs. Clinton. The remarks at the heart of the dispute, by David Geffen, the Hollywood executive who was once a big fund-raiser for the Clintons, were a sharp reminder of Clinton family history that has led some Democrats to believe Mrs. Clinton cannot win a general election.

But when it came to tallying the final score on the most intense engagement so far in the 2008 presidential race, even Mr. Obama, the junior senator from Illinois, seemed to acknowledge that he may have been outmaneuvered.

DOJ_NMG_0135713

In a telephone interview Thursday, Mr. Obama said he had not been aware beforehand of the statement his campaign had put out Wednesday morning responding to the public demand by Howard Wolfson, Mrs. Clinton's hard-driving senior communications adviser, that Mr. Obama denounce Mr. Geffen and return the money he had raised.

Mr. Obama said he had been on a red-eye flight, getting a haircut and taking his daughters to school as the fight broke out, and strongly suggested he had told his aides he wanted to stay above the fray.

"I told my staff that I don't want us to be a party to these kinds of distractions because I want to make sure that we're spending time talking about issues," Mr. Obama said. "My preference going forward is that we have to be careful not to slip into playing the game as it customarily is played."

For Mrs. Clinton, the risks of going after Mr. Obama included the possibility that some voters would view her as driven more by tactical war-room politics than by the domestic and foreign policy issues they are most concerned about.

At the very least, the blow-up provided a vivid snapshot of how the Clinton campaign is approaching what it views as the biggest obstacles to Mrs. Clinton's winning the nomination: the rapid emergence of Mr. Obama as a potent rival, and persistent questions about Mrs. Clinton's electability. And it demonstrated how fiercely these two formidable candidates are moving to nail down support in all quarters.

That is particularly true for Mrs. Clinton, backed by a cadre of aggressive advisers who have weathered a decade of some of the toughest political fights imaginable, from the election of Bill Clinton in 1992 to the fight to save him from impeachment in 1998, and are using lessons learned from those campaigns here and now.

For weeks, the Clinton campaign has been dealing with the threat from Mr. Obama aggressively, if not in such a public way as it did on Wednesday. Mrs. Clinton's team, which includes toughened advisers like Terry McAuliffe, the former Democratic Committee National chairman, has been sending signals, some gentle and some not so gentle, that it wants Democrats to choose between her and Mr. Obama and not hedge their bets.

At a fund-raiser for Mrs. Clinton in Hollywood two weeks ago, as Mr. McAuliffe told the story in an interview on Thursday, he joked in a crowded room that big contributors would be honored with limo rides with the new president while those who wrote checks to, say, Mr. Obama could give up their dreams of access.

"Clarence Avant's daughter was there, he's a friend of mine, and I looked at her and in front of 500 people I said, If you don't contribute, you're not going to get that ambassadorship to France," he said, referring to the former chairman of Motown Records. "It's a joke! I said it in front of 500 people."

The Los Angeles Times quoted Mr. McAuliffe as saying at that event, "You are either with us or you're against us," a remark Mr. McAullife and other attendees said was jocular.

But from New York to Washington to Los Angeles, the Clinton campaign has sought commitments of total loyalty this winter from a swath of important donors and elected officials. Mrs. Clinton would meet one-on-one with prominent donors, for instance, and make clear that she wanted their support exclusively. Some elected officials in New Hampshire, meanwhile, said they were told that their early support would matter more to the Clintons than an endorsement down the road.

Aides to both Mrs. Clinton, the junior senator from New York, and Mr. Obama said the other side had been relentless in trying to force potential contributors and political leaders to take sides. Their aggressiveness is not going over well with everyone, especially those who have given large sums to many Democrats over the years and are happy to see two or more presidential candidates continue to compete for their support more than 10 months before the first primary.

"I feel that way only because we the electorate earn the right to a vigorous debate," said Norman Lear, the producer, who has contributed to both Mr. Obama and Mrs. Clinton. Asked about Mr. McAuliffe's remark, he responded: "What's he going to do, jail me?"

The way that campaigns operate provide insights into the candidates themselves. If lessons were learned about the Clinton campaign style, there were lessons learned as well about Mr. Obama, who is making his first run for the presidency and whose lack of experience in campaigns has been a source of worry for some of his supporters.

In response to the initial volley from the Clinton camp on Wednesday, Mr. Obama's spokesman, Robert Gibbs, refused the demand by the Clinton campaign that the candidate distance himself from Mr. Geffen's statement, which he made in an interview with a New York Times columnist, Maureen Dowd. (Mr. Geffen said Mrs. Clinton was unelectable, and raised questions about her ethics and Bill Clinton's trustworthiness.) Mr. Gibbs went on to note that the Clintons had taken money from Mr. Geffen while they were in the White House, noting that Mr. Geffen had been among those who had spent the night in the Lincoln Bedroom.

DOJ_NMG_0135714

The two camps traded barbs all day Wednesday, going toe to toe on a day when Mr. Obama had skipped an appearance with the rest of the Democratic presidential field in a demonstration of his desire to stay out of the daily exchange of criticism that can consume campaigns.

"It fundamentally undermined their long-term message," said Chris Lehane, a Democratic consultant who made his name with a tough campaign style, referring to the Obama campaign.

"If you're to run as something fundamentally different — the philosopher king — you have to have a campaign that is completely different," said Mr. Lehane, who has not endorsed a candidate. "Long term, there is peril here for Obama: if he is presenting a message that he represents a new style of governance, once you start to engage in the back and forth, you really diminish this kind of message."

If there was one clear beneficiary to the wrangling — other than the Republican Party, which stood back and enjoyed the fight — it was a third Democratic candidate, John Edwards. Mr. Edwards's strategy has been to let Mr. Obama and Mrs. Clinton fight it out, leaving an opening for him.

Et Tu, David? A Lucrative Friendship Sours (NYT)

By Jennifer Steinhauer, David M. Halbfinger

The New York Times, February 23, 2007

LOS ANGELES Feb. 22 — The public unwinding of the relationship between the Clintons and David Geffen has many of the makings of a Hollywood who-done-it: While the outcome is now known, the trail remains complicated and mysterious.

The strains between Mr. Geffen and the Clintons were brought to the fore this week when Mr. Geffen, an entertainment executive and longtime benefactor of the Clintons, made clear with shards of verbal glass that he would not support the presidential campaign of Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton.

Mr. Geffen has been telling friends for two years that he thinks that Mrs. Clinton is a divisive figure who would fail to bring the nation together. He has since thrown his support behind Senator Barrack Obama of Illinois, who raised $1.3 million this week at a fund-raiser for which Mr. Geffen was a co-host.

"What Geffen did was he gave an expression to what is in the collective unconscious about the Clintons," said one Obama supporter in Hollywood, who, like everyone who was interviewed about the issue, would not speak for attribution out of fear of retribution from the Clinton camp, the famously irascible Mr. Geffen, or both.

Mr. Geffen's embrace of Mr. Obama is a notion that — backed with checkbooks and liberal blogging — could have resonance among Hollywood money raisers, who love nothing more than a fresh face attached to even perceived early momentum. It appears to be an outgrowth of Mr. Geffen's anger and disillusion with both Clintons, and his belief that Mrs. Clinton's candidacy impedes Democrats from regaining the White House, people close to the Clintons and Mr. Geffen said Thursday.

Yet even as his doubts about Mrs. Clinton have risen, Mr. Geffen contributed generously to her two Senate campaigns. All told, Mr. Geffen — who discussed his displeasure with a Clinton candidacy with the New York Times columnist Maureen Dowd this week — has raised or given millions of dollars to the Clinton political machine.

Long after his fury over Mr. Clinton's last-minute pardoning of the financier Marc Rich and not Leonard Peltier — the Indian activist who was convicted and sentenced to life imprisonment for the murders of two federal agents — Mr. Geffen went on to donate $1 million to the Clinton presidential library, even though Mr. Clinton made a disparaging remark to Time magazine about Mr. Geffen's displeasure with the way the last-minute pardons were executed.

Mr. Clinton had long paid homage to Mr. Geffen, and was a frequent guest at his home in Los Angeles. But after his 1996 re-election, Mr. Clinton began staying more frequently with Ron Burkle, a longtime Clinton supporter and onetime rival of Mr. Geffen for ownership of The Los Angeles Times. Mr. Burkle, a supermarket tycoon, lives in a 40-room Beverly Hills home that once belonged to the silent-movie star Harold Lloyd.

DOJ_NMG_0135715

By late 1999, the president felt so divided between his two billionaire friends that he once wound up leaving Mr. Burkle's home late one evening to turn in for the night at Mr. Geffen's nearby Beverly Hills home, all to avoid offending Mr. Geffen, one member of the president's entourage said, even though Mr. Geffen was out of town.

(No Hollywood sleepover goes without a movie screening, in this case, "Titus," starring Anthony Hopkins.)

For their part, Mrs. Clinton's supporters say that they are convinced that her luster in Los Angeles is untainted, and both spokesmen for both her and her husband declined to comment Thursday.

On Thursday in Los Angeles, Mrs. Clinton attended meetings with fund-raisers at Haim Saban's office, and later with supporters at Creative Artists Agency and other money raisers.

At the meeting at Mr. Saban's office, when the idea of a California primary's being moved to Feb. 5 was raised, according to one person who attended the event, Mr. Saban said, "Then we'll have to double what we all planned to do."

Analysis: Early Bumps Trip Clinton Camp (AP)

By Beth Fouhy, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 22, 2007

A Hollywood-style brawl with the campaign of rival Barack Obama is the latest in a series of speed bumps tripping up Hillary Rodham Clinton's early presidential moves.

From the Clinton team's decision to criticize — and therefore publicize — producer David Geffen's complaints about both Clintons to increasingly skeptical questions about Sen. Clinton's nuanced explanation of her 2002 vote authorizing the Iraq war, it became apparent even a battle-tested front-runner can fall prey to missteps.

On top of that, voters were reminded of the downside of the first Clinton presidency.

"Her explanation for her Iraq vote sounds like the bad old days of Dick Morris triangulation," said Marty Kaplan, a political communications professor at the University of Southern California. Morris, once an influential adviser to both Clintons who has since turned against the couple, urged President Clinton to make policy decisions by splitting the difference on opposing views.

Kaplan added, "She may have overreacted to Geffen in a way that showed she's potentially thin-skinned. And the whole thing was a reminder that the issues of Monica Lewinsky and Whitewater are still out there."

The latest spat began Wednesday, when Clinton spokesman Howard Wolfson called on Obama to disavow comments Geffen made in a New York Times interview.

Geffen, a onetime Clinton supporter who threw a $1.3 million fundraiser for Obama in Hollywood Tuesday night, criticized Bill Clinton for "reckless" behavior and called his wife polarizing and dishonest. He also took her to task for refusing to recant her Iraq vote.

Obama ducked the controversy, saying he shouldn't have to apologize for something he didn't say. But his spokesman Robert Gibbs noted that Geffen had raised $18 million for Bill Clinton and had been invited to one of the infamous Lincoln Bedroom sleepovers that helped define the Clinton fundraising excesses of the 1990s.

The brouhaha reflected the Clinton campaign's annoyance with what it perceives as the national media's lenient treatment of Obama.

The tit-for-tat between campaign operatives helped the story to explode nationally — overshadowing a Democratic presidential forum in Nevada that all the candidates except Obama attended.

Ironically, that lack of attention may have helped Clinton, who was pointedly jabbed by rival John Edwards for her unwillingness to revisit her war stance.

Edwards, a former North Carolina senator who also voted to authorize the invasion, has repeatedly apologized for his vote and said Clinton's decision not to do so was "between her and her conscience."

With the early 2008 voting contests in Iowa and New Hampshire still a year away, the current turbulence on the campaign trail is largely the province of hard-core political junkies.

Even so, the events of the last few days exposed the Clinton campaign's sensitivity to criticism of her husband's White House years the growing appeal of Obama — and to some extent, former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards — among the party's overwhelmingly anti-war activists.

DOJ_NMG_0135716

"It's time for a different kind of leadership in this country," Edwards said, adding that voters want a president "who will tell the truth when they've made a mistake. Who will take responsibility when they've made a mistake."

Clinton has been challenged to explain her vote at nearly every campaign stop since entering the presidential field last month.

She tried to put the matter to rest in New Hampshire last weekend, saying voters could choose another candidate if her answer doesn't suffice. Nevertheless, the questions persist.

Another headache emerged last week when Clinton was asked to renounce comments about Obama made by one of her South Carolina supporters. State Sen. Robert Ford, who is black, said he was endorsing Clinton in part because Obama as a black presidential candidate would hurt other Democrats on the ballot.

"Every Democrat running on that ticket next year would lose — because he's black and he's top of the ticket," Ford said.

Ford later apologized as did a Clinton spokesman. But Clinton did not personally distance herself from it.

Raphael Sonenshein, a political scientist at California State University-Fullerton, said the Clinton campaign had seized on the Geffen comments as a prelude of what to expect later.

"This is a dress rehearsal, and it's peanuts compared to what Republicans will do in the general election," he said. "She knows she's got to come out and come out strong."

EDITORIALS Geffen Has A Point About The Clintons (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 23, 2007

THERE ARE TWO THINGS to be said about the first major intramural spat of the 2008 Democratic primary season. The first is that David Geffen has a point (and we're not saying that just because there is a remote chance that we might work for him someday). The second is that if California moves up its primary, presidential candidates visiting here will soon have to pander to more than just Hollywood moguls.

Geffen, once among Bill and Hillary Rodham Clinton's biggest financial backers, threw Hollywood's first mega-fundraiser of the election cycle on Tuesday — for Barack Obama. His criticism of Hillary Clinton, reported Wednesday by New York Times columnist Maureen Dowd, sparked an amusingly overwrought exchange between the Clinton and Obama camps.

Geffen was on to something with his passing mention of the fact that Obama is not from "the Bush royal family" or the "Clinton royal family." Regardless of what you think of Bill Clinton's presidency, or his wife's talent, the dynastic aspect of Hillary Clinton's candidacy is an issue that will increasingly come to occupy center stage in this campaign. Is the country prepared to be governed, potentially, for 28 years by two families who alternate turns in the White House?

The Clinton campaign appears unwilling to acknowledge this concern. The candidate likes talking to audiences about whether the nation is ready for a female president. But the question of whether the country is ready to perpetuate the dueling-family reign by voting in the former president's spouse is disingenuously left off the table. Maybe Hillary Clinton can make the case that she is the most qualified candidate, but she is going to have to find a way to address the dynastic issue directly. She can't have it both ways — trading on her husband's popularity but not acknowledging people's unease at turning the White House into a family business.

Yet Californians, at least, may be grateful that candidates vying for the 2008 presidential nomination in both parties will have to worry not only about what big donors think of them but what all Californians think. In recent presidential primary seasons, the California contest hasn't gotten beyond the David Geffens because the state has been solely a fundraising battlefield. But now that California is likely to move its presidential primary to early February, candidates will no longer think of their California constituencies as consisting solely of that other royalty: Hollywood celebrities.

So, if you are frustrated that one Californian's view on the race could be so newsworthy, bear with us. You'll get your turn.

Clinton And Obama's Hollywood Scene (WP)

By E. J. Dionne

The Washington Post, February 23, 2007

It was a good day for Joe Biden, Chris Dodd, John Edwards, Bill Richardson, Tom Vilsack -- and, what the heck, Dennis Kucinich.

DOJ_NMG_0135717

It was a bad day for Barack Obama, Hillary Clinton and David Geffen.

It was a good day for the Republican Party, particularly George W. Bush, John McCain and Dick Cheney.

It was a bad day for the Democratic Party, opponents of the Iraq war and advocates of national health insurance.

The petty feud was started by big-time producer Geffen's brutal remarks about the Clintons, which appeared after he helped raise a ton of Hollywood money for Obama. The grudge match revived those depressing cliches about the Democrats: their affection for circular firing squads and their habit of never missing an opportunity to miss an opportunity.

You wonder what Clinton and Obama will learn from this. Both might study the long Democratic nomination fight that began in 1987, well in advance of the 1988 election.

There was an obvious front-runner named Gary Hart, a smart, young former Colorado senator who promised to lead his party out of the 1930s into the 1990s. There was a young Delaware senator named Joe Biden, the same guy who's running this time. Biden wasn't the clear No. 2 that Obama is now, but he got some good early reviews.

Before election year dawned, Hart and Biden were knocked out of the race, because of their own mistakes for sure, but also because of whispering campaigns and subterranean attacks by their opponents.

By the fall of 1987, the Democrats looked like ineffectual dwarfs, to use the word popular back then. A Republican operative named Haley Barbour -- now Mississippi's governor -- happily declared: "At the beginning of this year, the American people questioned whether the Democrats had the first team on the field. I think everything that's happened has confirmed that it's a real amateur hour. It's been a confirmation of people's idea that these aren't the big boys."

Obama and Clinton lieutenants and their full-of-themselves fundraisers: Read Barbour a few times and remember that the Democrats blew the 1988 election. Today, the party has its most talented collection of candidates since 1960. That could change fast.

Political junkies know the week's story line, but in brief: Geffen, a Hollywood mogul who co-hosted a $1.3 million fundraiser for Obama, trashed Bill and Hillary Clinton to New York Times columnist Maureen Dowd, who gets the powerful to say the darnedest things. The Clinton and Obama camps went to war, rocking computers all over the country with incendiary e-mails.

The Clinton side insisted that Obama -- the let's-end-negative-politics candidate -- disown Geffen. The Obama forces trashed Clinton for accepting support from a South Carolina Democrat who suggested that Obama would doom the ticket because he's black.

Just lovely. Because Clinton pulled her saintly opponent off his pedestal and made her new enemy Geffen into an Obama problem, she might be seen as the net winner. In truth, both campaigns showed they care a lot more about themselves than the causes (and the party) to which they claim to be devoted.

That's why every other Democratic presidential candidate was smiling, and why Republicans were gleeful, too. Absent the explosions set off by Geffen's therapy session with Dowd, the big news would have been Dick Cheney's mean jab at John McCain.

McCain, ensnared in Bush's Iraq disaster, tried to disentangle himself by going after Cheney and former defense secretary Donald Rumsfeld. Cheney's devastating pushback in an interview with ABC News made McCain look wimpy and less than straight-talking: "John said some nasty things about me the other day, and then next time he saw me, ran over to me and apologized. Maybe he'll apologize to Rumsfeld."

But the Hollywood news pushed the Republican eye-scratching over Iraq onto the back pages. It also shrank coverage of the first big Democratic forum in Nevada (only Obama skipped it), where the candidates sparred about serious issues, notably over how to achieve universal health coverage.

Oh, but health care is so boring compared with a Hollywood big shot who drops hints about Bill Clinton's love life. Yeah? Tell that to the family of someone who died of cancer because she had no insurance and couldn't afford a screening test.

Clinton, Obama and their brilliant staffs don't own the Democratic Party, no matter how much money they raise in Hollywood. If they think this is all about their personal drama, they should quit politics and go into the movies. Geffen can put up the money.

Depends What The Meaning Of "Mistake" Is (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0135718

By Eugene Robinson

The Washington Post, February 23, 2007

Hillary Clinton's rivals would love to paint her as inflexible, programmed, focus-grouped within an inch of her life and intent on bringing nothing less than a full-fledged Clinton Restoration to the White House. So why is she sitting for the portrait?

We'll get to her campaign's delicious quarrel with Hollywood mogul David Geffen in a moment. Less entertaining, but ultimately more important, is the rhetorical line that Clinton drew in the Iraqi quicksand Wednesday at the Democratic candidates' forum in Nevada: no apology for her vote to authorize the war, no admission that she made a mistake. In other words, Clinton opposes the war but defends her vote to enable it.

That's the kind of carefully calibrated position that I suppose might help her in the general election, when she would have to win support from independents. It would let her avoid the "I voted for it before I voted against it" trap that snared John Kerry in 2004. But buckling herself into a no-regrets straitjacket so early can only hurt Clinton among Democratic primary voters, who overwhelmingly oppose the war -- and who, by all evidence, expect abject contrition from candidates who voted to authorize it.

Barack Obama gets a pass -- he wasn't anywhere near Congress at the time, and he publicly opposed the war to boot. John Edwards and Christopher Dodd, both of whom were in the Senate in 2002, have proclaimed that their votes to authorize the invasion were wrong and are begging forgiveness.

Asked about Clinton's position, Edwards said: "Whether it's good enough, I think, is between her and her conscience. It's not for me to judge."

Which, of course, was a judgment.

Clinton may believe that being the front-runner for the nomination means never having to say you're sorry. She may believe that positioning herself at the hawkish end of the Democratic spectrum helps her project an image of toughness, dispelling any reservations voters may have about a woman as commander in chief. Whatever the reason, refusing to say the words "mistake" or "apology" seems transparently artificial. It's a simple matter of cause and effect: If you deplore the effect, how can you not regret participating in the cause?

It sounds like something a candidate has decided to say rather than something a candidate believes -- an all-too-cute parsing of the language that brings to mind some of the less glorious episodes of the Clinton years. It sounds like a position manufactured by committee, an output from a machine. It certainly doesn't sound like an organic part of the "conversation" that Clinton says she wants to have with America.

It's awfully early for a candidate to lock herself into such a problematic script. As long as the war remains the campaign's dominant issue, Clinton is likely to be pressed on Iraq at virtually every stop. Refusing to apologize, or even to admit making a mistake, just keeps alive an issue for Clinton that her opponents already have dealt with and left behind.

Now, on to the Geffen imbroglio. Once one of the Clintons' biggest Hollywood supporters, the billionaire co-hosted a fundraiser for Obama this week that brought in $1.3 million. That was bad enough, from the Clintons' point of view -- they're not used to having to share the Hollywood money machine with anybody else. But Geffen went much further, telling New York Times columnist Maureen Dowd that Hillary Clinton was "incredibly polarizing" -- and that while everyone in politics lies, the Clintons "do it with such ease, it's troubling."

The Clinton campaign went thermonuclear, and it's easy to understand why. Here was a former insider, a one-time guest in the Lincoln Bedroom, seeming to confirm the suspicions of the most dedicated Clinton-haters. The campaign immediately responded by demanding that Obama disassociate himself from Geffen's remarks and "return his money" -- presumably meaning his personal $2,300 campaign contribution. Clinton herself refrained from attacking Obama but deplored the "politics of personal destruction" -- a classic Clinton-era phrase.

Obama responded that he didn't see why he should get involved in what looked like a dispute between Geffen and the Clintons. Obama's campaign issued a sharper statement, perhaps worried about looking soft or passive, then wisely let the matter drop.

The impression that was left at the end of the week was of a touchy, grouchy Clinton Inc. and a candidate constrained by her campaign strategy. It was as if Hillary Clinton were sketching a caricature of herself. That's wasted effort. Others would be happy to do the job for her.

DOJ_NMG_0135719

For Clinton, New Wealth In Speeches (WP)

By John Solomon, Matthew Mosk, Washington Post Staff Writers

The Washington Post, February 23, 2007

Fees in 6 Years Total Nearly $40 Million

Former president Bill Clinton, who came to the White House with modest means and left deeply in debt, has collected nearly $40 million in speaking fees over the past six years, according to interviews and financial disclosure statements filed by his wife, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.).

Last year, one of his most lucrative since he left the presidency, Clinton earned $9 million to $10 million on the lecture circuit. He averaged almost a speech a day -- 352 for the year -- but only about 20 percent were for personal income. The others were given for no fee or for donations to the William J. Clinton Foundation, the nonprofit group he founded to pursue causes such as the fight against AIDS.

His paid speeches included $150,000 appearances before landlord groups, biotechnology firms and food distributors, as well as speeches in England, Ireland, New Zealand and Australia that together netted him more than $1.6 million. On one particularly good day in Canada, Clinton made $475,000 for two speeches, more than double his annual salary as president.

"I never had a nickel to my name until I got out of the White House, and now I'm a millionaire, the most favored person for the Washington Republicans," Clinton told a friendly audience in Kentucky last fall. "I get a tax cut every year, no matter what our needs are."

Indeed, the Clintons -- who left the White House with an estimated $12 million in legal debts rung up during the Whitewater, campaign fundraising and Monica S. Lewinsky investigations -- are worth an estimated $10 million to $50 million, according to Hillary Clinton's most recent disclosure form. That is attributable primarily to the speaking fees and to the seven-figure book deals that both Clintons signed shortly after leaving the White House.

The fortune they have amassed gives the Clintons a nest egg for the first time, and it allows them to tap into that wealth for a campaign if Hillary Clinton, as expected, forgoes public financing in her race for president. It also suggests a sometimes close connection between their personal finances and her political career.

Many of Bill Clinton's six-figure speeches have been made to companies whose employees and political action committees have been among Hillary Clinton's top backers in her Senate campaigns. The New York investment giant Goldman Sachs paid him $650,000 for four speeches in recent years. Its employees and PAC have given her $270,000 since 2000 -- putting it second on the list of her most generous political patrons.

The banking firm Citigroup, whose employees and PAC have been Hillary Clinton's top source of campaign donations, with more than $320,000, paid her husband $250,000 for a speech in France in 2004. Last year, it committed $5.5 million for Clinton's Global Initiative to help encourage entrepreneurship and financial education among the poor.

Asked about the companies and their relationship to the Clintons, Jay Carson, a spokesman for the former president, said, "It certainly makes sense that reputable New York companies who support the policies and works of President Clinton and his foundation would also be supportive of their senator."Finding Foreign Audiences

Over the past two decades, speaking for money, especially to foreign audiences, has become a common way for ex-presidents to find financial security. Ronald Reagan raised eyebrows collecting $2 million in Japan shortly after he left office in 1989. And George H.W. Bush and Jimmy Carter have both traveled extensively to lecture for pay.

The elder Bush, who was wealthy before he became president, had an active speaking schedule after he left the White House, and as recently as 2004 he was reported to have been paid between $125,000 and $150,000 for a series of speeches in China. He has also held seats on corporate boards. But much of his activity remains private because he is under no obligation to disclose it.

Mark K. Updegrove, author of a book on the activities of former presidents, said Clinton remains a huge draw even six years after leaving the White House. "One thing makes President Clinton slightly different from his predecessors," Updegrove said. "Not only has he carried the prestige of the presidency, but he maintains the mystique of celebrity."

DOJ_NMG_0135720

Two-thirds of the former president's speaking money has come from foreign sources. Outside the United States, clients are willing to pay more to hear him speak, Clinton is able to conduct his charitable work on AIDS, and he can avoid upstaging his wife on the American political scene, associates say.

Foreign clients have included Saudi Arabia's Dabbagh investment firm, which paid $600,000 for two speeches, and China's JingJi Real Estate Development Group, run by a local Communist Party official, which paid $200,000 for a speech. The Mito City Political Research Group, a Japanese political studies center, paid Clinton $400,000 for a 2002 speech about politics.

Besides Goldman Sachs, the two firms that have paid Clinton the most over the past six years are foreign-based. Gold Services International, an event organizer based in Bogota, Colombia, brought Clinton to Latin America in the summer of 2005 for $800,000 in speaking fees. The Power Within, a motivational-speech company in Toronto, paid Clinton $650,000 for speeches in Canada in 2005 and brought him back for an undisclosed sum in 2006. The company was founded by Salim Khoja, a Kenyan immigrant who years earlier was convicted of stock fraud and was barred for life from the brokerage business.Speaking for Charity

The nearly $40 million total is based on Hillary Clinton's annual ethics report to Congress, which showed that her husband made more than $30 million from speeches from 2001 to 2005. Under Senate ethics rules, she does not have to disclose 2006 fees until mid-May, and the estimate for that year's totals is based on interviews with speech organizers, who confirmed an additional $9 million to $10 million in fees.

Beyond the millions he has earned personally, the former president has given dozens more speeches that result in payments to the William J. Clinton Foundation, his nonprofit charity in New York. His associates say those have yielded millions to help cover the $60 million annual budget the foundation spends to fund his charitable work on AIDS and world hunger.

The Clintons declined to disclose the size and sources of the payments for speeches he delivered on behalf of the charity. Campaign law and Senate ethics rules require Hillary Clinton to disclose only the fees her husband has taken as personal income, not those he routed to charity.

The former president declined repeated requests to discuss his speeches or the income he earns from them. "The reason that he picked paid speeches is that it is an efficient way for him to make a living for his family and allow him a lot of time to do charitable work, which is his passion," said Carson, his spokesman.

Carson said Clinton's staff constructs his schedule to pack as much charitable work as possible -- along with political events helpful to Democrats -- around his for-profit speaking career.

"We take a look at the schedule and say, 'All right, he has to be in this place for that paid speech. There are these three or four great things we've been meaning to do in this place. Let's do them,' " Carson said.

Last June, for example, Clinton booked a speech in Denver before the National Apartment Association, the industry group for landlords, which earned him $150,000.

When his office heard that funds were lagging for a nearby memorial to victims of the Columbine High School massacre, he volunteered to be the keynote speaker at the groundbreaking ceremony -- at no charge -- and instantly boosted fundraising. On the dais that day, when told the project was still short of its goal, he pledged $50,000 that could be matched by a local company. On the same trip, he addressed a politically important group of school principals.

Likewise, in February 2006, Clinton headed to Asia for charitable work to help tsunami and AIDS victims. At the last minute, the State Department asked him to squeeze in a visit to Pakistan, helping ease tensions among Muslims angered by political cartoons they considered insulting. He then tacked on three days of paid engagements in Australia and New Zealand that earned him about $750,000.'It Was Worth It'

Those willing to pay Clinton to speak say they can pack a hall with people eager to hear his question-and-answer sessions on Middle East peace, his motivational seminars, or his lectures on globalization that weave together personal anecdotes and detailed data aimed at inspiring corporate executives to compete better in the 21st-century global economy.

Clinton can also transform a fundraising event.

The former president in 2005 helped the U.S. arm of Israel's treasury authority sell $101 million in investment bonds by speaking at a luncheon at the Pierre Hotel in New York that was jammed with real estate executives who wanted to hear his keynote address.

DOJ_NMG_0135721

A Catholic group in Canada far exceeded its fundraising goal when it hired Clinton to address a fundraising gala for domestic violence services last November. The crowds came despite protests by Catholic bishops who urged a boycott because of the group's support for abortion rights.

"We had people buying $500 tickets for a lunch. This was a once-in-a-lifetime event for them," said Andrew Wilding of the Catholic Family Counseling Center in Kitchener, Ontario. "They did it in lieu of Christmas gifts, birthday gifts. It was unbelievable."

Kevin O'Marah, senior vice president of AMR Research, an industry group for retail, food and manufacturing suppliers, said the process of signing Clinton to speak last year was so complex -- including filling out multiple forms explaining to Clinton's office and the speakers bureau he uses why the group wanted him -- that "it was like applying for college."

"But it was worth it," he said, adding that Clinton's speech to 900 executives at AMR's annual conference in Scottsdale, Ariz., inspired many in the audience to consider what they could do to address global hunger.More Money, More Access

Clinton gets a flat fee for those overseas events, but event promoters sometimes offer a tier of options to their patrons. Spending more means gaining more access. This was the case when Clinton collected at least $900,000 last fall for speeches in England and Ireland promoted by longtime golfing partner Satty Singh, a wealthy businessman based in Glasgow, Scotland.

Those who paid about $1,000 to see Clinton at the Burlington Hotel in Dublin on Sept. 27 gained entry to a champagne reception and lunch before the speech. For $4,000 more, they got VIP perks that included a photo and a goody bag containing an autographed copy of his memoir. For about $150,000, corporate sponsors were assured of seats close to Clinton.

Clinton receives thousands of speaking requests a year and accepts a few hundred. Despite the extensive vetting, at least two companies that booked him were under federal investigation.

In February 2005, Clinton traveled to the Paradise Island resort in the Bahamas and collected $150,000 from Swiss biotechnology giant Serono International for a speech that touched on global AIDS. Serono's U.S. arm was then embroiled in a well-publicized federal investigation into giveaways to doctors who unnecessarily prescribed its AIDS drug. A few months after the speech, the company pleaded guilty to two federal conspiracy charges and agreed to pay $704 million in fines.

Clinton also accepted $125,000 in December 2001 to address workers at International Profit Associates, an Illinois company that advises small businesses. At the time, IPA was the focus of a federal investigation -- started during the Clinton administration -- and a government lawsuit alleging widespread sexual harassment.

Like many who have paid the former president to give a speech, IPA executives have been helpful to his wife's campaigns in New York. Her campaign and political action committee have collected nearly $150,000 in donations from the company's officials, making IPA one of her largest single sources of campaign contributions since she ran for the Senate in 2000. The company also flew her aboard its corporate jet, according to a 2004 reimbursement item on her campaign finance report.

Asked about the IPA and Serono speeches, Carson said: "We take our vetting process very seriously. We do our best to try to catch any issues. And given the volume of that, we are not always perfect."

Clinton continues to book new lectures this year as his wife campaigns for president. He will be in Montreal for a motivational speech next month.

FEC Drafts New Campaign Finance Opinion (WP/AP)

By Jim Kuhnhenn, The Associated Press

The Washington Post, February 23, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Presidential candidates may solicit contributions for a general election campaign even if they later decide to take public money for the race, federal regulators said Thursday in a proposed opinion.

The draft document, which would have to be approved by the Federal Election Commission, was in response to a request for FEC advice from Democratic presidential candidate Barack Obama, the Illinois senator.

If a majority of the six election commissioners support the opinion, candidates would have yet another incentive to seek double contributions this early in the presidential election cycle. Any candidate who then chooses to accept public money would have to refund money raised exclusively for the general election.

The commission will meet March 1.

DOJ_NMG_0135722

Sen. Hillary Clinton, D-N.Y., and former Sen. John Edwards, D-N.C., have already said they will forego public financing in both the primary and general election campaigns. As a result, both are soliciting maximum contributions of $4,600 from individual donors, twice the $2,300 permitted for each election.

Under federal law, taxpayers can redirect $3 of their income tax payment to the presidential campaign fund. Candidates who accept public financing in the primaries can still accept political contributions, but must agree to certain spending limits. Primary winners who accept public financing in the general election cannot use political donations to finance their campaigns.

This year, the primary winners would be entitled to about $85 million each. But campaign finance experts and advisers to presidential candidates predict that the 2008 general election campaign will be far longer and much more expensive than previous ones. Some predict the total cost to each nominee will be $500 million. That is why some candidates would prefer to turn down the public funds and raise their own, more substantial sums.

Campaign watchdog groups, however, have lamented the trend as signaling the demise of the public financing system, which attempted to reduce the influence of money in politics.

Under federal law, any candidate who raises money during the primary for the general election must refund donors if he or she loses the primary. Obama, in seeking an opinion from the FEC, offered a twist on that financial consideration that left the door open to staying within the public system.

"We're pleased this draft opinion moves the ball forward in the direction of preserving public financing of campaigns this election," Obama spokesman Bill Burton said.

Obama's Funding Question To Get FEC Look (CHIT)

By John Mccormick, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, February 23, 2007

Responding to his request for clarification, the Federal Election Commission signaled Thursday that Sen. Barack Obama's presidential campaign may be able to solicit private contributions for the 2008 general election while remaining eligible for public financing for that same contest.

The draft response was to a question Obama's campaign brought up this month when it indicated that it would start raising money for a potential general election candidacy, nearly a year before the first caucus and primary votes will be cast.

Obama (D-Ill.) and two of his top rivals for the Democratic nomination, Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.) and former Sen. John Edwards (D-N.C.), have indicated they would likely reject the public financing system that has governed presidential elections for more than three decades.

But Obama wanted to see if he had the option of reversing course and then use public financing, should he win the nomination and be able to convince his Republican opponent to also limit spending.

The commission said it would formally consider the question at a March 1 meeting. "We have never faced this question before," said Bob Biersack, a commission spokesman.

In its draft ruling, the commission said Obama may solicit and receive contributions for the general election if he meets certain conditions, including a requirement to keep the money in a separate escrow account and that the funds not be used for any other purpose other than general election activities.

Under the draft proposal, if Obama were to win the Democratic nomination and then decide to accept public funding for the general election, he would need to refund all general election contributions within 60 days of certifying his eligibility for public funds.

In previous elections, candidates have accepted the notion that once they start raising money for the general election, they have committed to running without federal matching funds.

"We're pleased this draft opinion moves the ball forward in the direction of preserving public financing of campaigns this election," Obama spokesman Bill Burton said.

mccormickj@tribune.com

Proposal By Obama On Public Financing Appears To Gain (NYT)

By David D. Kirkpatrick

The New York Times, February 23, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 22 — The staff of the Federal Election Commission has drafted an opinion that would allow the two major parties' presidential nominees to adopt what amounts to a fund-raising truce.

The draft opinion would allow the nominees, if both agreed, to return contributions they had solicited for the general election campaign and limit themselves to public financing for it instead.

The opinion is a response to an inquiry by Senator Barack Obama of Illinois, a leading candidate for the Democratic nomination. It is an indication of how the commission, which released the document Thursday, is likely to rule on the idea. The commissioners are expected to issue their decision after a meeting next Thursday.

Mr. Obama sought the ruling after all the front-runners in both parties rejected public financing for the primary campaign, already under way, and prepared to forgo it for the general election as well, to avoid the spending limits that it imposes. That would make the 2008 general election the first outside the system since its creation in the aftermath of the Watergate scandal more than three decades ago.

Candidates say the amount of public financing — it would be about $85 million per nominee next year — has failed to keep pace not only with campaign costs but also with the potential for private contributions, meaning a candidate who does not seek donations early on risks falling far behind.

But Mr. Obama, campaigning on pledges to clean up politics, argued in his filing with the commission that the public financing system had insulated candidates from a corrupting dependence on big donors. He asserted that the system could be preserved for the general election through bipartisan agreement if party nominees returned early contributions.

The plausibility of such an agreement is not clear. One nominee is likely to have a financial edge on the other at the outset of the campaign, and accepting public financing would mean relinquishing that edge.

Hope From The FEC (WP)

The Washington Post, February 23, 2007

MAYBE THE public financing system for presidential campaigns can be saved after all -- at least part of it. The Federal Election Commission released a draft advisory opinion yesterday that could provide a way to slow the fundraising frenzy and encourage the 2008 nominees to accept full federal funding for their general election campaigns. The draft, likely to be approved by the commission at a meeting March 1, came in response to a creative request from Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.).

Like other presidential contenders this cycle, Mr. Obama is already raising money for a hoped-for general election campaign. The candidates are calculating that there are enough donors to go around and that the costs of campaigns have grown so high that it doesn't make sense to live within the $84 million public-money limit. But Mr. Obama asked whether he could also reserve the option, if he were to win the nomination, of returning those donations and taking public funds instead -- if the Republican nominee agreed to do so as well.

The FEC's positive reaction yesterday offers a glimmer of hope that 2008 will not become the first presidential election since the Watergate scandal to be fully financed by private funds. The system of providing federal matching funds during the primaries is dead, a victim of woefully outdated spending limits; none of the leading candidates participated in the system in 2004, and none is expected to this time around. But 2008 would be the first election in which candidates turn down matching funds for the general election as well. The result might be as much as $1 billion in combined spending, with enormous amounts of the candidates' time devoted to raising money rather than meeting voters. The solution of allowing a candidate to begin to raise general election funds now but opt to live within the system later isn't perfect, but it's far better than the alternative.

Mr. Obama's competitors in both parties should join him in trying to salvage this broken system. As the FEC prepares to finalize its ruling, the candidates should support its interpretation -- and pledge, if they win the nomination, to help control the campaign arms race.

Statehouse Yields Clues To Obama (WSJ)

By Jackie Calmes

The Wall Street Journal, February 23, 2007

Sharp Elbows of Illinois Politics Taught Lessons In Art of Compromise

DOJ_NMG_0135724

SPRINGFIELD, Ill. -- As an Illinois state senator, Barack Obama was a leader in helping to tighten state ethics laws -- up to a point. When a 2003 package seemed doomed in the Senate's final hours -- with his Democratic leader among the foes -- he left the chamber to tell advocates there was nothing more he could do.

"He wasn't going to stand on the desk and pound his shoe," recalls Cynthia Canary, director of the nonpartisan Illinois Campaign for Political Reform, and an admirer. "Barack is a political realist. You may know that in his heart he feels strongly, but he'll only go so far." Yet a compromise was salvaged, she adds, and Mr. Obama helped to toughen it in subsequent legislative sessions.

The accomplishment was emblematic of the picture that emerges of the eight years Mr. Obama spent here: of a lawmaker of lofty, liberal rhetoric who nonetheless pragmatically accepted bipartisan compromises that won over foes -- and sometimes left supporters dissatisfied.

Now that he is running as a presidential candidate, after just two years in the U.S. Senate, most clues about what style of politics he would bring to the White House are here in Illinois's Statehouse.

Mr. Obama wrote in his recent, best-selling memoir that it was in Springfield that he learned "how the game had come to be played" between Democrats and Republicans: "I understood politics as a full-contact sport, and minded neither the sharp elbows nor the occasional blindside hit." The Obama campaign's tangle this week with that of Democratic rival Hillary Clinton shows a willingness to engage in intraparty spats, as well.

Yet he also wrote that through his state Senate years he "clung to the notion that politics could be different," less combative, more bipartisan. He has put that notion at the heart of his presidential bid.

Illinois Republicans recall Mr. Obama as a committed liberal of no singular achievements, yet one they could work with to pass ethics, welfare and death-penalty revisions. "He's unique in his ability to deal with extremely complex issues, to reach across the aisle and to deal with diverse people," says Republican state Sen. Kirk Dillard. "If he surrounds himself with good people, I wouldn't lose any sleep with him as my president."

As for sharp elbows, the scraps for which Mr. Obama is remembered -- including near-fisticuffs once on the Senate floor -- were with fellow black Democrats, some of whom were resentful of his ambitions and his successes.

In Mr. Obama's first term, in 1997-98, he joined with Mr. Dillard to pass Illinois's first ethics package in a quarter-century, and with Republican state Sen. Dave Syverson, then chairman of a health and human services committee, to overhaul the state's welfare law. Those earlier ethics overhauls grew out of a proposal from the late U.S. Sen. Paul Simon, an Illinois Democrat, for a four-member task force -- one representative of each party in the Illinois House and Senate -- to forge a compromise. Mr. Dillard represented Senate Republicans. Senate Democratic leader Emil Jones, like Mr. Obama an African-American from Chicago, picked the young freshman on the advice of former federal judge Abner Mikva, who had known Mr. Obama as a constitutional-law teacher at the University of Chicago.

The panel's recommendations didn't go so far as ethics-revamp advocates wanted. To ease passage, for example, its ban on lawmakers' personal use of campaign funds exempted existing accounts. Still, Mr. Obama had a hard sell in Senate Democrats' caucuses. "He was getting so beat up by the members, sometimes I felt sorry for him," recalls Mr. Jones, who became his mentor. "He would just listen to them, and then explain the reason why this particular issue was before us."

When the legislature revisited the ethics issue in 2003, Mr. Jones was among those who resisted changes Mr. Obama promoted. "He wouldn't buck Emil Jones," Ms. Canary said. The Senate and House agreed to a weaker bill.

Likewise, Mr. Syverson says the welfare-overhaul compromise he cosponsored with Mr. Obama riled both parties. "He took heat from some liberal groups" for welfare limits, Mr. Syverson says, "but I took heat from conservative groups," for the child-care and health-care aid to those who moved from welfare to work. When Democrats won a majority in 2003, for Mr. Obama's final two years, he succeeded Mr. Syverson as the health panel's chairman. Yet on his most ambitious initiative, for universal health-care coverage, the best he could do was pass a measure providing for a study.

On the Judiciary Committee, Mr. Obama wanted to co-sponsor Democratic Chairman John Cullerton's top initiative, a highway-safety measure allowing police to stop vehicles in which occupants weren't wearing seat belts. At the time, nonuse couldn't be the primary reason for stopping drivers.

DOJ_NMG_0135725

But Mr. Jones objected. The Senate leader said a tougher seat-belt law would give police another ruse for racial profiling -- the practice of stopping and searching minority drivers for little reason. "Barack said, 'Then let's do a racial profiling law,' " Mr. Cullerton recalls.

Mr. Obama and other Democrats had previously proposed antiprofiling bills, which would require police to keep data on the race of those they stopped. Police groups always were opposed. But they wanted a seat-belt law. Senators say Mr. Obama negotiated changes to the racial-profiling measure that allowed the police to remain neutral. Both bills were passed.

Meanwhile, the legislature in 2003 was revamping death-penalty laws after evidence of numerous wrongful convictions. Mr. Obama wanted to mandate videotaping of interrogations of murder suspects, to guard against coerced confessions. Prosecutors and many Republicans were opposed, particularly to the prospect that unrecorded confessions would be inadmissible in court. They recall Mr. Obama's spending hours in negotiations on compromises, such as allowing for equipment failure and providing for judges' discretion. "Some people say the exemptions are too broad," Mr. Cullerton says, "but that's what you have to do to pass laws."

The credit that went to Mr. Obama for the racial-profiling and videotaping measures stoked tensions among black colleagues who had sponsored similar proposals only to see Mr. Jones promote his protégé's efforts. One was state Sen. Rickey "Hollywood" Hendon, an outspoken Democrat, who once had to be separated from Mr. Obama in the Senate after confronting him for reasons that witnesses don't recall and Mr. Hendon won't discuss.

Mr. Hendon complained that he felt like the football player who had run 99 yards, only to see the halfback plunge the final yard for the touchdown and the credit. Earlier this month, he was outside the Old State Capitol in the cold, lending support as Mr. Obama announced his presidential candidacy.

Wilder Praises Obama Strategy (WT)

By Seth McLaughlin, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, February 23, 2007

RICHMOND -- Richmond Mayor L. Douglas Wilder says Sen. Barack Obama's strategy of relying less on the black leaders of the civil rights era and more on a message of unity gives him the best chance of becoming the first Democrat in 44 years to win the state's electoral votes in a presidential election.

"The civil rights movement was over 50-something years ago," Mr. Wilder, a Democrat and the country's first elected black governor, told The Washington Times. "Many people know nothing of it other than a recitation [during Black History] month. People are tired of that. They want to see more relatively.

"The worst mistake one can make, in my judgment, is to try to tailor a message to a group and to say: 'I am the person for your group.' He should be the person for the American people," he said.

As a result, Mr. Obama, an Illinois Democrat who is black, has "received an audience the likes of which have never been seen by any African-American seeking an elective office in this country, period," Mr. Wilder said. "Even at [former Secretary of State] Colin Powell's height, he did not get these kinds of crowds, and Colin was not chopped liver."

The mayor's comments come less than a week after Mr. Obama addressed nearly 4,000 people at the annual Jefferson-Jackson dinner in Richmond and received Virginia Gov. Timothy M. Kaine's early endorsement.

The endorsement was the first by any governor outside of a candidate's home state. It also takes on additional significance in a state that has not voted for a Democrat in a presidential election since Lyndon B. Johnson in 1964, but where voters had elected Democrats in the past two gubernatorial races and last year's U.S. Senate race.

After his speech in Richmond on Saturday, Mr. Obama was thronged by supporters, who toppled a metal railing and knocked plates of half-eaten food off tables to get a peak of the senator before he slipped out a back door.

"It is a new day," Delegate Dwight Clinton Jones, a black Richmond Democrat, said after he watched Mr. Obama court voters and political leaders in Virginia on Saturday. "I believe that America is ready for things that in past times they may not have considered."

Although most black political leaders have been careful about what they say about Mr. Obama, there is evidence that civil rights leaders are concerned that Mr. Obama is not overly interested in appeasing them.

DOJ_NMG_0135726

For example, earlier this month, Mr. Obama opted to announce his bid for the Democratic presidential nomination in front of nearly 15,000 people, most of whom were white, at the Old State Capitol in Springfield, Ill. -- the same day thousands of black leaders gathered at Hampton University in Virginia for the State of the Black Union, an annual traveling town hall.

The timing and location of Mr. Obama's announcement drew some cutting responses from State of the Black Union panelists, even though the former civil rights lawyer and community organizer in Chicago apologized beforehand for not attending the event.

Without singling out Mr. Obama, one of the panelists, the Rev. Al Sharpton, told attendees, "Just because you're our color doesn't make you our kind."

The remarks from Mr. Sharpton helped open the floodgates for pundits eager to question Mr. Obama's so-called "blackness" and left some local black leaders bewildered.

When asked about the remarks, Delegate A. Donald McEachin, a black Richmond Democrat, said it is wrong to question Mr. Obama's "integrity or commitment" to the black community "in the absence of any evidence to the contrary."

"We all have our roles in history to play," Mr. McEachin said. "[The civil rights leaders] have, and continue to play their roles, and he is playing his.'

Mr. Wilder, a State of the Black Union panelist, said Mr. Obama is too smart to get bogged down in such comments.

"That wasn't from the people," he said. "That wasn't from that audience, that wasn't from attendees. I really do believe he is past that level, but he is not dismissive of it."

Running On A Résumé Both Local And National (NYT)

By Ralph Blumenthal And Dan Frosch

The New York Times, February 23, 2007

SANTA FE, N.M. — When a governor runs for president, local issues can suddenly loom large. Take cockfighting. Gov. Bill Richardson has come out against it after ignoring the question for years.

Concerned that New Mexico suffers for being the sole state other than Louisiana to permit wagering contests pitting weaponed birds in fights to the death, Mr. Richardson has taken sides in the emotional debate, speaking out for a ban, to be debated on Saturday in the Legislature.

“I believe the people of the state want to abolish it,” the governor, a Democrat, said in his art-bedecked office. “It’s a bad image nationally. I’m putting my weight on it. It’s going to make it pass, and it’s the right thing to do.”

With portfolios as a congressman, global troubleshooter and energy czar, Mr. Richardson, 59, may rightly claim the broadest résumé of the declared presidential candidates.

He served seven terms in the House until joining the Clinton administration as ambassador to the United Nations and then energy secretary before being elected governor in 2002.

But as he makes his case for the Democratic nomination, he is likely to be judged in large measure by his four years as governor, a record that has won him friends and foes.

He acknowledged being far back in the polls and unlikely to match leading rivals’ fund-raising.

“I’m not going to be competitive in that area with the top-tier candidates,” Mr. Richardson said. “But I’m going to have enough to win.”

He said he would wage “an old-fashioned grass-roots campaign” based on his résumé.

“Who’s the best person to get us out of Iraq?” he asked. “Who’s the best person to restore America’s international standing? The best person to create jobs? I believe I have the experience. I’ve done all these things everyone’s talked about.”

Hispanic — his mother was born in Mexico — in one of only three states where Anglos are no longer a majority (California and Texas are the others), Mr. Richardson won re-election as governor in November with a record 69 percent of the vote.

An imposing, exuberant figure with a relish for attention, he enjoys near-celebrity status in New Mexico, where his comings and goings — like being driven around in a speeding S.U.V. and holding court at a popular capital watering hole — routinely dominate the news.

DOJ_NMG_0135727

Under Mr. Richardson, New Mexico, long ranked near the bottom of almost every social index, has made advances. With his pressing for higher wages for educators, teachers' salaries have moved from 46th in the nation in 2000 to 39th in 2006, the highest since the mid-'80s, the National Education Association says.

Since Mr. Richardson took office, unemployment is down, to 3.8 percent from 5.8 percent, according to the federal Labor Department. New Mexico is 10th in economic growth, according to a report by the Federal Funds Information Service for States, affiliated with the National Governors Association and the National Conference of State Legislators.

Mr. Richardson has also pushed hard to make New Mexico, with its dust-swept mesas and high-desert peaks, a choice location for Hollywood. According to the New Mexico Film Office, more than 60 movies and television programs have been shot here since he became governor.

And he positioned New Mexico for the private space age by carving a spaceport out of the desert alongside the White Sands Missile Range.

He persuaded Mexican authorities to bulldoze a human-smuggling base across from Columbus and declared the first governor's state of emergency on the border, freeing $1 million a year for extra patrols. But the state is also broadly tolerant of immigrants, issuing driver's licenses without regard to legal residency.

"Richardson has positioned himself as hard to cubbyhole," Brian Sanderoff, a leading pollster, said. "The minute you think he's liberal, he does something conservative."

Critics say Mr. Richardson can be vindictive, penalizing opponents by holding up their projects or grants.

"He rules the roost," Lonna Atkeson, a professor of political science at the University of New Mexico, said. "He takes things away when people are not so nice."

Told that some people called his politics rough, Mr. Richardson blurted, "Who's saying that?"

Then he said: "No, no. Look, I'm aggressive. I get things done. I believe I'm a good manager."

The governor has also been lucky. State coffers are overflowing, with much of the revenue generated by oil and gas resources. His proposed budget calls for $123 million in tax cuts, a 9 percent increase in spending for primary and secondary schools and a 7.4 percent increase in teachers' salaries.

But national studies show New Mexico continuing to lag in categories where the state has historically underachieved, although some of the figures predate Mr. Richardson's efforts.

The Annie E. Casey Foundation ranked the state 48th in its 2003-4 Kids Count index of problem indicators. The foundation said more than a quarter of New Mexico children lived in poverty, among the highest rates in the nation.

A Census Bureau study shows that from 2003 to 2005, an average of 21 percent of New Mexicans went without health insurance. Just Texas had a greater average rate in that period.

"It's a failure of a systematic way of looking at the problem," said Kay Monaco, former executive director of New Mexico Voices for Children, an advocacy group.

Although not laid at Mr. Richardson's door, corruption scandals have also tarnished the state — "pay to play," in the words of critics. Some of Mr. Richardson's embarrassing appointees stepped down, including a former state police officer named to a magistrate judgeship who resigned after being caught ordering the release of a friend jailed on a drunken-driving charge.

"One bad judge out of 56," Mr. Richardson said, acknowledging "our vetting procedures are not the most extensive."

His ethics package, pending before the Legislature, includes limits on campaign contributions.

Mr. Richardson's physicality and roughhousing have also drawn rebukes. In his autobiography from 2005, "Between Worlds," Mr. Richardson recalled negotiating with Saddam Hussein in 1995 and, in a gesture of good will, touching President Hussein's arm.

"Saddam started," he recalled, "and along the wall eight hands suddenly touched sidearms."

In late 2005, Lt. Gov. Diane Denish told The Albuquerque Journal that Mr. Richardson "pokes me" when they sit together, calling that more annoying and likely to be misconstrued than improper.

"He pinches my neck," Ms. Denish said. "He touches my hip, my thigh, sort of the side of my leg."

The governor waved that off, telling The Journal: "I tease Diane. I touch guys. It's my way of lessening tension."

In the interview, Mr. Richardson ridiculed blogs' suggesting he acted improperly around women.

DOJ_NMG_0135728

"Rumors are always in a politician's life by your opposition," he said. "I've run seven times for Congress. I've been vetted by the F.B.I. for cabinet posts. I've been confirmed by the Senate. I've run two statewide races. Top security clearance. Kerry vetted me for vice president. Was clean."

He said that he welcomed scrutiny and that he had told his wife of 33 years, Barbara: "You ought to expect this. She said: 'I know. I'm ready for it.' "

Locally, no issue in recent years seems as volatile as cockfighting. State Senator Mary Jane Garcia, a Democrat who is sponsoring the bill, has tried to pass similar bills for nearly 20 years. But Ms. Garcia could never muster enough votes, largely because lawmakers were reluctant to provoke constituents, many of whom say the sport is rooted in the state's Hispanic culture.

But this time is different. Mr. Richardson is running for president.

"I asked him, 'Are you serious?' " Ms. Garcia recalled. "And he told me that he was ready to help, that it was the right thing to do, that it was the right thing for New Mexico."

The New GOP Attack Machine (POL)

By Mike Allen

The Politico, February 23, 2007

If you suddenly start hearing a lot about Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton, D-N.Y., having a "calculating nature" and "political baggage," or being a "lifelong liberal," it won't be a coincidence. Similarly, get ready to see Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., strafed for his "short political timeline" (a euphemism for "rookie"), for being "arrogant and insulated" and a liberal rubberstamp. John Edwards? "New negative tone," "running to the far left" and "hypocritical."

The put-downs – some clever, some blunt -- are part of an attack-o-matic that the Republican National Committee is encouraging its supporters to use in preparing for their appearances on cable television and talk radio. The 69-page playbook, posted on the national party's Web site (GOP.com) on Wednesday as "Meet the Real Dem Candidates," devotes 10 pages each to Clinton, Edwards and Obama; nine each to Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware and Sen. Chris Dodd of Connecticut; and seven each to New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson and former Iowa governor Tom Vilsack.

The Republican tip sheets, each with the antiseptic title of "Research Report," constitute a sophisticated new way for the party to infuse the blogosphere and airwaves with a coordinated, fact-based message. They help allies who come with their own credibility and are not identified as party officials.

The reports come complete with video links and amusing photos: Edwards has a shiny forehead, Biden has an open mouth, Obama glowers, Dodd pontificates and Clinton and Richardson purse their lips.

Critics will call it pre-fab mudslinging, but the documents are laid out in a just-the-facts fashion, with each charge linked to a citation for a news story. Such "talking points" used to be closely held, but Republicans are going public with them in an effort to standardize the message they propagate through the new media culture.

For some time, the Democratic National Committee has had a resource center for its advocates, in the form of a blog-style collection of riffs from news stories. It points to "smooth talking Mitt" Romney, "angry" John McCain and a Rudy Giuliani who might be "hiding" something. The entries can be sorted by candidate.

Karen Finney, communications director of the Democratic National Committee, called the GOP packet "a lame attempt on the part of the RNC to play catch-up" and said there is more to come from her party, both online and offline. The DNC reached out to its own talkers on Wednesday with a memo about vulnerabilities of Republican candidates, including "The Rudy You Don't Know" Giuliani, "Anything to Win" John McCain and "Smooth Talking" Mitt Romney.

RNC Chairman Mike Duncan explained on a conference call for "friends and allies" on Wednesday afternoon that the Democratic forum in Carson City, Nev., provided the party with the "first opportunity to get the truth out about the Democrats in a widespread, coordinated way."

"Our message is very simple," Duncan said, in rolling out the dossiers. "It seems like the Democrats have far more candidates for the presidency than they have real plans for the highest office in the land, if by chance one of them wins. That's a pretty simple message. Their candidates run the gamut from Hillary Clinton, who carefully calculates every single policy decision to see how it plays with her base, to … John Edwards, who complains that there are two Americas. But the problem is, he's not sure which America his $4.2 million mansion resides in."

DOJ_NMG_0135729

Duncan called for "a coordinated volley" against the candidates. "These documents will detail the flip-flops of the Democratic candidates … their dashes to the left, various verbal missteps that they've made," Duncan said. "I hope that you can use this new research to help us deliver the message about the Democrats early in the debate. You are the people who make a big difference for us. You're our face on television, our voice on radio. We need your help, and we appreciate your help. Every opportunity we have for you to hit the Democrats on the air is an opportunity for us to define them before they can define themselves."

RNC press secretary Tracey Schmitt said party officials and surrogates gave national and local radio and TV interviews on the documents, and state parties released statements echoing the research. "It's pretty obvious that the Democrats aren't eager to discuss the ins and outs of their records," Schmitt said. "We are more than happy to fill in the blanks."

Here are the images Republicans are pushing for each candidate, so count the times you hear them on radio and TV out of the mouth of your favorite (or least favorite) pundit:

Biden: "An Undisciplined, Self-Described Northeast Liberal, In Love With The Sound Of His Own Voice."

Clinton:"A Calculating, Divisive, Lifelong Liberal With Political Baggage."

Dodd: "A New England Liberal, Past His Prime, On An Unrealistic Vanity Run For The White House."

Edwards: "A Hypocritical, Inexperienced Liberal With A New Negative Attitude."

Obama: "An Inexperienced, Insulated, Arrogant, Unabashed Liberal."

Richardson: "A Self-Promoting, Washington Insider With A Controversial Record."

Vilsack: "A Tax-Hiking, Mismanaging, 'Blip' Candidate With No Foreign Policy Experience."

The Philadelphia Story (WSJ)

By Paul E. Peterson

The Wall Street Journal, February 23, 2007

Judging by test-score results, Philadelphia schools have been enjoying a renaissance over the past four years. Thirty-two percent of Philadelphia's fifth-graders achieved proficiency on the Pennsylvania reading test in 2006, as compared to just 21% in 2002; math proficiency rose to 41% from 19%. At the eighth-grade level, there were 20 percentage point uptics in both reading and math.

Nevertheless, the respected RAND Corporation, in a study expected to influence the report of the Accountability Review Council for the Philadelphia schools that will be released later today, claims these positive results -- which came after a series of reforms including the engagement of private firms in the management of 45 schools -- are in fact deceptive and misleading.

In a press release early this month, announcing results from its latest study, RAND claims to have shown that "the four-year gains . . . were generally on a par with gains from similar low-achieving schools in the rest of the state." According to Jolley Christman, one of the report's authors, Philadelphia's "investment in private management of schools has not paid the expected dividends."

Needless to say, the study attracted wide attention. It also thrilled school choice critics, including Henry Levin of Columbia Teachers College, who said of the experiment in private management, "It's a romance that just hasn't worked. . . . They don't seem to be doing better, and they cost more."

These strong conclusions are not well supported by the RAND study, however. The widely quoted press release overstates what is actually in the report; the comparisons within the study itself are inexact; and vital information on school spending and other school characteristics is missing from the report.

First, a few words about the larger context. In 2002, fighting off fierce opposition, Pennsylvania placed Philadelphia's schools in the hands of a School Reform Commission, which then hired as superintendent the same Paul Vallas who had helped lift student achievement in Chicago. Among other innovations, Mr. Vallas audaciously turned 45 of the lowest performing schools over to private providers.

DOJ_NMG_0135730

But reform did not come without a prolonged political struggle. Numerous compromises were struck, including concessions to unions that allowed many of the old regulations to remain in effect. Meanwhile, the unions kept a low public profile while apparently doing their best to undermine the reforms, especially by encouraging experienced teachers to leave the 45 schools assigned to private providers. In the first year, teacher transfer rates more than doubled at many of these schools. Despite this, test scores rose in most of the privately managed schools.

Now RAND says Philadelphia could have done equally well by doing nothing.

To prove that claim, one might expect RAND to have identified other big cities with extremely low-performing schools making equally striking gains -- but without launching reforms such as those undertaken in Philadelphia. Instead, RAND compared Philadelphia to other schools in Pennsylvania -- despite RAND's own admission (buried deep in its report) that "Philadelphia is unique among Pennsylvania school districts: Other schools in the state are only imperfectly comparable to Philadelphia schools."

In any event, RAND says that gains in Philadelphia "were generally on a par" with gains in "similar" schools elsewhere. But the report never identifies those "similar" schools -- not their names, not the characteristics of the students attending them, not their test performance back in 2002 before reforms began. RAND only tells us that the comparison schools were in the bottom 25% of all the state's schools, a very large category that contains a wide range of schools.

Still, Philadelphia schools do not look all that bad. While not making much progress the first year, they are estimated to have outperformed the comparison schools in the second and third years. For example, Philadelphia eighth-graders, in year three, are estimated to have gained eight to 10 points more than those in the comparison schools. In year four Philadelphia's edge slips. That could be a temporary blip; RAND instead concludes that Philadelphia's gains remained only at "par." Ordinarily, researchers make use of all available estimates, not just the most recent one, to draw their conclusions.

In its second analysis of schools within Philadelphia, RAND finds privately operated schools to have done no better -- but also no worse -- than would be expected from that same school, given citywide trends. In the words of the report's italicized conclusion: "We find little evidence in terms of academic outcomes that would support the additional resources for the private managers."

Given the restrictions placed on the private providers, such a finding would not necessarily be surprising. But RAND's way of reaching its conclusion is flawed; the research looked only at those students in certain grades who were tested on multiple occasions, a small, non-random percentage of all students. No information is provided on their representativeness.

More puzzling still is RAND's decision to expect these schools to exceed the overall citywide gains in test score performance. In so doing, RAND seemingly ignored the fact that the 45 schools assigned to the private managers were among the city's most challenging, scoring, in 2002, one to two years below the citywide average. A more suitable analysis would have expected them to gain more than students at comparably low-performing schools.

Finally, RAND questions the additional cost of private management, and says that the privately managed schools gained additional resources that the average school did not. But nowhere does RAND provide evidence on overall per-pupil spending at any Philadelphia school, making it impossible to tell whether the privately managed schools actually received more additional resources than other city schools.

It is more likely that per-pupil expenditure at the privately managed schools dropped when experienced, highly paid teachers left the schools at a much higher rate than before. RAND needs to show that that did not happen, or was offset by large increments in other kinds of expenditures, if it is to draw the conclusion that the privately managed schools had "additional resources."

Just how sensitive results are to RAND's specific methodology is unknown. But if education policy research is going to make a solid contribution to school reform, it needs to be both objective and keep pace with rising standards in educational research. In RAND's case, a forward step would be to make its Philadelphia data available to other qualified researchers, something it has so far been unwilling to do.

Paul E. Peterson is director of the Program on Education Policy and Governance at Harvard University and a senior fellow at Stanford's Hoover Institution.

DOJ_NMG_0135731

Non-Union Jobs (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 23, 2007

If Apple CEO Steve Jobs had praised teachers unions as the backbone of public education in the U.S., it would have made the front pages. Instead, at an education conference in Austin, Texas, Mr. Jobs offered some constructive criticism of teachers unions and barely anyone noticed. Sounds like news to us.

"I believe that what is wrong with our schools in this nation is that they've become unionized in the worst possible way," said Mr. Jobs during a Q-and-A session on technology in the classroom. "This unionization and lifetime employment of K-12 teachers is off-the-charts crazy."

The real crisis in public education, he noted, has nothing to do with the amount of technology in the classroom. It's the fact that union work rules prevent principals from firing the bad teachers and rewarding the good ones. "Here's the problem," said Mr. Jobs, using a business analogy: "What kind of person could you get to run a small business if you told them, when they came in, they couldn't get rid of people they thought weren't any good in the first place? Or they couldn't pay people three times as much when they got three times as much work done?"

Regular readers of these columns will find nothing particularly shocking in Mr. Jobs's broadside. Still, it's nice to hear such sentiments coming from a titan of industry, especially his.

The latest National Assessment of Educational Progress (NAEP) report was released yesterday. The dismal results are what we've come to expect from an elementary and secondary public education system in the vice-grip of the National Education Association and its political acolytes. According to the NAEP survey, nearly 40% of high-school seniors scored below basic level on the math test, and fewer than a quarter of 12th graders rate proficient.

Except for high-skill immigrants, this would be Apple's future labor pool. Mr. Jobs is right to point the finger at the union stewards of public education. And fellow business leaders, who have as big a stake in this matter, would do well to lend him public support.

Iran Defies Nuclear Ultimatum (WT/AP)

By George Jahn, Associated Press

The Washington Times, February 23, 2007

VIENNA, Austria -- Iran has ignored a U.N. Security Council ultimatum to freeze uranium enrichment and has instead expanded its program by setting up hundreds of centrifuges, the U.N. nuclear watchdog agency said yesterday. The finding paves the way for new U.N. sanctions.

The International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) said in a report to the Security Council and its 35-nation board that Tehran also has continued to build a heavy water reactor and related facilities which, along with enrichment, could help it develop nuclear arms.

In addition, the report said, Iran ignored a Security Council call to cooperate with the IAEA in its efforts to shed light on suspicious nuclear activities.

The conclusions, while widely expected, could serve as the trigger for the council to start deliberating on new sanctions against Iran.

In Washington, State Department spokesman Tom Casey said U.S. officials have already begun consulting with allies about the next steps, including sanctions. He said officials expect the council to meet on the matter as early as next week.

"The report gives us a pretty clear picture that shows that Iran has not changed its behavior, has not changed its views and is continuing on the path of defiance. We think that's unfortunate," he told reporters.

In Tehran, the deputy head of Iran's Atomic Energy Organization, Mohammed Saeedi, said international demands for Iran to suspend enrichment violated Iran's "rights, the nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty and international regulations."

The Security Council issued three demands to Iran on Dec. 23 -- freeze uranium enrichment, stop building heavy water facilities and fully cooperate with the IAEA. It introduced limited sanctions and gave Iran 60 days to comply -- a deadline that expired Wednesday.

DOJ_NMG_0135732

The IAEA report prepared by director Mohamed ElBaradei showed Tehran has instead expanded its enrichment efforts by setting up nearly 1,000 centrifuges in and above an underground bunker, enriching minute amounts of uranium and bringing nearly 9 tons of gaseous feedstock -- the mixture that is fed into the centrifuges for enrichment -- into its underground nuclear facility at Natanz.

Iranian officials also informed the agency that they planned to have close to 3,000 centrifuges in place by May, the report said.

Iran's stated goal is running 54,000 centrifuges at Natanz to churn out enriched uranium -- enough for dozens of nuclear weapons a year.

Iran maintains it only wants to generate power and says its heavy water facilities at the central city of Arak -- which will produce plutonium, another potential pathway to nuclear arms -- are meant solely to generate isotopes for medical research and other peaceful purposes.

Even before the IAEA report was issued, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said the U.S. and its allies would use the Security Council and other "available channels" to bring Tehran back to negotiations over its nuclear program.

British Foreign Minister Margaret Beckett said her country would consult with other Security Council members on the next steps, adding: "We remain determined to prevent Iran acquiring the means to develop nuclear weapons."

The sanctions approved in December banned all countries from supplying Iran with materials and technology that could contribute to its nuclear and missile programs and froze the Iranian assets of 10 key companies and 12 individuals related to those programs.

Russia and China, veto-holding council members with close ties to Iran, are likely to oppose strict economic sanctions or weapons bans. A travel ban was dropped from the initial resolution because of Moscow's opposition, so tough negotiations are expected.

Russia's U.N. ambassador, Vitaly Churkin, said yesterday that he had "no substantive comment" on the IAEA report, but he reiterated Moscow's desire for a diplomatically negotiated solution.

"We should not lose sight of the goal -- and the goal is not to have a resolution or to impose sanctions," he said. "The goal is to accomplish a political outcome."

New Penalties May Loom For Iran's Nuclear Work (USAT)

By Barbara Slavin

USA Today, February 23, 2007

WASHINGTON — The United Nations' nuclear watchdog said Thursday that Iran has expanded its efforts to enrich uranium, a conclusion likely to result in a push for tougher penalties against Tehran.

A report by the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) said Iran was installing hundreds of new centrifuges for uranium enrichment and was taking other steps that would enable it to build nuclear weapons.

Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns announced later Thursday that he will travel to London on Monday to meet with negotiating partners to try to draft a new resolution on Iran. Even before the report was issued, Burns had said the United States, its European allies, Russia and China had begun discussing a new round of penalties.

Iran's nuclear activities defy a U.N. Security Council demand that it suspend uranium enrichment by Wednesday or face the possibility of additional sanctions.

On Dec. 23, the council imposed penalties intended to cut off trade that could provide Iran with technology and know-how for its nuclear and missile programs. The council also banned travel by Iranian officials involved in the programs.

In addition, the United States has persuaded several large European banks to cut ties with Iranian banks or restrict dealings with them.

Iranian central bank figures show inflation and unemployment rising as the United States and Europe have increased economic pressure.

Burns said the administration was "heartened" by the impact the sanctions have had on other trade and investment in Iran. "It leads us to believe that a second round would have a similar impact."

DOJ_NMG_0135733

Despite sanctions, Iran appears to be accelerating efforts to enrich uranium. The IAEA report said Iran has installed two new sets of centrifuges in an underground plant at Natanz, 160 miles south of Tehran. Another two sets were "in the final stages of installation," and Iran told the U.N. agency it intended to put 3,000 centrifuges into operation by May. Centrifuges are machines that spin at high speed and isolate a form of uranium suitable for fuel for nuclear reactors or bombs.

Iran has said that it intends to make only fuel for nuclear power plants, not weapons.

Mohammad Saeedi, deputy head of Iran's Atomic Energy Organization, said on Thursday that the U.N. demand for Iran to suspend uranium work "has no legal basis and … naturally, it could not be accepted by Iran."

The IAEA said Iran had failed to clear up long-standing questions about other nuclear activities. The agency was uncertain if Iran was hiding other programs.

David Albright, a former U.N. nuclear inspector and president of the Institute for Science and International Security, a Washington think tank, said Iran was experiencing some technical difficulties but was still "moving ahead pretty fast."

Albright said it was possible Iran could have enough highly enriched uranium to make a bomb by 2009.

The Bush administration has urged Iran to stop uranium work and begin negotiations with the United States and five other countries: Britain, France, Germany, Russia and China. Iran has said it wants to talk but will not suspend enrichment as a precondition.

Contributing: Wire reports

Rice Warns Iran It Risks Further U.N. Sanctions (WP)

By Colum Lynch And Dafna Linzer

The Washington Post, February 23, 2007

UNITED NATIONS, Feb. 22 -- Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice warned Iran on Thursday that it will face further punishment and isolation if it forges ahead with efforts to develop a uranium-enrichment program, but she said the United States and other powers are prepared to restart talks aimed at ending the standoff if Iran suspends its most controversial nuclear activities.

The remarks came hours after the International Atomic Energy Agency issued a report saying Iran has defied yet another U.N. Security Council demand to halt its most sensitive nuclear activities. R. Nicholas Burns, undersecretary of state for political affairs, plans to travel to London on Monday to press Russia, China, Britain, France and Germany to slap additional penalties on Iran.

"We have the common goal to encourage Iran back to the bargaining table," Rice said after a meeting in Berlin with her counterparts from Russia, Germany and the European Union. "The hope is that the sanctions show the Iranians the isolation that they are enduring, that isolation is likely to increase over time and that it is time to take a different course."

The IAEA report confirmed that Iran has continued to operate an experimental uranium-enrichment program and that it has advanced its efforts to produce an industrial-scale facility that could potentially produce enough highly enriched uranium to make as many as two bombs a year. Iran says it has no intention of producing bomb-grade uranium and will use the facility to produce nuclear fuel for energy.

A senior Iranian official said that the council's demand to suspend its nuclear activities "could not be accepted by Iran" because it would strip Tehran of its right, under the 1970 Non-Proliferation Treaty, to operate a civilian nuclear energy program. "This report shows that the best way to resolve this international issue is to return to the negotiating table and reach a broad agreement," said the official, Mohammad Saeedi, deputy head of Iran's Atomic Energy Organization, according to [a news agency].

Russia, China and several European countries have become increasingly uncomfortable with the Bush administration's positions on Iran as tensions between Tehran and Washington have risen in recent months. Bush recently authorized the U.S. military to capture or kill Iranian intelligence and paramilitary agents in Iraq; the administration has said such agents are involved in attacks against U.S. military forces. The Pentagon has sent two carriers to sit off the Iranian coast in the Persian Gulf, which some allies have interpreted as preparation for a possible military strike.

DOJ_NMG_0135734

Those concerns have prompted renewed calls for direct dialogue with Iran. German, Swiss, Russian, Chinese, Saudi and IAEA officials have all reached out to Iran in recent weeks in the hopes of restarting talks even if Iran continues to defy the Security Council.

Several diplomats said there is a possibility that the E.U.'s top diplomat, Javier Solana, will meet next week with Iranian negotiator Ali Larijani to assemble a list of guiding principles for future negotiations.

U.S and European diplomats said that they are pursuing a "dual track" diplomatic strategy -- pressing simultaneously for additional sanctions and renewed negotiations with Tehran -- but remained divided over how tough new sanctions should be.

The United States, Britain and France favor imposing a series of additional penalties against Iran, including a mandatory travel ban and additional asset freezes against some Iranian officials linked to the country's most sensitive nuclear programs. They also support measures including a ban on export credits. "We want to do it as soon as possible and to avoid the wrangling of last time. But we've got to get tougher sanctions than we have at the moment if we want real impact, and we're very realistic about how difficult that may be," a senior European official said.

A senior U.S. official said the United States is willing to forgo a tough resolution in exchange for the Security Council moving quickly to a unified agreement to raise the political stakes for Iran while avoiding a fight with the Russians.

But other European powers that conduct billions of dollars in trade with Iran, including Germany and Italy, have resisted stringent economic sanctions that would harm their commercial interests.

Russia and China are also resisting a tough reaction. Russia's U.N. ambassador, Vitaly Churkin, said, "We should not lose sight of the goal, . . . to accomplish a political outcome of this problem."

Thursday's six-page report concluded that "Iran has not suspended its enrichment related activities." The report provided no evidence that Iran is trying to develop nuclear weapons, as President Bush asserts, but inspectors said Iran's lack of voluntary cooperation with its investigation made it impossible to rule out that such efforts were underway.

The report detailed progress Iran has made in the past two months installing several hundred centrifuges for industrial-scale enrichment at its largest nuclear facility in the town of Natanz. The Iranians have been enriching low levels of uranium suitable for a nuclear energy program, not bombs, in other centrifuges set up more than a year ago at Natanz's research center.

IAEA inspectors said Iran had not provided any new information on the history of its nuclear program, which began in secret in 1987. Inspectors also received no answers to questions raised by documents obtained by U.S. intelligence in 2004 that suggest Iran was trying to develop a missile capable of carrying a nuclear warhead and was considering plans for a second uranium-conversion facility.

Despite the lack of information in the report, no official, in Washington or Europe, suggested that Iran's current work meant it will acquire nuclear weapons in the near future.

"Their nuclear program is not forging ahead," said a senior European diplomat. "Some of that is a result of the sanctions and the international pressure on them and some of it is because of their own technical difficulties in putting the program together."

Rice Says Europe, Russia Want Iran Talks (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, February 23, 2007

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Thursday that U.S., European and Russian diplomats have a common goal to encourage Iran back to the bargaining table over its disputed nuclear program. "We reconfirmed we will use available channels and the Security Council to try to achieve that goal," the top U.S. diplomat said. Rice spoke following a breakfast meeting with her counterparts from Germany, Russia and the European Union.

The group reviewed Iran's compliance with a U.N. Security Council demand that it stop enriching uranium, a key step toward producing either nuclear power or a nuclear weapon.

After the meeting ended, the U.N. nuclear watchdog released a report formally confirming the Islamic republic's refusal to freeze enrichment.

DOJ_NMG_0135735

The report by Mohamed ElBaradei, head of the International Atomic Energy Agency, said Iran has expanded enrichment efforts.

The finding is a step toward additional sanctions, but it was not clear whether U.N. Security Council members Russia and China would go along.

Rice said she and her counterparts made no decisions Thursday because they met before ElBaradei's report was released. Rice headed back to the United States immediately after the breakfast meeting.

In Washington, State Department spokesman Tom Casey said that Iran's refusal to curtail its nuclear program is a "missed opportunity" for Iran's government and people.

Casey said that he is confident that the Security Council will approve additional sanctions against Iran but he declined to predict what they might be.

Iran has called for talks with the United States — but has not budged on council demands that it mothball its enrichment program.

Enriched to a low level, uranium is used to produce nuclear fuel but further enrichment makes it suitable for use in building an atomic bomb. The West claims the Islamic republic intends to build a bomb with enriched uranium. Iran says it merely wants to develop peaceful nuclear power.

In moderate remarks Wednesday directed at Washington — the key backer of tougher U.N. action — Iranian Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki said the dispute "has to be decided peacefully with the United States."

But other top Iranian officials used harsher language, and none showed signs of compromise on the main demand of the U.S. and other world powers — a halt to enrichment and related activities.

"The enemy is making a big mistake if it thinks it can thwart the will of the Iranian nation to achieve the peaceful use of nuclear technology," Iranian state TV's Web site quoted President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad as saying Wednesday.

Rice said last week that the United States probably would press for another U.N. resolution condemning Iran for continuing to defy the U.N. demand to stop enriching uranium, and to seek additional penalties against Tehran.

The Security Council set a 60-day deadline on Dec. 23 for Iran to freeze its enrichment activities and said continued Iranian defiance past that ultimatum, which ran out Wednesday, could lead to stronger punishment.

The U.N. is demanding an immediate and unconditional stop to uranium enrichment, after which European-led negotiations over an economic reward package might begin. Iran has long insisted it will not stop its nuclear activities as a condition for negotiations to start.

"The best course would be for Iran to suspend its enrichment and reprocessing activities so that we can return to negotiations," Rice told reporters Tuesday. "That is the entire purpose of having the pressure on the Iranian regime, so that the Iranian regime can make better choices about how to engage the international community."

___

On the Net:

CIA World Factbook on Iran: https://http://www.cia.gov/cia/publications/factbook/geos/ir.html

Diplomats Trying To Restart Iran Talks (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, February 23, 2007

U.S., European and Russian diplomats agree on encouraging Iran back to the bargaining table over its disputed nuclear program, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Thursday. Diplomats from the U.S. and its negotiating partners plan to meet next week to try drafting a new U.N. resolution on the standoff.

"We reconfirmed we will use available channels and the Security Council to try to achieve that goal" of restarting negotiations with Iran, the top U.S. diplomat said. Rice spoke after a breakfast meeting with her counterparts from Germany, Russia and the European Union.

The group reviewed Iran's compliance with a U.N. Security Council demand that it stop enriching uranium, a key step toward producing either nuclear power or a nuclear weapon.

DOJ_NMG_0135736

After the meeting, the U.N. nuclear watchdog released a report confirming the Islamic republic's refusal to freeze enrichment. The report by Mohamed ElBaradei, head of the International Atomic Energy Agency, said Iran has expanded enrichment efforts.

Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns said Thursday he will travel to London on Monday for meetings aimed at forging a new resolution on Iran.

Burns said he hoped the United States and other permanent members of the U.N. Security Council, plus Germany, can quickly draft a resolution. He said it was too soon to say what provisions the resolution might contain but said his hope was one would be drafted that would "see Iran repudiated again."

The atomic energy agency's report is a step toward additional sanctions, but it was not clear whether U.N. Security Council members Russia and China would go along.

Rice said she and her counterparts made no decisions Thursday because they met before ElBaradei's report was released. Rice headed back to the United States immediately after the breakfast meeting.

"The report gives us a pretty clear picture that shows that Iran has not changed its behavior, has not changed its views and is continuing on the path of defiance. We think that's unfortunate," State Department spokesman Tom Casey told reporters.

Iran has called for talks with the United States — but has not budged on council demands that it mothball its enrichment program.

Enriched to a low level, uranium is used to produce nuclear fuel but further enrichment makes it suitable for use in building an atomic bomb. The West claims the Islamic republic intends to build a bomb with enriched uranium. Iran says it merely wants to develop peaceful nuclear power.

In moderate remarks Wednesday directed at Washington — the key backer of tougher U.N. action — Iranian Foreign Minister Manouchehr Mottaki said the dispute "has to be decided peacefully with the United States."

But other top Iranian officials used harsher language, and none showed signs of compromise on the main demand of the U.S. and other world powers — a halt to enrichment and related activities.

"The enemy is making a big mistake if it thinks it can thwart the will of the Iranian nation to achieve the peaceful use of nuclear technology," Iranian state TV's Web site quoted President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad as saying Wednesday.

Rice said last week that the United States probably would press for another U.N. resolution condemning Iran for continuing to defy the U.N. demand to stop enriching uranium, and to seek additional penalties against Tehran.

The Security Council set a 60-day deadline on Dec. 23 for Iran to freeze its enrichment activities and said continued Iranian defiance past that ultimatum, which ran out Wednesday, could lead to stronger punishment.

The U.N. is demanding an immediate and unconditional halt to uranium enrichment, after which European-led negotiations over an economic reward package might begin. Iran has long insisted it will not stop its nuclear activities as a condition for negotiations to start.

"The best course would be for Iran to suspend its enrichment and reprocessing activities so that we can return to negotiations," Rice told reporters Tuesday. "That is the entire purpose of having the pressure on the Iranian regime, so that the Iranian regime can make better choices about how to engage the international community."

Iran Expanding Nuclear Effort, Agency Reports (NYT)

By David E. Sanger And William J. Broad

The New York Times, February 23, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 22 — In open defiance of the United Nations, Iran is steadily expanding its efforts to enrich uranium, the International Atomic Energy Agency reported Thursday. In response, the Bush administration immediately pressed for more severe sanctions against the country, at a moment of greatly increased tensions between Washington and Tehran.

In a mild surprise to outside experts, the nuclear agency reported that Iran was now operating or about to switch on roughly 1,000 centrifuges, the high-speed devices that enrich uranium, at its nuclear facility at Natanz.

“They are very serious,” said David Albright, a former inspector who is now president of the Institute for Science and International Security, a private nuclear study group. “They are installing faster than was commonly expected.”

DOJ_NMG_0135737

Coming on the heels of the Bush administration's accusations that Iran's Quds Force is sending deadly bombs and other weapons into Iraq, the report heightens what has become a growing confrontation.

Since the last energy agency assessment of Iran's progress, President Bush has ordered a second aircraft carrier group into waters in striking distance of Iran, an unsubtle reminder that, if diplomacy fails, Mr. Bush could order a strike on Iran's nuclear facilities. But senior administration officials have insisted in recent days that the show of military force is intended only to remind Iran of Washington's options, and they have dismissed the idea that Mr. Bush is considering an attack.

On Thursday, administration officials said they hoped to use the agency's conclusions to return to the Security Council for approval of deeper sanctions, and they said the United States would work outside the Council to persuade banks around the world to cut off more lending and export credits to Iran, in hopes of further damaging its oil infrastructure. Under Secretary of State R. Nicholas Burns will go to London on Monday to begin that process, meeting with the four other permanent members of the Security Council and Germany to talk about tougher sanctions. While Russia and China agreed to the December resolution, which required the inspectors to report back on Iran's compliance in 60 days, they indicated at the time that they were unwilling to increase the penalties.

The report appeared to confirm that the Iranian government was somewhat behind schedule in its nuclear ambitions: it boasted a year ago of plans to have roughly 3,000 centrifuges running by about now. But the 1,000 that it has nearly ready to run is still more than most outside experts believed it could install. If the country could operate 3,000 centrifuges continuously for a year, it could produce about one weapon's worth of highly enriched uranium.

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert of Israel said Thursday that even though the Iranians were not as far along as they would like to be, they were still far closer to learning how to make bomb-grade uranium than Israel was comfortable with. He dodged questions about at what point Israel might lean toward military action, a step American officials have said that they are trying to discourage.

"We're a long way from that," one senior administration official said earlier this week. "We want to make sure that the Israelis are, too." He said he had no indication that Israel was planning unilateral action.

The report comes at a time of debate within the administration over whether and how to find a way to negotiate with Iran without violating Mr. Bush's stricture that the country must first suspend its enrichment work. Officials say they are trying to exploit fissures in Iranian society, as some Iranian groups are beginning to question whether the hard-line position taken by President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and some of the country's ruling ayatollahs is worth the cost in sanctions and isolation.

"There are people in Iran who recognize that the path that they're on is not a useful path, not a constructive path," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said in Berlin before the release of the report. She said if Iran suspended enrichment, "We could begin negotiations on whatever they would like to talk about."

On Thursday, Mr. Burns said in an interview that he believed the Security Council resolution in December was having an effect. "We did not fully anticipate the strong impact that it would have," he said. "It has divided the government in Tehran and frankly knocked them off stride."

But Iran's leaders have continued to reject Mr. Bush's condition for talks — a suspension of nuclear activity — which would essentially undercut their only real leverage in negotiations. Unlike North Korea, which agreed in principle in recent days to freeze its production of new nuclear material, Iran is not believed to possess nuclear weapons, meaning that the uranium enrichment is its main bargaining chip.

Mr. Bush and Ms. Rice are also concerned about losing leverage, senior officials say. With oil at $60 a barrel, they are concerned that no sanctions can truly harm Iran. And negotiating while Iran expands its enrichment capacity, they fear, would mean that as negotiations dragged on, Iran would get closer to being able to produce a nuclear weapon.

In its December resolution , the Security Council gave Iran 60 days to both suspend its operations and answer a series of questions. Open issues, it said, included research on high explosives, which are necessary to detonate an atom bomb, as well as the design of a missile warhead.

"Without such cooperation and transparency," the report said, "the agency will not be able to provide assurances about the absence of undeclared nuclear material and activities in Iran or about the exclusively peaceful nature of that program."

DOJ_NMG_0135738

Moreover, the Iranians have sharply restricted the access of inspectors to many of the sites they once had freedom to visit. Inspectors were allowed several recent visits to the nuclear complex at Natanz, and their report reflected greater-than-expected progress there. In addition to the 362 centrifuges in its pilot plant there, Iran in recent months has been installing an additional 656 machines in two cavernous underground halls at the complex. Of those, inspectors say, roughly half are at the final stage of testing before the introduction of uranium, and the other half were "in the final stages of installation."

The report said that between Nov. 2 and Feb. 17, Iranian crews fed 145 pounds of uranium into the pilot plant for enrichment. That is more than they had done in previous intervals. But their effort still produced only about 15 pounds of low-enriched uranium — too little for anything but experimental analysis.

The inspectors expected that effort to expand quickly, saying that Iran planned to begin feeding uranium into the new centrifuges in the big halls by the end of this month, and to continue installing more centrifuges there so that, by May, the total number of operating machines would come to 3,000.

"They're forging ahead," said a European diplomat who spoke on the condition of anonymity because of protocol. "They're not moving at a huge pace but they're moving."

"It's fairly clear," the diplomat added, "that Iran still has not addressed the outstanding issues — the scope and intent of the program."

The Iranians say the cavernous underground halls will eventually hold 54,000 centrifuges, allowing the enrichment of uranium by the ton for reactor fuel rods — or, if the Bush administration's fears come true, nuclear arms.

The atomic agency in its report said Iran had already moved into the cavernous halls nearly 10 tons of unenriched uranium — enough, nuclear experts said, to make at least one atom bomb. In all, at its sprawling plant at Isfahan, Iran has produced some 200 tons of uranium now ready for enrichment at Natanz. If turned into weapons-grade uranium, that would be enough for more than a dozen nuclear weapons.

Iran Has Speeded Up N-plans, Says UN (FT)

By Daniel Dombey And Najmeh Bozorgmehr

Financial Times, February 23, 2007

Iran has speeded up its nuclear programme and plans to complete a large-scale uranium enrichment facility by May, the United Nations atomic watchdog said on Thursday.

By that time, according to a long-awaited report by the International Atomic Energy Agency, Iran plans to install and start using 3,000 centrifuges to enrich uranium – despite UN demands that it suspend uranium enrichment related activities.

If they functioned smoothly, the 3,000 centrifuges – organised into "cascades" of 164 machines apiece – could produce sufficient highly enriched uranium for a nuclear bomb within a year.

The report said Iran intended "to continue progressively with the installation of the 18 cascades of the 3,000 machine hall and to bring them gradually into operation by May 2007".

However, Iran protests its purposes are purely peaceful, and many observers add that the country relies on inferior blackmarket technology, notorious for breaking down.

Yesterday Mohammad Saeedi, deputy head of Iran's Atomic Energy Organisation, confirmed to the country's Mehr news agency that Iran planned to bring the 3,000 centrifuges on stream in May. Originally, Iran had intended to start installing the centrifuges by the final quarter of last year.

The report added that on January 31 Iran transferred "approximately 8.7 tonnes" of the nuclear feedstock uranium hexafluoride to the Natanz plant and that it planned to begin feeding them into the centrifuges by the end of this month.

The speed with which Tehran intends to pursue its programme adds to the tensions surrounding the dispute and means that the issue is likely to make a swift return to the UN Security Council, where the US will push for new measures against Tehran to add to UN sanctions agreed last December. However, Russia and China are sceptical about sanctions.

Privately, IAEA officials are sceptical of whether Iran can meet its timetable, which it informed the agency of last month. This week, Mohamed ElBaradei, IAEA director general, told the Financial Times that Iran could take between six months and a year to install and operate 3,000 centrifuges.

DOJ_NMG_0135739

So far, yesterday's report says, Iran has installed and started spinning two cascades of 164 centrifuges at the fuel enrichment plant, to add to two 164-centrifuge cascades in a "research" facility above ground. The report added that, as of February 17, Iran was in the final stages of installing two additional 164-centrifuge cascades.

The report also notes that Iran has objected to 10 of the agency's designated nuclear inspectors, after having rejected an earlier 38 inspectors, and failed to account for uranium contamination at a technical university.

Iran Says Nuclear Fuel Is For Future (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 23, 2007

VIENNA, Austria — Iran has steadily expanded its program to enrich uranium and defied a U.N. Security Council deadline for an immediate freeze of nuclear activities before it gains the capability to produce fuel for nuclear weapons, the U.N. nuclear watchdog agency said here today.

The six-page report by Mohamed ElBaradei, head of the International Atomic Energy Agency, is almost certain to trigger moves by the Bush administration and its European allies for stiffer U.N. sanctions against the hard-line Iranian regime.

The Security Council voted unanimously in December to impose a 60-day deadline for Iran to unconditionally stop a pilot program that has begun small-scale uranium enrichment, as well as stop construction of a heavy water reactor and installation of a much larger enrichment facility.

But ElBaradei's report indicated that the Iranians instead have pushed the program into higher gear since November. A senior United Nations' official, who briefed reporters, said there had been "no progress" in resolving the IAEA's major outstanding concerns.

"There is limited cooperation," he said. "In my view, it's fairly limited."

Most significantly, the report confirmed that Iran has begun installation of 3,000 gas centrifuges in an underground facility at Natanz and plans to "bring them gradually into operation by May 2007."

If true, experts here said, a facility that large conceivably could produce enough enriched uranium in a year to provide enough highly enriched uranium for a nuclear bomb. Earlier this week, ElBaradei was quoted as saying he believed the facility would not be operational for another six months.

Iran insists it will only produce low-enriched uranium to fuel civilian reactors at electric power plants, but the international community fears the effort could be extended to also produce weapons-grade material. Iran ultimately hopes to install 54,000 centrifuges, a facility large enough to fuel 20 bombs a year.

Iranian officials have repeatedly rebuffed IAEA requests to install special cameras and other remote monitoring equipment at the underground site to ensure the enrichment program is for peaceful purposes, according to the report.

Officials in Tehran also have failed to fully explain the source of particles of high-enriched uranium that previously were detected on equipment on the Natanz centrifuges and at separate technical research center, the report said.

IAEA inspectors visited Iran earlier this week and plan to return on March 3.

U.N. Secretary-General Ban Ki-Moon, on a visit to Vienna, told reporters that he was "deeply concerned … that the Iranian government did not meet the deadline set by the Security Council."

Iran's nuclear activities, he added, had "great implications for peace and security, as well as nonproliferation of weapons of mass destruction."

The focus now moves to the Security Council in New York, which is expected to meet next week to consider a range of further actions against Iran.

Possible new sanctions could include a travel ban on certain Iranian officials, a prohibition against export guarantees and other financial support for Iran, and an expansion of the nuclear embargo to an arms embargo.

Iran's nuclear negotiator, Ali Larijani, flew to Vienna on Tuesday for last minute talks with ElBaradei. Larijani told reporters afterward that Iran was "looking for ways and means to start negotiations."

He said Iran was prepared to provide "assurances that there would be no deviation" of material for nuclear weapons, but ruled out stopping the program outright as a precondition for talks.

Speculation Rages: Is Iran Bush's Next Target? (MCT)

By Ron Hutcheson And Warren P. Strobel

McClatchy Newspapers, February 23, 2007

WASHINGTON - President Bush says he isn't looking for a fight, but the question won't go away: Is the United States headed for war with Iran's Islamic rulers?

Increasing tensions with Iran over its nuclear program and actions in Iraq have fueled speculation that Bush may be paving the way for military action. With U.S. forces tied down in Iraq and Afghanistan, no one expects a ground invasion, but analysts at both ends of the political spectrum put little stock in Bush's insistence that he's focused only on diplomacy.

"I still believe, at the end of the day, that he will bomb the Iranian (nuclear) facilities," said Joshua Muravchik, a neoconservative scholar at the American Enterprise Institute, a think tank with close ties to the Bush administration. Muravchik, who favors military action, sees Bush's current focus on diplomacy as a prelude to attack.

"When he does it - if he does it - it will be wildly unpopular. He certainly at least wants to be able to say convincingly, `I tried everything else,'" Muravchik said.

Bush bristles at suggestions that he wants a confrontation. He and his advisers describe U.S. policy as a carrot-and-stick approach that uses the threat of military action to create diplomatic leverage. The goal is to encourage internal dissent in Iran and force the government to take a more moderate approach.

"Our policies are all aimed at convincing the Iranian people there's a better way forward, and I hope their government hears that message," Bush said at a Feb. 14 news conference. "We'll continue to try to solve the issue peacefully."

The next day, a frustrated Defense Secretary Robert Gates declared, "For the umpteenth time, we are not looking for an excuse to go to war with Iran."

The strategy could backfire, however, if U.S. pressure prompts Iranians to coalesce behind their leaders instead of encouraging dissent. Moreover, Iran has signaled that it has tools of its own, such as planning war games in the Strait of Hormuz, a chokepoint for half the world's oil; improving relations with Russia and China; and stepping up support for militant Shiite Muslims in Iraq, Lebanon, Afghanistan and elsewhere.

Skeptics note that Bush also stressed diplomacy in the run-up to the Iraq war, declaring his peaceful intentions even as he prepared for the 2003 invasion.

"I don't have any war plans on my desk," he told reporters during a visit to France on May 26, 2002. While that may have been technically correct, Bush already had received a series of briefings on invasion plans, including one about two weeks before his European trip.

In recent months, the Bush administration has ratcheted up pressure against Iran. It has:

Dispatched a second aircraft carrier strike group to patrol the Persian Gulf and sent Patriot anti-missile missiles to Arab allies bordering the Gulf.

Expanded operations against alleged Iranian networks operating in Iraq, conducting two raids, one involving U.S. soldiers snatching Iranians said to be members of the al Quds paramilitary force.

Accused Iran of supplying roadside bombs to Iraqi insurgents and vowed to stop the shipments.

Moved to bolster the government of Lebanese Prime Minister Fuad Saniora with money and military supplies in a proxy struggle with the Iranian-backed Hezbollah terrorist group.

Launched an aggressive financial campaign against Iran to curb its access to the international financial system, freezing bank funds and barring U.S. transactions with various entities. This week the Treasury Department added Hezbollah's construction arm, Jihad al Bina, to a roster of blacklisted banks.

A senior U.S. official said in an interview that Bush is seeking to increase pressure on Iran to change its behavior, but isn't trying to spark a military confrontation.

European and Arab diplomats say they've sought and received assurances that the United States isn't planning war against Iran.

"They have told us there are no plans to attack Iran," said Nabil Fahmy, Egypt's ambassador in Washington. Fahmy said that while Iran must address concerns about its nuclear program, the Middle East needs less conflict, not more.

DOJ_NMG_0135741

U.S. officials from Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on down say the pressure on Iran is producing results. They cite a growing debate in Iran over President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's performance, the country's economic doldrums and the poor showing of Ahmadinejad's supporters in December's local elections.

Still, Ahmadinejad has remained defiant on the nuclear issue, ignoring a Feb. 21 U.N. deadline to halt uranium enrichment. He says Iran is interested only in nuclear power generation. U.S. officials believe Iran is using its civilian nuclear industry as cover for a weapons program.

"The free world is sending the regime in Tehran a clear message: We're not going to allow Iran to have nuclear weapons,'" Bush told an American Legion convention last February.

So what happens if threats and diplomacy fail? It's a question that administration officials don't want to answer. Iran isn't believed to be on the verge of obtaining nuclear weapons, but some analysts - and Israelis - worry that it could soon reach a point where its program will be hard to stop without military strikes.

"We have got time," Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns, the No. 3 State Department official, said at a recent forum. "There is no one arguing, that I know of, inside the administration or outside, to the effect that we have to exhaust diplomacy in the next few months."

But Bush has two more years in the White House, and he may not want to leave the Iranian problem to the next president.

"We may be talking about decisions the president has not yet made, but may yet make before his two years are up," said Paul Pillar, a retired senior CIA analyst who's now a Georgetown University professor.

"In military terms, in political terms, the stage is being set," said retired Air Force Col. Sam Gardiner, a frequent administration critic. "The path is toward the military option, although a decision, I don't think, has been made."

Some analysts fear that heightened tensions could lead to military action whether Bush wants it or not. In 1988, during a tense period of the Iran-Iraq War, the guided-missile cruiser USS Vincennes mistakenly shot down an Iranian civilian airliner, killing all 290 people aboard.

"In the current climate, there's a substantial risk of things escalating out of control," Pillar said.

Arab States, Wary Of Iran, Add To Their Arsenals But Still Lean On The U.S. (NYT)

By Hassan M. Fattah

The New York Times, February 23, 2007

ABU DHABI, United Arab Emirates, Feb. 22 — As fears grow over the escalating confrontation between Iran and the West, Arab states across the Persian Gulf have begun a rare show of muscle flexing, publicly advertising a shopping spree for new weapons and openly discussing their security concerns.

Typically secretive, the gulf nations have long planned upgrades to their armed forces, but now are speaking openly about them. American military officials say the countries, normally prone to squabbling, have also increased their military cooperation and opened lines of communication to the American military here.

Patriot missile batteries capable of striking down ballistic missiles have been readied in several gulf countries, including Kuwait, Saudi Arabia and Qatar, analysts say, and increasingly, the states have sought to emphasize their unanimity against Iran's nuclear ambitions.

"There has always been an acknowledgment of the threat in the region, but the volume of the debate has now risen," said one United Arab Emirates official, who spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak on the subject. "Now the message is there's a dialogue going on with Iran, but that doesn't mean I don't intend to defend myself."

The Persian Gulf monarchies and sheikdoms, mostly small and vulnerable, have long relied on the United States to protect them. The United States Fifth Fleet is based in Bahrain; the United States Central Command is based in nearby Qatar; and the Navy has long relied on docking facilities in the United Arab Emirates, which has one of the region's deepest water ports at Jebel Ali.

The United States, too, has begun a significant expansion of forces in the gulf, with a second United States aircraft carrier battle group led by the John C. Stennis now in the Persian Gulf and with minesweeping ships.

DOJ_NMG_0135742

The expansion has helped calm fears among gulf governments that the United States could pull out of the region in the future, even as it has raised concerns about a potential American confrontation with Iran, accidental or intentional.

As tensions with Iran rise, many gulf countries have come to see themselves as the likely first targets of an Iranian attack. Some have grown more concerned that the United States may be overstretched militarily, many analysts say, while almost all the monarchies, flush with cash as a result of high oil prices, have sought to build a military deterrent of their own.

"The message is first, 'U.S., stay involved here,' and second, 'Iran, we will maintain a technological edge no matter what,' " said Emile el-Hokayem, research fellow at the Henry L. Stimson Center, a research center based in Washington. "They are trying to reinforce the credibility of the threat of force."

Military officials from throughout the region descended this week on the Idex military trade fair, a semiannual event that has become the region's largest arms market, drawing nearly 900 weapons makers from around the world. They came ready to update their military capacities and air and naval defenses. They also came armed with a veiled message of resolve.

"We believe there is a need for power to protect peace, and strong people with the capability to respond are the real protectors of peace," said Sheik Khalifa bin Zayed al-Nahyan, the president of the United Arab Emirates and ruler of the emirate of Abu Dhabi, at the exposition. "That is why we are keen to maintain the efficiency of our armed forces."

The Persian Gulf has been a lucrative market for arms. Saudi Arabia, Kuwait and Oman spend up to 10 percent of their gross domestic product on the military, amounting to nearly $21 billion, $4 billion and $2.7 billion, respectively, estimates John Kenkel, senior director of Jane's Strategic Advisory Services.

If they follow through on the deals announced recently, it is estimated that countries like the United Arab Emirates, Kuwait, Oman and Saudi Arabia will spend up to $60 billion this year. The biggest buyer in 2006, according to the defense industry journal Defense News, was Saudi Arabia, which has agreed to buy 72 Eurofighter Typhoon combat jets for $11 billion. It also has a $400 million deal to upgrade 12 Apache AH-64A helicopters to the Longbow standard. The kingdom also reportedly plans to acquire cruise missiles, attack helicopters and tanks, all for a total of $50 billion.

Kuwait reportedly bought 24 Apache Longbow helicopters, while the United Arab Emirates has continued to take delivery of 80 F-16 Block 60 fighters, with plans to buy air tankers, missile defense batteries and airborne early warning systems. Bahrain ordered nine UH-60M Black Hawk helicopters in an estimated $252 million deal, while Oman reportedly bought 30 antitank rocket launchers in a $48 million purchase and is planning a naval overhaul.

"It is a message to enemies that 'We are taking defense seriously,' " Mr. Kenkel said, emphasizing that the new arms were for deterrence.

"If the U.S. ever does pull back, these countries in the gulf have realized, they may have to fend for themselves," Mr. Kenkel said. "As the Boy Scouts say, always be prepared."

The most marked change is in the public nature of the acquisitions, which previously would have been kept secret, many analysts here said, itself a form of deterrence.

"They have been doing these kinds of purchases since the '90s," said Marwan Lahoud, chief executive of the European missile maker MBDA. "What has changed is they are stating it publicly. The other side is making pronouncements so they have to as well," he said, speaking of Iran's recent announcements about its weapons capacity.

Senior United States military officials say gulf countries have become more nervous as Iran has conducted naval maneuvers, especially near the Straits of Hormuz, the main artery through which two-fifths of the world's oil reaches markets.

"A year ago you could have characterized the interaction with the Iranians as professional," said Vice Adm. Patrick Walsh, departing commander of the Fifth Fleet. "What's different today has been the number and amount of exercises and the proximity of those exercises to the Straits of Hormuz themselves."

The exercises were among the reasons for the expansion of Navy forces in the region, he said, but have also raised alarm about the potential for accidents to lead to an unintended war.

Admiral Walsh said that American warships remained in international waters, and that Iranian and American ships kept close watch on one another. Some critics of the Bush administration have alleged that the increased military presence in the gulf risks igniting a conflict.

DOJ_NMG_0135743

Admiral Walsh said the increased American presence was aimed at o reassuring gulf states that the United States remained committed to their security, but also welcomed their efforts to build deterrence.

“We have found that we need to be physically present to prevent such armed behavior,” he said of the Iranian maneuvers. “We’re mindful we’re not giving up any water, but also being careful not to take a provocative stance.”

A Presidential Candidate Bill Clinton Can Publicly Embrace (WP)

By Al Kamen

The Washington Post, February 23, 2007

And now, the first known use of the Heimlich maneuver in political advertising. This photo was included in an e-mail a Loop Fan and undoubtedly countless Clinton contributors received on Wednesday.

The former president has written a campaign solicitation for his wife with his usual impeccable timing: It's a week when tensions between Sen. Barack Obama's and Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton's campaigns have exploded over unkind comments about the Clintons from Hollywood producer and former Clinton -- now Obama -- contributor David Geffen.

It was exceptionally hard to find Bill Clinton campaigning for Al Gore in 2000, but now, he writes, "I can't wait to join Hillary on the campaign trail and talk to people about what a great president she's going to be."

"During eight years in the White House," he writes, "Hillary and I faced a constant barrage of attacks from Washington Republicans. No insult was off-limits. No tactic was too low." And the GOP never had David Geffen on its side.

Meanwhile, Bill Clinton wants to raise $1 million in a week for his candidate spouse.

So contribute -- or, in this case, cough it up!

No Guns in Cheney's Photo Shoot

Still haven't found the perfect calendar for 2007? How about the Republican National Committee's splendid offering? Eleven beautiful shots of President Bush as leader of the free world. Several show him with kids, babies, sharing a laugh with the troops, with Laura Bush at the White House and so on.

The August photo, however, features a fine shot of Vice President Cheney at his ranch in Wyoming, taken by White House photographer David Bohrer.

So why August? No, stop it. Not for the Pulitzer Prize-winning book "The Guns of August." And anyway, he shot his friend in the face in February -- a year ago. The picture was taken in August 2003.

Hurry, the calendar's on sale for $25.

You Say 'Extraordinary Rendition,' They Say 'Vacation'

Tired of snorkeling in the Caribbean? Skiing in the Alps? Safaris in Africa? Then perhaps it's time for a truly different vacation. This just in from Agence France-Presse:

"A Polish travel firm said Thursday it was giving tourists a chance to follow in the footsteps of CIA agents and terror suspects near an alleged US detention centre in Poland's lakeland -- which the authorities deny exists.

"Visitors will be able to cycle and canoe near the Polish intelligence service's training centre . . . in the northern Mazuria region, and the nearby Szymany airport, Joanna Sobieska of Szarpie Travel was quoted as saying by the PAP news agency."

Just a seamless transition from stifling communism to creative capitalism.

Iran Sending In a New U.N. Ambassador

In the midst of building tensions between the United States and Iran, Tehran is withdrawing its long-serving ambassador to the United Nations, Javad Zarif. Iranian sources say Zarif, who has been a central figure in the negotiations over Iran's nuclear program, will be replaced by Mohammad Khazai, the deputy minister of economics. Khazai is no stranger to politics in the United States, having worked at the World Bank.

Zarif, who was sent to the United Nations when Mohammad Khatami was Iran's president, is due to leave in April. (There has been no Iranian ambassador to the United States since 1980, though there is a large interests section on Wisconsin Avenue NW staffed by dozens of Iranians, run under the auspices of the embassy of Pakistan. The United States uses Swiss diplomats to do its business in Tehran.)

Balanced Reading for Political Book Clubs

DOJ_NMG_0135744

An update on John R. Bolton's book on his days at the State Department and the United Nations: The former U.S. ambassador's book, "Surrender Is Not an Option: Defending America at the United Nations and Abroad," is to be published by Threshold Editions, which is the conservative publishing subsidiary of Simon & Schuster. (They've published Mary Cheney, Ed Gillespie, Al Regnery, Glenn Beck and other conservatives.) Bolton's book will be on sale Nov. 6 -- he'll be typing fast and aided by a daily diary -- and will naturally feature "no holds barred candor," take you "behind the scenes" and be "revealing," the publishing blurb says, all in 336 pages.

Also on the book front, this time from the left, a new one just out by Washington author Andrew Cockburn on former defense secretary Donald Rumsfeld. This one, we are told, is "drawn from sources deep inside Washington, D.C." -- meaning folks who ride the Metro? -- and promises to be a "startling" exposé.

In a week in which Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) said Rumsfeld "will go down as one of the worst secretaries of defense in history" -- presumably this ranking includes even Robert McNamara-- it seems Cockburn agrees. The book title offers a hint: "Rumsfeld: His Rise, Fall, and Catastrophic Legacy." Sounds a bit negative.

New Committee Chairman, New Horse for PAC to Back

Bandwagon alert! The Maersk Inc. Good Government Fund, the federal PAC of the shipping giant, gave $2,500 to Rep. Bennie Thompson (D-Miss.) on Jan. 29. It marked the first time that the company has given to the new chairman of the House Homeland Security Committee.

Secretive Force At Center Of Tensions Between U.S., Iran (MCT)

By Jonathan S. Landay

McClatchy Newspapers, February 23, 2007

WASHINGTON - A band of religious warriors that Iran's clerical rulers created to spread their country's Islamic Revolution has joined Iran's nuclear program at the center of the rising tensions between Washington and Tehran.

The Quds Force, a secretive overseas arm of Iran's Islamic Revolutionary Guard Corps, has operatives in Iraq and Afghanistan; runs Shiite extremist networks in Asia, the Middle East, Africa, Latin America and Europe; trains and arms Hezbollah and other Shiite radicals in Iran and Lebanon; and funds the Palestinian Islamic Jihad terrorist group. Now it's arming Iraqi Shiite Muslims with armor-piercing bombs to use against American troops, according to U.S. officials.

Many experts now warn that if the U.S.-Iranian frictions over Iraq and Iran's nuclear program escalate into conflict, Tehran would use the Quds Force to launch terrorist attacks against U.S. and allied targets around the world.

"They are the brains behind those who are pulling the trigger," said one official, who requested anonymity because intelligence on the group is highly classified. "You are never going to see their fingerprints."

Iran denies that it's helping to kill U.S. soldiers in Iraq, and the Bush administration has refused to declassify the intelligence that it says proves the Quds Force is sending weapons to Iraqi militants. As a result, while it's clear that Iran is supporting Shiite groups in Iraq, both the extent and the intent of its meddling there are subjects of debate.

Five Iranian officials detained by U.S. forces in recent raids in Iraq are said to be Quds Force operatives, but some U.S. officials think the force isn't in Iraq to direct attacks on U.S. troops. The Iranians, they think, simply want to ensure that Iraq's Shiites prevail over the minority Sunnis, thereby ensuring peaceful relations with Iran.

The Quds force is well known to the world's intelligence agencies, but much about it remains unknown, including where it fits into Iran's deliberately complex and confusing power structure. One early attempt to diagram the power structure, by a Defense Intelligence Agency analyst in the 1980s, put "God" in the top box.

Although many intelligence services, including those of the United States, Israel and European and Arab nations, have been keeping tabs on its operatives - or at least trying to - for more than 20 years, the unit has been publicly accused of complicity in a terrorist attack only once. That was in the July 18, 1994, suicide bombing of a Jewish community center in Buenos Aires, which killed 85 people and injured 151.

The case was based in part on the testimony of Abdolhassem Masbahi, a former senior Iranian intelligence officer who defected to Turkey in 1995. An Argentine judge, acting at the request of special prosecutors, issued arrest warrants in November for former Iranian President Ali Akbar Rafsanjani and seven other Iranian officials, including Ahmad Vahidi, the Quds Force commander at the time of the bombing.

DOJ_NMG_0135745

Experts say the force is a highly compartmentalized and disciplined contingent of several thousand men who are trained in espionage, military operations and political analysis, and it reports directly to supreme leader Ali Khamenei.

"It's like taking the CIA, special forces and the State Department and rolling them all into one," said the U.S. official.

"These guys have been around for a very long time," said Daniel Byman, a former CIA analyst who's now a terrorism expert at The Brookings Institution, a centrist Washington policy organization. "We know they are nasty, and we know they are capable."

Its mission of exporting the Islamic Revolution has meant confronting Iran's main enemies, the United States and Israel, beginning in Lebanon 25 years ago.

Current and former U.S. officials said Revolutionary Guard members helped plan and organize the Hezbollah suicide bombings of the U.S. Embassy and Marine barracks in Beirut in 1983 and 1984, which killed more than 300 people, including 241 U.S. service personnel. Reconnaissance photographs of the Iranian headquarters near the town of Baalbek revealed a mockup of the unfinished defenses around the embassy annex and tire tracks where the bomber had rehearsed his mission.

The force also is believed to have been involved in recruiting and training the Shiite radicals who carried out the 1996 truck-bombing of the Khobar Towers housing complex in Dhahran, Saudi Arabia, which killed 19 U.S. servicemen and a Saudi.

Only now, however, has the United States confronted Iran over the force's activities.

"No administration wanted to take these people on," charged Robert Baer, a former covert CIA officer who served in the Middle East.

The unit's name, Persian for Jerusalem, reflects the Iranian goal of destroying Israel and liberating Islam's third holiest city. Its hostility toward the United States is reflected in its use of part of the former U.S. Embassy compound in Tehran, where 52 Americans were held hostage for 444 days between 1979 and 1980, U.S. intelligence officials said.

The force was formally constituted in 1990 as the foreign operations arm of the Islamic Revolutionary Guard Corps, a military organization with its own air, land and sea forces that's separate from the regular Iranian military, whose main mission is protecting the ruling ayatollahs.

Hagel Says Diplomacy Is Best Option For Iran (FT)

By Josh Funk

Fremont (NE) Tribune, February 23, 2007

KEARNEY, Neb. - U.S. Sen. Chuck Hagel said Thursday that Iran should be held accountable for supporting terrorists through "wise statecraft" instead of military force, and America should be careful not to follow the "same destructive path" it did in Iraq.

The Nebraska Republican, who is still considering a 2008 presidential run, spoke at the University of Nebraska at Kearney's James E. Smith Conference on World Affairs.

Hagel said the United States must carefully consider any action against Iran in the wake of Thursday's report that Iran refused to comply with U.N. Security Council demands to curtail its nuclear program and suspend uranium enrichment.

"In a hazy, hair-triggered environment, careless rhetoric and military movements that one side may believe are required to demonstrate resolve and strength ... can be misinterpreted as preparations for military options," Hagel said. "The risk of inadvertent conflict because of miscalculation is great."

Middle East expert Steven Cook said Hagel is saying the Bush administration is wrong, and Iran needs to be engaged.

"Basically this is a polite, yet firm critique of the Bush administration policy with regard to Iran," said Cook, who is with the nonpartisan Council on Foreign Relations.

Cook said Hagel's speech appears related to his political aspirations.

"I think he's really trying to stake out a difference between himself and the other Republican contenders," Cook said.

Someone asked Hagel about his presidential aspirations during a question period after his speech.

"I'll make a decision on my political future in the next few weeks," Hagel said.

DOJ_NMG_0135746

During his speech, Hagel said part of the problem in U.S.-Iran relations is that neither country understands the other very well. Hagel said complex factors inside Iran can affect the situation, and not all of Iran is against the United States.

Two-thirds of Iran's population is younger than 30, Hagel said, and many of those Iranians have positive attitudes about America.

"We do not want to lose this pro-American generation by turning them away from us," Hagel said. "They are the hope of Iran. They bristle under the heavy yoke of the ayatollahs' strident limitations of personal freedom."

He said the recent success of six-party talks about North Korea's nuclear program should serve as a model for talks with Iran.

"The United States must employ similar, wise statecraft to redirect deepening Middle East tensions toward a higher ground of resolution," Hagel said.

And diplomacy is likely to be much more productive than military action in Iran.

"A U.S. military conflict with Iran would inflame the Middle East and global Muslim populations, crippling U.S. security, political, economic and strategic interests worldwide," Hagel said.

Hagel, who attended UNK when it was Kearney State College, used part of his speech to offer his audience of mostly college students a history lesson on conflict in the Middle East. And he said the United States should pay attention to that history because it affects current events.

"Forces and events in the Middle East cannot be neatly categorized. The swirl of Middle East history creates layers upon layers of complexity," Hagel said. "There is little transparency in the Middle East. That is a reality that is inescapable and cannot be assumed away.

"To ignore this reality is to risk being trapped by false choices _ false choices such as the question, "Which is worse: Iran with nuclear weapons or war with Iran?" Hagel said.

Iran Misses Another Deadline (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, February 23, 2007

Conspiracy theorists may soon have to add another name to Dick Cheney's secret cabal planning war with Iran: Mohamed ElBaradei.

At least that's what a wag might say after the Director General of the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) speculated this week in an interview with the Financial Times that Iran might be as close as six months from developing an industrial-scale uranium enrichment facility of 3,000 centrifuges. That kind of capability would put Iran on track to produce sufficient fissile uranium for a nuclear bomb by the fall of 2008.

Mr. ElBaradei also noted that "even if the Iranian [nuclear] program is for peaceful purposes, there is no question that at the back of their minds this is a deterrent." Let's underscore the words "even if." The Director General has until now been remarkably cautious in his pronouncements on Iran's intentions. But his comments this week are a remarkable, if implicit, admission that Iran might have other uses for enriched uranium than turning on lights.

These comments also coincide with Iran's decision to flout yet another U.N. deadline to suspend enrichment. According to the IAEA report on Iran, released yesterday, not only have the Iranians continued to enrich, they have also failed to offer further information on some of the outstanding questions in their nuclear file. One such question concerns the source of some highly enriched (read, bomb-grade) uranium particles found in Iran by IAEA inspectors.

So what does the international community now intend to do? Belying his own forecasts as a U.N. technocrat, Mr. ElBaradei ventured a political opinion that any military strikes against Iran would be "catastrophic, counterproductive." So much for him being a neocon shill. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice after meeting with her Russian, German and EU counterparts in Berlin, could only say that she "confirmed that we will use our available channels and the Security Council to try and achieve that goal."

Ms. Rice shouldn't hold her breath. The Security Council could barely agree in December to sanction a handful of companies and individuals directly implicated in Iran's nuclear and ballistic-missile programs. And as these columns reported Tuesday, the level of European commercial investment in Iran has grown briskly since its secret nuclear programs were exposed in 2003, with an estimated 10,000 jobs in Germany alone dependent on exports to Iran. Moral courage on that front may be expecting too much.

DOJ_NMG_0135747

Ultimately, whatever hope there might be of resolving the Iranian issue through diplomacy is going to require compromises by the Iranians themselves. Here's what Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad had to say about that: "If we shut down other activities for 10 years and the country only focuses on nuclear energy it will be worth it because if we obtain this energy our people will advance as much as 50 years."

Maybe it's time the rest of us start taking Mr. Ahmadinejad at his word, and tailoring our expectations accordingly.

What Scares Iran's Mullahs? (NYT)

By Abbas Milani

The New York Times, February 23, 2007

Stanford, Calif.

IRAN has once again defied the United Nations by proceeding with enrichment activities, the International Atomic Energy Agency reported yesterday. And yet, simultaneously, Iranian officials have been sending a very different message — one that has gone largely unremarked but merits close attention.

After a meeting with the supreme leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, the leader's chief foreign policy adviser, Ali Akbar Velayati, declared last week that suspending uranium enrichment is not a red line for the regime — in other words, the mullahs might be ready to agree to some kind of a suspension. Another powerful insider, Ali Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani, said much the same thing in a different setting, while a third high-ranking official acknowledged that the Islamic Republic is seriously considering a proposal by President Vladimir Putin of Russia to suspend enrichment at least long enough to start serious negotiations with the United Nations.

There have also been indications that the Iranians are willing to accept a compromise plan presented by Mohamed ElBaradei, the director general of the International Atomic Energy Agency. That plan calls for the suspension of all major enrichment activities but allows the regime to save face by keeping a handful of centrifuges in operation.

The mullahs are keen on damage control on another front as well. After his meeting with Ayatollah Khamenei, Mr. Velayati announced that the Holocaust is a fact of history and chastised those who question its reality. Ali Larijani, Iran's chief nuclear negotiator, also declared the Holocaust a "historical matter" to be discussed by scholars (and not, he implied, by ignorant politicians). In short, there is a new willingness among the Iranian political elite to avoid the rhetoric of confrontation and to negotiate.

There are three ways to analyze this turn. Advocates of an American invasion of Iran say that last month's strengthening of the American armada in the Persian Gulf has frightened the Iranian regime. What diplomacy could not do for years, a few destroyers did in less than a month. These advocates encourage more of the same, hoping either that the mullahs will accept defeat in the face of an imminent attack, or that a Gulf of Tonkin incident will lead to a full attack on Iran's nuclear facilities.

A second camp attacks the build-up of the armada as dangerous saber-rattling at best, and at worst as camouflage for already settled plans to attack Iran's nuclear sites. Such an attack, they say, might provide a much-needed feather for President Bush's empty cap at a time when his Middle East policy has manifestly failed. According to this camp, what changed the minds of Iranian officials was only the United Nations resolution threatening economic sanctions, and the possibility of other resolutions and more serious sanctions.

Both camps are partly right and yet dangerously wrong. There is a third way of looking at the facts.

The mullahs have historically shown an unfailing ability to smell out and, when pragmatic, succumb to credible power in their foes. Indeed, the presence of the American ships has helped encourage them to negotiate. But no less clear is the fact that the mullahs' attitude change began in late December, when the United Nations Security Council finally passed a resolution against the regime in Tehran.

The passage of the resolution hastened the demise of President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's confrontational approach to the West. And the falling price of oil, leading to declining revenues for the regime, magnified the resolution's economic impact. Top leaders of the Islamic Republic, from Ayatollah Khamenei to Mr. Rafsanjani, have made it clear that they consider sanctions a serious threat — more serious, according to Mr. Rafsanjani, than the possibility of an invasion.

DOJ_NMG_0135748

In other words, what the unilateral and increasingly quixotic American embargo could not do in more than a decade, a limited United Nations resolution has accomplished in less than a month. And the resolution succeeded because few things frighten the mullahs more than the prospect of confronting a united front made up of the European Union, Russia, China and the United States. The resolution was a manifestation of just such a united front.

While the combination of credible force, reduced oil prices and a United Nations resolution has worked to create the most favorable conditions yet for a negotiated solution to the nuclear crisis, any unilateral American attack on Iran is sure to backfire. It will break the international coalition against the Islamic Republic's nuclear adventurism; it will allow China, Russia and even some countries in Europe to legitimately side with the mullahs; it will lead to higher oil prices and an increase in Iranian government revenues; and finally, it will help revive the waning power of the warmongers in Tehran.

Those convinced that only the combination of credible might and diplomatic pressure will work worry rightly that the Bush administration, frustrated by its failures in Iraq and goaded by hawks in Washington, will do to Iran what it did to Iraq. In confronting Saddam Hussein and the threat of his weapons of mass destruction, the Bush administration insisted that amassing an armada in the Persian Gulf was necessary to frighten Mr. Hussein into submission. But once the armada was in place, they used it to carry out a long-ago planned invasion of Iraq.

Today, many worry that the plans for an invasion of Iran, too, were made long ago, and that the armada is there to make possible either another Gulf of Tonkin resolution or an Iranian act of provocation against American forces, which could then serve as an excuse for an attack on Iran.

War and peace with Iran are both possible today. With prudence, backed by power but guided by the wisdom to recognize the new signals coming from Tehran, the United States can today achieve a principled solution to the nuclear crisis. Congress, vigilant American citizens and a resolute policy from America's European allies can ensure that this principled peace is given a chance.

Abbas Milani is the director of Iranian studies at Stanford and a research fellow at the Hoover Institution.

Signals From Tehran (WP)

By David Ignatius

The Washington Post, February 23, 2007

The title of the two-page Iranian document is "Gentlemen's Agreement." In convoluted English, it lists 11 points of understanding supposedly reached in September between Iranian negotiator Ali Larijani and his European counterpart, Javier Solana, on a temporary, partial, not-quite suspension of uranium enrichment.

What's interesting isn't the purported agreement -- Solana's spokeswoman, Cristina Gallach, insists there wasn't one -- but the fact that the Iranians are circulating the document and signaling through various channels that they want to restart dialogue. Indeed, when Larijani met Solana in Munich this month, "he expressed the willingness to resume talks to prepare final negotiations," according to a source close to Solana.

"We're getting pinged all over the world by Iranians wanting to talk to us," Undersecretary of State R. Nicholas Burns said in an interview yesterday. The problem, says Burns, is that the Iranians haven't yet said the "magic word," which is that they will actually suspend enrichment in exchange for the suspension of U.N. sanctions.

With Iran still publicly defying the United Nations over its nuclear program, the United States and its allies agreed yesterday to tighten the pressure another notch by preparing a second U.N. Security Council resolution with additional sanctions. Burns said Russia and China agreed to back the new resolution in a meeting yesterday with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice. "It may not be substantially stronger, but it will be stronger," said Burns, who will travel to London on Monday to negotiate the details of the new resolution.

U.S. and European officials think Iran's new interest in negotiations is a sign that pressure on Tehran is working. The campaign includes the initial U.N. sanctions resolution, which shook the Iranians because it was backed by Russia and China; tough U.S. banking sanctions, accompanied by a successful Treasury Department push to dissuade European and Japanese banks from lending to Iran; and calculated muscle-flexing by the Bush administration, which has sent an additional aircraft carrier task force to the Persian Gulf and seized Iranian operatives inside Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0135749

"We are hopeful that all these pressure points will influence the internal debate in Iran," says Burns. And they appear to be doing just that.

The multipronged squeeze on Tehran surprised President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad and other Iranian officials, who seemed confident when I visited the country in September that they were in the driver's seat and that it was the United States that was weakened and isolated. "We knocked them off stride and put them on the defensive," argues Burns. A British official who follows the issue closely agrees: "The Iranians have moved from cockiness to division and nervousness."

Western officials see various signs of an altered political balance in Tehran: public criticism of Ahmadinejad's management of the economy by former president Ali Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani; a letter challenging the president's economic policy signed by 150 members of the Iranian parliament; criticism of Ahmadinejad's handling of the nuclear issue by former members of the Iranian negotiating team and by a hard-line newspaper; and now new signals from Larijani and others that Iran wants to resume the preliminary negotiations it broke off last year.

"The financial sanctions have had a real impact," says the British official. "They lead to a general insecurity about economic viability."

So does all this mean it's time to go back to the bargaining table? Not yet, say a number of U.S. and European officials. They insist that the Iranians must stop haggling and agree to quit enriching uranium. Russian officials told me in Moscow last week that President Vladimir Putin passed the message to a top Iranian emissary this month that Tehran must agree to a "timeout" in enriching uranium if it wants to settle the nuclear issue.

The Iranians continue to dicker, in what Western officials regard as a tactical ploy to get out of trouble. Their efforts center on paragraph eight of the "Gentlemen's Agreement" their officials have been circulating. That part of the document proposes that if U.N. sanctions are lifted, Iran would agree to a two-month period "during which Iran in a voluntary and non-binding and temporary move avoids installation of next cascades" for enrichment. In other words, the Iranians wouldn't add additional centrifuges that would allow industrial-scale enrichment but would continue spinning their modest initial cascade of centrifuges.

No deal, say U.S. and European officials. The only way the Iranians can escape sanctions is to suspend enrichment and sit down at the table. If they do so, an array of goodies awaits. Meanwhile, the strategy of confrontation continues, and U.S. and European officials -- who haven't had much to cheer about recently -- seem confident that it's working.

The writer co-hosts, with Newsweek's Fareed Zakaria, PostGlobal, an online discussion of international issues athttp://blog.washingtonpost.com/postglobal. His e-mail address isdavidignatius@washpost.com.

'Long Way' To Go In North Korea Nuclear Pact: US (AFP)

By Stephen Collinson

AFP, February 23, 2007

The United States said Thursday there was a "long way to go" to implement a landmark North Korea nuclear deal, and warned tough talks loom on Pyongyang's suspected secret uranium enrichment program.

US Assistant Secretary of State Christopher Hill defended the deal with the isolated and impoverished Stalinist state which emerged from exhaustive six-nation talks in Beijing last week.

"I think there is a real sense among all the parties that we have a process going. We are very mindful of the fact that we have a long way to go," Hill said at a briefing at the Brookings Institution think-tank.

Hill lavished praise on China for its role in brokering the deal, and confirmed that if things go smoothly, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice will travel to Beijing in April as required by the deal for talks with her North Korean counterpart and ministers from the other parties to the negotiations: China, Russia, Japan, and South Korea.

The deal, which binds North Korea to shut key nuclear facilities in exchange for energy aid, requires Pyongyang to produce a list of all its nuclear programs.

"We will face the problem -- in fact, the very serious problem -- of the highly enriched uranium program," Hill said,

DOJ_NMG_0135750

Hill said the North Koreans had never acknowledged US accusations they had a program to manufacture highly enriched uranium (HEU) for nuclear bombs, but added that the United States had information North Korea had bought equipment consistent with plans for such a scheme.

"But they have been willing to discuss what we know and to try to resolve this ... to mutual satisfaction," he said.

"We don't know whether we're going to be able to do that, but we have agreed to have this discussion."

The United States accused North Korea in October 2002 of hiding a program to produce HEU, and the ensuing showdown sent relations back into the Cold War deep-freeze, ultimately resulting in the rupture of a 1994 deal which froze the Stalinist state's plutonium-based nuclear program.

Officials in Seoul this week warned Pyongyang must disable all programs under the six-party deal.

Critics have complained the pact does not directly address North Korea's existing plutonium nuclear bombs, or its suspected HEU program.

Hill heaped praise on China for hosting the six-party talks.

"I do believe that we have been able to synchronize our goals," Hill said.

"I think we're also synchronizing not only the goals, but also the strategy and in many respects the tactics themselves, so we've really come together with them on this."

"If we're successful with all of this, our plan is to then have a ministerial where US Secretary of State Condi Rice will go out to Beijing and she will meet with her other five counterparts, including the North Korean minister of foreign affairs, and review the first 60 days," Hill said.

Hill's remarks came a day after Washington said US Deputy Secretary of State John Negroponte will travel to major Asian capitals next week for talks likely to focus on the nuclear deal.

Vice President Dick Cheney meanwhile wrapped up a visit to Japan, offering to support Tokyo on the emotionally charged issue of resolving North Korean kidnappings of Japanese citizens, which has cast a shadow over the nuclear deal.

Economically crippled North Korea has agreed to start disabling its nuclear facilities in exchange for badly needed energy aid.

It agreed to close and seal its Yongbyon reactor -- long suspected to be the centre of its nuclear program -- within 60 days and admit UN nuclear inspectors in return for 50,000 tonnes of heavy fuel oil.

Further steps to disable nuclear facilities would be rewarded with up to 950,000 tons of heavy oil or other aid, while Washington also agreed to discuss removing North Korea from a list of state sponsors of terrorism and begin talks on normalizing relations.

Hill Warns N Korea On Deadlines (FT)

By Guy Dinmore

Financial Times, February 23, 2007

North Korea must stick to the tight deadlines of the new deal to freeze its Yongbyon nuclear facility in exchange for a modest amount of fuel oil, Christopher Hill, the US negotiator at the six-party nuclear talks, said on Thursday.

Describing the 60-day deadline agreed to on February 13 as “very short” and one that required a “considerable amount of negotiation”, Mr Hill conceded that potentially serious sticking points lay ahead.

“We need to avoid, above all, missing deadlines,” Mr Hill told the Brookings Institution, a Washington think-tank. “When you start missing deadlines, it’s like a broken window theory. One window is unrepaired. Before you know it, you’ll have a lot of broken windows and nobody cares.”

Mr Hill stressed that the shutting down of Yongbyon and the return of international inspectors within 60 days was just the first step of a much longer process. The ultimate goal, which North Korea signed up to in September 2005, is denuclearisation of the Korean peninsula in exchange for aid and security guarantees.

During the first 60 days, in which North Korea is to receive 50,000 tonnes of fuel oil for its depleted power stations, Pyongyang has also committed to discussing a list of all its nuclear programmes, and to later provide a complete declaration.

DOJ_NMG_0135751

Mr Hill anticipated “problems” with that declaration, noting that North Korea had refused to acknowledge the existence of what the US alleges is a secret uranium enrichment programme. However he also indicated that the US did not believe Pyongyang had mastered the enrichment process.

North Korea carried out an underground test explosion last October and is believed to have enough reprocessed plutonium for some eight to 10 bombs.

North Korea’s demand to be taken off the US list of state sponsors of terrorism would take “some time”, Mr Hill said.

Foreign ministers of the six nations, which also include hosts China, South Korea, Japan and Russia, are to meet in Beijing in April to review any progress.

Within 30 days, the US and North Korea are to set up a bilateral working group to start discussions on normalising relations. Mr Hill made clear that process would only conclude when North Korea had dismantled its entire nuclear programme.

Nuke Timeline Key To Successful Deal (WT)

By David R. Sands

The Washington Times, February 23, 2007

The top U.S. negotiator on North Korea said yesterday that the United States will insist on strict deadlines to keep a step-by-step deal to end the North's nuclear-weapons programs from unraveling as did a similar deal negotiated under the Clinton administration.

Christopher R. Hill, assistant secretary of state for East Asian Affairs, said North Korea must shut down its nuclear site at Yongbyon and allow United Nations inspectors back into the country by mid-April under the deal struck at the six-party talks in Beijing 10 days ago.

Also by that date, a series of working groups -- including a bilateral one on U.S.-North Korean relations and one on promised food and fuel aid for Pyongyang -- are supposed to be up and running. The U.S. government also has promised to wrap up an 18-month investigation of a Chinese bank that was a crucial conduit for the North's meager hard currency reserves.

"Above all, everyone is agreed that we need to avoid missing deadlines," Mr. Hill told a packed room yesterday in a briefing at the Brookings Institution think tank.

"When you start missing deadline, it's like the theory about a broken window," Mr. Hill said. "If one window isn't repaired, before you know it, you'll have a lot of broken windows and nobody cares."

The agreement was signed by representatives from the United States, North and South Korea, Russia, Japan and China. Beijing hosted the talks and provided crucial behind-the-scenes diplomacy to make the deal, Mr. Hill said.

China's decision to back U.N. resolutions condemning Pyongyang for a missile test last summer and a nuclear bomb test in October "really got the attention of North Korea," he added.

U.S. critics of the deal, including former U.N. Ambassador John R. Bolton, have criticized the agreement as a replay of the 1994 Agreed Framework, negotiated by the Clinton administration to head off an earlier North Korean nuclear crisis. Pyongyang proceeded with a secret nuclear-weapons program despite the promises of energy and aid in the 1994 deal.

Mr. Hill said that this time, China and all of the North's neighbors were parties to the deal, making it harder for Pyongyang to walk away. The six-party agreement also is far more ambitious, he said, calling for the eventual elimination of the North's nuclear-weapons programs and normalization of relations with the United States.

But Mr. Hill said he was "not taking a victory lap yet," because the Beijing accord left some major questions unanswered.

Among them: the fate of the North's existing stock of nuclear bombs -- estimated at four to 12 -- and of the 50 kilotons of plutonium Pyongyang is thought to have on hand to make more bombs. The North still has to provide a detailed list of all its nuclear sites that will be dismantled.

The State Department envoy also conceded that major uncertainties remain about the North's plans to use highly enriched uranium to fuel nuclear bombs. The Bush administration cited Pyongyang's admission in 2002 that it had a secret uranium program as a reason to break off the Agreed Framework deal for good.

Pyongyang has secretly bought some equipment consistent with an enriched uranium program, but there are some "considerable production techniques that we're not sure whether they have mastered," Mr. Hill said.

DOJ_NMG_0135752

N. Korea Nuclear Deal Rife With Benefits (AP)

By Barry Schweid

AP, February 23, 2007

The breakthrough nuclear agreement with North Korea could pay wide-ranging dividends for all sides, especially in the area of already improving U.S. relations with China and America's allies, chief U.S. negotiator Christopher Hill said Thursday.

Other side benefits might include a peace treaty formally ending the war on the Korean peninsula after more than a half-century, a cut in the force of 25,000 U.S. troops in South Korea, a better life for impoverished North Koreans and the State Department's declassifying of the North as a sponsor of terror, Hill said in remarks at the Brookings Institution, a liberal-oriented think tank.

The U.S. negotiator said he plans to meet with North Korean counterparts within 30 days to work on these issues and a schedule for North Korea to go beyond its commitment last week in six-sided negotiations in Beijing to seal its main nuclear reactor and permit international inspection.

In return, Pyongyang is due to receive 50,000 tons of heavy fuel oil and ultimately another 950,000 tons in fuel if it completely abandons its nuclear weapons program.

"We are very mindful we have a long way to go," Hill said.

For one thing, he said, Pyongyang must provide a complete list of programs to be put out of commission.

Conservatives have blasted the agreement, which was considered a breakthrough after months of deadlock and bickering, as naive and worse. They say it rewards North Korea for bad behavior and sets a terrible precedent for Iran, another country with which the U.S. is locked in a nuclear standoff.

Former U.N. Ambassador John Bolton said in an interview that the North Korean regime "is not going to give up something so central to its survival as nuclear weapons."

North Korea is known to have tried to acquire aluminum tubes from Germany and "made certain purchases of equipment which is entirely consistent with a highly enriched uranium program," he said.

The agreement already has strengthened U.S. relations with China and South Korea, Hill said. China wants "clarity" from North Korea on abandoning its weapons program and, "We really have lined up our interests with them," Hill said.

Further closing ranks on all fronts, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice is planning to meet with the foreign ministers of the five other countries in April in Beijing. They are North Korea, China, South Korea, Japan and Russia.

In a parallel move, Deputy Secretary of State John Negroponte will make a trip early next month to Japan, South Korea and China. The State Department has ruled out a stop in Pyongyang by Rice's new top deputy.

Hill stressed that North Korea has not yet made a commitment to abandon its entire program.

"They're going to make decisions to move on a step-by-step basis. And as they move one step, they will look back and say, 'This is a better place than we were in yesterday.' And that will encourage them to take still another step," Hill said.

Meanwhile, he said, North Korea is very interested in getting off the State Department list of terror sponsors.

"We are prepared to begin that process, with the understanding it's going to take some time. ... We need some answers from them," he said.

A peace treaty to replace an armistice and formally end the Korean war is not technically a six-party issue. Hill said he assumes China, the United States, North Korea and South Korea would meet to resolve the issue. If they do, different ways may be found to maintain peace on the peninsula, a task undertaken since the war by U.S. troops.

"Our guiding star," Hill said, is "we want to maintain the security and the stability that we've maintained all these years."

Top Democratic Hopefuls' Bickering Puts Focus On Candor And Personal Behavior (WSJ)

By John Harwood

The Wall Street Journal, February 23, 2007

CHARACTER RISES as top issue in early presidential skirmishing.

DOJ_NMG_0135753

Criticism by media mogul Geffen, a onetime ally of Bill and Hillary Clinton, underscores concerns among Democrats that controversies over candor and personal behavior could embroil 2008 ticket. Clinton team's attack on Geffen's new favorite, Obama, aimed to quash such discussion, but a top adviser laments that the tactic "gave it too much attention."

One academic expert on political combat calls Obama camp's feisty response worth risks to his "above politics" stance. "Real political change requires ... attacks to show what is wrong," says Vanderbilt's John Geer, author of "In Defense of Negativity."

Facing skepticism over shifting political image, Romney says "I believe" four times in his first TV ad.

CONGRESS MULLS different approaches on executive pay.

House shows little interest in Senate-passed limits on deferred-compensation plans. But Sen. Grassley shows willingness to modify the proposal to fend off complaints from business groups that it might hit middle managers.

In talks between the two chambers, another Senate proposal has a better chance: limiting company deductions for exit-pay packages of departing executives. Meanwhile, House Financial Services Chairman Frank plans hearing next month on giving shareholders more control of executive pay.

BUSINESS ASSAILS Democrats' push for "card check" union-organizing legislation.

House leaders expect the bill, which would end workplace secret ballots to determine union status, to pass with 20 or more Republicans joining majority Democrats. U.S. Chamber's political director, Bill Miller, denounces the attack on "a function of democracy."

Neither side expects the bill to garner the 60 votes needed to clear Senate procedural votes before passage, and the Bush administration has signaled a potential veto in any case. The two parties plan to use the issue to rally their bases for the 2008 elections.

"The result ... will be an issue in the next campaign," says AFL-CIO's Kelly Ross.

STARTING POINT? Citing potential for first step toward addressing climate change, Senate environment committee chairwoman Boxer seeks cooperation from administration on improving energy efficiency at 9,000 federal buildings. House Energy and Commerce Chairman Dingell aims for climate-change hearing in March with chief executives from U.S. auto makers.

DINGELL PREPARES congressional budget writers for a request for $50 billion over five years to finance the children's-health initiative that he plans to introduce with Sen. Clinton as early as next week. Sen. Kennedy explores new funding source to expand coverage beyond "sin taxes" on cigarettes and alcohol: a new levy on junk food.

COMPETITORS? U.S. Chamber bristles at Treasury's roundtable with Secretary Paulson on March 13 on the competitiveness of U.S. capital markets. The chamber had hoped to own the spotlight with its own report on that subject, to be released the same week. Treasury officials say the timing was dictated by Paulson's schedule, not an attempt to upstage the chamber.

THE EQUALIZER? Paulson is expected to put inequality on the agenda again in a speech Thursday before traveling to Korea, Japan and China. The former Goldman Sachs chief, arguing that addressing workers' concerns about globalization is essential to resisting protectionism, has been pushing within the administration for better policy responses.

BUSH ADMINISTRATION AIMS toward first steps on implementing North Korean nuclear deal.

U.S. diplomats seek meetings with North Korean officials within two weeks, probably in New York, for unprecedented talks on normalizing relations and perhaps taking communist state off the list of terror sponsors. The U.S. also promises to thaw frozen North Korean bank account in Macau.

Rice could meet North Korea's foreign minister as soon as April. North Korean talks with Japan may grow testy, as Tokyo presses Pyongyang on fate of 13 Japanese abducted in the 1970s and 1980s.

Bush's Asia hand Christopher Hill invokes "broken-window theory" in arguing against tolerating missed deadlines.

MINOR MEMOS: While Hollywood fuels Clinton-Obama competition, Gore walks the red carpet as his climate-change documentary aims for two awards at this weekend's Oscars. Win or lose, the ex-VP will attend the Governor's Ball and Vanity Fair party.

DOJ_NMG_0135754

NKorea Official To US For Talks: Sources (AFP)

AFP, February 23, 2007

North Korea's chief nuclear negotiator will visit New York early next month to follow up the multinational agreement on scrapping his country's nuclear programmes, sources said Friday.

Kim Kye-Gwan was expected to take part in a working group meeting on normalising US-North Korea relations, a source told Yonhap news agency.

"No date has been set for his visit but it is likely to last from March 5 through 7," the source said.

An official who spoke to AFP on condition of anonymity confirmed Kim would go to New York in early March but said he was unsure of the reason.

"It is probably for the purpose of the joint working group but no date has been set for that meeting," the official said.

At six-nation talks in Beijing on February 13 the communist state agreed to shut down and then disable its nuclear facilities in phases. In return it will receive up to one million tons of heavy fuel oil or equivalent economic aid.

As part of the deal the United States and North Korea agreed to start talking about establishing full diplomatic relations. Five working groups are due to meet within 30 days to start planning how to implement it.

Yonhap said Kim, a vice-foreign minister, is expected to hold talks with his US counterpart Christopher Hill in New York.

Hill cautioned Thursday there was a "long way to go" to implement the deal and said tough talks lie ahead on a suspected uranium enrichment project which Washington believes Pyongyang is concealing.

He said the North Koreans had never acknowledged such a programme. "But they have been willing to discuss what we know and to try to resolve this."

Critics have complained the Beijing pact does not directly address North Korea's existing plutonium stockpile or nuclear bombs, or its suspected uranium programme.

US Vice President Dick Cheney said Friday in Australia that the deal was a hopeful step towards a better future for the North Korean people.

But he added: "We go into this deal with our eyes open. In light of North Korea's missile tests last July, its nuclear test in October and its record of proliferation and human rights abuses, the regime in Pyongyang has much to prove."

Cheney Criticizes China's Arms Buildup (AP)

By Rohan Sullivan

AP, February 23, 2007

Vice President Dick Cheney said Friday that China's recent anti-satellite weapons test and a rapid military buildup were "not consistent" with its stated aim of a peaceful rise as a global power.

Speaking in Sydney, Cheney also expressed wariness about North Korea's commitment to a landmark deal announced last week on ending the country's nuclear programs.

As anti-war demonstrators clashed with police outside the hotel where Cheney was speaking, the vice president also expressed gratitude to Australia for sending troops to the Iraq war, which he said must be won or terrorists would be emboldened worldwide.

Cheney praised China for playing an "especially important" role in the six-nation negotiations that resulted in the North Korea deal, under which the North is to seal its main nuclear reactor and allow international inspections in exchange for fuel oil.

"Other actions by the Chinese government send a different message," Cheney told the Australian-American Leadership Dialogue, a private organization that promotes ties between the two countries.

"Last month's anti-satellite test, China's continued fast-paced military buildup are less constructive and are not consistent with China's stated goal of a peaceful rise," he said.

The Chinese Foreign Ministry did not immediately respond to a faxed request for comment on Cheney's remarks. Many government offices were closed Friday for the weeklong Lunar New Year holiday.

Beijing previously said its Jan. 11 destruction of a defunct weather satellite was for scientific purposes, but the test was widely criticized as a provocative demonstration of China's growing military clout.

DOJ_NMG_0135755

Washington and key Asian allies such as Japan say the test — which made China only the third nation after the United States and Russia to use weapons beyond the atmosphere — undermined efforts to keep weapons out of space. Beijing countered by saying the United States is blocking a possible global treaty that would ban weapons in space.

China's military has grown rapidly along with its economy in recent years, prompting concern in Washington that the balance of military power in the Pacific could start to shift away from the United States.

Regarding the North Korea deal, Cheney said it represented "a first hopeful step" that would "bring us closer" to a nuclear-free Korean peninsula — but he also sounded a note of caution.

"We go into this deal with our eyes open," he said. "In light of North Korea's missile test last July, its nuclear test in October and its record of proliferation and human rights abuses, the regime in Pyongyang has much to prove."

Washington and key Asian allies such as Japan have expressed concern that China's Jan. 11 firing of a missile at a defunct weather satellite — making it only the third nation after the United States and Russia to use weapons beyond the Earth's atmosphere — undermined efforts to keep weapons out of space. China says the test was for scientific purposes.

Also, China said in late December it was strengthening its military to thwart any attempt by Taiwan to push for independence, but vowed that it was committed to the peaceful development of its 2.3 million-strong military, the world's largest.

Cheney praised Prime Minister John Howard, who sent 2,000 troops to join the U.S.-led invasion of Iraq, saying Australians had won the respect of the world through their support of the fight against terror.

He said that if the U.S.-led coalition leaves Iraq before domestic forces can handle security, radical factions would battle for control, and the violence would spread throughout the country and beyond.

"Having tasted victory in Iraq, jihadists would look for new missions," joining the Taliban fighting in Afghanistan and spreading "sorrow and discord" across the Middle East and further afield, he said.

"Such chaos and mounting danger does not have to occur, it is however the enemy's objective," Cheney said. "For the sake of our own long-term security, we have a duty to stand in their way."

Outside, protesters waved placards saying "Go home Cheney" and "Bring the troops home." Three people were arrested as police clashed with about 50 demonstrators. Ten people were arrested at a similar demonstration shortly before Cheney arrived in Australia late Thursday.

Cheney was to hold talks Saturday with Howard, a staunch ally of Washington who has become a rarity by offering more, not fewer, troops for Iraq and Afghanistan.

Iraq, Afghanistan and North Korea are expected to dominate the talks with Howard, who is under increasing political pressure to set an exit strategy for the 1,400 Australian troops who remain in and around Iraq.

Among the protesters in Sydney on Friday was former Guantanamo Bay detainee Mamdouh Habib, who called for the release of the lone Australian still held at the U.S. naval base at Cuba, David Hicks. A group of three men held a counter-protest nearby with a banner reading: "The world needs more men like Dick Cheney — we love America."

Cheney and Howard are expected to discuss Hicks, a former kangaroo skinner captured in Afghanistan who has been locked up without trial at Guantanamo for more than five years.

Under growing public pressure, and with Hicks looming as an issue at elections due later this year, Howard has begun pushing U.S. officials to deal with Hicks' case more quickly.

VOA Says Goodbye To Uzbek, Other Tongues (WP)

By Delphine Schrank

The Washington Post, February 23, 2007

Back home on a farm in Uzbekistan, Navbahor Imamova's mother and siblings crowd around their cranky, Soviet-made radio and tune in daily to Voice of America broadcasts in Uzbek. Though frequently scrambled by Chinese martial music, the VOA journalist said, the broadcast is her family's chief source of credible, uncensored foreign news in the authoritarian Central Asian country.

But that source is due to be silenced. For the second year running, the board overseeing the government-funded VOA has plans to wipe out news in several languages, including its flagship English-language "News Now" programming.

DOJ_NMG_0135756

"This is big," said Imamova, one of seven people who put together the Uzbek service from Washington. "It's not a secret that Uzbekistan is one of the most politically oppressed countries. There's not a single outlet that can call itself independent there."

The Broadcast Board of Governors, which oversees VOA and six other government-funded international broadcasters, said this month that the cutbacks are being made in an effort to shift resources to new technology and "critical audiences" in the Middle East, North Korea, Somalia and Cuba.

"The current budget climate requires that we utilize our funds to effectively adapt to changing viewing habits and new technology, and respond to the nation's most immediate and vital national security challenges," the board said in a statement.

The board's $668.2 million budget request calls for a 3.8 percent increase from its anticipated fiscal 2007 level. The increase would fund the expansion of programming to North Korea, Iran, Afghanistan and Pakistan, as well as to the Arab-language satellite network Alhurra TV and its pop music and news counterpart, Radio Sawa.

Board spokesman Larry Hart said the decision to scrap the services largely reflects their diminishing audiences. "The world has changed, and our independent surveys show year after year that fewer and fewer people use shortwave radio," Hart said. "Now, that differs dramatically in different parts of the world. But satellite TV, FM radio and the Internet are the way of the future."

VOA employees and advocates counter that their programming is a model of open media and a crucial source of trustworthy news and information for decision makers and influential figures worldwide, a demographic that is difficult to quantify.

Since VOA's inaugural radio broadcast into Nazi Germany 65 years ago, the network has expanded into television and across the globe, and in its heyday, it carried programming in more than 50 languages. In the past few years, services were cut in 10 former Soviet bloc countries that have since joined the European Union. Other services have come and gone only to appear again.

VOA advocates and employees said that among the more dire changes being planned is elimination of "News Now," which feeds the broadcaster's 45 language services and includes reports from Washington and around the world. VOA would continue to offer Web-based English-language content, as well as English to sub-Saharan Africa and news for listeners with a limited English vocabulary.

"This is the VOA. Everything else is patterned on it. This has been our identity since 1942," said Neil Currie, a senior anchor with "News Now" and 23-year veteran of the agency. The English-language program has already suffered the effects of drastic cuts, he said, with staff whittled down in the past two years from more than 50 people to 14. Broadcasts have been reduced dramatically. On Sundays, Currie said, he is alone in the VOA newsroom putting together hours' worth of news.

"It is very hard to think of a parallel to killing the English-language services of VOA America. I can't think of an analogy absurd enough," said Sanford J. Ungar, president of Goucher College in Maryland and VOA's director from 1999 to 2001. "Would Radio Moscow stop broadcasting in Russian? Would Radio Beijing stop broadcasting in Chinese? Radio France in French? The BBC in English?"

Alan L. Heil Jr., a former deputy director of VOA and author of "Voice of America: A History," said, "We need Voice of America more than ever, and yet here we are silencing ourselves on radio." For Heil, the plan is particularly shortsighted when English is spoken by more than a quarter of the world's population and when Russia, China, Iran and al-Jazeera are expanding their TV and Internet programming in English.

Based on figures from the research group InterMedia Survey Institute, Heil calculated that total audience losses worldwide under the budget plan could run to 18.5 million listeners, with 10.5 million lost for the English broadcasts alone.

But Hart, the broadcast board's spokesman, said the priority is to use the limited funds available to target information-deprived indigenous speakers in their own languages, rather than English-speakers traveling abroad. "People who are information-deprived or who don't have access to satellite TV or who don't have hookups to the BBC or CNN -- they don't speak English, and those are the people we need to reach," he said.

Ungar, who was director of VOA when it started offering 24-hour news on the Internet, does not dispute the value of new technology. "But VOA radio is a great bargain," he said. "It costs so little to do it, and is vastly less expensive than TV."

Advocates say shortwave radio should hardly be dismissed as an anachronism. Battery-operated radios are cheap and easy to procure worldwide. Not so with satellite TVs or even Internet service, both of which can be blocked more easily and efficiently than shortwave frequencies. And unlike FM, which transmits up to 75 miles, shortwave can be broadcast over vast distances.

DOJ_NMG_0135757

VOA advocates contend that the broadcast board has opted to bulldoze the agency rather than explore alternatives, including asking for greater appropriations to cover the cost of the doomed services, which come to $22 million, or about 3.5 percent of the budget.

For Imamova, the broadcaster in the Uzbek service, the plan is devastating. "VOA Uzbek is the only source of U.S. and international news in the region. It is a critical service," especially in light of a crackdown on news media in Uzbekistan, she said, adding that her comments reflect her personal views.

The Uzbek government has crippled reception of the multimedia service, which costs VOA $600,000 a year and also reaches Kazakhstan, Tajikistan and parts of China. But researcher InterMedia also notes the likelihood of a significant audience undercount because of respondent wariness in the country.

But virtually all the countries listed for eliminations are critical, Heil said. Russian President Vladimir Putin "could pull the plug on TV any day, the Balkans are something of a tinderbox with the Kosovo crisis coming to a head, and Tibetan services are absolutely critical in a country with no other independent information."

"You have to keep up with new technology, but at the same time you need a measured approach to keep your audience base," Heil added. "The stronger you are as a news gatherer, the closer you come to fulfilling VOA's mission: 'The news may be good. The news may be bad. We shall tell you the truth.' "

Europeans' Chill Deepens On US Policy (CSM)

By Robert Marquand

The Christian Science Monitor, February 23, 2007

The resignation of Italian Prime Minister Romano Prodi underscores the difficulty in Europe of governments trying to support US foreign policy on terror while at the same time pleasing their own publics.

Mr. Prodi, who has been in office less than a year, stepped down Wednesday after he was unable to convince his parliament of the "profound difference" between sending Italian troops to Afghanistan and sending them to Iraq. Italy currently deploys 1,950 troops in Afghanistan as part of a NATO mission of some 30,000 soldiers from European states.

The Prodi drama came hours after Britain and Denmark announced the start of troop withdrawals from Iraq – a blow to the White House as it deploys an additional 21,000 soldiers to stabilize Baghdad. In a further departure from perfect alignment with US policy in the Middle East, British prime minister Tony Blair also said this week that he will consider dealing with the Palestinian group Hamas as part of a new "national unity" government in the occupied territories.

European capitals are wavering over how to deal with a US administration in its final two years, one saddled with multiple inconclusive wars and battles against terror.

Yet despite the crisis in Italy, and general dislike in Europe for US tactics in fighting terrorism, a fairly clear distinction continues to exist in elite circles between US-led Iraq and Afghan ventures.

Those distinctions have both practical and legal foundations: While a defeat of the US in Iraq might be troubling for the West, an accompanying defeat in Afghanistan would be "catastrophic," says a Brussels-based European diplomat.

"The war in Afghanistan is seen by Europeans as having a real basis in the events of 9/11, under UN rulings of the right of self-defense," says Adam Roberts, a professor at Oxford University, "and this is seen as different from the war in Iraq.

"In Afghanistan, efforts at transformation are multilateral, as distinct from Iraq," he adds. "In Afghanistan, 2 million refugees have returned, whereas in Iraq, 2 million refugees have left. There is still a strong tendency to draw these distinctions, despite European concern over US policy, which is very widespread."

The center-left Prodi government in Rome was always fragile, a nine-party coalition whose main agreement was its dislike of the previous center-right government of Silvio Berlusconi. Prodi decided to resign, it appears, after he was unable to achieve supporting votes from within his coalition for Italy's troops in Afghanistan or to follow through on a two-year-old deal with Washington to expand a military base in Vicenza.

DOJ_NMG_0135758

Still, growing negative perceptions in Italy over the US enterprise in the Middle East has been eroding many distinctions in the public mind between the Afghanistan and Iraq wars, according to French analyst Bernard Getta. Such perceptions deepened last week when a judge ordered that 25 suspected CIA operatives stand trial in Milan for kidnapping an Islamist cleric in 2003 and sending him to Egypt. On Feb. 18, tens of thousands of Italians marched in Vicenza.

In Britain, Mr. Blair's announcement Wednesday that he would forces in Basra by 1,600 as part of what may be a complete drawdown by the end of 2008 reflects a broad consensus about Iraq.

Blair emphasized the difference between relatively safer conditions in Basra and those in Baghdad, suggesting that British forces had played their part, and that "the next chapter ... will be written by Iraqis." But the Iraq deployment is increasingly less popular. Blair spoke with his heir apparent, Chancellor of the Exchequer Gordon Brown, sitting to his left; Mr. Brown is regarded as willing to take a more independent position vis-à-vis the White House.

In the case of the Palestinian territories, the US has said it won't deal with a unity government unless it abides by conditions set last year by the Quartet mediating group – Russia, the US, the EU, and the UN – that Hamas renounce violence and recognize Israel.

In Denmark, which will bring home all 460 ground troops from Iraq by summer, public opinion generally distinguishes between Iraq and Afghanistan, says Mogens Jakobsen, who runs Epinion, a polling firm in Copenhagen.

As in Britain, the Iraq war is losing traction among Danes.

"The British withdrawal gave the Danish government a window of opportunity to get out," Mr. Jakobsen says. "Popular support ... is dropping, and it is more difficult for the government to explain to the people why they are there. So the British action was a kind of fig leaf for the Danes."

In the past year, some Danes have become skeptical of their Afghan role. Mostly, this is over tensions with the US created by a Danish policy not to turn over Afghan prisoners to US forces. A perception exists that US troops have sometimes tortured prisoners in Afghanistan. But "the Afghan war is not ... high on the agenda of opposition," Jakobsen says.

Europe's pushback stems partly from frustration that until recently the US had not worked closely with its allies on the Continent. Yet most European foreign ministries, from Britain to Germany to France, are working closely with US allies on Afghanistan, the Iranian nuclear question, and the Middle East, and are now considering a controversial US missile-shield for central Europe.

Italy has had 61 governments in 62 years; its parliamentary system is rife with squabbling parties that often take uncompromising positions. It remains unclear whether the government will disband, leading to new elections. That would pave the way for another run by Mr. Berlusconi.

Thursday, however, President Giorgio Napolitano began polling parties to determine whether a new government can be formed in the immediate future.

An Upside-Down World (WSJ)

By Nick Cohen

The Wall Street Journal, February 23, 2007

LONDON -- The other day Ken Livingstone, the mayor of my hometown of London, organized a conference on Islam and the West. It was a carefully rigged affair in which handpicked speaker after handpicked speaker stood up and announced that the democracies were to blame for the tidal wave of murder sweeping the world. To provide a spurious air of balance, the organizers invited a few people who dissented from the line of the Muslim Brotherhood and its British allies. Agnès Poirier, a French feminist, was one of them, but she pulled out because although there were no special facilities for Christians, Hindus and Jews, Mr. Livingstone had provided separate prayer rooms for Muslim men and Muslim women.

She wanted to know: Does Ken Livingstone's idea of multiculturalism acknowledge and condone segregation? It clearly does, but what made this vignette of ethnic politics in a European city worth noting is that commentators for the BBC and nearly every newspaper here describe Mr. Livingstone as one of the most left-wing politicians in British public life. Hardly any of them notices the weirdness of an apparent socialist pandering to a reactionary strain of Islam, pushing its arguments and accepting its dictates.

DOJ_NMG_0135759

Mr. Livingstone's not alone. After suicide bombers massacred Londoners on July 7, 2005, leftish rather than conservative papers held British foreign policy responsible for the slaughters on the transport network. ("Blair's Bombs," ran the headline in my own leftish New Statesman.) In any university, you are more likely to hear campaigns for the rights of Muslim women derided by postmodernists than by crusty conservative dons. Our Stop the War coalition is an alliance of the white far left and the Islamist far right, and George Galloway, its leader, and the first allegedly "far left" MP to be elected to the British parliament in 50 years, is an admirer of Saddam Hussein and Hezbollah.

I could go on with specific examples, but the crucial point is the pervasive European attitude to the Iraq catastrophe. As al Qaeda, the Baathists and Shiite Islamists slaughter thousands, there is virtually no sense that their successes are our defeats. Iraqi socialists and trade unionists I know are close to despair. They turn for support to Europe, the home of liberalism, feminism and socialism, and find that rich democrats, liberals and feminists won't help them or even acknowledge their existence.

There were plenty of leftish people in the 20th century who excused communism, but they could at least say that communism was a left-wing idea. Now overwhelmingly and everywhere you find people who scream their heads off about the smallest sexist or racist remark, yet refuse to confront ultra-reactionary movements that explicitly reject every principle they profess to hold.

Why is the world upside down? In part, it is a measure of President Bush's failure that anti-Americanism has swept out of the intelligentsia and become mainstream in Britain. A country that was once the most pro-American in Western Europe now derides Tony Blair for sticking with the Atlantic alliance. But if Iraq has pummeled Mr. Blair's reputation, it has also shone a very harsh light on the British and European left. No one noticed it when the Berlin Wall came down, but the death of socialism gave people who called themselves "left wing" a paradoxical advantage. They no longer had a practical program they needed to defend and could go along with ultra-right movements that would once have been taboo. In moments of crisis, otherwise sane liberals will turn to these movements and be reassured by the professed leftism of the protest organizers that they are not making a nonsense of their beliefs.

If, that is, they have strong beliefs to abandon. In Europe and North America extreme versions of multiculturalism and identity politics have left a poisonous legacy. Far too many liberal-minded people think that is somehow culturally imperialist to criticize reactionary movements and ideas -- as long as they aren't European or American reactionary movements. This delusion is everywhere. Until very recently our Labour government was allowing its dealings with Britain's Muslim minority to be controlled by an unelected group, the Muslim Council of Britain, which stood for everything social democrats were against. In their desperate attempts to ingratiate themselves, ministers gave its leader a knighthood -- even though he had said that "death was too good" for Salman Rushdie, who happens to be a British citizen as well as a great novelist.

Beyond the contortions and betrayals of liberal and leftish thinking lies a simple emotion that I don't believe Americans take account of: an insidious fear that has produced the ideal conditions for appeasement. Radical Islam does worry Europeans but we are trying to prevent an explosion by going along with Islamist victimhood. We blame ourselves for the Islamist rage, in the hope that our admission of guilt will pacify our enemies. We are scared, but not scared enough to take a stand.

I hope conservative American readers come to Britain. But if you do, expect to find an upside-down world. People who call themselves liberals or leftists will argue with you, and when they have finished you may experience the strange realization that they have become far more reactionary than you have ever been.

Mr. Cohen, a columnist for the Observer and the New Statesman, is the author of "What's Left?: How Liberals Lost Their Way" (Fourth Estate, 2007).

A Foreign Policy Built On Do-Overs (NYT)

By Thomas L. Friedman

The New York Times, February 23, 2007

Watching the Bush team wrestle with Iran, North Korea and Iraq reminds me of something that used to be said of the Reagan administration: The right hand never knew what the far right hand was doing.

DOJ_NMG_0135760

In fact, my bet is that when the inside history of the Bush team is written, we will discover that, contrary to its carefully managed image of a disciplined core operating from consistent, conservative principles, it has actually been one of the most internally divided administrations — ever.

The only thing the Bush folks all agreed on was that they would never do anything Bill Clinton did. Beyond that, it's been a food fight. The trial of Scooter Libby, with its testimony about wars between the V.P.'s office and the White House, the White House and the C.I.A., and everyone against the State Department, proves that beyond a reasonable doubt.

When the former Bush U.N. ambassador John Bolton trashed the president's recent deal with North Korea as a "charade," though, he highlighted the biggest internal division of all within the Bush team: how to deal with rogue regimes like Iran, North Korea and Saddam's Iraq — whether to go for regime change or behavior change.

On Iran and North Korea, "this administration does not have clear policies, it has competing impulses," said Robert Litwak of the Wilson Center, who just published a smart book on this theme: "Regime Change: U.S. Strategy Through the Prism of 9/11." "The administration's mantra is 'all options are on the table.' But the dilemma is that too many objectives are on the table as well."

Because this administration was divided for so long on Iran and North Korea, over regime change or behavior change, it got neither. All it got was that Iran and North Korea both went out and bought Bush insurance: a nuclear weapons program.

President Bush obviously recognizes that and is now trying to remedy it. Bill Clinton was criticized for taking more golf mulligans — do-overs — than any other president. Mr. Bush will be remembered for taking more foreign policy mulligans than any other president.

On North Korea, the president has finally decided to focus purely on changing behavior. He struck a very sensible deal last week with Kim Jong Il to take his country off our terrorism list and normalize relations, provided Mr. Kim gives up his nukes.

But we could have had a similar deal years ago — when North Korea had only two nukes — had the Bush team not been wrangling with itself over regime change or behavior change. While it wrangled, Mr. Kim built up his nuclear arsenal, adding six to 12 more bombs. If this deal is carried out, which is still uncertain, the wasted years will not have been a disaster. If it isn't carried out, they will have been very costly.

Why do you think that a year after Mr. Bush told us we were "addicted to oil" we still have no serious plan to end that addiction? Because the market fundamentalists in his White House — led by Dick Cheney, who opposes any government effort to impose carbon caps or taxes to promote alternative energies, à la California — keep blocking the market pragmatists who do. And Mr. Bush won't intervene.

The irony of Iraq is that it's the one place where Mr. Bush decisively chose regime change, but he then executed it so poorly, with insufficient troops, that Iraq never stood a chance. If Don Rumsfeld and Dick Cheney had spent as much time plotting the toppling of Saddam Hussein as they did the toppling of Colin Powell, Iraq today would be Switzerland. Today's Bush troop surge in Iraq is just another mulligan — the president's trying to do in 2007 what he should have done in 2003. In between, we've paid a huge price.

How about we avoid a mulligan on Iran? Let's put a clear deal on the table: full diplomatic relations, security guarantees and thousands of student visas if Iran puts its nuclear program under U.N. inspection and stops supporting terrorism. If not: more sanctions and isolation. Such an offer would at least get us some leverage, unite us more with our allies outside Iran, energize our allies inside Iran and force some excruciating choices on Iran's leaders.

"Resolving the contradiction in Washington will sharpen the contradiction in Tehran," Mr. Litwak argued. "Taking regime change off the table in America will put behavior change on the table in Iran."

I guess we should be thankful that Mr. Bush is trying to fix some of his mistakes, but we have paid a huge, unnecessary price for his learning curve. Which is why it's always best to get it right the first time. The best golfers never take mulligans, and the best presidents never need them.

Russia And US Play Down Missile Dispute (FT)

By Neil Buckley And Hugh Williamson

Financial Times, February 23, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0135761

Senior US and Russian officials sought to play down their differences on Thursday after two weeks that have seen a sharp cooling in relations between their countries.

On a visit to Moscow, Stephen Hadley, the US national security adviser, said he did not see a speech by President Vladimir Putin of Russia in Munich this month that was sharply critical of US "unilateralism" as a return to cold war-style confrontation.

He also reiterated assurances that Washington's planned missile defence system, parts of which the US wants to locate in eastern Europe, was not aimed at Russia but at a potential threat from Iran or other rogue states.

Igor Ivanov, Mr Hadley's counterpart as head of Russia's national security council, acknowledged there were disagreements between the two countries but said it was important that these should be resolved by dialogue.

Mr Hadley also held talks with Mr Putin during a visit that seemed designed to project a more conciliatory stance after the sharp exchanges that have taken place since the Russian president's Munich address.

"We do not see President Putin's speech as an invitation to confrontation and do not believe it was made with that intention," Mr Hadley said.

Sergei Yastrzhembsky, Mr Putin's envoy to the European Union, described the Munich speech as a "cold shower" rather than a declaration of cold war. He told Rossiiskaya Gazeta, a government daily, the speech brought into the open the kind of issues usually discussed behind closed doors.

"We are no longer in ideological conflict with the west," Mr Yastrzhembsky added. "Russia is a totally different country."

But the dispute over the planned US missile defence system continued to simmer on Thursday. Sergei Lavrov, Russia's foreign minister, said Moscow's complaints arose from concerns on how such defences were being handled between Russia and the west. He said western countries in the Nato-Russia Council, which deals with military ties between Moscow and the alliance, had insisted on "calling a break" in talks on co-operation on missile defence.

The pause in consultations appeared to have been "tailor-made to coincide with" the US move to position parts of its national missile system in eastern Europe, he complained.

Frank-Walter Steinmeier, Germany's foreign minister, said it was important to avoid "anti-American or anti-Russian reflexes" when tackling this issue.

Russia, US Advisers Pledge Cooperation (AP)

By Maria Danilova

AP, February 23, 2007

The U.S. national security adviser sought Thursday to ease Russian concerns about American intentions, saying he did not consider a fiery speech by President Vladimir Putin to have been a sign of confrontation, and reiterating reassurances about U.S. missile defense plans.

Washington and Moscow have been trading heated criticism over issues including U.S. plans to deploy elements of a national missile defense system in former Soviet satellites in Europe.

At a security conference this month in Germany, Putin said the United States "has overstepped its national borders in every way" and is fostering a global arms race — an unusually clear, comprehensive account of Kremlin complaints about U.S. conduct.

U.S. National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley played down speculation that the remarks heralded a return to Cold War-style confrontation.

"We do not read President Putin's comments in any way ... as an invitation to confrontation," the Interfax news agency quoted Hadley as telling Russian reporters during his visit to Moscow, which included a meeting with Putin.

U.S. and other Western journalists were not invited to be present when he made the remarks, which suggests they were aimed at a Russian audience.

Hadley repeated assurances that planned missile defense sites in Poland and the Czech Republic would be aimed at countering a potential threat from Iran, and constituted no threat to Russia.

"It is not directed in any way against Russia," Interfax quoted him as saying.

DOJ_NMG_0135762

According to Interfax, he also indicated the United States has no plans to deploy missile-defense components in Ukraine, which shares a long border with Russia.

Putin and other Russian officials have rejected the assurance that the system would be meant to combat an Iranian threat.

At a meeting between Hadley and his Russian counterpart, both men acknowledged disagreements but pledged to work closely together to overcome them and reach common goals.

Russian Security Council Secretary Igor Ivanov said the two countries should cooperate closely in areas such as fighting international terrorism and striving for global peace.

"This does not mean that our relations are cloudless — there are disagreements, there are misunderstandings, including on security matters. That is why it is very important that the dialogue that we have continues to develop at all levels and allows us to deal with those issues so that they don't damage bilateral relations," Ivanov said after the Kremlin meeting.

Hadley also met with Sergei Ivanov and Dmitry Medvedev, two first vice-premiers who are seen as the leading potential candidates to succeed Putin in 2008.

Hadley, who is visiting several European capitals this week amid a flurry of international diplomacy over Iran's nuclear program, the persistent Mideast unrest and other issues, also said Moscow and Washington share goals and should continue to seek common ground when they disagree.

"Where we have disagreements we've been able to talk candidly about them and work together constructively," he said.

Undersecretary of State Nicholas Burns, speaking Wednesday in Washington, described Putin's speech as "extraordinary."

Putin aide Sergei Yastrzhembsky, suggested Thursday that Putin's speech was not a statement of mistrust and animosity toward the United States but a sign of what Russia feels is its resurgence in the international arena after years of post-Soviet decline.

"Putin very clearly said one simple thing: 'Gentlemen, Russia has returned, it should be reckoned with,'" Yastrzhembsky was quoted as saying by the RIA-Novosti news agency.

Philippine Military Is Linked To Killings (NYT)

By The New York Times

The New York Times, February 23, 2007

MANILA, Feb. 22 — A commission investigating political murder in the Philippines has found that members of the armed forces were responsible for “an undetermined number of killings” and that senior officers could be held accountable.

Jose Melo, a retired Supreme Court justice, conducted the inquiry. The report, released on Thursday, said military officials had allowed, tolerated and even encouraged the murders of political activists, and that the government of President Gloria Macapagal Arroyo had not done enough to stem the violence.

It singled out a retired major general, Jovito Palparan, who leftist and human rights groups have said was behind many of the abuses. He has long denied a role in the abuses.

The military chief of staff, Gen. Hermogenes Esperon, called the commission’s conclusions “strained, unfair and a blank accusation.”

Political Killings Traced To Philippine Military (CSM)

By Simon Montlake

The Christian Science Monitor, February 23, 2007

These days, Boy Facunla is afraid to return home to the sun-drenched rice paddies of central Luzon, the region where he raised a family of eight and became active in local left-wing politics. Now, he spends his days hiding out in a cramped Manila office, fearing that a spate of unexpected murders in his community may one day turn on him.

"I haven't been home in two years. I'm the number one target in my area," he says in an interview held at the office of a farmers' union. "We think it's the military behind these killings."

Mr. Facunla is not alone in his suspicions. Since 2001, when President Gloria Macapagal Arroyo took office with the backing of the powerful military, hundreds of left-wing activists, unionists, farmers, human rights workers, and clergy have been slain, sparking accusations of a systematic, nationwide campaign to silence those who challenge the status quo.

DOJ_NMG_0135763

A government commission headed by retired Supreme Court judge Jose Melo issued a long-awaited report Thursday that put the blame for much of the violence on the Philippine military. The damning report came one day after a visiting United Nations investigator said the military was in a "state of denial" about its involvement in the killings.

However, Philip Alston, a law professor at New York University and the UN's special rapporteur on extrajudicial killings, said that the "death squads" weren't state sanctioned.

"I do not believe that there's a policy at the top designed to direct these killings," he told a press conference at the end of a 10-day trip by the invitation of the Philippine government.

The Melo commission concurred, saying elements in the military had acted outside the law and called for an independent agency to investigate the security forces.

The military swung back at the commission, calling the report "strained, unfair, and a blank accusation."

"I believe that Mr. Alston might be in a state of denial himself," said Gen. Hermogenes Esperon at a news conference on Wednesday.

Ms. Arroyo has proposed creating special courts to try cases of extrajudicial killings. But ending a culture of impunity in the military won't be easy, not least because of its tight hold on local and national politics. It has also garnered substantial US assistance since 2001 for its war on terror, and its elite troops are being trained by US Special Forces.

The commission's findings are likely to increase pressure on Arroyo. Midterm elections in May could tip the balance in Congress against her. The president's opponents already tried unsuccessfully to impeach her once in 2005 over election fraud allegations.

Internal purges or military death squads?

Security officials reject claims of military death squads, calling them left-wing propaganda by groups that they consider to be fronts for the outlawed Communist Party of the Philippines (CPP) and its armed wing, the New People's Army (NPA). Indeed, while the US is fixated on the fight against Islamic extremists in the southern Philippines, Arroyo's advisers say the greater threat comes from Communist insurgents that roam across the country.

There is also disagreement over the extent of the violence. Karapatan, a leftist human rights watchdog, has recorded over 800 killings since 2001, but observers say that number is inflated and includes dozens of nonpolitical murders and undocumented cases. Alston declined to provide an estimate, but said the total was "high enough to be distressing."

A police task force set up last year to probe the violence has pinned much of the blame on the CPP itself. Deputy Director General Avelino Razon, who oversees the task force, says that most documented killings of left-wing activists were carried out by Communist forces, not the security forces.

"We think they're doing a series of purges, and this is timed during a government campaign against their insurgency," he says, referring to an all-out war that Arroyo declared last year against the CPP.

General Razon says police and Army personnel were involved in a few murder cases, but insists they were acting alone. "If we have evidence of orders from above, we would file charges against the officer issuing the orders," he says.

Unsurprisingly, this is vigorously disputed by leftist groups who accuse the police of a whitewash. Teodoro Casino is one of six left-wing lawmakers who were charged with rebellion last year after Arroyo declared a state of emergency. A court later overturned the charges. Mr. Casino says the administration's hand is clearly seen in the violence.

"You can't attribute widespread killings to a few generals. It has to go all the way up. It's the government's counterinsurgency policy that's provided the environment for these human rights abuses to take place," he says.

Military killings may lend support to leftists

Casino's complaint is echoed not only in political circles but also within the influential Roman Catholic church. Bishop Deogracias Iniguez, head of public affairs for the Catholic Bishops Conference of the Philippines, says Arroyo, a devout Catholic, is quick to smear her opponents. Many priests have been accused of Communist sympathies in the past – some of whom have turned up dead.

"In the Philippines, if you are against the government, then you're associated with the left-wing groups," he says.

DOJ_NMG_0135764

The presence of legal leftist organizations in the Philippines is a legacy of a 1990s peace initiative to bring activists into the political arena and cut ties with armed insurgents. Security officials say these ties persist and accuse left-wing lawmakers of channeling Congressional funds to their comrades. Casino denies this accusation.

Even Arroyo's critics concede that a tough response is needed to counter the NPA and its frequent attacks on government targets. But declaring all-out war on Communists and tarring all activists with the same brush isn't the way forward, says Randy David, a newspaper columnist and sociologist at the University of the Philippines.

"This is a terrible approach to the insurgency. Those who are already in the underground may even welcome this. It focuses attention on their struggle, and in the long term it forces people to go underground," he says.

Chavez Builds His Sphere Of Influence (WP)

By Juan Forero And Peter S. Goodman

The Washington Post, February 23, 2007

CARACAS, Venezuela President Hugo Chavez of Venezuela has long pledged to buck Washington-backed economic policies in Latin America. Now, two months after winning reelection and consolidating his hold on the country with new powers to rule by decree, he is strengthening economic ties in the region in a bid to limit U.S. influence.

Chavez recently announced that his government would build housing, a highway and an oil refinery in Nicaragua, part of an aid package that would benefit one of Washington's most tenacious Cold War adversaries, President Daniel Ortega.

Farther south, Venezuela has pledged to provide Ecuador with $1 billion in credit, a gesture that would soften the blow if that country's leftist government follows through on its threat to default on foreign debt payments. And, along with President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad of Iran, a foe of the Bush administration, Chavez has announced a $2 billion international investment fund for Latin America.

Taken together, economists and others who track the country's affairs say, the investments signify an effort by Venezuela to curb the reach of the U.S. government, whose influence has waned in Latin America. For Chavez, the goal is nothing less than to kill the so-called Washington consensus, the economic prescriptions championed by the International Monetary Fund and the U.S. Treasury, which press governments to limit spending, raise interest rates and open their economies to foreign trade and investment.

Backing such economic principles as privatization and trade liberalization, the consensus rooted out bloated bureaucracies and helped tame hyper-inflation. Yet even those countries that have run their economies along Washington consensus lines have generally seen disappointing rates of economic growth and deepening poverty. The electoral success of such leftist leaders as Chavez, Ortega, Bolivia's Evo Morales and Ecuador's Rafael Correa is in part the result of the failure of previous policies to generate growth and raise incomes, economists say.

"All of this IMF stuff has actually benefited a very small sector of our economies," said Hernando de Soto, a Peruvian economist who champions free markets and has criticized elements of Chavez's political program. "That's where Chavez and company come in, because they pick up on the resentment."

Chavez's campaign to persuade countries to break with fiscal orthodoxy, a strategy funded by revenue from the largest oil reserves in the Americas, has had mixed success. Some of the region's most important economies -- Mexico, Brazil, Chile, Colombia and Peru -- maintain solid relations with multilateral lenders and continue to follow market-oriented principles, such as welcoming foreign investment, limiting government spending and attacking inflation.

For its part, the United States still has enormous influence in and close ties with most Latin American countries. Free-trade agreements now cover nearly two-thirds of economic output in the Americas, according to Thomas A. Shannon Jr., assistant secretary of state for Western Hemisphere affairs. And although voters in the region have increasingly elected leftist governments in the past several years, most of them are like those headed by Luiz Inacio Lula da Silva in Brazil and Michelle Bachelet in Chile -- concerned about social inequality but fiscally austere and on friendly terms with Wall Street.

Although Chavez frequently travels to foreign capitals to lambaste Washington, it's not so clear that Latin Americans favor the Venezuelan president's prescriptions, even if their governments are happy to accept his aid. According to a recent survey of 20,200 people in 18 countries by LatinobarÃ³metro, a Chilean polling firm, most Latin Americans lumped Chavez with Fidel

DOJ_NMG_0135765

Castro and President Bush as bad leaders, citing Brazil's Lula and Chile's Bachelet as the best. And most of those polled classified themselves as political moderates .

Still, U.S. efforts to reach a free-trade agreement with South America's two biggest economic powers, Brazil and Argentina, are stalled, and Washington's efforts to influence economic policies through the IMF and its sister organization, the World Bank, have diminished.

Chavez vs. the IMF

In a policy marked by 1960s-style rhetoric, Chavez is promising to "liberate" Latin America from the "imperialist North American plot" to enslave the region, as he put it recently during the inauguration of Correa in Ecuador. Given new powers to pass economic decrees for 18 months, the Venezuelan president has a free hand to control his country's purse strings.

"In Latin America and the Caribbean, there's more consciousness that these financial organizations are a curse that have taken our countries to hunger, misery and exploitation," said Sal Ortega, a member of the Venezuelan National Assembly's foreign relations committee.

Economists say other factors have helped leaders sever ties with the IMF, perhaps most notably the booming commodity prices that have filled government coffers from Bogota to Buenos Aires with international reserves and led to three years of robust economic growth. "The region doesn't need IMF financing, and we're happy about that," said Anoop Singh, director of the IMF's Western Hemisphere department. "The main reason is that the world economy is healthy, commodity prices are high and countries in the region are generally following much stronger policies than during previous expansions."

Chavez is most closely allied with those governments furthest from Washington's reach, including Cuba, which each year gets as much as $2 billion worth of cut-rate oil from Venezuela. He has also found allies in newly ascendant, like-minded political leaders: Ortega and Correa took office in January, and another beneficiary of Venezuelan aid, Bolivia's Morales, who rose to prominence opposing globalization, took office in January 2006.

Some analysts supportive of Chavez's policies, like Mark Weisbrot, co-director of the Center for Economic and Policy Research in Washington, contend that Venezuelan aid has made a difference for countries in the region. They point to Latin America's poor growth in the 1990s, when privatizations, pension cuts and other austerity measures prescribed by Washington were in full swing.

"Venezuela has added an alternative source of financing without policy conditions," Weisbrot said. "This has given governments wanting to avoid IMF conditions another option, as well as increased bargaining power with international financial institutions."

In the past two years, Argentina, Bolivia, Brazil and Nicaragua have all paid off IMF loans or let lapse IMF agreements that imposed significant strictures on their governments. Among countries in Central and South America, only Paraguay, Peru and Honduras still have major agreements with the IMF, though Nicaragua has said it will negotiate a new one.

Data from the Penn World Table, an analytical unit at the University of Pennsylvania, highlight the economic difficulties that are driving some of Latin America's politics these days. In five Latin American countries that have allied themselves with Chavez -- Venezuela, Bolivia, Argentina, Ecuador and Nicaragua -- the data show that from 1980 through 2003, economic output per person shrank by more than 10 percent, when adjusted for inflation and relative purchasing power. That's a sharp contrast to the 40 percent economic growth those countries recorded from 1960 to 1979.

In Venezuela, Chavez has nationalized industries and tapped the country's oil wealth to expand public health and educational programs aimed at the poor. He has directed his aid dollars toward enabling other countries to cut ties with the IMF and similarly disregard the Washington consensus, nationalizing industries and boosting social spending even while risking inflation -- a course the IMF would not have allowed.A New Era?

The amount of Venezuelan aid is hard to quantify. The Center of Economic Investigations, a consulting firm in Caracas, the capital, has kept track of Chavez's frequent pronouncements and says that in 2006, he pledged $47 billion in aid and agreements -- impossible to deliver considering that Venezuela's annual budget hovers around $50 billion. Still, the country's central bank recorded billions spent on foreign bonds and other investments in the first nine months of last year, dwarfing the amount the United States offers in assistance to Latin America.

DOJ_NMG_0135766

In Venezuela, the closer ties to Ecuador and Nicaragua, coupled with ChÃ¡vez's recent announcements that he will nationalize utilities and take greater control of oil projects at the expense of multinational corporations, has enthralled supporters who believe the country is in the vanguard of a new era in Latin America. Venezuela is proposing a new multinational bank, a Bank of the South, to replace Washington-based lenders.

"We are distancing ourselves fundamentally from the imperial pretensions of the United States," said Haiman El Troudi, a former chief of staff to Chavez who studies economic issues at the state-funded International Miranda Center in Caracas. "The leftist, progressive thought is thinking the same, thinking of human beings, the installation of new social relations to get along, thinking of the conditions of people's lives and people's culture."

The Venezuelan model, which is predicated on a break with all multinational institutions with Washington ties, has plainly gathered steam in some Latin American countries.

Last year, Argentina, recovering after its 2001 economic collapse by ignoring some crucial aspects of IMF advice, paid off the last of the $10 billion it owed the fund. It was aided by Venezuela, which had bought $2.5 billion in Argentine debt.

In Bolivia, Morales nationalized the gas industry and renegotiated agreements with foreign investors -- measures opposed by orthodox economists. Last March, after spending nearly two decades under the strictures of an IMF program, Bolivia let its agreement with the fund end. Meanwhile, Venezuela has committed more than $140 million in loans and grants while pledging to invest as much as $1.5 billion in Bolivia's gas industry in coming years.

Bolivian leaders said Venezuelan aid comes with fewer strings attached. "In the case of the United States, we're locked into specific areas -- aid for roads, aid for health, aid for electricity," Ãlvaro GarcÃ-a Linera, the vice president, said in an interview in his office. The Venezuelan aid "allows us greater flexibility to choose projects with more productive impact, especially those ventures that include a state presence."

With Venezuela offering loans, Ecuador, too, has moved to cut back its ties to the IMF and related lenders. The Correa administration said it would not sign an agreement allowing the fund to monitor the government's economic plan.

The question now is how long Venezuela can maintain the aid. Although the economy is growing thanks to high oil prices, it has little private investment and creates few new jobs. And, true to the predictions of economists who are skeptical of the Chavez model, inflation is skyrocketing -- so much so that Chavez recently threatened to nationalize grocery stores if they did not limit price increases.

"I don't know if Venezuela can simultaneously sustain internal spending and external spending at the level it has until now," said Teodoro Petkoff, a former leftist guerrilla and a Chavez opponent who runs a newspaper in Caracas. "I've said it before -- this year, the economy is going to begin to cost Chavez."

Venezuela Rivals U.S. In Aid To Bolivia (NYT)

By Simon Romero

New York Times, February 23, 2007

LA PAZ, Bolivia — To understand Venezuela's growing influence here, consider that more than two dozen ambassadors are in this capital city, including those of Bolivia's leading trading partners like Brazil, the United States and Argentina. Yet none enjoy the direct conduit that the Venezuelan ambassador, Julio Montes, has established with President Evo Morales.

Mr. Montes often accompanies Mr. Morales on domestic and international trips on executive jets provided by Venezuela's national oil company, say officials who have seen them traveling together. On many days Mr. Montes, who arrived in La Paz a year ago, can be found at the presidential palace huddled in meetings with Mr. Morales or the president's top aides.

Since Mr. Morales became president little more than a year ago, Venezuela has quickly come to rival the United States as Bolivia's main patron. It has provided assistance for the army, cattle ranches, soybean cultivation, microfinance projects, urban sanitation companies and the oil industry.

Perhaps most important to Washington, despite its opposition, Venezuelan financial assistance has helped Bolivia push ahead with plans to increase exports of its industrial production of coca, the main ingredient in cocaine.

The coca financing plan has helped Venezuela accomplish one of its foreign policy goals: limiting the regional influence of the United States, which for years has provided Bolivia with millions of dollars in aid in an effort to curb coca production. The United States recently cut its drug enforcement aid to Bolivia by about 25 percent, to $33.8 million, after Mr. Morales acknowledged that the size of the country's coca-growing areas were about double official estimates.

DOJ_NMG_0135767

A senior American official here, speaking anonymously out of concern that Bolivia's already fragile relations with the United States could erode further, said it was difficult to know the exact amount of Venezuelan aid because many of the agreements between Venezuela and Bolivia were not made public.

Citing Mr. Morales's efforts to assert greater government control over the energy industry and to rush a military agreement with Venezuela through the Bolivian Congress, the American official said, "It is clear that Venezuela has strongly influenced policy in Bolivia."

Analysts who have reviewed the various Venezuelan assistance projects say the total may surpass the $120 million in antidrug and humanitarian assistance from the United States, which made Bolivia one of the largest recipients in the world of aid from Washington per capita.

[A report in the Venezuelan newspaper El Nacional over the weekend of Feb. 17-18 said President Hugo Chávez had approved a $100 million assistance fund for Bolivia, though it was not clear whether that included assistance for military or petroleum projects.

["What we are doing in Bolivia is the same that Cuba has done in Venezuela," Mr. Montes told El Nacional, referring to the thousands of Cuban doctors and social workers who had been sent to Venezuela. "The difference is that the greatest resource of the Cubans is their human capital. We have the possibility to help our Bolivian brothers with economic resources."]

Not all are pleased with Venezuela's new role. "We've become a client state of Venezuela, in what is a new form of imperialism," said Óscar Ortiz, an opposition senator with the Podemos Party who has publicly criticized Bolivia's relationship with Venezuela.

Mr. Ortiz and other opposition legislators have been particularly critical of Venezuelan ambitions that they believe may conflict with Bolivia's interests.

For instance, even as Venezuela advises Y.P.F.B., Bolivia's national energy company, in its efforts to assert greater control over ventures with foreign energy companies, Venezuela has moved forward with its own plans to build a pipeline that would export gas to Brazil, currently the main customer for Bolivian gas.

Political supporters of Mr. Morales argue that the alliance with Venezuela has allowed Bolivia to avoid some of the potentially detrimental effects of United States trade and drug policies in Latin America.

"Our comrades in Venezuela are rescuing our way of life," said Jerónimo Meneces Mollo, director of coca industrialization for Bolivia's government, which is receiving $250,000 in financing from Venezuela to build two coca-processing plants that will produce coca tea for exclusive export to the Venezuelan market. "No one but Hugo Chávez is brave enough to do this."

Others point to a prospective trade agreement between Colombia and the United States that could ease the entry of American soybean exports to Colombia and potentially deprive Bolivian farmers of one of their key markets.

In a boon to Mr. Morales's government, Venezuela answered the threat by announcing that it would purchase a large portion of Bolivia's soybean crop. Venezuela also says it plans to import 300 tons of Bolivian beef to meet demand in its domestic market, along with as much as 7,500 tons of beans and poultry.

Though much of Venezuela's aid is related to agriculture, like the donation of more than 300 tractors produced by a joint Venezuelan-Iranian venture, its military assistance has attracted the most scrutiny.

Opposition legislators are trying to overturn a military agreement reached last year that could provide Bolivia with as much as $47 million in assistance intended, among other things, to strengthen the government's presence in the eastern lowlands, where separatist sentiment runs strong.

The International Institute for Strategic Studies, a British research group, said in a recent report that Venezuela, which is undertaking a rapid armaments buildup, could be providing Bolivia with weapons and financing for new military bases.

Officials from both countries minimized the report, saying any military assistance was intended to assist Mr. Morales by lending him helicopters and flight crews to travel throughout Bolivia. [Citing military officials, the Bolivian newspaper La Razón reported on Feb. 19 that Venezuela was giving Bolivia two SuperPuma helicopters in a good-will gesture.]

DOJ_NMG_0135768

“Bolivia is a tremendously poor country,” said Gustavo Torrico, a leading supporter of Mr. Morales in Congress. “Any help we can get is positive.”

Not least, the Venezuelan aid has given Bolivia a source of assistance outside the International Monetary Fund, whose policies are widely criticized in much of Latin America as not having helped the poor. It has also given Mr. Morales the breathing space to carry out popular social welfare programs.

“The direct relationship with Chávez hasn’t been problematic for Evo Morales so far,” said Jim Shultz, executive director of the Democracy Center, a nonprofit institute in the Bolivian city of Cochabamba. “The I.M.F. is a banker without clients in parts of Latin America.”

Jackson Lee Tries To Smooth Chavez Ties (HC)

By John Otis

Houston Chronicle, February 23, 2007

BOGOTA, COLOMBIA — Breaking with Bush administration policy, Rep. Sheila Jackson Lee of Houston ventured to Venezuela to campaign for a thaw in relations with leftist President Hugo Chavez.

"We've made a serious mistake in not engaging with President Chavez," the Democratic lawmaker said Thursday in a telephone interview from Houston, a few hours after returning from a three-day trip to Caracas, the capital. "I came to break the tension, to warm up a chilled relationship."

The visit by Jackson Lee, a member of the House Foreign Affairs Committee, which paid for the trip, was the first by a member of the U.S. Congress since the Democrats took control of the House and Senate and since Chavez won re-election. It also came in the wake of announcements by Chavez to move Venezuela toward what he calls "21st century socialism" — including plans by his government to take a majority stake of U.S.-run oil operations in the country.

"Houston jobs are directly related to our relationship with Venezuela," Jackson Lee said. "I don't want to give up on this very important regional partner."

Venezuela supplies about 11 percent of America's oil imports. Major U.S. petroleum companies, some based in Houston, have invested billions in the country.

But ever since an aborted coup in 2002 that Chavez charges was supported by the Bush administration, relations between Washington and Caracas have gone downhill.

For his part, Chavez has alienated many members of Congress, especially after his infamous speech in September at the United Nations when he called President Bush "the devil."

The last high-profile U.S. delegation to Venezuela, led by Rep. Henry Hyde, R-Ill., who has since retired, was initially refused permission by the Chavez government to de-plane at the international airport in November 2005 and abruptly flew back to the U.S., further damaging ties.

Even so, said Cynthia Arnson, who heads the Latin America program at the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars in Washington, "there are people on both sides of the aisle in Congress who recognize that there are U.S. interests that need to be protected and that it requires a more pragmatic approach."

Opening door to dialogue?Jackson Lee pressed the same point at a news conference Wednesday at the U.S. Embassy in Caracas, saying, "Venezuela has many friends in this new Congress."

But Arnson cautioned that "Chavez has not shown any interest in engaging the United States in any kind of constructive way."

In addition, there is growing concern in the U.S. about the health of Venezuela's democracy under Chavez, who also controls the military, the legislature and the courts and has moved to clamp down on some media outlets.

Jackson Lee met with Vice President Jorge Rodriguez as well as with officials at the National Assembly and Foreign Ministry and members of the Venezuelan media. She did not meet with Chavez in Caracas but said she would speak with him by telephone later Thursday.

DOJ_NMG_0135769

Jackson Lee also conferred with executives from Chevron, Exxon Mobil Corp. and Venezuela's state-run oil company to discuss compensation as the government moves to become the majority shareholder of operations in the oil-rich Orinco River basin.

"I think we opened a door to dialogue," she said, "though it's not open far enough,"

Jackson Lee called on the Bush administration to lift a ban on arms sales to Venezuela. That would clear the way for the sale of spare parts and technological upgrades for Venezuela's aging F-16 fighter jets, which were purchased in the early 1980s and were made by Lockheed Martin Aeronautics of Fort Worth.

According to the Center for Responsive Politics in Washington, Jackson Lee, a seven-term lawmaker, has received about $7,000 in campaign contributions from Lockheed Martin since 1989. However, according to the center, she received far less than several other members of Congress from Texas, including Rep. Nick Lampson, D-Stafford — $28,259 — and Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, R-Texas — $32,707.

Last year, the State Department banned the arms sales on grounds that Venezuela had failed to cooperate in the fight against drugs and terrorism. Chavez's government has also refused to sign agreements stating that U.S.-developed technologies would not be passed on to third countries.

Venezuela has purchased a new fleet of Russian-made Sukhoi fighter jets, and Chavez has talked of selling the F-16s to Iran, which Washington says would be illegal.

As for growing concerns in Washington about Chavez's leftist politics, Jackson Lee said: "The U.S. government has relations with many governments where we question human rights and press freedoms.

"China comes to mind."

Chronicle reporters Michelle Mittlestadt and Bennett Roth contributed to this report from Washington.

Cuba's Visa Denials Signal Reluctance On Reforms (WSJ)

By José De Córdoba

The Wall Street Journal, February 23, 2007

MEXICO CITY -- The Cuban government refused to renew the visas of at least two resident foreign journalists, dimming hopes it will move forward with reforms as Fidel Castro fades from power.

The refusals were "part of a political tightening in the expectation that when Fidel dies they will have total control and there won't be any opposition or resistance," said Jaime Suchlicki, an expert on Cuba at the University of Miami.

Mr. Castro, 80 years old, handed power over to his brother, longtime Defense Minister Raúl Castro, 75, on a provisional basis after undergoing surgery in July. Since then, many analysts have speculated that the younger Castro, who is believed to be more pragmatic than his brother, would experiment with reforms and fresh thinking.

Since the younger Castro assumed power, there have been some signals of a domestic thaw. In one speech, Raúl Castro urged university students to question authority. On another occasion, intellectuals took the unprecedented action of demanding an apology from the government for seeming to bring back a hard-line official who had been involved in censuring writers decades ago. The younger Castro also has called for negotiations with the U.S. to resolve the differences between the two countries.

While Raúl Castro has sounded like a moderate, Ramiro Valdez, a hard-line former interior minister who is information and technology minister, has been cracking down on the use of parabolic antennas used by Cubans to pick up television signals from the U.S. He also defended the restrictions Cuba places on its citizens to access the Internet.

Cuba recently announced regulations that it would require correspondents to renew permits every 30 days, enabling the government to keep a tighter leash on journalists.

Gary Marx, who has been based in Havana for the Chicago Tribune since 2002, and Cesar Gonzalez Calero, a reporter for the Mexico City daily El Universal, were told this week by Cuban officials that their visas wouldn't be renewed and they could no longer report from the island, according to the Chicago Tribune and El Universal.

DOJ_NMG_0135770

The Chicago Tribune said a reporter for the South Florida Sun-Sentinel will continue to staff the Tribune Co. bureau in Havana, and the Cuban government had told Mr. Marx that the government would welcome an application from a new Chicago Tribune correspondent.

The Tribune quoted Mr. Marx as saying the Cuban government said it had revoked his visa because he had been on the island too long, and didn't give any examples of stories to which they objected.

Julia Sweig, a Cuba specialist at the Council on Foreign Relations, said the Cuban government often exhibits a contradictory pattern of opening up in one area and battening down in another. "It's like, 'Just in case someone is getting too excited that we might have process of reform, we'll take a whack at the foreign press to show who we are -- a closed society,' " she said.

Chadian Prime Minister Yoadimnadji Dies (AP)

AP, February 23, 2007

Chadian Prime Minister Pascal Yoadimnadji died Friday at a Paris hospital where he was being treated for cardiovascular problems, the African nation's embassy said. He was 56.

Kadallah Ousman, the embassy spokesman, said Yoadimnadji died at midnight at Val de Grace military hospital in Paris.

The cause of death was not immediately known.

Ousman said he had no immediate information on a funeral service or on who would replace Yoadimnadji.

Chadian President Idriss Deby appointed Yoadimnadji, a lawyer, as head of government in 2005. He replaced Moussa Faki Mahamat, who had resigned.

DOJ_NMG_0135771

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE NEWS CLIPS

PREPARED FOR THE OFFICE OF PUBLIC AFFAIRS, US DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE BY BULLETIN NEWS WWW.BULLETINNEWS.COM/JUSTICE

TO: THE ATTORNEY GENERAL AND SENIOR STAFF

DATE: FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 23, 2007 7:45 AM EST

TODAY'S EDITION

Terrorism News:

Experts: Padilla Unable To Stand Trial (NSDY/AP) 4
Psychiatrist: Solitary Confinement Has Made Padilla Unfit For Trial (USAT) 4
Defense Calls Padilla Incompetent For Trial (NYT) 5
Padilla Unfit For Trial, Defense Experts Say (LAT) 6
Lawfare (WSJ) 7
A Congressional Duty (WP) 8
Editorial: Figures Don't Add Up (VENTCS) 9
Terror Suspect's Statements Detail Time In Somalia (BOS/AP) ... 9

Homeland Response:

Independent Review Needed For Supermax (DENP) 10
Supermax Safety (PUEBCH) 11
Report Details Harassment That Followed 9/11 Attacks (MINNST) 11
In New Orleans, Progress At Last In The Lower Ninth Ward (NYT) 12
Senator Lott Floods The Zone (WSJ) 13

War News:

Senate Dems Move To Limit Iraq Mission (AP) 14
Democrats May Try To Limit Iraq Mission (USAT) 16
Senate Democrats Keep Pressure On Bush With Plan To Limit Iraq Mission To Counterterrorism (NYT) 16
Democrats Seek To Repeal 2002 War Authorization (WP) 17
Lieberman Says War Vote Could Prompt Party Switch (POL) 18
What Joe Lieberman Wants... (TIME) 19
Republican Critic Of Iraq Policy Vows Not To 'Starve' The War (MCT) 19
Rep. Sam Johnson Emerges As GOP Voice In War Debate (LAT) 20
No Way To End A War (WP) 21
Free Nations Can't Ignore Terror, Cheney Warns (WT) 22
Powell Backs Surge, Time Frame To Quell 'civil War' (JC) 23
Old Problems Undermine New Security Plan For Baghdad (NYT) 23
Insurgents Broaden Arsenal In Battles With U.S., Iraqi Forces (WP) 25
General Implicates Al-Qaeda In Copter Crashes (USAT) 26
Al Qaeda Believed Behind Copter Crashes (WT) 26
Iraq Rebels Expected To Use More Chlorine Gas In Attacks (NYT) 27
U.S. Troops Uncover "car Bomb Factory" Near Fallouja (LAT) ... 28
U.S. Unit Shoulders Burden At Police Station In Baqubah (WP) 29
Firefight Between U.S. Troops, Insurgents Kills At Least 12 (USAT/AP) 31
Baghdad 'Surge' Returns Chalabi To Center Stage (WSJ) 31
Rape Of Second Sunni Woman By Iraqi Security Forces Alleged (WP) 33
Withdrawing From Banks (WT) 34
Distrust, Fear A Year After Iraq Mosque Bombing (LAT) 35
Soldier Sentenced For Rape, Murder In Iraq (AP) 36
Long Iraq Tours Can Make Home A Trying Front (NYT) 36
Back From Despair, In Her Words (LAT) 39
South Korean Gets 5 Years For Dealings With Iraqis (NYT) 41
Park Sentenced To 5 Years In U.N. Oil-for-Food Bribery Scandal (WP) 42
Iraqi Embassy Upgrades Its D.C. Digs (WP) 43
U.S. Used Bases In Ethiopia To Hunt Al Qaeda In Africa (NYT) 44

Corporate Scandals:

US Judge Denies Motion To Delay Enron Lawsuit (AP) 46
Former Sadia CFO To Pay $364,000 In SEC Insider-trading Case (AP) 47
Panel Sets Voluntary Guides For Hedge Funds (USAT) 47
Call For More Oversight Of Hedge Funds Is Rejected (WP) 48
Officials Reject More Oversight Of Hedge Funds (NYT) 49

Criminal Law:

Jury To Continue Deliberations In Scooter Libby CIA-Leak Case (WSJ) 50
Still No Verdict In CIA Leak Trial (NSDY/AP) 51
Leak Trial Reveals Flaws In Note-taking (AP) 51
Fumo Trial Likely To Start Early '08 (PHI) 52
Meeting Offers Sneak Preview Of Fumo Trial (PHI) 53
Inside The Ring (WT) 54
Investigation Won't Stop Rep. Miller From California Dealmaking (AP) 55
Prosecutor Urges Public To Help Fight Corruption (NYT) 57
FBI: Sex Fugitive Captured In Livingston Parish (AP) 57
Man Pleads Guilty In Child Pornography Case (MH) 58
Man Sought In W.Va., Ohio Sex Attack (PPG) 58
Police Probe Ferry Offense (WHEELINT) 59
Three Indicted In Las Vegas In Katrina Relief Fund Fraud Case (BSH) 60

Oklahoma City Man Accused Of Falsely Claiming Katrina Funds (AP) ... 60
N.C. Man Convicted In Oregon In Multicountry Silver Scheme (AP) ... 61
Study Fails To Stem Gangs Debate (LAT) ... 61

Civil Rights:

EXCLUSIVE: Gonzales Talks On Civil Liberties (CBN) ... 62
DOJ Report Touts Bush Record On Rights (UPI) ... 63
Teel Avoids Death Penalty (BSH) ... 64
Urban League Chief Wants Justice Probe Of Katrina Shootings (AP) ... 65
Illinois Gay Marriage Bill Introduced (CHIT) ... 66
Nonprofit Litigates Largest Employment Discrimination Class Action Ever To Go To Trial (LAW) ... 66
Bark And Hold (WP) ... 67

Antitrust:

$1.75M Fine Ends Probe Of Concrete Price-fixing (INDYSTAR) 68
Plea Deal In Bid-rig Scheme (NSDY) ... 68
Sirius-XM Merger Faces Major Hurdle Over Antitrust Issues, Experts Say (BLOOM) ... 69
Sirius-XM Merger Would Send Wrong Signal (WP) ... 69
Reject Their Request (USAT) ... 70
Sirius And XM Together Makes Sense For Listeners (USAT) ... 71
Apple And Cisco Settle Dispute Over IPhone Name (FT) ... 72
South Korea Fines Four Refiners For Price-Fixing (WSJ) ... 72
Traverse Mountain Antitrust Suit Fails (SLT) ... 73
FTC Clears AIG Acquisition Of U.S. Ports (AP) ... 73
EU Clears ProSiebenSat.1 Acquisition (AP) ... 73
Planned Merger Angers Black Farmers (JCL) ... 74
Esmark: Deal For Weirton Is Dead (AP) ... 75
Microsoft Hit With $1.52 Billion Verdict In MP3 Suit (WSJ) ... 76
MP3 Patents In Upheaval After Verdict (NYT) ... 77
Microsoft Ordered To Pay $1.5B To Alcatel (USAT) ... 78
Microsoft Loses Big In MP3 Patent Suit (WP) ... 79
Microsoft Hit By $1.5bn Award (FT) ... 79
Jury Finds Against Microsoft In $1.5 Billion Patent Dispute With Alcatel-Lucent (AP) ... 80

Environment:

Bush Talks Energy (HDD) ... 81
Bush Stresses Fuel Technology (WP) ... 82
Bush Pushes His Energy Initiative At North Carolina Biofuel Plant (MCT) ... 82
Bush Makes A Pitch For Amber Waves Of Homegrown Fuel (NYT) ... 83
Bush Pushes Energy Initiative In N.C. (AP) ... 84
Bush Gets A Whiff Of Alternative Fuel (LAT) ... 85
Bush Visits Franklinton Biotech (RNO) ... 86
A Presidential Pat On The Back (DHS) ... 86
Where Bush Would Steer Energy R&D (CSM) ... 87
Car Mpg Ratings Going Down (USAT) ... 89
City To Pay $1.5 Million In Coal Gas Site Agreement (LMDS) ... 89
BP Employee Deleted Files From Computer (FT) ... 90
GAO: Fuel Tank Cleanup Could Cost $12B (AP) ... 90
A Conservative Conservationist? (WP) ... 91
Colorless Green Ideas (NYT) ... 92

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Detroit Dealer Gets 30 Years In Two Fentanyl Deaths (DN) ... 93
Drug Dealer Gets 30 Years In Fentanyl Case (FREEP) ... 93
Seller Of Lethal Drug Cocktail Sentenced (AP) ... 94
Official: 4 Officers Arrested In Sting (NSDY/AP) ... 94
Four Hollywood Cops Face Charges In FBI Sting (MH) ... 94
Medical Marijuana Activists Cite Little-known Law In Suit (SFC) 95
Advocacy Group's Suit Calls On U.S. To Acknowledge Pot's Medicinal Value (LAT) ... 96
Federal Charges In Home Pot-growing Operation (SFC) ... 96
U.S. Drug Czar Urges Canada To Crack Down On Pot Claims American Measures Have Lowered Drug Use In Teens (CP) ... 97
Canada Must Not Follow The U.S. On Drug Policy (OC) ... 97
Former Federal Agents Suing City, Charge Police Corruption (AP) ... 98
ATF Agents Faced Cop Retaliation, Jury Rules (CHIT) ... 99
City Man Guilty Of 27 Crimes, All Violent (PHI) ... 100

Immigration:

Senate Hearing To Push Bush On Immigration (WT) ... 101
Smugglers Raise Stakes In Fight Over Border Rule (WT) ... 102
Homeland Security Strategy Hits Executives, Illegal Workers (WSJ) ... 103
Janitor-service Chiefs Charged In Illegals Ring (WT) ... 103
Janitorial Service Officials Charged In Sweep Of Illegal Immigrants (WP) ... 104
Cleaning Executives Indicted In $18 Million Fraud (NYT) ... 105
Cleaning Company Executives Accused Of Employing Illegal Workers (USAT) ... 106
Cleaning Service Owners Charged In Sweep Of Illegal Immigrants (AP) ... 106
Judge Dismisses Posada's Bid To Be Freed (AP) ... 107

Tax:

13 Charged With Fraud Over Tobacco Sales Taxes (MINNST) 108
Corporate Owners Hide Assets, Identities (USAT) ... 109
Bill Clinton's AMT Bomb (WSJ) ... 111

Congress-Administration:

Walter Reed Stories Factual But Unfair, Medical Chief Says (WP) ... 112
Painting Over The Problems At Walter Reed's Building 18 (WP)113
Damaged And Adrift In The Shadows (NYT) ... 114
Senate Effort To Pass Intelligence Legislation Stalls Again (WT)114
Pentagon Abandons Big Bomb Test (AP) ... 115
Agency Scraps Plan For Explosives Test (NYT) ... 116
McCain Raps Extraneous Pentagon Spending Requests (POL)116
Labor Seeks Boost From Pro-Union Measure (NYT) ... 117
Fairfax Schools Could Lose Millions For Defying 'No Child' (WP)118
Virginia Schools May Lose Funding (WT/AP) ... 119
Bush's Budget May Stifle Students' Loans (WT) ... 120
For Energy, A Budget Not Without Merit (WP) ... 121
Profiteering Colleges (NYT) ... 122

DOJ_NMG_0135773

Trapped On An Airplane (NYT)..... 122
A Visit Worth The Time And Money (NYT)..... 123

Other News:

U.S. Economy Leaving Record Numbers In Severe Poverty (MCT)..... 123
Dow, S& P 500 Sink While Nasdaq Rises (USAT)..... 126
Stocks Ease As Oil Nears $61; Nasdaq Grabs A 6-Year High (WSJ)..... 127
UCLA Wins Psychiatric Sex Trial, But No One Gets Monetary Award (LAT)..... 127
Grades Rise, But Reading Skills Do Not (NYT)..... 129
Grades Rise, But Reading Skills Fall, Data Suggest (USAT).... 130
Test Scores At Odds With Rising High School Grades (WP).... 130
Report Raises Questions About High-School Courses (WSJ).. 132
Higher Grades Contradict Test Scores (AP)..... 133
High Schoolers' Scores Lag Despite Courses, Grades (WT).... 134
U.S. High Schools Raise Grades, Don't Test Better (Update2) (BLOOM)..... 134
Stepping To The Plate, Giuliani Is Seeing Only Softballs (NYT)136
Giuliani To Court K Street (POL)..... 137
Huckabee: Don't Forget Me (POL)..... 137
Fundraiser To Help Underwrite S.C. Primary (WP)..... 138
Detour From High Road In Clinton-Obama Clash (NYT)..... 138
Et Tu, David? A Lucrative Friendship Sours (NYT)..... 140
Analysis: Early Bumps Trip Clinton Camp (AP)..... 140
EDITORIALS Geffen Has A Point About The Clintons (LAT) ... 141
Clinton And Obama's Hollywood Scene (WP)..... 142
Depends What The Meaning Of "Mistake" Is (WP)..... 143
For Clinton, New Wealth In Speeches (WP)..... 144
FEC Drafts New Campaign Finance Opinion (WP/AP)..... 146
Obama's Funding Question To Get FEC Look (CHIT)..... 147
Proposal By Obama On Public Financing Appears To Gain (NYT)..... 147
Hope From The FEC (WP)..... 148
Statehouse Yields Clues To Obama (WSJ)..... 148
Wilder Praises Obama Strategy (WT)..... 149
Running On A Résumé Both Local And National (NYT)..... 150
The New GOP Attack Machine (POL)..... 152
The Philadelphia Story (WSJ)..... 153
Non-Union Jobs (WSJ)..... 154
Iran Defies Nuclear Ultimatum (WT/AP)..... 155
New Penalties May Loom For Iran's Nuclear Work (USAT)..... 156
Rice Warns Iran It Risks Further U.N. Sanctions (WP)..... 156
Rice Says Europe, Russia Want Iran Talks (AP)..... 157
Diplomats Trying To Restart Iran Talks (AP)..... 158
Iran Expanding Nuclear Effort, Agency Reports (NYT)..... 159
Iran Has Speeded Up N-plans, Says UN (FT)..... 161
Iran Says Nuclear Fuel Is For Future (LAT)..... 161
Speculation Rages: Is Iran Bush's Next Target? (MCT)..... 162
Arab States, Wary Of Iran, Add To Their Arsenals But Still Lean On The U.S. (NYT)..... 163
A Presidential Candidate Bill Clinton Can Publicly Embrace (WP)..... 165
Secretive Force At Center Of Tensions Between U.S., Iran (MCT)..... 166
Hagel Says Diplomacy Is Best Option For Iran (FT)..... 167
Iran Misses Another Deadline (WSJ)..... 168
What Scares Iran's Mullahs? (NYT)..... 168
Signals From Tehran (WP)..... 169
'Long Way' To Go In North Korea Nuclear Pact: US (AFP)..... 170
Hill Warns N Korea On Deadlines (FT)..... 171
Nuke Timeline Key To Successful Deal (WT)..... 172
N. Korea Nuclear Deal Rife With Benefits (AP)..... 172
Top Democratic Hopefuls' Bickering Puts Focus On Candor And Personal Behavior (WSJ)..... 173
NKorea Official To US For Talks: Sources (AFP)..... 174
Cheney Criticizes China's Arms Buildup (AP)..... 175
VOA Says Goodbye To Uzbek, Other Tongues (WP)..... 176
Europeans' Chill Deepens On US Policy (CSM)..... 177
An Upside-Down World (WSJ)..... 178
A Foreign Policy Built On Do-Overs (NYT)..... 179
Russia And US Play Down Missile Dispute (FT)..... 180
Russia, US Advisers Pledge Cooperation (AP)..... 181
Philippine Military Is Linked To Killings (NYT)..... 182
Political Killings Traced To Philippine Military (CSM)..... 182
Chavez Builds His Sphere Of Influence (WP)..... 183
Venezuela Rivals U.S. In Aid To Bolivia (NYT)..... 185
Jackson Lee Tries To Smooth Chavez Ties (HC)..... 187
Cuba's Visa Denials Signal Reluctance On Reforms (WSJ)..... 188
Chadian Prime Minister Yoadimnadji Dies (AP)..... 188

DOJ_NMG_0135774

TERRORISM NEWS:

Experts: Padilla Unable To Stand Trial (NSDY/AP)

By Curt Anderson, Associated Press Writer

Long Island Newsday, February 23, 2007

MIAMI -- Accused al-Qaida operative Jose Padilla suffers from intense stress and anxiety stemming from his isolated years in military custody and cannot adequately help his lawyers prepare for trial, two defense mental experts testified Thursday.

Defense lawyers hope to delve more deeply into Padilla's treatment at a Navy brig in Charleston, S.C., later in the federal hearing, when they are allowed to question brig officials directly involved in his custody. Those officials have never spoken publicly about the case, and the hearing will continue Monday.

"He is immobilized by his anxiety," said Patricia Zapf, a forensic psychologist who administered tests on Padilla last October. "He believes he will go back to the brig and he will die there."

The hearing before U.S. District Judge Marcia Cooke on Padilla's competency is crucial in deciding whether he and two co-defendants will stand trial in April.

Padilla, a 36-year-old U.S. citizen, is charged with being part of a North American terror support cell that provided money, recruits and supplies to Islamic extremists around the world. All three have pleaded not guilty and face possible life imprisonment.

The Bush administration initially claimed that Padilla was on an al-Qaida mission to detonate a radioactive "dirty bomb" in a major U.S. city when he was arrested in May 2002 at Chicago's O'Hare International Airport.

He was designated an "enemy combatant" and was imprisoned by the military without criminal charges. But the dirty-bomb allegations are not part of the Miami case.

Padilla has claimed in court filings that he was tortured at the brig, which U.S. officials have denied. Prosecutors say he is competent for trial.

"It has always been our policy to treat all detainees humanely," Cmdr. Jeffrey Gordon, a Defense Department spokesman, said Thursday. "The government in the strongest terms denies Padilla's allegations of torture, allegations made without support and without citing a shred of record evidence."

Dr. Angela Hegarty, a forensic neuropsychiatrist, said she concluded after examining and testing Padilla for more than 22 hours last fall that he is mentally incompetent for trial because he has post-traumatic stress disorder. Zapf reached the same diagnosis and recommended that Padilla receive treatment.

Padilla's symptoms are most acute when he is asked to talk about his 3 1/2 years in the brig, including interrogations techniques used on him, or to review evidence in his criminal case, including transcripts of intercepted telephone conversations, Hegarty said.

"He doesn't want to because it hurts so much, and because it hurts so much he shuts down," Hegarty said.

When Padilla his asked about his case or the brig, Zapf said, he becomes noticeably tense, begins to sweat, tries to change the subject and rocks back and forth while hunched over. She said he was adamant that he did not want to testify in his own defense.

"He said he can't relive it, he can't go through it again, and he can't name names," Zapf said.

During cross-examination, prosecutor John Shipley pointed to a test administered by Hegarty in which Padilla scored zero on the portions indicating post-traumatic stress disorder. Those segments involved questions about flashbacks, nightmares, depression and other symptoms.

"Nothing in this test supports your diagnosis at all, isn't that correct?" Shipley asked.

"No," Hegarty replied, noting that the test answers were only one component of her decision.

Psychiatrist: Solitary Confinement Has Made Padilla Unfit For Trial (USAT)

By Laura Parker

USA Today, February 23, 2007

MIAMI — A New York psychiatrist testified Thursday that Jose Padilla, a U.S. citizen accused by the government of being an "enemy combatant," developed so many mental ailments during three years of solitary confinement in the Navy brig in Charleston, S.C., that he is not competent to stand trial.

DOJ_NMG_0135775

That view of the 36-year-old terrorism suspect, once accused of planning to detonate a radioactive "dirty bomb," emerged as Angela Hegarty took the stand as the first of three psychiatrists expected to testify at a hearing to determine Padilla's mental fitness. "He lacks the capacity to assist his counsel in this case," Hegarty said.

More revelations are expected next week when four officials from the brig, as well as four officials from the Miami Federal Detention Center take the stand. Their testimony will provide an unprecedented window into the U.S. military's treatment of terrorism suspects. Since the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, officials responsible for the detention of terrorism suspects have been ordered by a federal judge to testify only a few times.

Padilla, 36, faces trial April 16 on federal charges of conspiring to murder, kidnap and maim people overseas and conspiracy to support terrorism by supplying money and materials. He was arrested in May 2002, and spent three years and eight months in the brig until he was transferred into federal custody after his indictment in Miami in November 2005.

Federal prosecutors have fiercely resisted defense efforts to call the brig officials for the hearing, arguing that Padilla's treatment at the brig is not relevant to the federal charges he faces. Defense attorneys contend that Padilla's treatment amounts to torture and caused his mental break.

U.S. District Court Judge Marcia Cooke ordered Defense Department attorney Mike Reheuser, brig technical director Sandy Seymour, brig psychologist Craig Noble and brig social worker Maj. Andrew Cruz to testify. Federal Detention Center officials Jorge Luis, Dr. Victor Shoukry, Dr. Lisa Feldman and Dr. Hoa Ngo also will testify.

Hegarty, who testified for the defense, was followed to the stand by Patricia Zapf, a psychologist hired by the defense. Both experts said Padilla suffers from post traumatic stress as a result of his confinement.

Prosecutors will call Rodolfo Buigas, a medical expert for the Bureau of Prisons, who examined Padilla and found him mentally competent. The hearing resumes Monday.

Defense Calls Padilla Incompetent For Trial (NYT)

By Deborah Sontag

The New York Times, February 23, 2007

MIAMI, Feb. 22 — In a highly unusual competency hearing in federal court here Thursday, defense lawyers began to lay out their argument that Jose Padilla, the Brooklyn-born former enemy combatant, was rendered incompetent to stand trial on terrorism conspiracy charges by what they characterize as crippling mistreatment by the government.

Two mental health experts, a forensic psychiatrist and a forensic psychologist hired by the defense, testified that Mr. Padilla, 36, suffers from post-traumatic stress disorder as a result of his isolation and scores of interrogation sessions during three years and eight months in a military brig in South Carolina.

“He’s unfit to stand trial,” said Patricia A. Zapf, the psychologist, describing Mr. Padilla as so “immobilized by his anxiety” and so distrustful that he is incapable of assisting his own lawyers — whom he at times suspects of being agents of the government — in preparing his defense.

Dr. Zapf said Mr. Padilla, a United States citizen who was initially accused of plotting a dirty bomb attack against the United States and held without charges by the military, believed that he would end up “back in the brig and that he would die there.”

Dr. Zapf continued: “He’d say, ‘What does it matter? It doesn’t matter. My fate has been decided. It’s better to let things be.’ ”

Mr. Padilla, who was indicted in late 2005 on terrorism conspiracy charges that do not include the dirty bomb plot but do carry a possible life sentence, sat calmly through Thursday’s hearing as lawyers and doctors discussed his facial tics, anxieties and feelings of hopelessness.

Wearing a tan jumpsuit, sandals with socks, wire-rimmed glasses and a wispy mustache, Mr. Padilla occasionally chatted amiably with his lawyers and once turned around and gave his mother, Estela Lebron of Broward County, a broad, sustained smile. His leg irons were barely visible beneath the rolled-up cuffs of the pants that belong to the federal detention center where he is now being held in isolation.

In a recent motion to the court, Anthony J. Natale, a federal public defender and one of Mr. Padilla’s lawyers, said, “Like many aspects of Mr. Padilla’s case, his claim of incompetency is unique in that it is the government that is squarely to blame for his current mental state and his concomitant ability to stand trial.”

Marcia G. Cooke, the federal judge presiding over the case, ordered a Bureau of Prisons evaluation of Mr. Padilla late last year when his lawyers raised the issue of his competency. That review, which was complicated by Mr. Padilla’s refusal to submit to testing by prison psychologists, concluded recently that Mr. Padilla was competent to stand trial.

Prosecution lawyers urged Judge Cooke to accept that evaluation as neutral and final. They opposed a full-blown competency hearing that examined Mr. Padilla’s treatment in the brig, calling the subject of his detention there a “sideshow.” But Judge Cooke ordered officials from the brig to testify, and they are expected to do so when the hearing continues next week.

DOJ_NMG_0135776

If Judge Cooke finds Mr. Padilla incompetent to stand trial, prosecutors have made it clear they will appeal that decision. If a ruling of incompetency were upheld, Mr. Padilla might then be transferred by the government to a psychiatric institution with the goal of making him capable of standing trial.

Mr. Padilla, according to the defense-hired doctors who examined him, is terrified of ending up in a psychiatric hospital and denies that he has any mental disorders. During their evaluations, they said, Mr. Padilla denied that he was anxious, while flushing, sweating, twitching and visibly manifesting his anxiety.

"Mr. Padilla is very, very anxious about quote-unquote appearing crazy," said Dr. Angela M. Hegarty, a psychiatrist.

The doctors testified that Mr. Padilla refused to discuss the details of his case with his lawyers, growing agitated when asked to review video recordings of his interrogations — 87 such tapes have been turned over to the defense — or to listen to wiretapped phone conversations.

According to the testimony, Mr. Padilla, a Muslim convert, also declines to answer his lawyers' questions about his whereabouts or activities after he left the United States in 1998 on what he told his family was a spiritual journey but what prosecutors see as a mission to conduct "global jihad." The questioning, according to the doctors, echoes the questioning of his interrogators.

"When asked, he shuts down and says, 'I can't, I can't,' " Dr. Hegarty said. Prosecutors challenged the idea that Mr. Padilla was incapable of communicating with his lawyers, noting that the lawyers had submitted an affidavit signed by him with a motion to dismiss the charges based on "outrageous government conduct." That motion contained detailed accusations by Mr. Padilla about abuses in the brig, including hooding, stress positions, assaults, threats of imminent execution and the administration of "truth serums."

Padilla Unfit For Trial, Defense Experts Say (LAT)

By Carol J. Williams, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, February 23, 2007

2 psychiatrists agree the terrorism suspect has post-traumatic stress disorder. His lawyers blame his treatment in custody.

MIAMI — Two forensic psychology experts testified Thursday that alleged Al Qaeda accomplice Jose Padilla suffered mental damage during his 3 1/2 years in U.S. military custody and was unfit to stand trial on terrorism charges.

Testing and evaluation of the 36-year-old former Chicago gang member revealed "strong indication of cognitive impairment" and a 98% probability of brain injury, said Patricia Zapf, a clinical forensic psychologist and associate professor at City University of New York.

"I believe he is not competent to proceed, that he is not fit to stand trial," Zapf testified as a witness for the defense.

U.S. District Judge Marcia Cooke scheduled the competency hearing after Padilla's defense attorneys filed a motion to dismiss the case because of what they called "outrageous government conduct" that amounted to torture.

Padilla's trial is scheduled to begin April 16.

Forensic neuropsychiatrist Angela Hegarty told the court that Padilla wasn't competent to assist in his own defense because he exhibits profound anxiety and "shuts down" at any mention of his treatment at the U.S. Navy brig in Charleston, S.C.

Both defense experts diagnosed Padilla with post-traumatic stress disorder and acute anxiety, which they attributed to his prolonged isolation and treatment at the Charleston brig.

Padilla, shackled and dressed in a tan cotton jailhouse tunic and trousers, sat impassively throughout the day's proceedings. His only show of emotion was a wave and smile to his mother, who was seated in the back of the courtroom.

Padilla was arrested at Chicago's O'Hare International Airport upon his return from Pakistan in May 2002, on suspicion of having plotted with other terrorism suspects to unleash a "dirty bomb" on an unnamed U.S. city.

President Bush declared Padilla an enemy combatant, and he was held in the brig without charges until late 2005. The government then moved the case to the federal court system with an indictment alleging Padilla was part of a North American terrorist cell providing material assistance to Islamic extremists abroad.

Lead defense attorney Anthony Natale has called mental health professionals and interrogation personnel from the brig staff to testify to the conditions in which Padilla was held. Testimony from the brig personnel, expected when proceedings resume Monday, could shed light on the military's controversial and secretive practices in getting terrorism suspects to disclose incriminating information.

A Bureau of Prisons psychological evaluator, Rodolfo Buigas, is expected to testify for the prosecution that Padilla is competent to stand trial.

Hegarty, an assistant professor of clinical psychology at Columbia University, said Padilla suffered from a form of Stockholm syndrome in which a captive identifies with his aggressors because of a perception that they control his fate.

DOJ_NMG_0135777

"When you are helpless and dependent on an all-powerful group, it takes away your anxiety when you line up with them," she said, recalling instances during her 22 hours of discussion with Padilla when he would object to contradicting the government for fear of reprisals.

"He thought he would go back to the brig and that he would die there," Zapf said. "He's very much living in the present. He doesn't want to talk about the past or think about the future."

Any attempts to get Padilla to discuss his custody left the defendant "immobilized by his anxiety," Zapf said.

Both witnesses reported that Padilla exhibited facial tics, flushing and perspiration, and that he evaded all questions relating to his solitary confinement. Defense attorneys say he was subjected to extreme temperatures and noise, fed LSD and other drugs, and made to endure hours of interrogation shackled in "stress positions."

Both also denied that Padilla was deliberately feigning psychological problems to evade prosecution.

Assistant U.S. Atty. John C. Shipley attempted to discredit Hegarty's post-traumatic stress disorder diagnosis by pointing out that Padilla scored "a perfect zero" on the segment of a standardized test designed to detect symptoms of the disorder.

But Hegarty countered that visible symptoms of anxiety as well as nightmares, depression and hallucination had been observed in the defendant, leading her to conclude he was exhibiting "minimalization" or denial, a classic indication of the disorder.

Asked how she reconciled Padilla's affidavit attesting to brutal treatment in the brig with his supposed mental alignment with his government jailers and accusers, Hegarty compared the defendant's situation to that of a battered woman who vacillates between defense of the abuser and short-lived efforts to escape him.

Zapf described Padilla as polite and apologetic about his inability to discuss his military captivity and, like Hegarty, quoted the defendant as saying he feared that his defense lawyers were part of a government plot against him.

Cooke repeatedly overruled objections from the prosecutors that Hegarty and Zapf were straying beyond the questions asked of them. The judge's latitude with the defense attorneys could signal that she will allow military jailers and interrogators to answer questions about their methods. Prosecutors in previous terrorism cases have stifled such testimony by deeming the techniques classified.

Lawfare (WSJ)

By David B. Rivkin, Jr. And Lee A. Casey

The Wall Street Journal, February 23, 2007

The term "lawfare" describes the growing use of international law claims, usually factually or legally meritless, as a tool of war. The goal is to gain a moral advantage over your enemy in the court of world opinion, and potentially a legal advantage in national and international tribunals.

Al Qaeda, of course, is an experienced lawfare practitioner. Its training manual, seized by British authorities in Manchester, England, openly instructs detained al Qaeda fighters to claim torture and other types of abuse as a means of obtaining a moral advantage over their captors. That advice has been routinely followed by detainees at Guantanamo Bay, who have succeeded in generating incessant demands -- from European officials among others -- for the base's closure and their own liberation.

These efforts, however, pale to insignificance when compared to the blizzard of litigation initiated in the U.S. federal courts on behalf of al Qaeda and Taliban detainees. The suits range from habeas corpus petitions to free captured enemy combatants -- cases that were dismissed by the U.S. Court of Appeals in Washington, D.C. on Tuesday -- to tort suits seeking monies from U.S. government officials, to challenges regarding the detainees' conditions of confinement.

There was a quixotic attempt to save Saddam Hussein's life by asking a federal court in Washington, D.C. to "stay" his execution by the Baghdad government. Several suits seek to hold the U.S. liable for the alleged misconduct of other governments. Of these, the lawsuit by Canadian Maher Arar, ostensibly tortured after being "rendered" to Syria, is the best known.

The most significant common thread among all these actions is the clear desire to portray U.S. government actions as illegal and unprecedented. In fact, it is the claims for extensive due process rights for captured enemy combatants that are unprecedented.

Combatants, whether the regular soldiers of sovereign states, irregular guerillas or terrorists, have never enjoyed the right to contest the legality of their detention in the civilian courts, or to a criminal trial. The Supreme Court reaffirmed these traditional rules in Hamdi v. Rumsfeld (2004), where a clear majority held that captured al Qaeda operatives could constitutionally be held as enemy combatants for the duration of hostilities without the due process required for individuals accused of criminal violations. The only process the court considered necessary was an opportunity to contest, before military authorities, the factual basis of their classification as enemy combatants with a limited opportunity for judicial review.

DOJ_NMG_0135778

Nevertheless, lawyers for the detainees continue to demand a full-fledged criminal process in the civilian courts for their clients. Former Clinton Attorney General Janet Reno has argued in a friend of the court brief that one detainee (Ali Saleh Kahlah al-Marri) should be entirely removed from the military justice system, even though he already has received far more extensive judicial process than that required by the Hamdi decision.

Similarly, in a grim echo of domestic prisoners-rights cases, lawyers for another detainee, Saifullah Paracha, have demanded that he be transferred from Guantanamo Bay to a civilian U.S. hospital for a common medical procedure -- a cardiac catheterization.

Perhaps the most pernicious ongoing lawfare example is the effort to hold U.S. officials financially liable for their wartime conduct based on the theories developed in Bivens v. Six Unknown Named Agents (1971). In that case, the Supreme Court permitted a civil damage suit against individual federal drug enforcement agents for allegedly violating the plaintiff's constitutional rights, in particular the Fourth Amendment guarantee against unreasonable searches and seizures.

Several Bivens actions have been filed on behalf of foreign combatants captured, detained and later released by U.S. forces. None have been particularly successful -- so far -- but the determined effort to use legal principles developed in the context of civilian law-enforcement operations on U.S. soil against officials directing an ongoing armed conflict overseas reveals an unsettling policy agenda.

These efforts are of a piece with a similar "progressive" movement -- ongoing at least since the end of World War II -- to remake the traditional laws of war, attempting to import into the area of armed conflict concepts and norms from the world of domestic law enforcement. Thus, leftist NGOs routinely demand that irregular enemy combatants like al Qaeda and the Taliban be treated as POWs or criminal defendants, claim that military force can be applied only to the minimum amounts necessary to neutralize a particular opponent (rather than with a view to achieving ultimate victory), and have sought to ban an increasing number of weapons and weapons systems as being "inherently indiscriminate."

The effect of this lawfare effort, were it successful, would be to make it exceptionally difficult -- if not impossible -- for a law-abiding state to wage war in anything like the traditional manner, bringing the full weight of the national armed forces to bear against an enemy, without prompting charges of war crimes and efforts to intimidate individual officials with prosecutions on ersatz "war crimes" theories. In fact, the criminalization of traditional warfare seems to be the goal.

Unfortunately, the progressive humanitarians (as they would certainly describe themselves) have embarked on this campaign to criminalize warfare (a kind of judicially enforced Kellog-Briand Pact), without giving much thought to alternatives for ensuring the welfare and security of the civilian populations that the armed forces of states, and of the U.S. in particular, are raised and maintained to protect. To the extent that terrorist combatants are given the rights of criminal defendants, their ability to sustain long-term hostilities, and to reach their civilian targets, is increased.

Lawfare designed to delegitimize the use of American military force, and the American way of war, certainly has the potential to undermine public support for the war effort, both at home and abroad. Recognizing the stakes involved, the U.S. should be as committed to winning the lawfare battle as the ground combat in Afghanistan and Iraq.

Merely defending itself in court is not enough. The U.S. must go on both the legal and public diplomacy offensive, utilizing such aggressive litigation tactics as seeking sanctions against lawyers who make frivolous arguments or violate security regulations. Most important, the administration should strive to explain, tirelessly and at the highest levels, that its policies are both legal and legitimate and that it is the lawfare's practitioners who are the true radicals.

Messrs. Rivkin & Casey, who served in the Department of Justice during the Reagan and George H.W. Bush administrations, are writing a book on war's evolving legal architecture.

A Congressional Duty (WP)

The Washington Post, February 23, 2007

ON THE FIRST day of the new Congress, two leading senators announced they would join in an attempt to reverse the hasty and ill-considered decision of the previous Congress to deprive foreign prisoners at Guantanamo Bay of the ancient right of habeas corpus, which allows the appeal of imprisonment to a judge. One of the senators, Arlen Specter (R-Pa.), predicted that the courts would rule that the provision of the Military Commissions Act eliminating habeas corpus was unconstitutional; he nevertheless joined the incoming chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, Patrick J. Leahy (D-Vt.), in sponsoring a bill restoring the appeal right.

Now Mr. Specter's prediction is looking less sure: The U.S. Court of Appeals for the D.C. Circuit ruled this week that Congress's act was constitutional, and it threw the cases of dozens of Guantanamo detainees out of federal court. That ruling will almost certainly be reviewed by the Supreme Court on appeal, but Congress should not wait for its decision. It should move quickly on the Habeas Corpus Restoration Act.

DOJ_NMG_0135779

The Supreme Court has already twice overruled decisions by the D.C. Circuit denying Guantanamo detainees habeas rights, but it is hard to predict whether it will do so again. The court's composition has changed since those rulings, with the addition of justices more likely to be sympathetic to the arguments of the Bush administration. Congress has reversed part of the basis for the court's previous rulings by enacting a statute saying that persons found to be "enemy combatants" by military review panels, including detainees held at Guantanamo, have only a limited right of appeal.

The principal remaining question is whether Congress's action is permitted under Article I, Section 9 of the Constitution, which says, "The Privilege of the Writ of Habeas Corpus shall not be suspended" except in cases of "Rebellion or Invasion." Two judges of the three-member appeals court panel ruled that the provision does not apply at Guantanamo because it is not on U.S. territory and the detainees are foreigners. A dissent written by Judge Judith Rogers pointed out that one of the earlier Supreme Court rulings stated that giving appeal rights to Guantanamo inmates "is consistent with the historical reach of the writ of habeas corpus." But the court has not ruled squarely on the constitutional issue.

Rather than wait for the court's decision, Congress should correct its own mistake. The 51 to 48 vote rejecting Mr. Specter's previous attempt to restore habeas condemned hundreds of foreign prisoners to indefinite detention without trial at Guantanamo; only a few score are expected to be prosecuted by the military commissions. Since 2002 it has become clear that a number of prisoners at the facility were arrested in error, are not terrorists and pose no threat to the United States. Moreover, improvements in the prisoners' treatment have come about largely because of their court appeals. Congress has both a practical and a moral interest in ensuring that this basic human right is restored.

Editorial: Figures Don't Add Up (VENTCS)

Ventura County (CA) Star, February 23, 2007

The Justice Department's post-9/11 statistics on terrorism cases have been deeply flawed, sometimes inflated, sometimes underreported — in any case, just highly inaccurate. Only two out of 26 sets of statistics reported between 2001 and 2005 were found to be accurate by the department's inspector general, Glenn Fine.

The most erroneous were figures on terrorism prosecutions collected by the department's Executive Office of U.S. Attorneys. In 2004, the department reported 379 terrorism-related convictions, but Mr. Fine said the actual number was 240.

Given the penchant of the department's political leadership for overhyping terrorism-related cases, the natural inclination is to think that the figures were intentionally padded.

Mr. Fine, reassuringly, says no. He blamed the errors on a "decentralized and haphazard" system of data collection and disagreements over the definition of an "anti-terrorism" case.

The result was that unrelated offenses like immigration violations, marriage fraud, drug trafficking and firearms violations were included in the terrorism figures.

Given the sensitivity of these numbers, it's surprising that the department was so careless. The Bush administration has portrayed itself as tough on terrorism — invoking these same statistics to prove it — and, by extension, the Democrats as weak. If it got this wrong, it makes you wonder what else it got wrong.

The audit concluded that, "it is essential that the department report accurate terrorism-related statistics." After five years of the domestic war on terror, that's not asking a whole lot.

Terror Suspect's Statements Detail Time In Somalia (BOS/AP)

By Juan A. Lozano, Associated Press Writer

The Boston Globe, February 23, 2007

HOUSTON --Handwritten statements released Thursday depict the frustration, confusion and deception that revolved around a U.S. citizen accused of receiving training from al-Qaeda in his efforts to help overthrow the Somali government.

The three sets of statements, which Daniel Joseph Maldonado gave to FBI agents after his arrest in Kenya last month, detail in the 28-year-old's words why he left the United States, his time in Somalia and the frantic last few days he and his family spent in the country before his capture by authorities.

In his initial handwritten statement, Maldonado wrote he moved from the United States because of anti-Muslim sentiment following the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks and heard that Somalia was emerging as a "true Islamic state."

"I would be able to live, pray, act, dress and be a Muslim without anyone yelling at me, calling me names, refusing me jobs or apartments," he wrote.

He also said in later statements that he wanted to "fight jihad" or a holy war in Somalia.

The statements first became public during Maldonado's two-day probable cause and detention hearing earlier this week. A federal magistrate judge ruled Wednesday there was sufficient evidence that Maldonado received weapons and bombmaking training at a Somali camp where al-Qaeda members were also present. Maldonado was ordered held without bond until his trial.

DOJ_NMG_0135780

Maldonado, 28, a Muslim convert also known as Daniel Aljughaifi and Abu Mohammed, is accused of traveling in November to an al-Qaeda terrorist camp in Somalia, where he was trained to use firearms and explosives in an effort to help another group, the Islamic Courts Union, topple the government and install an Islamic state. He was captured by the Kenyan military while trying to flee Somalia on Jan. 21.

He faces charges of undergoing military training with a terrorist organization and conspiring to use a weapon of mass destruction, specifically a bomb. If convicted, he faces up to life in prison.

During the hearing, FBI agent Loretta Eglen-Anderson testified she and other agents had him write down what he had done in Somalia.

Maldonado, who grew up in Pelham, N.H., and lived in Houston from August 2005 to November 2005, moved with his wife and three children to Cairo, Egypt, before going to Somalia in November.

Maldonado wrote that he didn't find acceptance in Egypt nor when he first got to Somalia, which has not had an effective national government since 1991.

Eglen-Anderson testified Maldonado initially lied to FBI agents about his reasons for going to Somalia. In later statements, Maldonado admitted he "left out the fact that I wanted to fight jihad."

After arriving in Somalia, Maldonado wrote he and his family were taken in by a man. In revised statements he said the man gave him a gun and ammunition.

Maldonado left his family in the Somali capital of Mogadishu and traveled to the southern port city of Kismayo, where FBI agents and federal prosecutors said he went to receive weapons and bombmaking training at an al-Qaeda camp. Maldonado later admitted he did go to get training.

In his statements, Maldonado never mentioned al-Qaeda and said he was sick for a week with malaria after arriving in Kismayo.

After recovering in a hospital, Maldonado said he was asked again "to join the jihad. But I was more concerned with my family in Mogadishu and still doubtful about weather it was a valid jihad."

Maldonado later admitted he lied about his doubts.

Maldonado wrote that after the fighting in Somalia intensified, he tried to get his family to come to Kismayo so they could leave the country. He was reunited with his family but was told he and his family would have to travel separately to Kenya.

In his worry and frustration, Maldonado wrote he called his parents and lied to make them feel guilty.

"So I decided to make them feel bad by saying that I was a soldier and I was going to fight jihad and possibly die," he wrote.

Prosecutors said they don't think he was lying.

Maldonado was able to travel with his family part of the way to the Kenyan-Somali border.

"We said very sad good by's hoping for each others safety and her and the children left," he wrote.

In his efforts to get to the border, Maldonado traveled by boat and truck, ending up in a camp in a wooded area. The camp was raided and Maldonado fled, eventually being captured by Kenyan troops.

Maldonado's wife died of malaria but it is not clear where or when she died. The couple's three children are now being taken care of by Maldonado's parents in New Hampshire.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Independent Review Needed For Supermax (DENP)

Denver Post, February 23, 2007

Colorado's congressional delegation has been pushing to identify and resolve the prison's shortcomings. A sweeping inquiry should be conducted.

It's hard to know what to believe when it comes to assessing the state of security at the Supermax federal prison in Florence, which holds some of the most dangerous inmates in the country.

During a tour of the facility Wednesday, Barb Batulis, a Supermax guard and union representative, said the prison isn't adequately staffed. But U.S. Bureau of Prisons chief Harley Lappin said he can safely manage the institution with the staff he has. U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales said he thinks the facility is secure but could be improved, though he shared no ideas.

That won't satisfy worried neighbors who want Lappin to erect a $23 million fence - not so much to keep the inmates inside as to keep their accomplices from approaching Supermax from the outside.

DOJ_NMG_0135781

There have been troubling signals from the maximum security prison for some time. The question of adequate staffing came into focus last fall with release of a report by the Department of Justice inspector general. It said Supermax didn't have adequate staff or language skills to monitor communications between inmates and the outside world. The investigation was sparked by March 2005 media reports that said three convicted terrorists involved in the 1993 World Trade Center bombing wrote about 90 letters to Islamic extremists with links to the Madrid train bombings. Prison officials said they've taken steps to address the shortages.

But that wasn't all. Shortly thereafter, an arbitrator ruled that staffing at the prison had gotten so low that working there had become more hazardous. The prison smartly hired more staff; however, union officials say at least some of the hires were destined for other understaffed prisons and not replaced. It's difficult to know whether the situation has improved or if prison officials are robbing Peter to pay Paul. But we do know this: Despite watching over some of the nation's most diabolical criminals, Supermax staffing is actually down from when it opened in 1994. Prison officials say the addition of cameras and other technology has lessened the need for guards.

Perhaps that's true. Or perhaps it's a convenient justification. Trouble is, everyone defining the problems and creating solutions has a self-interest that could color their assessment.

Colorado's congressional delegation has been active in pushing to resolve the prison's shortcomings, and they must work to penetrate the veil of ambiguity. A sweeping review of the prison's security and staffing should be conducted by the Government Accountability Office. The sooner the better.

Supermax Safety (PUEBCH)

Pueblo (CO) Chieftain, February 23, 2007

HOW SAFE is Supermax? U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales toured the nation's most secure federal prison on Wednesday and was assured security measures have been taken to beef up safety.

Sens. Wayne Allard and Ken Salazar accompanied the AG on the tour, and afterward Sen. Allard expressed confidence that the Administrative Maximum Security U.S. Penitentiary in Florence has been improved with technological upgrades. He added that more employees and more security measures could be coming in the future.

Sen. Salazar said, "We are committed to making sure this is the safest and most secure for the protection of the people who work and live here." Both senators previously had toured Supermax, and Sen. Salazar noted that staffing has been improved since then, in addition to the technology upgrades.

This is not to say that Supermax has not been without growing pains. An Inspector General's report issued last year detailed relaxed phone and mail monitoring, particularly for the terrorists being held inside the lockup.

As a result of that report, the Bureau of Prisons has monitored 100 percent of the mail to or from inmates designated as terrorists. All of those prisoners' phone calls also are monitored, although sometimes due to staffing patterns the calls are recorded, then listened to later.

Officials of the American Federation of Government Employees, the union representing the rank-and-file prison staffers, say more should be done to beef up security. Particularly, they believe staffing levels should be bolstered.

We certainly don't believe the prison housing the nastiest of nasties in the federal system ought to be operated unsafely, so the union's concerns should get a fair hearing. On the other hand, the judgment of the professional managers should also be given due weight.

Sen. Allard said the government probably will not be able to address 100 percent of the staffers' concerns at least right away - such things are a matter of available funding - but he added that more employees and more security could be coming in the future. With a growing prison population, such measures will have to be considered by Congress.

Report Details Harassment That Followed 9/11 Attacks (MINNST)

By Jean Hopfensperger, Star Tribune

Minneapolis Star Tribune, February 23, 2007

Minnesota Advocates for Human Rights says concerns about terrorism are exposing innocent people to discriminatory treatment.

Imani Jaafar-Mohammed, a Muslim lawyer from Woodbury, endured a neighbor throwing chunks of pork in her yard and yelling "terrorist!" from his window.

Hyder Khan, an Indian from Bloomington, says he can't print out his airline boarding pass in advance because there is a name like his on a security list.

Dipankar Mukherjee, an Asian theater director from Minneapolis, says he has heard airline passengers request that they be moved so they don't have to sit next to him.

DOJ_NMG_0135782

"When I used to travel back into the United States, people would say 'Welcome home,' " said Mukherjee. "Now they say, 'Step aside,' or 'Please go to this room.' "

The terrorist attacks of 9/11 still are casting a shadow on Minnesota's immigrant and Muslim community, according to a report issued Thursday by Minnesota Advocates for Human Rights. Racial and religious stereotyping continues to this day, as do overt acts of discrimination, the report said.

The 94-page report was based on interviews with more than 100 Minnesota immigrants. The events of 9/11 fueled changes in public attitudes toward national security and immigration that continue today, it said. Those changes were also aggravated by subsequent political campaigns targeting immigrants and the public debate over immigration reform, the report said.

"This was not meant to be a scientific study, but to detail history and real life experiences," said Robin Phillips, executive director of Minnesota Advocates for Human Rights. "We want to make sure that history and experience is included in the public policy dialogue."

Mukherjee, who spoke at a news conference Thursday announcing the report, was most exasperated by how he was constantly pulled from airport lines during "random" passenger checks. Once, after being released from one interview, he was pulled out of line again, less than an hour later.

The Department of Homeland Security, which oversees the Transportation Security Administration, has a policy strongly discouraging racial or ethnic profiling in law enforcement activities.

But immigrants are also targeted in unofficial ways, Mukherjee said. He recalled trying to get a receipt from a tow truck operator in Uptown last year. He said the operator yelled at him, "Why don't you first give me a receipt from the World Trade Center?"

Jaafar-Mohammed, meanwhile, said she and her husband had looked forward to their first home together in Woodbury. But the harassment from their neighbor reached the point that she feared for her safety. The Minneapolis attorney said she obtained a restraining order last year on the man, who eventually left their suburban neighborhood.

Harassment aside, federal policies to contain terrorism also continue to leave their mark, the report said. For example, some Muslims continue to worry whether their charitable donations to Islamic organizations could be construed as "material support" to terrorists groups, which is prohibited by the Patriot Act. Islam requires its followers to donate 2.5 percent of their savings to charity.

Several incidents of alleged misconduct by the FBI are mentioned in the report. A Somali man employed by a Twin Cities school district says he received a visit from the FBI at his home a day after he inquired about bus rentals for a school event. One of the questions he was asked; "What do you think of Saddam Hussein?"

FBI spokesman Paul McCabe said he had not been informed about the incidents mentioned in the report, and that they would be impossible to verify without names, dates and places. The authors of report, however, offered confidentiality to those they interviewed.

If people have concerns about the FBI, they should contact the FBI or a trusted community organization, he said. "We will investigate," McCabe said.

Phillips said that the Minnesota Advocates is interested in learning about other experiences -- good and bad -- resulting from Sept. 11. To report those experiences, or to view the report, go to www.mnadvocates.org.

In New Orleans, Progress At Last In The Lower Ninth Ward (NYT)

By Adam Nossiter

The New York Times, February 23, 2007

NEW ORLEANS, Feb. 22 — The first new houses built in the Lower Ninth Ward since Hurricane Katrina were turned over to their owners on Thursday, creating a small island of hope in a sea of ruin.

Side by side, sparkling and bright on Delery Street at the neighborhood's eastern edge, the two houses unveiled at a ceremony on Thursday stand out in a landscape grimly frozen since the storm. The twin pastel variants on traditional New Orleans architecture sit incongruously whole amid block after block of ruined shells with doors swinging open and windows gaping wide.

Empty during the day and dark at night, this area is a long way from being a neighborhood again, even though it has been the focus of intensive volunteer efforts and organizing since the storm. The destruction of the Lower Ninth Ward, which was working-class and black before the hurricane, and its subsequent failure to begin recovering, have become symbols for what some see as inequities in this city's halting revival.

That symbolism was much in evidence at the ceremony, a gathering of the homeowners and the varied volunteer forces that built the $125,000 solid pine houses, which officials said are elevated five feet and designed to resist hurricane-force winds.

DOJ_NMG_0135783

It was an occasion to look past the catastrophe that sent a wall of water rushing into the Lower Ninth Ward 18 months ago, at least for the moment. If the levees fail again and a similar volume of water comes through, the new houses will take only two feet of water, the contractor said.

There were promises on Thursday to bring the neighborhood back, particularly from Acorn, the nonprofit neighborhood group that organized the construction and helped finance the two houses. There was cheering, there were plaques for the volunteers, and there were speeches by politicians and preachers.

And there were the two sturdy women who had been next-door neighbors for 25 years until Hurricane Katrina blew their houses away, the owners Gwendolyn Guice and Josephine Butler, who received the keys to the new houses on Thursday.

Acorn and the volunteers built the houses on the same spot as the women's original ones, and both women seemed overcome at being back.

"I'm all over hoops," Ms. Guice said, switching between tears and smiles as she happily showed off her trim little green house, a subtle modification of the classic New Orleans front-to-back-hall style.

Looking out the back at a nearby school building with a collapsed roof and a muddy vacant lot where there was once a house, Ms. Guice was adamant that Thursday represented a hopeful beginning on a street that once sheltered many solid homeowners.

"A lot of people are just sitting back, waiting and seeing," Ms. Guice said.

Her re-installment and Ms. Butler's, she insisted, would help draw people back. And given the privations of her long exile, much of it spent in Houston, she would not be fazed by living in the ward's darkness and isolation, she suggested.

She showed no regrets about the fate of her old house.

"I never did find the den," Ms. Guice said. "It just shoved straight off. It might be floating in the gulf."

Still, the complications of the demonstration project on Delery Street raise questions about its usefulness as a prototype. The two houses were financed by Acorn and a California bank, and the two women are planning to repay their loans using their insurance proceeds and money they hope will be forthcoming from Louisiana's Road Home housing aid program. Louisiana State University's School of Architecture helped design the houses, students from the school helped build them, young people from Covenant House did odd jobs, a church provided landscaping, and even the novelist Richard Ford, who recently moved back to the city, pitched in.

How often this process could be replicated is unclear, though Acorn has money for more loans. Some believe that a neighborhood as destitute as this one cannot come back without large-scale intervention.

"I think we have a problem of quantity, and anything that can't be delivered in quantity is not a suitable prototype, regardless of the fantastic intentions," said Andrés Duany, the Miami architect and planner who has played a leading role in this city's efforts at rebuilding. "The verification is not aesthetics, not the degree of good will; it's quantity."

But under Thursday's bright sun, the focus was not on the hurdles.

"If you try not to focus on how bad everything is, you can focus on what is good," Allan Jones, an electrician who worked on the two houses, said as he surveyed the bleak landscape. "There is potential."

Mr. Ford spoke at the ceremony of the "valiant and hopeful house-raising," and those words captured the spirit of an enterprise that seemed as much a challenge to the future as a foundation for something new.

When Ms. Butler moved to the area nearly 60 years ago, it was still a semi-wilderness, recalled Tanya Harris, her granddaughter and an Acorn official.

"This was a shot in the dark," Ms. Harris said. "This was a leap of faith."

Senator Lott Floods The Zone (WSJ)

By Kimberley Strassel

The Wall Street Journal, February 23, 2007

One big question when Democrats took over Congress was which industry would be first to feel the new majority's populist rage. Oil? Pharma? Banks? Corporate America just got its answer, direct from the angriest man to have been empowered in the past election: Republican Sen. Trent Lott.

The Mississippian was "infuriated" by the insurance industry's refusal to shell out for certain Katrina claims, most notably his own. So Mr. Lott is spearheading a ferocious campaign of political revenge that would make even Henry Waxman envious -- replete with investigations, voracious trial lawyers, ambitious state attorneys general and threats of punitive federal legislation. And like most personal grievances that get morphed into policy battles, it's ending badly for consumers.

Mr. Lott's beachfront property in Pascagoula -- one of three homes he owned -- was swept away entirely by Hurricane Katrina's waters. Like many Gulf Coast residents, Mr. Lott was soon reminded by his insurer, State Farm, that his policy only covered wind damage -- not flood damage. The senator surely knew that, which is why he'd also purchased federal flood insurance. According to his flood policy that was in effect when Katrina hit, he was covered up to $350,000 in flood damages, and he presumably collected in full. (Sen. Lott's office didn't return my call.)

DOJ_NMG_0135784

State Farm, however, refused to cough up, inspiring Mr. Lott to embark on a campaign ripped straight out of the Democratic playbook. First was to pay a call to the favorite mob squad of the left, the plaintiffs' bar. Quicker than you can say "tort reform," Dickie Scruggs, the legal kingpin who engineered Mississippi's tobacco shakedown, was representing Mr. Lott in a high-profile lawsuit against State Farm.

Mr. Lott probably didn't have to do much special pleading, since Mr. Scruggs is his brother-in-law, and had also suffered Katrina damage. Mr. Scruggs is also a pal of Mississippi Attorney General Jim Hood, who within a few weeks of Katrina had filed a lawsuit against insurers over their "unconscionable" decision to not pay for damage they didn't cover. By December of 2005, the Lott-Scruggs-Hood triangle was proving a gale force storm for insurers.

For his part, Mr. Lott has been busy cranking up the pressure in Washington. Not that he didn't give fair warning. In July of last year, he placed a call to Chuck Chamness, the CEO of the National Association of Mutual Insurance Companies, to let the industry know what was coming. Mr. Chamness later sent a letter to Mr. Lott, summing up the call. The key passage: "Your comment that you will dedicate your next term of office to 'bringing down State Farm and the industry' through all means available to you, including legislation designed to harm the property/casualty insurance industry, was very unsettling, to say the least."

Mr. Lott has proven as good as his word. Since Katrina, he's slipped legislation into a Homeland Security bill requiring the inspector general of that agency to investigate insurers. He's put forward a bill requiring insurers to "state clearly" on their policies' "front page" what they don't cover. He's dropped another bill that would compel insurers to release more information about vehicles damaged by Katrina. Word is he's even been looking into the industry's tax rates.

But his big bomb came last week, when he introduced legislation that would end the insurance industry's exemption from certain federal antitrust regulations. Mr. Lott suggests this is to keep big insurance players from conspiring to do evil things, though the reality is that the exemption mainly benefits small insurers who use it to pool statistically reliable data. So in his wrath, Mr. Lott may end up kneecapping many of the hundreds of small insurers who offer some real competition to the so-called conspiring giants.

Democrats have been only too happy to assist in this fight, given their own ambitions of turning the Katrina mess to their political advantage. Mr. Lott's been getting his biggest help from fellow Mississippian and Democrat Gene Taylor -- who also has a beef with State Farm and was part of the Scruggs lawsuit. In January, Mr. Taylor asked Financial Services Committee chief Barney Frank for an investigation into insurers' Katrina practices. Mr. Frank was only too happy to take the first step and next week Mr. Taylor will be the star witness in a subcommittee hearing about insurers' decision not to pay claims. Next up: subpoenas.

(Congressman Taylor, in a conversation with me yesterday, said he thinks it is "extremely appropriate" that he is in this insurance fight because "what happened to my constituents, my neighbors and my friends also happened to me.")

Meanwhile, Attorney General Hood has deftly used Messrs. Lott's and Taylor's Washington moves as a prod for his own agenda. In a public statement in January he noted that if insurers didn't settle with him, and continued "with their 'robber baron' mentality, I think that Congressman Taylor and [Congressman Bennie] Thompson and Senator Lott will see to it that we have national insurance reform." How's that for a threat?

Within a few weeks State Farm had agreed to settle with the Attorney General Hood and to review 35,000 claims, as well as agreed to pay off all those in the Scruggs lawsuit, including Messrs. Lott and Taylor. Any bets on just how big a slice of his contingency fees Mr. Scruggs will now donate to the Democratic National Committee for next year's elections?

Lost among all the politicians' war-whooping over the State Farm capitulation, is the effect this extortion has had on the private insurance industry. In recent weeks companies from State Farm to AllState have stopped writing policies in parts of Mississippi, which will result in consumers having fewer insurance choices, if they can find insurance at all.

Ah, but never fear: Washington has a solution for that, too. In the face of insurers exiting his state (in no small part because of the actions of politicians), Mr. Taylor earlier this month introduced yet another piece of insurance legislation. This one would expand the national flood insurance program to cover other hurricane-related damage. In other words, the Mississippian wants to create a new federal disaster insurance program that will put taxpayers -- rather than private insurers -- on the hook next time a storm hits. Revenge is a scary thing.

WAR NEWS:

Senate Dems Move To Limit Iraq Mission (AP)

DOJ_NMG_0135785

By David Espo
AP, February 23, 2007

Determined to challenge President Bush, Senate Democrats are drafting legislation to limit the mission of U.S. troops in Iraq, effectively revoking the broad authority Congress granted in 2002, officials said Thursday.

While these officials said the precise wording of the measure remains unsettled, one draft would restrict American troops in Iraq to combating al-Qaida, training Iraqi army and police forces, maintaining Iraq's territorial integrity and otherwise proceeding with the withdrawal of combat forces.

The officials, Democratic aides and others familiar with private discussions, spoke only on condition of anonymity, saying rank-and-file senators had not yet been briefed on the effort. They added, though, the Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid is expected to present the proposal to fellow Democrats early next week for their consideration.

The plan is to attempt to add the measure to anti-terrorism legislation that scheduled to be on the Senate floor next week and the week following.

Jim Manley, a spokesman for Reid, declined to discuss the deliberations, saying only, "No final decisions have been made on how to proceed."

Any attempt to limit Bush's powers as commander in chief would likely face strong opposition from Republican allies of the administration in the Senate and could also face a veto threat.

The decision to try to limit the military mission marks the next move in what Reid and other Senate war critics have said will be a multistep effort to force a change in Bush's strategy and eventually force an end to U.S. participation in the nearly four-year-old war.

Earlier efforts to pass a nonbinding measure critical of Bush's decision to deploy 21,500 additional troops ended in gridlock after Senate Republicans blocked votes on two separate measures.

The emerging Senate plan differs markedly from an approach favored by critics of the war in the House, where a nonbinding measure passed last week.

Speaker Nancy Pelosi has said she expects the next challenge to Bush's war policies to come in the form of legislation requiring the Pentagon to adhere to strict training and readiness standards in the case of troops ticketed for the war zone.

Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., the leading advocate of that approach, has said it would effectively deny Bush the ability to proceed with the troop buildup that has been partially implemented since he announced it in January.

Some Senate Democrats have been privately critical of that approach, saying it would have virtually no chance of passing and could easily backfire politically in the face of Republican arguments that it would deny reinforcements to troops already in the war zone.

Several Senate Democrats have called in recent days for revoking the original authorization that Bush sought and won from Congress in the months before the U.S.-led invasion that toppled Saddam Hussein.

That measure authorized the president to use the armed forces "as he determines to be necessary and appropriate ... to defend the national security of the United States against the continuing threat posed by Iraq" and to enforce relevant United Nations Security Council resolutions.

At the time the world body had passed resolutions regarding Iraq's presumed effort to develop weapons of mass destruction.

In a speech last week, Sen. Joseph Biden of Delaware, chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, said, "I am working on legislation to repeal that authorization and replace it with a much narrower mission statement for our troops in Iraq."

He added that Congress should make clear what the mission of U.S. troops is: to responsibly draw down, while continuing to combat terrorists, train Iraqis and respond to emergencies.

"We should make equally clear what their mission is not: to stay in Iraq indefinitely and get mired in a savage civil war," said Biden, a 2008 Democratic presidential candidate.

Along with Biden, officials said Sen. Carl Levin of Michigan, chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, and a small group of key Democrats were involved in the effort to draft legislation. Leadership aides are also playing a role.

It was not clear whether the measure would explicitly state that the 2002 authorization for the use of military force was being revoked. One proposal that had been circulated would declare that Bush was not authorized to involve U.S. armed forces in an Iraqi civil war, but it appeared that prohibition had been dropped as part of the discussions.

One Democrat said the legislation could remain silent on the issue of Bush's troop increase and noted that Reid had said he was ready to move beyond the deployment of more troops.

At the same time, several officials noted that any explicit authority for U.S. troops to confront al-Qaida would effectively bless Bush's decision to dispatch about 3,500 troops to the volatile Anbar Province in the western part of Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0135786

The balance of the 21,500 additional troops would go to Baghdad, where the administration hopes they can help quell sectarian violence and give the Iraqi government time to establish its authority.

Democrats May Try To Limit Iraq Mission (USAT)

USA Today, February 23, 2007

Senate Democrats are drafting legislation that would limit the mission of U.S. troops in Iraq, Democratic aides told the Associated Press on Thursday.

The aides said that the precise wording of the measure has yet to be determined but that one draft would restrict American troops in Iraq to combating al-Qaeda, training Iraqi army and police forces, maintaining Iraq's territorial integrity and otherwise proceeding with the withdrawal of combat forces.

The aides and others familiar with private discussions spoke on condition of anonymity because most senators had not yet been briefed.

U.S. cancels Nevada bomb test

The Pentagon canceled a planned explosion over the Nevada desert to test a conventional weapon intended for use on underground facilities that produce and store weapons of mass destruction. James Tegnelia of the Defense Threat Reduction Agency said, "It's time to look at alternative methods" that don't involve "this type of large-scale test." Indian tribes and state officials said the test could kick up radioactive material from earlier nuclear tests.

Ga. congressional election set

Georgia Gov. Sonny Perdue set June 19 for a special election to fill the congressional seat left vacant by the death last week of Republican Rep. Charles Norwood. If no candidate receives a majority, a runoff between the top two vote-getters will be July 17. Norwood, 65, was in his seventh term.

Bush touts use of biofuels

President Bush, touting his plan to boost use of biofuels fivefold over 10 years, toured a Franklinton, N.C., laboratory that is working on ways to convert wood chips to ethanol. Bush's plan relies on advances in making ethanol from sources such as wood chips and switchgrass rather than just corn. Bush's trip is designed to promote energy initiatives he outlined in his State of the Union address.

Senate Democrats Keep Pressure On Bush With Plan To Limit Iraq Mission To Counterterrorism (NYT)

By Carl Hulse

The New York Times, February 23, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 22 — Senior Senate Democrats, stepping up their confrontation with President Bush over Iraq policy, are preparing legislation that would limit the role of United States troops there to counterterrorism efforts and prohibit them from interceding in sectarian violence.

Senate officials said Thursday that the proposal now being drafted would be a new turn in their attempts to force the White House to halt its troop buildup in Baghdad. They described it as more substantive than the nonbinding resolution of opposition to the increase that stalled in the Senate last Saturday.

The officials would speak only if not identified because the central proposal was still being drafted and needs to be presented to all Senate Democrats when they return from a weeklong recess next Tuesday.

They said the proposal was intended to essentially overturn the 2002 resolution granting Mr. Bush the authority to remove Saddam Hussein from power, and limit the military to combating Al Qaeda in Iraq, keeping Iraq from becoming a haven for terrorists and training Iraqi forces. The proposal's goal, officials said, would be to allow combat forces not engaged in those duties to be removed from Iraq next year.

The chief authors are Senators Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware, the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, and Carl Levin of Michigan, the chairman of the Armed Services Committee. The plan is to try to attach the proposal to an antiterrorism bill the Senate expects to begin considering Tuesday.

Lawmakers and senior aides said that such a plan was unlikely to pass Congress, and even if it did, it would certainly be vetoed by President Bush. But Democrats say their intention is to keep pressure on both Mr. Bush and Congressional Republicans who are facing a public frustrated with the war. Democrats say that other Iraq proposals are likely to emerge as well.

Senate Democrats say they prefer the emphasis on the mission of American troops over a plan by some House members to try to limit United States military involvement by putting restraints on troop deployments based on readiness and equipment availability.

DOJ_NMG_0135787

Senate Democrats have been discussing such an approach in recent weeks and decided to forge ahead after Senate Republicans were able to block a vote on the resolution criticizing the troop buildup even though 56 senators, including 7 Republicans, voted last Saturday to debate the resolution.

In meetings with Senator Harry Reid of Nevada, the majority leader, and other Democratic leaders, officials said a consensus emerged that trying to redefine the 2002 resolution was the best approach. Officials said lawmakers and senior aides were still refining the exact language that would be used and were uncertain whether the new proposal would explicitly repeal the initial Iraq war resolution, amend it or take another avenue. "We haven't crossed that bridge yet," one official said.

But he and others said they believed the initiative made good political and policy sense because the circumstances had changed so much since the 2002 vote, with Saddam Hussein executed and the search for weapons of mass destruction coming up empty.

Senator Biden foreshadowed his approach in a speech last week when he said that the "the best next step is to revisit the authorization Congress granted the president in 2002 to use force in Iraq. That's exactly what I'm doing."

"We gave the president that power to destroy Iraq's weapons of mass destruction and, if necessary, to depose Saddam Hussein," he said. "The W.M.D. were not there. Saddam Hussein is no longer there. The 2002 authorization is no longer relevant to the situation in Iraq."

Republican leaders have already said they expected the new Democratic effort to be blocked. But Democrats said they saw it as the next step to building a case against Mr. Bush's war effort and that Republicans could be drawn to it if the war continued to go badly.

They said they believed that the initiative had the capacity to attract broad support from Democrats even though members of the party were splintered over how aggressively to confront Mr. Bush over the war. Officials said they were heartened that the Democratic senators Edward M. Kennedy of Massachusetts and Russell D. Feingold of Wisconsin, two strong war opponents, seemed open to the idea of embracing the new proposal by Senators Levin and Biden.

Jim Manley, a spokesman for Mr. Reid, would not discuss the plans that Democrats have for moving forward on Iraq policy next week, saying no final decisions had been made on how to proceed.

Democrats Seek To Repeal 2002 War Authorization (WP)

By Shailagh Murray And Jonathan Weisman

The Washington Post, February 23, 2007

Senate Democratic leaders intend to unveil a plan next week to repeal the 2002 resolution authorizing the war in Iraq in favor of narrower authority that restricts the military's role and begins withdrawals of combat troops.

House Democrats have pulled back from efforts to link additional funding for the war to strict troop-readiness standards after the proposal came under withering fire from Republicans and from their party's own moderates. That strategy was championed by Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.) and endorsed by House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.).

"If you strictly limit a commander's ability to rotate troops in and out of Iraq, that kind of inflexibility could put some missions and some troops at risk," said Rep. Chet Edwards (D-Tex.), who personally lodged his concerns with Murtha.

In both chambers, Democratic lawmakers are eager to take up binding legislation that would impose clear limits on U.S. involvement in Iraq after nearly four years of war. But Democrats remain divided over how to proceed. Some want to avoid the funding debate altogether, fearing it would invite Republican charges that the party is not supporting the troops. Others take a more aggressive view, believing the most effective way to confront President Bush's war policy is through a $100 billion war-spending bill that the president ultimately must sign to keep the war effort on track.

Last week, the House approved a nonbinding resolution that criticized Bush's decision to deploy an additional 21,500 troops, but the measure was blocked in the Senate by Republicans during a rare Saturday session. It is probable that Senate Democrats will encounter the same procedural roadblock in attempting to push through another resolution, in particular one with real teeth.

"I've had enough of 'nonbinding,' " said Sen. John F. Kerry (D-Mass.), who is helping to draft the new Democratic proposal. The 2002 war resolution, he said, is an obvious target.

"The authorization that we gave the president back in 2002 is completely, completely outdated, inappropriate to what we're engaged in today," he said.

Senate Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Joseph R. Biden Jr. (D-Del.) began calling for a reauthorization of the war early last month and raised it again last week, during a gathering in the office of Majority Leader Harry M. Reid (D-Nev.). Participants included Kerry, Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl M. Levin (Mich.), Charles E. Schumer (N.Y.), Jack Reed (R.I.) and Russell Feingold (Wis.). Those Democratic senators have emerged as an unofficial war council representing the caucus's wide range of views.

DOJ_NMG_0135788

"We gave the president that power to destroy Iraq's weapons of mass destruction and, if necessary, to depose Saddam Hussein," Biden said of the 2002 resolution in a speech last week before the Brookings Institution. "The WMD was not there. Saddam Hussein is no longer there. The 2002 authorization is no longer relevant to the situation in Iraq."

Biden and Levin are drafting language to present to their colleagues when the Senate reconvenes on Tuesday, following a week-long recess.

The new framework would set a goal for withdrawing combat brigades by March 31, 2008, the same timetable established by the bipartisan Iraq Study Group. Once the combat phase ends, troops would be restricted to assisting Iraqis with training, border security and counterterrorism.

Senior Democratic aides said the proposed resolution would be sent directly to the Senate floor for action, without committee review, possibly as an amendment to a homeland security bill scheduled for debate next week.

Reid said no final decision had been made on the timing. Spokesman Jim Manley said Reid wants to present the idea to other Democrats before determining how and when to proceed.

Party leaders in the House are likely to present a proposal for binding legislation to the Democratic caucus next week, according to lawmakers in that chamber. But lawmakers and senior Democratic aides said Murtha's plan would have to be scaled back dramatically, after a week-long Republican assault.

Murtha, chairman of the Appropriations defense subcommittee and a leading critic of the war, had intended to fully fund Bush's $100 billion war request for the remainder of this fiscal year. But under his plan, those funds could be spent only to deploy combat troops deemed fully rested, trained and equipped.

After nearly four years of combat, most military units would not be able to meet those standards. Although the war would be fully funded, the policy would prevent some of the 21,500 additional combat troops from being deployed, and some troops already in Iraq would have to be sent home.

But that approach may be all but dead, according to several Democratic lawmakers. Murtha doomed his own plan in part by unveiling it on a left-wing Web site, inflaming party moderates.

"Congress has no business micromanaging a war, cutting off funding or even conditioning those funds," said Rep. Jim Cooper (Tenn.), a leading Democratic moderate, who called Murtha's whole effort "clumsy."

Cooper's position underscores the challenges now facing the House Democratic leadership. While the caucus's liberal wing is demanding legislation to end the war almost immediately, moderates such as Cooper say Congress should focus on oversight of the war and stay away from legislation that encroaches on the war powers of the president.

"I think Congress begins to skate on thin ice when we start to micromanage troop deployments and rotations," said Texas's Edwards, whose views reflect those of several other Democrats from conservative districts.

House Democratic Caucus Chairman Rahm Emanuel (Ill.) pointed out that Democrats still have public opinion strongly on their side and that a vote on any plan would place Republicans in more jeopardy than Democrats. A new, more restrictive authorization for the war also is gaining serious consideration in the House, Emanuel noted.

Several Democratic aides say the Iraq funding bill, due for a vote the week of March 12, may contain some of Murtha's demands for more training and better equipment for combat troops. But the proposals that set the toughest requirements are likely to drop out, such as a demand that troops be trained on and deployed with the combat equipment they will use in Iraq.

More important, the legislation may include a waiver that the president or defense secretary could invoke to deploy troops who are not fully combat-ready, Democratic aides said. That way, the commander in chief's hands would not be tied.

But under such a bill the president would have to publicly acknowledge that he is deploying troops with less than a year's rest from combat, that he is extending combat tours of troops in Iraq, or that he is sending units into battle without full training in counterinsurgency or urban warfare, the aides said.

Lieberman Says War Vote Could Prompt Party Switch (POL)

By Carrie Budoff

Politico.com, February 23, 2007

Sen. Joseph I. Lieberman of Connecticut told the Politico on Thursday that he has no immediate plans to switch parties but suggested that Democratic opposition to funding the war in Iraq might change his mind.

Lieberman, a self-styled independent who caucuses with the Democrats, has been among the strongest supporters of the war and President Bush's plan to send an additional 21,500 combat troops into Iraq to help quell the violence there.

"I have no desire to change parties," Lieberman said in a telephone interview. "If that ever happens, it is because I feel the majority of Democrats have gone in a direction that I don't feel comfortable with."

Asked whether that hasn't already happened with Iraq, Lieberman said: "We will see how that plays out in the coming months," specifically how the party approaches the issue of continued funding for the war.

DOJ_NMG_0135789

He suggested, however, that the forthcoming showdown over new funding could be a deciding factor that would lure him to the Republican Party.

"I hope we don't get to that point," Lieberman said. "That's about all I will say on it today. That would hurt."

Republicans have long targeted Lieberman to switch – a move that would give them control of the Senate. And Time magazine is set to report Friday that there is a "remote" chance Lieberman would join the GOP.

What Joe Lieberman Wants... (TIME)

By Massimo Calabresi

Time, February 23, 2007

In his 18 years in the U.S. Senate, Joe Lieberman has cultivated an image of himself as a lonely prude among the morally corrupt, that rare Washington official who places principle above politics. But with the Democrats' hold on power dependent on just one vote — in effect, his — and with Republicans courting him to tilt the balance in their favor, Lieberman has been indulging in some fairly immodest political footsie. Early this year he terrified fellow Democrats by skipping several of the weekly caucus lunches that cement party fidelity in the Senate. Recently he was spotted in the Republican cloakroom talking with South Carolina's Lindsey Graham about reforming Social Security. He even says he might vote Republican for President in 2008, a not-so-veiled hint that he would prefer John McCain, his fellow true believer in the Iraq war, to most, perhaps all, Democratic alternatives.

The Democrats' 2000 candidate for Vice President is the only party member in the Senate supporting President Bush's Iraq policy and says he is "very troubled about the direction the party is heading on foreign policy generally." With his re-election in November, many old allies now rue abandoning him after he lost the Connecticut Democratic primary to Ned Lamont last August. Both sides concede that bitterness remains. "It's still a little painful and awkward," says the majority whip, Dick Durbin, "but I think the caucus counts him as a friend."

Lieberman says leaving the Democratic Party is a "very remote possibility." But even that slight ambiguity — and all his cross-aisle flirtation — has proved more than enough to position Lieberman as the Senate's one-man tipping point. If he were to jump ship, the ensuing shift of power to Republicans would scramble the politics of the war in Iraq, undercut the Democrats' national agenda and potentially weaken their hopes for the White House in 2008. Those stakes are high enough to give Lieberman leverage with both parties no matter how slim the chance of his crossing the aisle. Which means Senate leaders aren't worrying only about whether Joe Lieberman will switch parties. They're wondering what, if anything, he plans to do with the power that comes from keeping that possibility alive.

So far, Lieberman is using his clout mostly in ways that discomfit his fellow Democrats, while his relationship with Republicans has involved more collaboration than coercion. When Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid said Bush's State of the Union proposal for a bipartisan terrorism panel was redundant, Lieberman, who supported the idea, privately sent Reid a letter saying he was "upset." Within days, Reid backed down and negotiated the panel's makeup with the White House. And last month, after Lieberman told Reid he had stopped attending the weekly Democratic lunch because he didn't feel comfortable discussing Iraq there, Reid offered to hold those discussions at another time. Lieberman has started attending again.

It stands to reason that Lieberman, a lifelong Democrat, would be interested in extracting concessions from Republicans as well. He describes himself as a hawk abroad, and lately his rhetoric has come to resemble the G.O.P.'s, notably when he said Democratic opposition to Bush's troop surge would "discourage our troops, hearten our enemies." But he's progressive at home; he has a long record of fighting for environmental concerns, prides himself on his early support for the civil rights movement and has earned strong ratings from labor. He's even working on a military mental-health bill with California liberal Barbara Boxer. His staff claims he votes with Democrats more than 90% of the time, if Iraq is removed from the calculation.

And Lieberman is uniquely positioned to influence the Bush Administration. In December 2004 the White House "sounded him out" for the job of U.N. ambassador, says a source close to Lieberman, and although he declined the offer, he remains in regular contact with the Executive Branch. Before Bush's State of the Union speech in January, National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley brought in Lieberman for a private consultation with the President. Lieberman says he talks with or e-mails Hadley, Homeland Security chief Michael Chertoff and White House legislative-affairs head Candida Wolff every week or two.

Lieberman's G.O.P. flirtation has its risks — and a time limit. By this time next year, the 2008 election cycle will overshadow anything that happens in the Senate. The longer he waits to capitalize on his moment, the greater the danger that he'll be tagged as one of those politicians for whom having power is more important than using it.

Republican Critic Of Iraq Policy Vows Not To 'Starve' The War (MCT)

By Renee Schoof

McClatchy Newspapers, February 23, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0135790

WASHINGTON - A longtime Republican opponent of the Iraq war, Rep. Walter Jones of North Carolina, broke ranks Thursday with Democratic Rep. John Murtha over Murtha's plan to attach conditions to war funds.

The split signals that divisions among war opponents are likely to emerge next week when Congress returns from recess. Murtha and other Democrats have said they'll look at how they might use congressional power over military regulations and funding to pressure the Bush administration to redeploy U.S. forces out of Iraq.

Murtha, D-Pa., chairs the House Appropriations Defense Subcommittee. Last week he said he'd amend the bill funding the war so that U.S. troop deployments couldn't be extended beyond one year and so that troops would have at least one year at home between deployments and be certified as "fully combat ready" with training and equipment before being sent.

Murtha also said he'd try to prevent the military from using "stop-loss" orders to force soldiers to remain on active duty beyond the terms of their enlistments.

Murtha said those steps would effectively stop the troop increase.

"They won't be able to do the deployment," he said. "They won't have the equipment. They won't have the training."

Jones applauded Murtha's intention to require proper training and equipment, but he said he opposed any effort to "starve" the war.

"I believe that we must take great care to ensure that any effort to provide for our armed forces not be used as a proxy for resolving larger issues concerning the war in Iraq," Jones wrote in a letter to Murtha. "Any attempt to starve the war as a way of bringing it to a conclusion, rather than through a serious policy debate about the best way forward in Iraq, would be wrong."

Jones argued that until "elected officials in Washington" change the mission of the troops in Iraq, "their funding should be unfettered by appropriations strings."

Murtha didn't issue an immediate public response to Jones.

Jones was a co-sponsor of the nonbinding resolution the House of Representatives passed earlier this month that opposed President Bush's plan to send more than 21,000 additional U.S. soldiers and Marines to Iraq.

A conservative whose district includes the Camp Lejeune Marine Corps base, Jones voted in 2002 for the resolution that authorized the war in Iraq. Later, he concluded that pro-war administration officials had manipulated intelligence and that the war was unjustified. Jones called on Bush in 2005 to set a timetable to begin withdrawing troops by fall 2006.

Jones has personally signed more than 6,000 two-page letters to the families of all Americans killed in Afghanistan and Iraq.

In his letter to Murtha, Jones said he holds accountable "those institutions and individuals who have made serious misjudgments leading up to, and during, the war in Iraq." But he added that he had assured his constituents and members of the armed forces that he wouldn't vote to cut off funding for troops in the field.

Jones easily won re-election in November to his seventh term.

Rep. Sam Johnson Emerges As GOP Voice In War Debate (LAT)

By Richard Simon

The Los Angeles Times, February 23, 2007

WASHINGTON — When House Republicans needed a John McCain-like war hero to lead their fight against Democratic assaults on President Bush's Iraq strategy, they turned to another former POW, a Texas Republican named Sam Johnson.

Though less known than Sen. McCain (R-Ariz.), his onetime cellmate in Vietnam, Johnson spent nearly seven years in a prisoner of war camp, about half of it in solitary confinement. When he took to the House floor during last week's emotional debate on the Iraq war, the 76-year-old former fighter pilot drew heavily on Vietnam experiences.

He spoke about his 2,494 days of "hell on Earth" in captivity and his "rat-infested 3-by-8 dark and filthy cell," while displaying the effects of injuries he sustained 34 years ago: a mangled right hand, stooped posture and slow gait.

Johnson has emerged as the House GOP's point man in an escalating fight in Congress over Bush's execution of the war — a position that puts him opposite another decorated Vietnam veteran, Rep. John P. Murtha (D-Pa.). GOP leaders see Johnson as the Republican best suited to counter Murtha, an ex-Marine and defense hawk who has become a influential war critic. "I respect John Murtha as a Marine," Johnson said. "However, serviceman to serviceman, I think his efforts are misguided."

Johnson is preparing for the next phase of challenges to Bush's war strategy. Murtha, who heads the House defense appropriations subcommittee, is moving to attach strings to Bush's war-funding request that could thwart his plan to add 21,500 troops to the 135,000-plus already in Iraq.

Both parties have featured military veterans prominently to make their case in the debate over the 4-year-old war.

Johnson led a parade of congressional military veterans in the GOP's losing fight last week against a symbolic resolution, sponsored by the House's Democratic majority, that put the chamber on record against a buildup of U.S. troops in Iraq.

He marked the 34th anniversary of his first full day of freedom from POW camp during the debate.

DOJ_NMG_0135791

And he gave the closing speech — one of the most impassioned during four days of debate — opposing the resolution.

"Let my body serve as a brutal reminder that we must not repeat the mistakes of the past," Johnson said. "We must not cut funding for our troops. We must stick by them. We must support them all the way."

He delivered a salute and returned to his seat as members of both parties applauded.

A Johnson staffer said the response to Johnson's stand had been overwhelmingly positive. "We've received phone calls from across America of grown men crying," said communications director McCall Avery.

But, said Texas state Rep. Lon Burnam, a Democrat who is director of the Dallas Peace Center, Johnson is going against public opinion on the war. "Sam Johnson is never going to pay attention to that because he is a hard-right, ideologically driven hawk," he said. "We don't bother to go to talk to him."

Liberal bloggers have also taken Johnson to task, posting remarks he made in 1995 in support of withholding funds from President Clinton's plan to send 20,000 American peacekeeping troops to Bosnia.

"I wholeheartedly support withholding funds from President Clinton's Bosnia mission," Johnson said then. "Although it is a drastic step and ties the president's hands, I do not feel like we have any other choice. The president has tied our hands, gone against the wishes of the American people, and this is the last best way I know how to show my respect for our American servicemen and -women."

Johnson defended his earlier comments Thursday, noting that in 1995 he opposed the deployment of troops to Bosnia "in the first place."

"In 2002, I supported sending our guys to Iraq, and I stand by that decision today," he said. "The Democrats who voted to go to war in Iraq in 2002 and just voted against our troops are the ones who are changing their tune."

Johnson made headlines in 2005 for suggesting that the weapons of mass destruction that U.S. troops failed to find in Iraq were in Syria and offering to drop a nuclear bomb on the country.

He later said he was joking.

Johnson was elected to the House in 1991 after serving six years in the Texas Legislature. Before that, he served in the Air Force for 29 years, once flying with the Thunderbirds, the Air Force's precision demonstration team.

He flew 62 combat missions in the Korean War in a plane named Shirley's Texas Tornado after his then-wife. On his 25th Vietnam mission, he was shot down in 1966 and captured.

"While in solitary confinement, my captors kept me in leg stocks, like the pilgrims, … for 72 days," he recalled during the debate. Next, he said, "they put me in leg irons … for 2 1/2 years."

Last week was not the first time Bush's allies called on Johnson because of his military background. In the 2000 presidential campaign, Johnson went to South Carolina to campaign for Bush against McCain. And during the 2004 campaign, Johnson called Democratic presidential candidate Sen. John F. Kerry, a decorated Vietnam veteran, "Hanoi John" — a comparison to actress Jane Fonda, who is still reviled by many for her trip to North Vietnam during the war.

But Johnson, a conservative, also has broken with Bush. He recently opposed a Vietnam trade agreement that was a presidential priority, and Bush's call to include a guest-worker program in an immigration overhaul.

No Way To End A War (WP)

By Charles Krauthammer

The Washington Post, February 23, 2007

The United States has fought many wars since 1941 but has never again declared one. No one abroad declares war anymore either, perhaps because it has the anachronistic feel of an aristocratic challenge. Whatever the reason, today Congress doesn't declare war; it "authorizes" the "use of force."

In October 2002, both houses of Congress did exactly that with open eyes and large majorities. Sen. Jay Rockefeller, a Democratic member of the Senate intelligence committee who had access to all the relevant information at the time, said, "I have come to the inescapable conclusion that the threat posed to America by Saddam's weapons of mass destruction is so serious that despite the risks -- and we should not minimize the risks -- we must authorize the president to take the necessary steps to deal with that threat."

Now, more than four years later, the Democrats want out of the resulting war. Most, such as Rep. John Murtha, want to do so for a simple reason: They think the war is lost. If you believe that, then getting out is the most reasonable and honorable and patriotic policy.

Congress has the power to do that by cutting off the funds. But Democrats will not, because it is politically dangerous. Instead, they are seeking other ways, clever ways. The House is pursuing a method, developed by Murtha and deemed "ingenious" by antiwar activist Tom Andrews of Win Without War, to impose a conditional cutoff of funds, ostensibly in the name of protecting the troops. Unless the troops are given the precise equipment, training and amount of rest Murtha stipulates -- no funds.

DOJ_NMG_0135792

Unfortunately for the Democrats, Murtha is not disingenuous enough to have concealed the real motive for these ostensibly pro-readiness, pro-troops conditions. He has chosen conditions he knows are impossible to meet -- "We have analyzed this, and we have come to the conclusion that it can't be done," he told MoveCongress.org -- in order to make the continued prosecution of the war difficult, if not impossible, for the commanders in the field.

But think of what that entails. It leaves the existing 130,000 troops out there without the reinforcements and tactical flexibility that the commander, Gen. David H. Petraeus, says he needs to win.

Of course, the Democrats believe the war cannot be won. But if that's the case, they should order a withdrawal by cutting off funds. They shouldn't micromanage the war in a way that will make winning impossible. That not only endangers the troops remaining in the field, it also makes the Democrats' "the war is lost" mantra a self-fulfilling prophecy.

Murtha's ruse is so transparent that even Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman Carl Levin, who opposes the war, will not countenance it: "I think that sends the wrong message to our troops."

Levin has a different idea -- change the original October 2002 authorization. "We . . . will be looking at modification of that authorization in order to limit the mission of American troops to a support mission instead of a combat mission," says Levin. "That is very different from cutting funds."

While this idea is not as perverse as Murtha's, it is totally illogical. There is something exceedingly strange about authorizing the use of force -- except for combat. That is an oxymoron. Changing the language of authorization means -- if it means anything -- that Petraeus will have to surround himself with lawyers who will tell him, every time he wants to deploy a unit, whether he is ordering a legal "support" mission or an illegal "combat" mission.

If Levin wants to withdraw our forces from the civil war in the cities to more secure bases from which we can continue training and launching operations against al-Qaeda, he should present that to the country as an alternative to (or a fallback after) the administration's troop surge. But to force it on our commanders through legalisms is simply to undermine their ability to fight the war occurring on the ground today.

Slowly bleeding our forces by defunding what our commanders think they need to win (the House approach) or rewording the authorization of the use of force so that lawyers decide what operations are to be launched (the Senate approach) is no way to fight a war. It is no way to end a war. It is a way to complicate the war and make it inherently unwinnable -- and to shirk the political responsibility for doing so.

letters@charleskrauthammer.com

Free Nations Can't Ignore Terror, Cheney Warns (WT)

By Michael Keats

The Washington Times, February 23, 2007

SYDNEY, Australia --Vice President Dick Cheney warned today that the United States and a key ally, Australia, "simply cannot indulge" thoughts of an early withdrawal from Iraq because it would spawn a new wave of global terror.

Mr. Cheney, on a two-day visit to a staunch U.S. ally, praised Prime Minister John Howard's firm support of the U.S.-led war and its fight against terror, saying the only option for survival was to fight back ferociously.

"The notion that free countries can turn our backs on what happens in places like Afghanistan, Iraq or any other possible safe haven for terrorists is an option we simply cannot indulge," Mr. Cheney said in Sydney.

"We are determined to prevail in Iraq because we understand the consequences of failure. If our coalition withdrew before Iraqis could defend themselves, radical factions would battle for dominance over the country," he said.

Ahead of Mr. Cheney's Sydney visit today, anti-war demonstrators scuffled with police.

Mr. Cheney arrived with assurances for Mr. Howard in the face of mounting domestic criticism of the Iraq war.

Opposition leader Kevin Rudd, meanwhile, seized on Britain's decision to reduce its troop presence in southern Iraq, arguing that Australia should follow suit.

Hours before Mr. Cheney's plane touched down in Sydney last night, about 250 demonstrators defied a police ban to march through the city center to the Sydney Town Hall.

Authorities made at least 10 arrests when the demonstrators set out for the U.S. Consulate chanting: "Troops out now," "Jail Cheney," and "Free David Hicks" -- a reference to the Australian who has been languishing in the U.S. prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, since his capture in Afghanistan five years ago.

Hundreds of police are involved in a security operation that has locked down access to several areas of Sydney, where Mr. Cheney will stay before departing Sunday.

DOJ_NMG_0135793

Mr. Cheney's visit comes at a testing time for Mr. Howard's Liberal-National coalition government, which faces a national election later this year.

The latest public-opinion survey, a Newspoll published Tuesday, has Labor Party leader Mr. Rudd ahead of Mr. Howard as preferred prime minister by 47 percent to 37 percent.

Mr. Howard has ruled out following Britain and Denmark in withdrawing forces from Iraq and has been at pains to stress that there are still 10 times the number of British troops remaining in Iraq than those from Australia -- with the U.S. commitment even greater.

Powell Backs Surge, Time Frame To Quell 'civil War' (JC)

By Dan Shaw

Journal and Courier, February 23, 2007

Former Secretary of State Colin Powell told an audience at Purdue University that he supports sending more American soldiers to Iraq.

But if the troop surge does not quell what he characterized as a "civil war" within a year, the United States should begin to leave, he said.

"The situation is getting more and more confused," he told an audience of slightly more than 1,000 people seated in the Loeb Playhouse on the Purdue campus Thursday.

Powell was invited to be the featured speaker during the university's annual celebration of National Engineers Week. Last year, Purdue brought another former secretary of state -- Madeleine Albright -- for the event.

Speaking about the conflicts in the Middle East, Powell said the United States was right to retaliate against Afghanistan after the attacks of Sept. 11, 2001. But he was less certain when discussing the invasion of Iraq.

He conceded that the intelligence on Iraq's having weapons of mass destruction was misleading.

"But we were not wrong about the nature of this regime, and I am glad that it is gone," he said. "I hope the Iraqis will the seize the opportunity we have given them."

After Powell finished speaking, aeronautical engineering student John Wright said, "I liked that he was so direct and upfront about the intelligence they had. He owned up to the pitfalls and never backed down."

During the middle of the speech, Powell had to stop talking temporarily when a fire alarm sounded.

Jeanne Norberg, spokeswoman for the university, said the alarm was pulled accidentally and the interruption had nothing to do with a small group of protesters who had gathered outside the theater doors before Powell's speech.

Police officers ordered several of the protesters, who criticized Powell with signs and comments, to leave the Stewart Center shortly after the speech, saying they had become disruptive.

Powell took time during the interruption to sign books, drawing laughs when someone handed him a copy of an AARP magazine.

Much of Powell's speech was delivered with humor. He even affected a Texas accent to imitate President Bush.

Speaking of Russian President Vladimir Putin, Powell said Bush might say, "Colin I have looked into his eyes and seen his soul."

"OK," Powell said, reverting to his regular voice. "I have looked into his eyes and still see KGB."

Even so, Powell said he is hopeful that Putin is trying to move Russia in the right direction. And he takes heart that the United States is trading more and more freely with China and Asian countries. Commerce will make them so dependent on each other that they cannot afford to go to war, he said.

Turning to the United States, he said it can best serve the world by showing how having a free society can help make a nation happy and prosperous, he said. Americans must not let the fear of terrorism make them intolerant of people from different cultures.

"We are still like no other place in the world," he said. "We are still a place that people come to have their problems solved."

Henry Chou, a biochemistry student from Fishers, Ind., said the speech was perhaps the best he had ever heard.

"He has the message of hope," Chou said. "People still know what the U.S. stands for, and we have that to hold on to."

Old Problems Undermine New Security Plan For Baghdad (NYT)

By Richard A. Oppel Jr.

The New York Times, February 23, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 19 — It looked like a scene out of a counterinsurgency training video. Dressed in crisp uniforms with a computer-generated camouflage of blue, gray and brown, Iraqi national police officers joined United States troops on searches late last week through relatively calm districts of Shaab and Ur in northeast Baghdad in the first large operation of the Baghdad security plan.

DOJ_NMG_0135794

But appearances in Iraq can often be deceiving. At least two of the national police officers who turned out for the operation were moving ahead of the American troops not to lead the security drive but to warn the residents to hide their weapons and other incriminating evidence.

Some policemen on the sweep advertised their Shiite sympathies. Infiltration by militias has always been a major problem for the Iraqi security forces, and particularly the police, viewed by many Sunnis in the capital as de facto Shiite militia fighters.

The much anticipated effort to wrest Baghdad streets from the control of militias and insurgents has been presented in news conferences and public statements as an Iraqi-led operation. Iraqi officials have been out front, announcing arrests, weapons finds and other details, as well as new decrees intended to halt two years of so-called sectarian cleansing. But on the streets, the joint patrols seemed little different from those of the past few years: A handful of Iraqis, acting at the direction of a larger group of Americans, opening drawers and closets and looking behind furniture as they searched for banned weapons or other contraband.

For the first few days of the operation, about 2,500 American troops took part, compared with about 300 Iraqi forces, a mix of police and Army personnel, military officials said. The original plan called for Iraqis to work with United States troops throughout the night to enforce curfews and otherwise ensure that the gains of the previous day were not lost. But they were shifted to buttress the day force.

It was a translator working with the Americans, interviewed a day after the fact, who had overheard the Iraqi police tipping off the Iraqis. “They were telling people in the neighborhood to hide your weapons from the Americans,” he said. The police were Shiites, he said, and inclined to favor others of their sect in the district, which is mostly Shiite but has a considerable Sunni population.

On another patrol, an American commander said, Iraqi residents told American soldiers that a national policemen had warned them to hide anything incriminating including paraphernalia about Moktada al-Sadr, the Shiite militia leader whose forces are targets of the Baghdad crackdown.

“Families told us he was warning people before we’d come in, ‘If you have this or that, then hide it before they get here,’ ” said First Lt. Andy Moffit, who led a platoon through Shaab and Ur. The major problem with Iraqi forces is not their tactical skill, but their “loyalties and integrity,” he said.

On that score, he said, “We’ve still got years to go.”

Fearful of police ties to the militias, some residents questioned by the Americans about militia activity refused to say anything until the police were led out of the room.

Moreover, some Iraqi forces made little effort to hide their true allegiance. In one police truck an amulet stamped with the image of Imam Hussein, the revered Shiite martyr, swung from a rearview mirror. Next to it was a green Shiite flag, taped to the inside of the windshield. The truck’s radio blared chants heard during Ashura, a Shiite religious holiday.

To many Sunnis the Iraqi forces remain little more than instruments of Shiite hegemony, and the Baghdad plan appears to have done little to change that view.

“They can’t protect the Sunnis in the Shiite districts, and they will never fight the militias because they are from the same sect,” said Ahmed al-Mashhadani, a Sunni resident of west Baghdad, where other Baghdad security operations took place last week. “We don’t trust them, and if American troops leave, we will call back the resistance platoons to protect ourselves.”

American troops in northeast Baghdad heard the same refrain from Shiites who said that only their own militias could protect them from Sunni insurgents. “Before, the Mahdi Army checkpoints used to check each vehicle that came in here,” lamented one Facilities Protection Service guard, a Shiite, at a warehouse in Ur. “Now, the Iraqi police aren’t really checking each vehicle.”

American officials had long insisted that Iraqi forces were making great strides. But the torrent of sectarian killings that followed the Samarra shrine bombing last February made plain that most Iraqi troops were not up to the task and, in a frightening number of cases, were part of the problem.

Beginning in August, American troops increasingly returned to the front lines in Baghdad, facing roadside bombs and other threats. They have suffered an average of 85 deaths a month since then — a 50 percent increase over the previous six months. And those fatalities have increasingly occurred in Baghdad.

Lt. Col. Avanulas Smiley, commander of the First Battalion, 23rd Infantry Regiment, said he took heart in the performance of an Iraqi national police commander during the northeast Baghdad operations, citing the man’s willingness to acknowledge and address concerns about militia infiltration.

DOJ_NMG_0135795

He also said the number of police officers on the sweeps was not the total number of Iraqis working on the security push. That number would include others who operated checkpoints and worked independently of the Americans. He said he was disappointed that more Iraqi forces did not participate in the sweeps.

And he noted the flagging political support in the United States for the occupation. “We run the risk of losing popular support when there is the potential for getting this thing over the hump,” he said.

For now, what the Bush administration has called its surge plan, widely seen as a last effort to rescue Baghdad from civil war, will bring more than 17,000 additional troops to Baghdad to carry out a new strategy that leaves United States forces clustered in outposts throughout Baghdad neighborhoods, close to the streets and to Iraqi police and troops.

They will have plenty to do. Even routine security tasks performed by Iraqi forces, such as operating traffic checkpoints, are frequently undermined by laziness, American troops say, if not outright sabotage through complicity with the militias.

The thoroughness of the inspections can vary widely. In one hour at an Iraqi checkpoint in Karada, a mostly Shiite neighborhood, on Feb. 16, the police allowed more than 150 vehicles to pass while pulling over about 25. In only three cases did they open the trunks. They found nothing. At another checkpoint a mile away, near the Green Zone, most of the cars were pulled aside, and eventually traffic snaked for a mile.

Then a sedan containing six young men pulled up to barriers set up by interior ministry commandos. The driver, apparently referring to an unspecified militia, said, “I’m with the guys,” said an Iraqi reporter for The New York Times who had heard the exchange. The car was immediately sent through.

Insurgents Broaden Arsenal In Battles With U.S., Iraqi Forces (WP)

By Ann Scott Tyson And Joshua Partlow

The Washington Post, February 23, 2007

Insurgents in Iraq are employing a variety of new tactics -- from an unprecedented string of helicopter shoot-downs to unusual chlorine bomb attacks and direct assaults on U.S. military bases -- that American commanders say are intended to create chaos and undermine the U.S. and Iraqi military push to quell violence in Baghdad.

Lt. Gen. Raymond T. Odierno, the second-ranking U.S. commander in Iraq, said Thursday that he believed a U.S. Army Black Hawk helicopter that went down Wednesday north of Baghdad had been shot down -- which would make it the eighth U.S. military or civilian aircraft to be downed by insurgents since Jan. 20.

"Initial reports that I have seen indicate enemy fire," Odierno told Pentagon reporters during a teleconference from Baghdad. Helicopters are essential to U.S. military operations, he said, and will fly an estimated 400,000 hours in Iraq this year, making it vital to protect them.

Odierno said he believed that "al-Qaeda-associated cells" using similar tactics are behind at least some of the shoot-downs. He said U.S. raids in recent days have led to the capture of two suspected cell members, one of whom admitted he was involved in shooting down an aircraft. The Sunni insurgent group al-Qaeda in Iraq has asserted responsibility for several of the recent attacks on U.S. helicopters.

Chlorine-laced bombs are another new tactic. Four more people died Thursday in Baghdad after ingesting chlorine fumes from a blast the day before on the road leading to the capital's airport, raising the death toll in the attack to seven people, said Col. Sami Hassan of the Interior Ministry.

"This is just the first time that we've seen the chlorine used in this way," said Lt. Col. Christopher C. Garver, a U.S. military spokesman in Baghdad. He said he knew of no more than two or three people who died from ingesting the chlorine, a common industrial chemical used heavily in water treatment and not a "weaponized-chemical" agent capable of inflicting mass casualties.

Wednesday's bombing was the third time in a month that insurgents rigged chlorine tanks to their explosives to increase the deadliness of their attacks, military officials said. The day before, insurgents blew up a truck carrying chlorine gas tanks in Taji, north of Baghdad, in an attack that killed nine people. In late January, another truck carrying explosives and chlorine tanks exploded near Ramadi, killing 16 people.

Insurgents are attempting to "adapt in such ways where they can continue to create instability. And that's what they're doing, especially with these" vehicle bombs incorporating chlorine, Odierno said. He added that U.S. and Iraqi forces stationed around Baghdad were taking steps to keep car bombs out of crowded areas. U.S. troops discovered a car-bomb factory Tuesday outside Fallujah that contained chlorine cylinders, he said.

More aggressive, direct attacks by insurgents on bases housing the U.S. military are another troubling development. Last month, four American soldiers were killed after being kidnapped at their compound in Karbala, and a suicide bomb attack this week on a U.S. military facility in Tarmiyah north of Baghdad left three soldiers dead.

On Thursday, U.S. soldiers killed at least 12 suspected insurgents and wounded three others in a six-hour battle starting at 7:30 p.m. in eastern Ramadi, the capital of Anbar province in western Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0135796

Soldiers from Task Force 1-9 were attacked by small-arms fire and found insurgents in several buildings in the area, said 1st Lt. Shawn Mercer, a Marine spokesman in western Iraq.

Soldiers used heavy machine guns and one shoulder-fired rocket, and eventually "precision-guided munitions," which damaged buildings, he said. "We have no reports of civilian casualties, and there were no coalition casualties," he said.

General Implicates Al-Qaeda In Copter Crashes (USAT)

By Jim Michaels

USA Today, February 23, 2007

WASHINGTON — "Al-Qaeda-associated" cells may be behind a recent spike in downed U.S. helicopters in Iraq, a general said Thursday.

Lt. Gen. Raymond Odierno, the No. 2 U.S. commander in Iraq, said two suspects have been captured in connection with the helicopter attacks. One suspect, he said, admitted involvement in one attack.

Since Jan. 20, insurgents have shot or forced down eight U.S. helicopters, killing 28 troops and civilians. Enemy fire forced down a Black Hawk helicopter north of Baghdad on Wednesday.

Insurgents fire on Army helicopters an average of 100 times a month, Maj. Gen. James Simmons, deputy commander of Multinational Corps-Iraq, said earlier this month. Enemy fire hits helicopters in about 17% of those attacks, he said. Most are able to keep flying.

U.S. officers are studying the recent incidents to determine how best to adjust helicopter flying tactics and are attempting to uncover and destroy the groups behind the attacks, Odierno said.

Earlier this month, Odierno said he didn't think insurgents had greater access to sophisticated weapons, such as surface-to-air missiles. But insurgents have used similar tactics in recent attacks, suggesting they may be more effectively using machine gun and small-arms fire against helicopters.

"I think we see in a few cases … that there were probably some sort of ambush sites that were set up by some of our foes," Odierno said in a video conference from Baghdad. "I think they've probably been trying to do this for a long time, but my guess is we have a cell out there that's somewhat effective." He later clarified his remarks to say there may be several cells.

U.S. forces rely on helicopters more to move supplies and troops as roadside bombs make ground travel more dangerous.

The Army expects to log 400,000 flight hours in helicopters this year, up from 240,000 hours in 2005.

The Army has almost quadrupled its spending this year, from $7.5 million to $29.6 million, on equipment that protects helicopters from missiles and other attacks, Pentagon budget records show. That includes a laser warning system that alerts pilots to threats from the ground.

Changing helicopter flying tactics often means trading one threat for another. Low-flying helicopters are less vulnerable to surface-to-air missiles because they are hidden by terrain and buildings. However, helicopters flying closer to the ground are easier to hit with rocket-propelled grenades or with fire from assault rifles or machine guns.

Al Qaeda Believed Behind Copter Crashes (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, February 23, 2007

Two or three al Qaeda terrorist cells in Iraq are behind the recent series of helicopter shootdowns, a senior U.S. commander in Iraq said yesterday.

Army Lt. Gen. Ray Odierno, commander of the Multinational Corps, Iraq, told reporters that the downing of several helicopters involved common tactics, techniques and procedures used by terrorists.

"We're trying to understand what those are, learn about it so we can protect our aircraft, but more importantly, try to go after the cells," the three-star general said. "I believe they're al Qaeda-associated cells."

Eight helicopters in Iraq have been shot down or have crash-landed after ground fire since Jan. 20. Some of the attacks involved shoulder-fired surface-to-air missiles.

Military officials at first sought to blame the downings on mechanical problems, but later information revealed most were hit by enemy fire. One attack on a UH-60 Black Hawk north of Baghdad resulted in the deaths of 12 soldiers. A third Black Hawk was shot down Wednesday and Gen. Odierno said initial reports indicate "enemy fire" was the cause.

"We are aggressively examining the conditions of each incident and adapting tactics and techniques to address the issue," Gen. Odierno said, noting that the military is increasing the use of helicopters because most casualties are occurring from improvised bomb attacks on ground vehicles.

Two persons linked to the helicopter attacks are being questioned, including one who took part in one of the shootdowns. The terrorist "admitted that he was involved in one of them," Gen. Odierno said.

DOJ_NMG_0135797

"And we've done a couple of operations over the last few nights, and I think we've also gotten into another part of a cell who might have shot down another aircraft, one of the aircraft. So we continue to work this extremely hard," he said.

The aircraft attacks were carried out from "ambush sites that were set up by some of our foes," Gen. Odierno said, noting that "I think they've probably been trying to do this for a long time, but my guess is we have a cell out there that's somewhat effective."

The increase in the helicopters attacks comes as U.S. and Iraqi forces have launched a major, months-long program to pacify Baghdad, where much of the insurgency against the new Iraqi government and U.S.-led coalition forces is taking place.

Gen. Odierno said one breakthrough was the discovery by an Army airborne unit Tuesday of a car bomb factory near Karma, about 12 miles northeast of Fallujah.

"The unit discovered numerous artillery rounds, mortar rounds, bombs, rockets, gutted anti-aircraft shells, a pickup truck and three other vehicles that were already in various stages of preparations as car bombs, as well as much detonation material," he said.

The factory also contained material that is being used to enhance bombs, such as fertilizer and chlorine in cylinders.

"We also found the various components of a metal shop, including welders, burner stoves, circular saws, sanders and other items needed to build explosive devices," he said.

Asked about the insurgent's use of chlorine bombs, Gen. Odierno said over the past two years there have been attempts to use different chemicals to boost the lethality of improvised bombs and chlorine "is just another way to do it."

Iraq Rebels Expected To Use More Chlorine Gas In Attacks (NYT)

By Richard A. Oppel Jr.

The New York Times, February 23, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 22 — Insurgents are likely to continue combining car bombs with chlorine gas and other chemicals to launch attacks similar to three in recent weeks that spewed chlorine and sickened scores of Iraqis, the military warned Thursday.

American troops raided a car-bomb factory near Falluja and found chlorine cylinders and propane tanks among the bomb components.

The raid late Tuesday in Karma, an insurgent-dominated village between Falluja and Baghdad, led American officials to suggest that insurgents had planned to combine the materials found into a new round of chemical-laden vehicular bombs.

The latest chlorine bombing happened Wednesday in southern Baghdad and killed at least two people and wounded 32 others. Many exhibited symptoms of exposure to chlorine, a greenish gas that burns the skin and can be fatal after a few concentrated, deep breaths.

The Karma site was stocked with “numerous artillery rounds, mortar rounds, bombs, rockets, gutted antiaircraft shells, a pickup truck and three other vehicles that were already in various stages of preparations as car bombs,” said Lt. Gen. Ray Odierno, the second-ranking commander in Iraq.

“We also found ingredients to be used to devise or enhance explosives such as fertilizer and chlorine cylinders,” the general said.

The general insisted that the recent chlorine attacks did not suggest that the insurgency is “any more capable,” but said that militants were trying to “adapt in such ways where they can continue to create instability, and that’s what they’re doing.”

Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV told CNN that the troops had found “five complete buildings full of these various types of things,” including 65 propane tanks. “What we are seeing is a change in tactics, but the strategy has not changed.”

Military officials are also acutely concerned that insurgents have adapted tactics to exploit vulnerabilities in flight patterns of military helicopters, which are expected to fly 400,000 hours this year in Iraq, a 20 percent increase over 2006.

At least eight helicopters have been downed in the last month, the latest on Wednesday when a Black Hawk crash-landed in Diyala Province after coming under fire from heavy machine guns and rocket-propelled grenades.

No one was wounded in the latest crash.

General Odierno said that in two or three of the helicopter shoot downs “ambush sites” had been set up by insurgents. “My guess is we have a cell out there that’s somewhat effective,” he said. He said two suspected of being insurgents, each believed to have played a role in separate helicopter attacks, had been detained in the past week, and one had admitted his involvement.

In Ramadi, the Anbar provincial capital, American forces fought a fierce battle with insurgents that officials at the Ramadi hospital said had left at least 27 Iraqis dead. One of the officials, Dr. Abdullah Salah, said four women and four children were among those killed. Witnesses said at least three houses had been attacked by American aircraft.

The marines, who patrol western Iraq, disputed the hospital casualty count, saying that the six-hour fight left 12 insurgents dead and that they had no reports of civilian or American military casualties.

DOJ_NMG_0135798

A Marine spokesman, First Lt. Shawn Mercer, said insurgents attacked soldiers with small arms and rocket-propelled grenades Wednesday evening in east Ramadi. The American soldiers fired back at first with small arms and medium machine guns, then with heavy machine guns, a shoulder-fired rocket, and "precision guided munitions."

The Associated Press reported that photographs made available to the news agency showed "the bodies of two small boys wrapped in one blanket, one with a bloody face, the other ashen and with mud on his mouth, his hands crossed on his chest." Other pictures showed four or five bodies covered by blankets, and men searching through rubble.

On the heels of another rape allegation that has shaken Iraq's Shiite-dominated government, an Iraqi general in the northern city of Tal Afar told several news agencies that four Iraqi soldiers had been accused of raping a 50-year-old Sunni Turkmen woman about 10 days ago.

Brig. Gen. Nijm Abdullah told The Associated Press that a lieutenant and three enlisted men initially denied the woman's charge, but then confessed after being confronted by the woman.

An official from the Tal Afar hospital said the woman was raped after her husband was jailed by Iraqi soldiers, and she did not come forward until she was encouraged to do so by an official from the main Sunni political bloc.

One soldier from the 13th Sustainment Command (Expeditionary) was killed and three wounded by a roadside bomb attack near Diwaniya early Thursday morning, the military reported.

At least 14 bodies were also discovered throughout the capital on Thursday, an Interior Ministry official said.

U.S. Troops Uncover "car Bomb Factory" Near Fallouja (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 23, 2007

U.S. troops in Iraq uncovered a "car bomb factory" near Fallouja this week that contained multiple canisters of chlorine, a potentially lethal gas that has been used in three insurgent attacks over the last month, a top U.S. official in Baghdad told reporters Thursday.

Lt. Gen. Raymond T. Odierno, the Army commander responsible for day-to-day military operations in Iraq, said the Tuesday night raid outside the city west of Baghdad netted a wide array of munitions and three vehicles that were apparently being readied as car bombs at the compound, in addition to the chlorine cylinders.

The discovery of yet more chlorine following bombings Tuesday and Wednesday in which the chemical was used seemed to indicate a stepped-up effort by insurgents to use such choking agents to cause even more deaths and spread fear among Iraqi civilians.

At least 21 Iraqis and a U.S. soldier were killed or found dead around the country Thursday amid an aggressive security crackdown in the capital and rainy weather hampering travel across the region.

Odierno noted that insurgents have for several months been trying to use various other chemicals to make car bombs more deadly, and characterized the use of chlorine as part of these efforts.

Such bombs are capable of spreading fear, but Odierno noted that deaths caused by the chemical have thus far been limited. The most recent attack, on Wednesday, sickened 25 Iraqis, killing two.

"Over the last year or so ... we have found attempts of them to try to use all different types of chemical mixtures in order to try to make [car bombs] more lethal, and this is just another way to do it," Odierno said in a briefing from Baghdad held for reporters at the Pentagon.

Army Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell IV, the chief U.S. military spokesman in Iraq, said in an interview on CNN that the cache of weapons found Tuesday night near the town of Karma, northeast of Fallouja, included "all kinds of ordinary chemicals" besides chlorine, a possible indication that insurgents have stepped up their efforts to use toxic substances in their attacks.

Although Odierno would not say who the U.S. believed was behind the chlorine bombs, Karma is in Sunni Arab-dominated Al Anbar province, home to both home-grown Sunni insurgents and foreign fighters linked to the group Al Qaeda in Iraq.

Despite the limited deaths in the chlorine attacks, White House spokesman Dana Perino said the use of chlorine appeared to be part of an effort by insurgents to pull off "spectacular events" that would kill civilians, and she called employment of the gas "disturbing and concerning".

Chlorine has been considered for use as a chemical weapon as far back as the U.S. Civil War. According to the 2003 book "A War of Nerves," proposals were made to President Lincoln's secretary of War to use chlorine against Confederate forces in 1862, but the suggestions were never acted upon.

The first documented use of the gas in warfare was by German troops against Allied forces during World War I; chlorine cylinders were first opened in April 1915, releasing the yellowish-green gas on French and Algerian troops defending the town of Ypres in Belgium.

Although Germany again employed chlorine during World War II, it has not been widely used in warfare since then. The U.S. Department of Health and Human Services lists chlorine as a "choking agent" that could be used as a weapon by terrorists.

DOJ_NMG_0135799

On Thursday, an improvised explosive device, or roadside bomb, was blamed for the death of the American soldier near the southern city of Diwaniya. Three other soldiers wounded in the blast were evacuated to Baghdad for treatment, the U.S. military said.

In Baghdad, the bodies of at least 14 men were discovered. Mortar rounds struck a western neighborhood of the capital, killing one civilian and injuring three others. Elsewhere in Iraq, three bodies were found in Kirkuk, two in Mosul and one in Hillah.

U.S. and Iraqi forces northeast of Baghdad arrested a top police official on charges of running death squads. Brig. Gen. Qassem Khazaal, head of Diyala province's criminal intelligence division, and six others under his command were arrested on charges of kidnapping and murder.

U.S. Unit Shoulders Burden At Police Station In Baqubah (WP)

By Bill Murphy Jr.

The Washington Post, February 23, 2007

BAQUBAH, Iraq -- It took nearly a month to build the tiny bunker on the roof of this Iraqi police station. The U.S. soldiers worked at night to avoid snipers, carrying sandbags up four flights of stairs in the dark.

One day last week, several American soldiers arrived to begin their shift here, using the roof to scan the surrounding area for attackers. The soldiers were well armed, and they had cigarettes, coffee and soda with them, even beef jerky. But there was one thing missing from the roof of the station, and from the ranks of those who were there to defend it: members of the Iraqi security forces.

Similar U.S. units are embedded at other Iraqi police and army installations in Baqubah, a city of 300,000 about 35 miles northeast of Baghdad. Keeping these locations open and functioning is vital, military commanders say, if the Iraqis who live here are to have confidence in the government.

The police station houses a unit of the local police Emergency Response Force. The Americans call it "the ERF," so it rhymes with "surf." In theory, the ERF should be like a U.S. police SWAT team, but in practice, the Iraqis are simply outmanned and outgunned. The U.S. troops here, from Alpha Company, a unit in the 1st Cavalry Division, say the Iraqi police officers are loath even to leave the station.

"Originally, it was designed like we were going to be training" them, said 1st Lt. Jason Brinkley, 23, of Palacios, Tex. But ever since insurgent attacks in late November, "we've just kind of been staying here, pretty much to keep the place from being overrun," he said.

In one room of the station that the Americans use, weapons, ammunition and rations were stacked alongside cases of soda and hundreds of bottles of water. A generator powered a microwave oven, and a freezer was stuffed with frozen hamburgers, hot dogs and breakfast sandwiches.

"It's like an infantryman's dream in here," said Sgt. Benny Alicea, 34, of Attleboro, Mass.

The ERF comes under fire almost every day, and most days, Brinkley said, his troops kill between one and six insurgents. "The standoff we've got is to our advantage, because we shoot better than they do," Brinkley said.

"You get used to it," said Spec. Monty Hesley, 27, of Hanover, Kan. "That's your job, is killing people and people trying to kill you. You can get into a zone. You have to, or you're going to drive yourself nuts."

Most of the troops at the ERF said they had no idea how their work might contribute to a larger effort, or even who the enemy is. And they said they do not trust the Iraqi police officers living one floor below them. At least one U.S. soldier stood guard with his rifle at all times, ensuring that none of the Iraqi police ventured into the American living area.

The core of this platoon is on its second tour together in Iraq. It fought at Najaf in August 2004 and alongside the Marines at Fallujah in November 2004.

"I just care about my friends -- this platoon, that everybody will come home," said Pfc. Stanislav Mykhaylichenko, 20, of New York, a Ukrainian immigrant whose father fought in the Soviet army in Afghanistan in the 1980s.

"The best bet is to pull back," said Sgt. Jerry White, 26, of Bell, Fla. "Sending more troops -- it's not working. You're sending more targets. That's all you're doing."

"They're going to have their civil war, and all we're doing is just being in the middle of it," Alicea said.Frustration and Death

"Everybody gets frustrated. Who the hell wouldn't be?" Lt. Col. Mo Goins, commander of the 1st Battalion, 12th Cavalry Regiment, said later. "We're all Type A personalities, Westerners, and we want it done right away."

"The soldiers see their small part of the war," said Col. David Sutherland, commander of 3rd Brigade, the 4,700-strong unit that includes the 1-12 Cavalry and other battalions, and has the entire province of Diyala -- home to about 1.6 million people -- as its area of operations. "We've been here for five months. The soldiers get frustrated. They think all they're doing is going out and getting hit with" improvised explosive devices.

DOJ_NMG_0135800

"We've got hot spots," he said. Overall, he said, Baqubah has gotten more violent, but things have improved in the rest of the province. Since Feb. 4, nine U.S. soldiers have been killed in and around Baqubah.'We're Under Attack'

At 9:46 a.m. on the second day of the soldiers' three-day shift, small-arms fire erupted outside.

"Shooting from the south. They do that," said Spec. Patrick Pena, 24, of Midland, Tex.

Long bursts of automatic-weapons fire followed. Outside, bullets hit a damaged vehicle in front of the building. Not far away, a U.S. soldier refueling the ERF's generator took cover. It was unclear whether any of the Iraqi police officers were returning fire.

Two loud thumps echoed.

"Mortar rounds!" someone yelled.

"Yeah, mortars. Small arms," Brinkley agreed. "I think we're under attack."

The soldiers erupted in laughter.

"It's what they always do," Brinkley continued. "They just get out of a car, fire two rounds and get out of here. It's nothing accurate, just harassing fire."

Spec. Jeremy Anderson, 22, of Corpus Christi, Tex., stayed low on the roof, near the sandbag bunker, pointing out buildings from which insurgents often target the ERF and the small road that the soldiers call Sesame Street because they see the same odd characters there every day.

The shooting died down. Loudspeakers blared from nearby neighborhoods. None of the soldiers spoke Arabic, but they said they can sometimes make out words like "Ameriki," "Bush" and "jihad."

Morning turned to midday. There were two more loud explosions. Mortars again, the soldiers said.

Downstairs, Brinkley sipped a Mountain Dew and walked into a room where several soldiers were resting. He had spent two hours in a sniper's nest over a shower stall that the men use as a makeshift urinal, and he had finally found a target. A man with an AK-47 assault rifle was trying to get into position about 500 yards away.

Brinkley squeezed the trigger and killed him.

"I'm still happy," Brinkley said. "The right thing to do is get dudes to stop shooting at you, especially that accurate fire."Engaging the Officers

Few of the U.S. troops have much contact with the Iraqi police here, but Staff Sgt. Thomas Blair, 22, of Boston, walked downstairs in the early afternoon.

"Mister Thomas!" a 21-year-old Iraqi officer called out.

A half-dozen Iraqi police officers spoke through an Iraqi interpreter employed by the U.S. Army. None would give their names for fear that their families would be killed if insurgents learned their identities. Most wore civilian clothes.

An officer who said he was 37 was eager to talk. "Insurgents have good weapons. [We] don't. No uniform, no ammunition."

Several officers said they wanted an armored Humvee. They drive around in pickup trucks now, they said.

The police showed off their living quarters. In one dusty room, five twin beds took up most of the space. Ten policemen sleep there, switching off on the beds, the men explained. An officer wearing a light sweater and sandals said he wanted boots and a uniform, but cannot afford them. All the officers said they were owed money, and one said he had not been paid for eight months.

A 26-year-old officer gestured at a bullet hole in the window. He traced a line through the air to another hole in the wall above one of the beds.

"I'm scared of any bad guy," the 21-year-old officer said. "I have no ammo."

"But you have me!" chimed in Blair. He struck an exaggerated pose with his M-4 rifle and laughed.

As the men talked, Blair shared his cigarettes with them. He said he feels bad for the officers, and he gives them food and cigarettes because their rations are so meager. But he acknowledged he has another motive. If the insurgents overrun the ERF, he said, he wants to be known as the nice, friendly American.

"They're not chopping my head off," he said.'Fire Danger Close'

Anderson came down from the roof. He and another soldier had spotted two men with an AK-47 trying to bury something on the road, a classic IED team. He opened fire with an M-14 sniper rifle, hitting one of them. It was the platoon's second suspected kill of the day.

At 4:20 p.m., troops who weren't on guard ate microwave oatmeal from foam plates. There was another loud explosion outside, followed by smaller booms.

"Fire danger close," came a radio report from the rooftop. "We've got our heads down, but it sounds like RPGs," or rocket-propelled grenades.

DOJ_NMG_0135801

Two of the platoon's Bradley Fighting Vehicles went out to assist a U.S. tank that was immobilized after breaking a tread. As they returned to the ERF, a sniper opened fire. Brinkley's driver, Spec. Jeremy Mitchell, 26, of Rockmart, Ga., was nearly hit as he started to climb out.

Brinkley returned fire with the vehicle's 25mm gun, and there was no more activity in the building where the shots had come from. He counted it as their third kill of the day.

"Not the first time I've been shot at, and it won't be the last," Mitchell said afterward, though he clearly looked shaken.

Calls came over the radio. The platoon learned it would be given 12 hours back at the forward operating base the next day to do some much-needed maintenance on its Bradleys.

It would be the first such stand-down in three weeks.

"This is all normal, routine stuff," Brinkley said. "Dude with the AK that I shot in the street? That's routine. The dudes digging an IED? That's an everyday occurrence."

"Let's see if we get shot at if we go out to grill," Mitchell suggested. The platoon keeps a barbecue on an outside landing, right off the third floor. On its last rotation here, a sniper fired at Brinkley while he was cooking about 5 p.m., so the platoon has learned to wait until dark to cook.

"It wasn't that close," Brinkley recalled. "Five or six feet away."

Firefight Between U.S. Troops, Insurgents Kills At Least 12 (USAT/AP)

The Associated Press

USA Today, February 23, 2007

Sunni insurgents attacked U.S. troops in the volatile city of Ramadi, setting off a six-hour firefight that killed at least 12 people, the U.S. military said Thursday.

The Ramadi battle broke out Wednesday evening when insurgents opened fire on a U.S. patrol. The Americans responded with precision-guided munitions that damaged several buildings and ended the fight, said a Marine spokesman, 1st Lt. Shawn Mercer.

There were no U.S. casualties. Twelve insurgents were killed, Mercer said. He said no civilian casualties were reported.

However, Hafidh Ibrahim of the Ramadi Hospital said the bodies of 26 people, including four women and children, were pulled from the rubble of three houses.

Frequent battles have taken place in Ramadi, the capital of Anbar province west of Baghdad. President Bush has ordered an increase of 21,500 troops in Iraq — 4,000 of them in Anbar province to try to quell violence there. The rest are bound for Baghdad.

The military warned that insurgents were adopting new tactics after a raid near Fallujah uncovered a car bomb factory with propane tanks and chlorine canisters. Insurgents have detonated three trucks carrying canisters of toxic chlorine since Jan. 28. The most recent attack, Wednesday in Baghdad, killed five people and sent more than 55 to hospitals.

U.S. troops "found ingredients to be used to devise or enhance explosives, such as fertilizer and chlorine cylinders," Lt. Gen. Ray Odierno, the No. 2 U.S. commander in Iraq, told Pentagon reporters by video link.

"What they're trying to do is … adapt in such ways where they can continue to create instability," Odierno said.

Chlorine, used as a weapon in World War I, can cause breathing problems and irritate the skin. At high levels, it can be fatal.

Also Thursday, at least 19 people were killed or found dead in Baghdad, and two bodies were discovered in the city of Kut. Three other people were shot to death in the northern city of Mosul.

Baghdad 'Surge' Returns Chalabi To Center Stage (WSJ)

By Yochi J. Dreazen

The Wall Street Journal, February 23, 2007

BAGHDAD, Iraq -- In his latest remarkable political reincarnation, onetime U.S. favorite Ahmed Chalabi has secured a position inside the Iraqi government that could help determine whether the Bush administration's new push to secure Baghdad succeeds.

In a new post created earlier this year, Mr. Chalabi will serve as an intermediary between Baghdad residents and the Iraqi and U.S. security forces mounting an aggressive counterinsurgency campaign across the city. The position is meant to help Iraqis arrange reimbursement for damage to their cars and homes caused by the security sweeps in the hope of maintaining public support for the strategy.

Mr. Chalabi's writ is supposed to be limited mainly to security, according to aides to Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, but he is already speaking ambitiously about playing a larger role in economic, health and reconstruction efforts as well. In his new capacity, Mr. Chalabi answers directly to Mr. Maliki and is already taking part in weekly planning meetings with senior American officials such as Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad and Gen. David Petraeus, the top U.S. military commander in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0135802

Mr. Chalabi's position was created as part of a broad push by Mr. Maliki's government to capitalize on any positive momentum created by the addition of 21,500 additional American forces to Iraq, of which some 3,000 have arrived so far. In the weeks after President Bush disclosed his plans to "surge" additional forces to Iraq, Mr. Maliki created five new government committees charged with making the plan work on the ground. They include panels focused on economic development, the restoration of basic services such as electricity, and, in Mr. Chalabi's case, the critical task of maintaining public backing for the initiative.

The new position is vaguely defined, and it is too early to tell how much power Mr. Chalabi will ultimately wield. How much money will be available to pay claims and how it might be awarded and disbursed remains to be finalized, too. But he is a skilled political infighter who has often shown a talent for making the most out of whatever hand he is dealt. Mr. Chalabi also maintains close ties with key political allies of Mr. Maliki such as radical Shiite Muslim cleric Muqtada al-Sadr, which gives him extra sway within Mr. Maliki's government. Indeed, U.S. Embassy officials suggest Mr. Chalabi's closeness to Mr. Sadr is a major reason he was offered the liaison post.

Already, some U.S. officials are expressing concern about Mr. Chalabi's new role, fearing he will undercut the elaborate system of elected and appointed local governments that American officials have been cultivating over the past three years. American and Iraqi critics also worry that Mr. Chalabi, a Shiite, will use his clout to ensure that Sunni Muslim neighborhoods of the city are hit hardest by the new security crackdown, a move that would further inflame Iraq's sectarian tensions.

"The question is whether he is really doing this to help, or whether he's trying to build himself a new political base in Baghdad or carry water for the Shiites," said a senior American official here. "And we simply don't know the answer to that yet."

In an interview yesterday, Mr. Chalabi said such concerns are unfounded, and stressed that he would use his position solely to help maintain public backing for the security push. "This is not about political parties, or about sectarian groups," he said. "We just want to motivate people to support the security plan, because otherwise it can't succeed."

Mr. Chalabi said he envisions helping Iraqis get the government to repair homes or furniture harmed in security raids, or to reimburse them for damage caused by the sweeps. He said he also plans to develop a way for Iraqis to report petty theft by security personnel, a common occurrence across Iraq. Mr. Chalabi insisted he would treat Sunnis fairly, and pointed to a recent series of conciliatory gestures he has made toward the embittered minority, which ruled for decades before the 2003 U.S. invasion that toppled Saddam Hussein.

In addition to leading the new "popular committee for mobilizing the people" in support of the Baghdad security push, Mr. Chalabi continues to head a government de-Baathification committee. That panel -- charged with expelling members of Mr. Hussein's ruling Baath Party from the government -- has come under fire for firing hundreds of thousands of mainly Sunni civil servants from their government posts. The mass unemployment and ill will resulting from the purge is widely believed to have helped swell insurgent ranks, and senior officials in the U.S. and Iraq have conceded the move was counterproductive.

Mr. Chalabi, too, has changed course in recent weeks and now says he wants to bring most former Baathists back into the government. Mr. Chalabi said he had helped draft legislation that would enable most of the ousted Sunni civil servants to reclaim their jobs or pensions, and said 14,000 former Baathists had already returned to their jobs. If the bill is signed into law, Mr. Chalabi said only 1,500 high-ranking former Baathists would be permanently barred from the government.

Despite such assurances, Mr. Chalabi remains a deeply divisive figure in Iraq, viewed skeptically by many U.S. as well as Iraqi officials. Critics see him as openly sectarian, and say they have little faith that he will treat Shiites and Sunnis equally in his new role.

"Chalabi is a very good politician, but we don't know his true intentions," said Mohammad al-Rubaie, who heads the district government in Baghdad's Karrada neighborhood. "We have to make sure that he doesn't have a free hand to do everything he wants, because otherwise his position can cause more harm than good, and create even more sectarian dangers."

Mr. Chalabi's return to prominence caps a remarkable turnaround for a man whose moment seemed to have passed after a string of political setbacks. He had spent decades in exile building ties with the neoconservative thinkers pushing for a U.S. invasion of Iraq. He returned to Baghdad after Mr. Hussein's ouster, but soon alienated many of his former backers by becoming a close ally of Mr. Sadr and making frequent trips to Iran. In December 2005 elections, Mr. Chalabi's party failed to win a single parliamentary seat.

Mr. Chalabi largely faded from public view, but he remained an active behind-the-scenes player in Iraq's chaotic political scene. He continued to run the powerful de-Baathification panel, made regular trips to Iran and recently returned from a trip to Syria undertaken at Mr. Maliki's behest, according to a senior Maliki aide.

DOJ_NMG_0135803

An aide to Mr. Chalabi said the vehicle for his latest renaissance was born of the realization that an aggressive counterinsurgency -- which involves breaking down doors, rifling through houses and making wide-scale arrests -- can quickly alienate the public.

Mr. Maliki tasked Mr. Chalabi with building a system of district committees that will work with American and Iraqi security forces operating in each area of the city, the aide said. The hope is that these committees will make it easier for residents to get restitution from the Iraqi government -- and possibly the American military -- if their property is harmed, and give them an incentive to approach Iraqi and American forces with information about insurgents.

Fueling speculation that he will expand his role, Mr. Chalabi invited dozens of political, tribal and religious leaders to a meeting in a Baghdad hotel Wednesday to explain how his new post would function and begin the process of choosing the members of the liaison committees meant to operate in Baghdad's 10 districts. During the meeting, Mr. Chalabi repeatedly told the crowd of his close ties to Mr. Maliki and described an ambitious plan to ban cars from the main market area of the Rusafa neighborhood for security reasons, a move he said would rejuvenate economic growth there.

In the interview, meanwhile, Mr. Chalabi said he would use his new position to identify shortfalls in the city's health system and basic infrastructure.

Even Mr. Chalabi's critics acknowledge he is an unusually skilled politician, a gift on full display as he made his way through a smoke-filled banquet hall in the Mansoor Hotel Wednesday, nattily attired and trailed by a retinue of bodyguards and aides. Mr. Chalabi glad-handed his way from table to table, exchanging handshakes and kisses with the local Iraqi political officials clamoring for a moment of his time. By the end of the meeting, he had won over at least some of the skeptics.

"It doesn't matter that he didn't win a seat in the elections -- this is a man who is better than most of the current people in parliament," said Muslim Ahmad Saleh, chairman of the district government in the Kadhamiya neighborhood.

Rape Of Second Sunni Woman By Iraqi Security Forces Alleged (WP)

By Ernesto Londono

The Washington Post, February 23, 2007

BAGHDAD, Feb. 22 -- An Iraqi police official in the northwestern city of Tall Afar said Thursday that a military officer and three soldiers had admitted to raping a Sunni woman and recording the act with a cellphone camera.

The four soldiers told an investigative committee convened by the Iraqi army that they sexually assaulted the woman nearly two weeks ago, according to Gen. Najem Abdullah, a police spokesman in Tall Afar.

The soldiers' statement follows another Sunni woman's assertion this week that she had been raped in Baghdad by members of Iraq's predominantly Shiite security forces. Iraq's Kurdish president and its Sunni vice president said Thursday that a judge should investigate her case, which the Shiite-led government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has dismissed as groundless.

Iraqi President Jalal Talabani said in a statement that the courts were "the only legitimate place to examine such allegations" and that the government should avoid steps that would "inflame sensitivities and create mistrust."

Talabani's stance, echoed by Vice President Tariq al-Hashimi, is sharply at odds with Maliki's insistence that the 20-year-old Baghdad woman who contends three Iraqi policemen raped her Sunday is a criminal who fabricated the story to exacerbate sectarian tension and undermine a U.S. and Iraqi security plan to pacify the capital.

The case has caused a political uproar -- with Sunnis demanding justice and Shiites defending the officers -- in a society where public discussion of rape is rare.

"In this country, [rape] is more serious than any other crime," said Wamid Nadhme, a political scientist at Baghdad University. "The religious values and the honor values say that one should not violate a woman. This will have very serious implications in coming days if neither side is able to prove that they are right and the other side is wrong."

"Sexual violence is a well-documented tool of war," said Sarah Leah Whitson, director of the Middle East and North Africa sections of Human Rights Watch. But in Iraq, "this case is the first of its kind."

The day after the Baghdad woman's allegation came to light, Maliki said the accused officers deserved to be honored. He said the government would sue her for making the claim.

The U.S. government has remained largely on the sidelines, even though many Iraqis view the Americans as the only potential impartial arbiter. The woman was treated at a U.S. military-run medical facility in Baghdad's fortified Green Zone.

Maliki's office e-mailed to reporters portions of her medical record, which showed health-care providers had documented signs of bruising on her inner thighs, groin and head. The document also included a handwritten note in English saying there were no signs of trauma in the patient's vagina.

U.S. officials initially said they would issue a statement on the case but later said discussing it would violate patient privacy guidelines.

DOJ_NMG_0135804

Khalid Mohammed Hassan, a civic activist in Tall Afar, called the rape case there "a very dangerous crime and a very ugly crime."

"Such ugly practices will push the citizens to not cooperate with the security forces or the army, and they'll be afraid they'll be in the same position," he said.

The Islamic State of Iraq, a Sunni insurgent group, issued an audio statement on its Web site Thursday saying 300 insurgents have volunteered to conduct suicide operations to avenge the woman who came forward Monday. At least 50 are from the woman's tribe, and 20 offered to marry her if she is single, the statement says.

Withdrawing From Banks (WT)

By James Palmer

The Washington Times, February 23, 2007

There is nothing routine about a trip to the bank in Baghdad.

Confronted by criminal gangs on the streets and demands for bribes from tellers in the branches -- not to mention long lines, shortages of bank notes, and other inconveniences -- many Iraqis are opting simply to keep their savings at home.

Even without the security concerns, financiers and government officials say, there are not enough banks in Iraq to serve the population and finance sorely needed reconstruction, leaving companies and individuals struggling to secure their assets.

"You must keep it somewhere," said Abd Ali Radi, the 56-year-old owner of a modest bus company. "This is a problem for all Iraqis today."

Interviewed in a restaurant last month, Mr. Radi recalled a recent trip to his bank in which, while nervously edging ahead in line, he heard the familiar sound of an ammunition round being injected into the chamber of an automatic pistol. He quickly fled.

Ali Al-Ajeely, a 48-year-old travel agency owner, said he is so fearful of carrying large amounts of cash that he avoids the city's depositories altogether. "It's safer to stay away from the banks," he said.

And businessman Hamza Own, a 47-year-old waterworks contractor, called the banks insecure and inefficient. "I have better ways of storing my money," he said, adding he last held a bank account in 1990.

Several banks in Baghdad this year have suffered daylight heists in which millions of dollars were stolen from their main offices, branches and armored vehicles.

"Most banks handling cash have experienced large robberies -- a million here, another million there," said Foud M. Mustafa, the managing director of the Credit Bank of Iraq.

The robberies have forced some institutions to reduce the amount of cash they keep on hand. "Smaller is better now," said Zuhair Al-Hafidh, whose Ashur International Bank focuses on the investment sector.

Iraqi banks guarantee their deposits, but customers have few assurances while traveling to and from the institutions. And in a city where dozens of people are killed every day, many residents feel it is more practical to keep their savings at home.

"If anything happens to you, your family has the money," said Mr. Al-Ajeely, the travel agent.

Yet even in a society where an estimated 70 percent of business is conducted in cash, many Iraqis can't avoid banks.

Raad Mohammed Salman, whose company transports oil, said the volume of his business forces him to make deposits because "it's too much to keep at home." But he doesn't relish the experience.

Corrupt bank clerks commonly press for bribes of 50,000 dinars -- about $38.50 -- to complete a transaction valued at a little over $23,000. "They know I have good contracts with the oil ministry," Mr. Salman explained.

Wa'al Abdul Mutalab, a 39-year-old money changer, said he handles tens of thousands of dollars daily and delivers cash deposits to his bank on a motorcycle to avoid thieves.

Once in the banks, Mr. Mutalab said, he must deal with long lines of government pensioners. "I have to arrange an appointment so I can finish quickly," he said.

Misgivings about banks date from the rule of Saddam Hussein, who would impose restrictions on banks without warning during times of unrest -- notably a $750 monthly limit on withdrawals after the 1990 invasion of Kuwait.

Saddam did open the banking sector to private institutions, and 21 such banking companies operate in Iraq today. But financial analysts say it is still not enough, especially as security problems have forced them to close branches and shelve expansion plans.

The Credit Bank of Iraq had planned to create 55 branches after Saddam's fall, but it recently closed two in Baghdad and now has only 12 open, according to Mr. Mustafa, its director.

During the nearly four years since Saddam was overthrown, five Iraqi banking companies have partnered with foreign banks. But companies outside Iraq still are hesitant to risk investments.

"We have no dealings with foreign banks now," said Farzdak Abdal Razak, a manager at the Middle East Investment Bank in Baghdad. He said merger talks with Citibank officials in Jordan collapsed last year.

DOJ_NMG_0135805

Bank directors still dream of adding branches, welcoming foreign investors and having automated teller machines operating 24 hours a day. But most Iraqis would settle for a safe place to keep their money.

For those with just a little cash like Mr. Al-Ajeely, the matter is simple. "I keep it in my pockets," he said.

Distrust, Fear A Year After Iraq Mosque Bombing (LAT)

By Christian Berthelsen

The Los Angeles Times, February 23, 2007

BAGHDAD — On a gray, drizzly day in the mostly Shiite Muslim neighborhood of Karada, one of this capital's last bastions of relative stability, sheepherder Ahmed Jassim Safee reflected on how life has changed in the year since sectarian warfare erupted with the bombing of the Golden Mosque in Samarra.

"We used to go to sell our livestock in Fallouja, Ramadi and Rutbah," Safee said of Iraqi cities that are now Sunni hotspots practically off-limits to Shiites. "The shrine bombing has resulted in the drawing of borders, and now we cannot travel freely even within the limits of one city or town because you don't know when you're going to be targeted or for what reason."

The Golden Mosque held the tombs of imams who were descendants of the Muslim prophet Muhammad and regarded by the Shiite sect as his rightful successors. U.S. and Iraqi officials have committed to rebuilding the mosque's bomb-damaged golden dome, but it is in a Sunni-dominated area and the work is viewed as too dangerous to undertake at the moment.

Before the mosque bombing, anger and violence in Iraq had largely been focused on the U.S.-led forces occupying the country in the wake of the 2003 invasion.

But the Feb. 22, 2006, attack on one of the nation's holiest Shiite mosques overshadowed Western failures and transgressions, including the Abu Ghraib prison scandal and reconstruction lapses, that occurred after the fall of Iraqi President Saddam Hussein. It set off a convulsion of sectarian warfare that continues mostly unabated to this day and starkly divides Iraq in ways that were largely buried before.

Now, one year on, amid the latest version of a security plan intended to restore calm, bombed-out buildings scar Baghdad and Iraqis live in fear of one another. Several people asked to discuss their feelings on the shrine bombing and their hopes for the future declined to do so. Those who were willing to talk said they badly wanted the plan to work and for peace to return. But their faith in such an outcome varies widely.

As his 14-year-old son, Abbas, slaughtered a sheep for a customer and dozens of other animals milled around, Safee, 37, said he was pessimistic. He noted that hundreds of people have been killed even after the new security effort was launched early this month and that on Wednesday the government announced it had captured Sudanese militants entering the country.

"What kind of security plan is this?" Safee said. "Life after the shrine incident in Samarra has become unbearable and worse than ever. It has become very dangerous to the extent that even a .50-caliber machine gun wouldn't do you good for protection."

The distrust is not limited to Shiites. Sunnis too believe sectarian tensions have long-lasting ramifications, and fear for the future.

"I don't think that the shockwaves of this incident have died down yet, and I don't think that they will unless a more secular government comes into power," said Zaid Jumaili, a 33-year-old electrical engineer from a predominantly Sunni neighborhood in west Baghdad.

"These explosions basically got rid of any inhibitions that the people had before it. It's all about revenge. Ordinary Shiites started attacking or killing ordinary Sunnis, and ordinary Sunnis who had nothing to do with [religious militants] started doing the same thing as a reprisal."

Still, many Shiites and Sunnis share the view that the attack was the work of foreign agents determined to foment a holy war in Iraq, and resent the way it has divided their country. Saif Lahaybi, a 23-year-old Sunni engineering student, said he had to end a relationship with a Shiite girl because of the divisions, and he and Shiite friends are no longer able to visit each other's neighborhoods to socialize.

"No doubt the bombing of the shrine in Samarra is not accepted, whether by Shiite or Sunnis," he said. "We were like one, living together and sharing neighborhoods."

But there are those who hold out hope.

Mohammed Thamir, 28, who on Thursday sat in his darkened luggage store without electricity, said he believed the new security effort would bring an end to the violence.

"It was a big tragedy and what happened is unfathomable, but I am optimistic that we will be able to surpass these hard times," he said as the light from a battery-powered fluorescent bulb glinted off the metal fixtures of his suitcases. Business was brisk after the bombing, as Iraqis bought baggage to flee the country. Now, he said, sales have slowed as people give the new plan a chance to work.

DOJ_NMG_0135806

"'Hopefully this security plan will put an end to this violence," Thamir said. "I have faith that it will work. It's not just Iraqis; the whole international community has interest in the success of this plan."

Shujaa Abdul-Ilah, the 25-year-old owner of a store that sells leather shoes and coats, said the violence had forced him to close his shop five hours earlier each day, but that the crackdown had made him feel safer.

He said that despite the violence and sectarian tension, "I don't think that it will stay like that. We are all brothers regardless of our religion or sect. We have lived in Iraq for numerous generations."

Soldier Sentenced For Rape, Murder In Iraq (AP)

AP, February 23, 2007

FORT CAMPBELL, Ky. -- A U.S. soldier was sentenced to 100 years in prison yesterday for the gang rape and murder of an Iraqi girl and the killing of her family last year.

Sgt. Paul E. Cortez, 24, also was given a dishonorable discharge. He will be eligible for parole in 10 years under the terms of his plea agreement.

Cortez of Barstow, Calif., pleaded guilty this week to four counts of felony murder, rape and conspiracy to rape in a case considered among the worst atrocities by U.S. military personnel in Iraq.

In his plea agreement, he said he conspired with other soldiers from the Fort Campbell-based 101st Airborne Division to rape 14-year-old Abeer Qassim al-Janabi. The girl, her parents and a younger sister were all killed.

Earlier yesterday, tears rolled down Cortez's face as he apologized for the rape and murders. He said he could not explain why he took part.

"I still don't have an answer," Cortez told the judge. "I don't know why. I wish I hadn't. The lives of four innocent people were taken. I want to apologize for all of the pain and suffering I have caused the al-Janabi family."

The military judge hearing the case, Col. Stephen R. Henley, issued a sentence of life in prison without parole, the maximum for the charges. Under military law, the defendant is given the lesser sentence unless he violates terms of the plea agreement, which requires Cortez to testify against others charged in the case.

Psychologist Charles Figley testified that Cortez and the other soldiers likely suffered stress brought on by fatigue and trauma.

"It eats you up," Figley said. "It's a horrible thing. This is not unique. We've seen this in other wars."

Five soldiers who served with Cortez in Iraq testified that his actions were out of character and described the hardships of war they experienced, including sleep deprivation and the lack of running water.

"I just never would have seen it coming," said Staff Sgt. Tim Briggs, who has known Cortez for five years and served with him in Iraq.

Prosecutors said the stress was no excuse for the actions of Cortez and the other soldiers from the 101st Airborne Division, based at Fort Campbell.

On Wednesday, Cortez described raping the girl in her family's home in Mahmoudiya last March, along with Spc. James Barker, 24. Barker pleaded guilty in November to rape and murder and was sentenced to 90 years in military prison.

Cortez said this week that former private Steven D. Green raped the girl in front of him; shot her father, mother and sister; and then shot her in the head. He also testified that the soldiers attempted to burn the girl's body; burned their own clothes; and threw the murder weapon, an AK-47, into a canal in an attempt to dispose of the evidence.

Cortez was found not guilty of more serious charges of premeditated murder and conspiracy to premeditated murder.

Pfcs. Jesse Spielman, 22, and Bryan Howard, 19, await courts-martial. Green, who is accused of being the ringleader but was discharged from the military before being charged, will be prosecuted in a federal court in Kentucky.

Long Iraq Tours Can Make Home A Trying Front (NYT)

By Lizette Alvarez

The New York Times, February 23, 2007

In the nearly two years Cpl. John Callahan of the Army was away from home, his wife, he said, had two extramarital affairs. She failed to pay his credit card bills. And their two children were sent to live with her parents as their home life deteriorated.

Then, in November, his machine gun malfunctioned during a firefight, wounding him in the groin and ravaging his left leg. When his wife reached him by phone after an operation in Germany, Corporal Callahan could barely hear her. Her boyfriend was shouting too loudly in the background.

“Haven’t you told him it’s over?” Corporal Callahan, 42, recalled the man saying. “That you aren’t wearing his wedding ring anymore?”

DOJ_NMG_0135807

For Corporal Callahan, who is recuperating at Walter Reed Army Medical Center, and so many other soldiers and family members, the repercussions, chaos and loneliness of wartime deployments are one of the toughest, least discussed byproducts of the conflicts in Iraq and Afghanistan. Hundreds of thousands of soldiers and loved ones have endured long, sometimes repeated separations that test the fragility of their relationships in unforeseen ways.

The situation is likely to grow worse as the military increases the number of troops in Iraq in coming months. The Pentagon announced Wednesday that it was planning to send more than 14,000 National Guard troops back to Iraq next year, causing widespread concern among reservists. Nearly a third of the troops who have served in Iraq and Afghanistan have done more than one tour of duty.

Most families and soldiers cope, sometimes heroically. But these separations have also left a trail of badly strained or broken unions, many severed by adultery or sexual addictions; burdened spouses, some of whom are reaching for antidepressants; financial turmoil brought on by rising debts, lost wages and overspending; emotionally bruised children whose grades sometimes plummet; and anxious parents who at times turn on each other.

Hardest hit are the reservists and their families, who never bargained on long absences, sometimes as long as 18 months, and who lack the support network of full-fledged members of the military.

"Since my husband has been gone, I have potty-trained two kids, my oldest started preschool, a kid learned to walk and talk, plus the baby is not sleeping that well," said Lori Jorgenson, 30, whose husband, a captain in the Minnesota National Guard, has been deployed since November 2005 and recently had his tour extended another four months. "I am very burnt out."

In the next couple of months, Ms. Jorgenson, who has three young children, has to get a loan, buy a house and move out of their apartment.

Even many active-duty military families, used to the difficulties of deployments, are reeling as soldiers are being sent again and again to war zones, with only the smallest pause in between. The unrelenting fear of death or injury, mental health problems, the lack of recuperative downtime between deployments and the changes that await when a soldier comes home hover over every household.

And unlike the Vietnam era, when the draft meant that many people were directly touched by the conflict, this period finds military families feeling a keen sense of isolation from the rest of society. Not many Americans have a direct connection to the war or the military. Only 1.4 million people, or less than 1 percent of the American population, serve in the active-duty military.

"Prior to 9/11, the deployments were not wartime related," said Kristin Henderson, a military spouse whose husband served as a Navy chaplain in Iraq and Afghanistan and whose recent book "While They're at War" explores the impact of today's deployments. "There were separation issues, but there was no anticipatory grief and no fear and no medical overload."

It is common for spouses to wind up on antidepressants, Ms. Henderson said, a situation made worse by the repeat deployments. The more deployments, the less time that families have to mend before the stress sets in again, she added.

Ms. Henderson recalled having a panic attack in church while her husband was away and crying in the shower most mornings so no one would see her. "The common misconception," she said, "is that the more you do this, the better you get. That is not true."

Some relationships grow stronger as distance and sacrifice help bring into sharp focus what is important. Before Robert Johnson's deployments to Iraq with the North Carolina Army National Guard, he and his wife, Dawn, faced difficult decisions about how to care for their seven children, including four living at home. They decided their two severely disabled teenage twin sons would be best cared for elsewhere, one in a group home, the other with grandparents.

But Ms. Johnson, 41, who works full time at a pharmacy, said she felt there had been an upside to the ordeal. "Now I know," she said, "that I can pretty much survive anything."

Other marriages, especially young marriages rushed by deployment, may have been destined to fail from the start.

Seeking Help

As the war stretches into its fourth year, more troops and their families are reaching out for help, turning to family therapists and counselors. The Army and the Marines, partly in response to a jump in the number of divorces and a rise in domestic violence reports, have created programs to help couples cope, including seminars and family weekend retreats. The Army has also improved the family readiness groups that often serve as a lifeline for spouses.

Divorces, which had hovered in the 2 percent to 3 percent range for the Army since 2000, spiked in 2004 to 6 percent among officers and 3.6 percent among enlisted personnel. The rate for officers dropped to 2.1 percent in 2006, but the rate for enlisted personnel has stayed level, at 3.6 percent.

Married women are having the hardest time. The divorce rate for women in the Army in 2006 was 7.9 percent, the highest since 2000, compared with 2.6 percent for men.

Demand for counseling has grown so quickly among military families and returning soldiers that the military has begun contracting out more services to private therapists. Reservists must rely largely on networks of volunteers.

DOJ_NMG_0135808

"For a while a lot of soldiers coming back were not being seen because there was such an overload of patients and so few mental health providers on base," said Carl Settles, a psychologist and retired Army colonel who runs a practice near Fort Hood, Tex.

The military recently called him to ask how many of several hundred patients he could take on, Dr. Settles said.

Corporal Callahan, who is on the brink of divorce, said his marriage, his second, had been troubled before his deployment but became unsalvageable once he shipped out. His deployment also forced him to transfer guardianship of his children temporarily to their grandparents because of problems at home, he said.

His injury, which has left him unable to walk, has now complicated his chances of remaining in the Army. "I felt like I had hit bottom," he said. "I had so much bitterness in me. I have been so angry. So many nights I have cried and tried to figure out what I can do and what I can't do."

Capt. Lance Oliver, Corporal Callahan's commander in Iraq, said he kept close track of Corporal Callahan's personal situation, and while disintegrating marriages are not uncommon, Captain Oliver said, Corporal Callahan's was the most dramatic.

"I can't think of one that is more heartwrenching," he said.

Spouses' Secrets

Extramarital affairs, hardly rare in other wars, are also a fixture now.

David Hernandez, who is in the Army and is based in Fort Hood, said his relationship with his wife of 10 years crumbled between his second and third deployments. She was frazzled and lonely, he said, with two children to care for; he came back moodier, quieter and more distant. Now his wife is living with another man, Mr. Hernandez said in e-mail messages from Iraq. He, in turn, has started a relationship with a female soldier, despite his hope for reconciliation.

"It was very stressful for her doing everything and worrying about me," he said, adding, "I spent so much time away; it drove us apart to seek other relationships."

"Now I'm back out here," he said. "I feel helpless. What can I do? It makes it a little easier being with someone out here. Temptation was the hardest, and I gave in."

Dr. Settles sees about 40 soldiers a week in private practice and says a majority of soldiers cope well. But those with problems feel them deeply.

"Infidelity and financial issues are major issues," Dr. Settles said, adding that there are abundant cases of wives who clear out their husband's bank accounts or soldiers who come home and go binge shopping. "Even a good mule needs a few oats once in a while," he said. " Some of these guys, they are kind of at their limit."

Some therapists say they are bracing for this year's divorces. Mary Coe, a marriage and family therapist working near Fort Campbell, an Army base on the border of Kentucky and Tennessee, said she was seeing "many, many divorces" right now. The 101st Airborne Division recently returned from its second deployment with an astonishing level of rage, she said. "Now we are seeing 15- to 20-year marriages not making it, and these are families that survived 20 years of deployments," Dr. Coe said.

Lei Steivers, whose husband is a senior noncommissioned officer at Fort Campbell, has been a military wife for 25 years. But it took her husband's second yearlong deployment to Iraq to cripple their marriage. They are now in counseling. A family leader on the base, Ms. Steivers, 46, also has two sons in the military. She said a number of men she knows came home last year for rest and relaxation and demanded a divorce.

Many spouses, she said, blame the presence of women alongside combat units. The blame may be misplaced, but the anxiety is not.

"They are side-by-side fixing an engine, the girls live upstairs, the guys live downstairs," Ms. Steivers said. "We are just more and more in awe, saying, What is going on?"

Some wives have uncovered their husband's pornographic pictures on Web sites like MySpace, she said, adding, "I've seen them because the wives show them to me."

Dr. Coe said she had been surprised by the number of soldiers who had come home and sought counseling for sexual addictions fueled by DVD's and Internet pornography.

While pornography is blocked by the United States military in Iraq, service members gain access to it with laptops through their own Internet service providers, Corporal Callahan said.

At the same time, spouses back home sometimes hook up with men on the Internet. When the relationship surfaces, it sometimes leads to violence, said Robert Weiss, who co-wrote "Untangling the Web," a book about Internet pornography, and who has been hired as a consultant by military family groups looking for guidance.

Family Trumps All Else

For some spouses, concerns about infidelity take a back seat to the demands of a household. Lillian Connolly's husband of 21 years, a staff sergeant in the Army Reserve in Massachusetts who now works at a Lowe's Home Improvement, was sent to Iraq twice. The first deployment, in 2003, lasted 11 months. The second one, for which he volunteered, was much harder on the family. Even before his father's second deployment, the couple's 12-year-old started having tantrums. When his father left their home in 2005, the boy started to misbehave at school, Ms. Connolly said. He and his sister were the only children with a deployed parent, and the school, she said, was mostly unsympathetic. If anything, Ms. Connolly said, she got the blame.

DOJ_NMG_0135809

"He really worried about his dad every day," Ms. Connolly said of her son. "They couldn't understand he had an anger problem because his dad was gone.

"That was more stressful and harder to deal with than my husband being gone."

Mary Keller, the executive director of the Military Child Education Coalition, a private nonprofit group that helps children and schools cope, said two million children had experienced deployments. Worst hit are those in schools that are isolated from military culture.

"It is highly likely that the teacher doesn't have a personal experience with the military," Dr. Keller said.

At home, spouses say, they try to keep their young children connected to their deployed parents. Ms. Jorgenson lets her three children pull Skittles out of a bowl to mark the passage of time. She buys them surprise gifts from their father, like boxes of Fruity Pebbles or camouflage sheets. Meanwhile, she thinks, "Will I ever get through bath time and get them to bed without screaming and losing my patience?"

Parents of young soldiers often appear the most tormented, counselors say, especially if opposed to the enlistment. There are also few resources for them.

"Mothers are in worse shape than wives," said Jaine Darwin, a psychoanalyst and co-director of Strategic Outreach to Families of All Reservists, a volunteer group that offers counseling to military families in many states. "Mom is not allowed to cry. And that is certainly a problem."

Esther Gallagher, 50, who works in a counseling office at a high school in Goodrich, Minn., has two sons in Iraq. She worries about both but frets most about her youngest, Justin, 22, a gunner who has seen a lot of violence in Falluja. He joined the Minnesota Army National Guard and has spent most of the past three years on deployment; the last tour was recently extended, which angered his mother and disheartened the soldiers in his unit.

When Sergeant Gallagher came home for two weeks last year, he walked out of the room any time anyone talked about Iraq.

"Every day, they are in harm's way," Ms. Gallagher said, her voice quavering. "I mean, that's your baby — to have him out there in harm's way, and not knowing. Your life has been to protect these kids."

Back From Despair, In Her Words (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 23, 2007

WITH her husband in a coma, unable to breathe on his own, Nancy Kules sat down at a computer and began to type. PRAY, PRAY, PRAY, she wrote.

It was Dec. 2, 2005. Nancy, a kindergarten teacher from Arizona, had flown across the Atlantic to be with her husband, Army 1st Lt. Ryan Kules, at a military hospital in Germany. His entire body was wrapped in bandages. All Nancy could see were his forehead, a toe and his blood-clogged ears.

Ryan's Humvee had been hit by a roadside bomb in Iraq three days earlier. His right arm and left leg were blown off. He nearly bled to death. He had severe brain damage. Doctors feared he would not survive.

Nancy wrote to friends and relatives: I wish I were logging on with better news…. I will give you all the cold, hard facts.

The ordeals of combat amputees in Iraq and Afghanistan have provided a familiar narrative after nearly four years of war. But less familiar are the stories of their spouses. For the next year, in 309 entries in an online journal, Nancy Kules laid out the facts and poured out her emotions.

Her journal opened a window on a searing experience shared by a growing number of spouses who have become collateral damage in America's overseas wars. What began as an attempt to keep loved ones informed became a unique personal account of recovery and accommodation, of suffering and redemption.

"People think what a great story it is, and what blessings we've had, and how Ryan has overcome great odds," Nancy said outside the couple's Maryland home on a sunny winter morning. "But they don't think about the daily repercussions of it. The heart of the matter isn't something you can therapy away. It is what it is. It's our new reality."

For Nancy, and for thousands who have visited the site (www.caringbridge.org/visit/ryankules) to offer comments and contributions, the journal is an inspiration. But in its frank approach to tragedy, it is also a reminder that reality can be daunting, and that life for this couple can never be the same.

The story begins just after Nancy, 24, received the phone call that military families dread. Summoned to a phone at her elementary school in Ahwatukee, Ariz., she heard a faraway voice say, matter-of-factly, that Ryan, 25, had lost limbs in an explosion.

She left work, packed and headed for the airport — knowing that being told to fly to Germany meant that Ryan was too badly injured to make it back to the U.S.

"I honestly thought I was going to be bringing a body home," she said.

Nancy was bombarded with contradictory information. After one doctor described severe brain damage, she threw up. Other doctors had assured her there was minimal brain damage.

"I wanted to know the truth, and I wanted to kick whoever gave me bad information," she said.

On Dec. 3, 2005, the second day at the hospital in Germany, she wrote: It is easier to get the info to you this way, because it is difficult to talk about it out loud.

Between the grief, time changes, and jet lag, we are so unaware of time. I got to help clean Ryan up last night. I spent a good 4 hours taking a q-tip to his fingers, toes, ears and any other visible skin. It was somewhat therapeutic for me….

I want MY Ryan back, (past, present, and future) and all those memories that we share and I have been re-living for the past few days … I have faith that this will happen.

Dec. 7: I re-read the things that I have written, barely remembering some of it…. I find myself crying when I read these things. Not the kinds of sobs that shake my whole body, but a peaceful stream of tears running down my face.

With Ryan in a coma, Nancy spoke to him, hoping he would somehow understand that she was at his side.

"He was so badly broken," she recalled recently. "If he was hanging on until we got there, I wanted him to know, 'Baby, I'm here and I love you and if you gotta let go, it's OK.' "

HE did not let go.

Ryan was transferred to Walter Reed Army Medical Center in Washington, still in a coma and fighting a high fever. There, Nancy noticed that his eyes were no longer locked in a fixed stare. They moved slightly.

Dec. 10: I knew for the first time that Ryan is aware that I am here. He is still not following commands, but when I looked in his eyes, I just feel like he is still there, frustrated that he cannot show this to us yet …

The anguish of this discovery is startling. I feel like my time to deal with 'me' is over, and I now need to find the strength to focus on him …. I am scared of what Ryan will think. I am scared of what he already knows…. I think I need to go outside, stomp, scream, and cry a little.

Three days later, after a breathing tube was removed, Ryan spoke his first words since the explosion: "Hi, Nancy."

Nancy quizzed him. His name? "Ryan." His dog's name? "Peanut." Did he love Nancy? "Yes." Their wedding anniversary? "Um … April?"

Dec. 13: Ha ha. I'll take it …. It is a long, l o n g road ahead of us, but the progress of today helps us look toward tomorrow …

Dec. 14: This evening, Ryan told me "my legs and arms are broken." I just said "yes baby, but the doctors are working to help you. I have to go to the bathroom, I will be right back." Then, I stepped around the corner and cried. My poor Ryan. My heart aches for him …

I cannot imagine waking up and suddenly having to deal with the loss.

That same day, Ryan called his wife "Miss Nancy."

I got all teary eyed because of this … I don't know why he called me Miss Nancy. That was hard. I am sure he will get around to "baby" or at least Nancy soon enough but …

The loss of his limbs weighed on Ryan. "I didn't freak out, but I would realize it all over again the next day, anew," he recalled. "People ask if I woke and started screaming because I'm missing an arm and a leg. Well, it was gradual — it happened over and over."

Doctors discovered mucous and blood clots in Ryan's lungs. Because of breathing problems, he was re-intubated and unable to speak.

Dec. 16: 2 steps forward, 100 steps back. We feel like we have lost a week+ of progress in one night.

Dec. 18: I am happy as a clam this evening. His vital signs are great, the clots have not presented any new problems as of yet, and he gives me kisses whenever I ask for them (mostly) :)

Ryan had not yet been told that two of his soldiers died in the explosion.

Dec. 23: Ryan told me that he had been waiting for us to have some time alone so he could ask … the question that I have been preparing for, but dreading. "What happened to the other men from my platoon?"

It broke my heart to tell Ryan, but he was understanding and lay in quiet contemplation after I broke the news. I cried.

The journal records Ryan's three dozen surgeries (he remembers only three) and his long medical odyssey from coma to intensive care to therapy to rehabilitation. It captures Ryan's first attempts to feed himself, his first "breakout" from the hospital for a day trip, his struggles to learn to walk on a prosthetic leg. He left the hospital as an outpatient in mid-January 2006.

July 12: Ryan is able to walk, AND drink a Slurpee at the same time. The small things in life …

DOJ_NMG_0135811

The entries document with candor and passion the couple's "roller coaster ride."

Nov. 29, the one-year anniversary of the explosion: Even through times that felt very dark and lonely, this website has been a beacon of support, and a lifeline to others that were (and are) willing to share in our pain and concern, or joy and accomplishments …

I can honestly say neither of us has ever experienced anything more challenging, or demanding. Although things have been almost impossible to bear at times and even harder to understand, the number one thing … is to try our best to learn from the situation. What can we take away from all of this that will leave us stronger?

RYAN is among 100 Americans who have lost two limbs in Iraq or Afghanistan. An additional 448 have lost one limb, and four have lost three.

Promoted to captain in July, he is walking, with effort, on his prosthesis. He can drive a car. He has undergone therapy to become left-hand dominant. His right arm — he was right-handed — was severed too high up for a prosthetic arm to fit effectively.

Nancy says his brain function is as good as ever, though Ryan cracked, "Some would argue that I've always had reduced brain function."

He and Nancy have taken trips around the country in which Ryan has gone snowboarding, snow skiing, water-skiing, whitewater rafting, biking, fishing and canoeing. He visits Walter Reed twice a week for physical therapy.

"The neighbors know me as the guy with the left arm who walks kind of funny," he said. "They don't know me any other way. I'm kind of accepted as a normal member of society, and that's the goal in rehab."

Ryan plans to work as an intelligence analyst for a private company that does contract work for the federal government. "I can't get back into the fight on the ground anymore, so this is my way of getting back into it," he said.

Nancy plans to return to teaching someday, and is "slowing down" on the journal, she said.

"It's time to kind of get back our privacy," she said. "We still want to share the highlights of our life, but in a more normal way. Now, thank God, the updates are kind of ordinary. It's not do-or-die information anymore."

They are now "just a normal couple in their 20s, dealing with all the little things couples deal with," Nancy said.

"But for every day for the rest of hopefully Ryan's very long life, he will wake up every morning and face the challenge mentally, physically and emotionally, strapping on body parts in order to function," she said. "That doesn't go away."

Recently, the journal reported a new development: The Kuleses are expecting their first child, a girl, in May. They've already named her: Jillian Deme Kules. The "J" honors Sgt. Jerry W. Mills Jr., 23, and the "D" Sgt. Donald J. Haase, 28, the soldiers killed in the explosion.

"It was a relief to know there wasn't anything, uh, you know … well, you get blown up, you sort of wonder what else might not be working," Nancy said.

"Yeah, you gotta make sure everything works," Ryan said.

"Well, everything's working fine," Nancy said. "It's not just for show."

"Good way to put it there, Nancy," Ryan said.

Nancy's journal no longer focuses on Ryan's recovery, or her own. The main topic now is the latest baby news.

Sept. 23: Ryan and I cannot wait until our little one is old enough to understand the meaning behind [her] name.

South Korean Gets 5 Years For Dealings With Iraqis (NYT)

By James Barron

The New York Times, February 23, 2007

Tongsun Park, a once flamboyant South Korean businessman convicted of illegally representing Saddam Hussein in trying to influence the United Nations oil-for-food program, was sentenced yesterday to five years in prison.

Judge Denny Chin of Federal District Court in Manhattan said Mr. Park had “blatantly disregarded the law” by taking more than $2 million for trying to lobby United Nations officials to ease sanctions against Iraq.

“You acted out of greed, acted to profit from what was supposed to be a humanitarian program,” Judge Chin told Mr. Park. He also fined him $15,000 and ordered him to forfeit $1.2 million.

The judge called the sentence “harsh” for a 71-year-old man with health problems. But he also said it was “appropriate.”

Mr. Park was found guilty last July. He was the first defendant to go to trial in connection with a scandal that involved cash from Iraq in diplomatic pouches, “back-channel communications” to the United Nations secretary general at the time, and even a scheme to bribe him.

The oil-for-food program was intended to ease some aspects of the sanctions imposed on Iraq after it invaded Kuwait in 1990. Under it, Mr. Hussein’s government could use the money from limited oil sales to buy aid supplies — food, medicine and other nonmilitary staples.

Federal prosecutors said Mr. Park had even had a hand in influencing the negotiations that gave birth to the aid program in 1995. But they said he never registered as an agent for Mr. Hussein's government, as required under federal law.

Judge Chin focused on the money that passed through Mr. Park's hands, and on the money that he pocketed. The judge said Mr. Park had accepted "manila folders filled with $100 bills" and had once gone to Iraq to pick up $700,000 in cash.

Mr. Park's lawyer, Michael S. Kim, said Mr. Park had decided not to say anything in court because of "advanced age, frail health and his desire to get his life back on track." Mr. Park said at the time of his arrest that he had diabetes and high blood pressure and had just had a kidney transplant.

The sentencing came hours after Judge Chin refused a request from four other defendants to dismiss separate fraud and conspiracy charges. They have pleaded not guilty and are awaiting trial.

Mr. Park, who was also a central figure in a Congressional bribery scandal in the 1970s that became known as Koreagate, was arrested 13 months ago. Mexican immigration officials took him into custody at the Mexico City airport.

As prosecutors prepared their case against Mr. Park, an independent panel led by Paul A. Volcker, the former Federal Reserve chairman, concluded that at the time of his activities for Iraq, Mr. Park was something of an informal adviser to the United Nations secretary general at the time, Boutros Boutros-Ghali.

The report said Mr. Park and a business partner, Samir A. Vincent, had worked out an arrangement with officials of Mr. Hussein's government and would receive millions of dollars in cash.

Park Sentenced To 5 Years In U.N. Oil-for-Food Bribery Scandal (WP)

By Colum Lynch

Washington Post, February 23, 2007

NEW YORK, Feb. 22 -- South Korean businessman and influence peddler Tongsun Park was sentenced Thursday to five years in prison for his role in the bribery scandal surrounding the United Nation's oil-for-food program for Iraq a decade ago.

Park, 71, admitted taking more than $2.5 million from Saddam Hussein's government to bribe senior U.N. officials to persuade them to ease economic sanctions against Iraq after the 1991 Persian Gulf War. He was convicted in July of acting as an unregistered agent of Iraq; he was to have set up a back channel between then-U.N. Secretary General Boutros Boutros-Ghali and then-Iraqi Deputy Prime Minister Tariq Aziz.

The sentence was the maximum possible. U.S. District Judge Denny Chin also ordered Park to forfeit $1.2 million of his assets and fined him $15,000. Chin said Park had "acted out of greed" and "blatantly disregarded the law."

"You either bribed a U.N. official or you were acting as if you were going to bribe a U.N. official," Chin told Park, who stood impassively in the courtroom. He was taken into custody after saying goodbye to friends.

Park's trial and a U.N. investigation exposed a secretive network of businessmen, Washington politicians and other insiders who joined forces in the early 1990s to ease U.N. sanctions imposed on Iraq after it invaded Kuwait in 1990. Their efforts eventually led to the $64 million oil-for-food program allowing Iraq to sell its oil to pay for humanitarian goods.

Park's role in the scheme marked an extraordinary comeback -- and another amazing fall -- for a man who was indicted in the 1970s "Koreagate" influence-peddling scandal that roiled Washington. He had funneled hundreds of thousands in cash from the South Korean government to influential members of Congress. After the case broke, Park fled to South Korea. But after bribery charges against him were dropped, he agreed to return to the United States and testify before Congress about his activities.

During that era, Park was a fixture in Washington political circles, hosting parties at his historic George Town Club. His friends and clients included the late House Speaker Thomas P. "Tip" O'Neill Jr. (D-Mass.), Rep. Charles B. Rangel (D-N.Y.) and William E. Timmons, an influential Republican lobbyist who once joined forces with Park in an unsuccessful attempt to prevent the U.S. ouster of Panamanian strongman Manuel Noriega.

"He was always known as a man who was willing to bring two people together for the right price," said Mark G. Califano, a former U.N. investigator who co-wrote "Good Intentions Corrupted," a book based on the findings of a U.N. probe led by former U.S. Federal Reserve chairman Paul A. Volcker.

Despite his past, Park insinuated himself with Boutros-Ghali in the early 1990s, acting as an unofficial intelligence adviser on issues including the Korean Peninsula and Japan. He provided "first-class information," "knew everybody" and was "an integral part" of Washington's political elite, Boutros-Ghali told a team of U.N. investigators probing corruption in the humanitarian program.

Park was also valued by Boutros-Ghali and U.N. insiders for his capacity to secure money and political support for a variety of U.N. causes, including the organization's 50th anniversary celebration.

DOJ_NMG_0135813

He also set up meetings with influential political leaders, including Rangel, now chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, to reinvigorate Boutros-Ghali's unsuccessful 1996 reelection campaign after the Clinton administration decided to veto his candidacy.

"It was always interesting to talk to Tongsun, about the travels he had done, relationships with people, how he was seeking to build a better world, said George Dalley, Rangel's chief of staff. "Whatever purpose he might have had, he was good at masking it. That is my best explanation of why a person even with a shadowy past could remake himself and develop a relationship that would be a positive one with a guy like Charlie Rangel."

"I guess now it's for sure that his reputation and his memory is all going to be the fixer, the hustler," Dalley said. "For a while I guess I saw a guy trying to redeem himself from his past and doing something that was totally different. But apparently it wasn't."

Park's foray into Iraq diplomacy began in 1992 when he joined forces with Samir A. Vincent, a former Iraqi Olympic athlete who had close ties to officials in Baghdad and Washington.

Vincent had been unable to persuade Iraqi officials to allow the American Red Cross to oversee a humanitarian relief program for the country.

Park and Vincent hatched a plan to solicit millions from the Iraqis to try to bribe Boutros-Ghali and other officials to develop an oil-for-food program that was favorable to the Iraqi government.

In 1996, Hussein's government agreed to pay $5 million to Park and $10 million to Vincent, a portion of which was to be used to bribe unnamed U.N. officials. But Park received only a fraction of his cut, more than $700,000, in old bills stuffed into shopping bags.

The following year, Park traveled to Baghdad to try to collect the rest. Aziz provided him with $1 million in a cardboard box, which he exchanged for a $988,885 check that was invested in a Canadian company controlled by a then-senior U.N. official.

The federal investigation into the oil-for-food program has expanded into a wider probe of other corruption at the United Nations and has resulted in the indictment or conviction of 14 people. Vincent pleaded guilty and testified against Park at the trial.

But there was no evidence in Park's case that he and Vincent used the cash to bribe Boutros-Ghali.

Califano said a "fairly detailed review" of Boutros-Ghali's financial records yielded no evidence of inappropriate payments. "We think the Iraqis probably got ripped off," Califano said.

Iraqi Embassy Upgrades Its D.C. Digs (WP)

By Nora Boustany

The Washington Post, February 23, 2007

Iraq may be facing a deadly civil war, but the Iraqi government is initiating major, costly repairs to its diplomatic building in Washington and expanding its real estate holdings here.

The latest Iraqi government purchase for its U.S. mission is a $5.8 million mansion at 3421 Massachusetts Ave. NW in Observatory Circle, across the street from Vice President Cheney's official residence. The three-story, 1920 Tudor-style structure, with more than 7,000 square feet of space, will serve as Iraq's temporary embassy during renovations to its fading Dupont Circle mission. Plans are to eventually turn the Dupont Circle building into a cultural center for the exhibition of Iraqi art.

The mansion comes with bright skylights, inset lighting fixtures, a top-floor kitchenette with a built-in espresso machine, new hardwood floors and soft pistachio carpeting up the winding stairs. There are heated floors, a firefighting system, speakers for music throughout the building, and spacious bathrooms, one with a Jacuzzi.

"We have bathrooms coming out of our ears," said Iraqi Ambassador Samir Sumaidaie, inspecting the new digs.

A Washington design and restoration company, Skynear and Co., painstakingly repaired the building after a 2004 fire, replicating almost every detail. Original plaster moldings were recast and French chandeliers imported to replace the originals. "A lot of blood, sweat and tears went into it," said Lynn Skynear. "We think we resurrected it back from the dead."

The Iraqi government bought the building in October.

Overseeing the effort is Sumaidaie, an electrical engineer by training, a poet and Islamic art connoisseur by inclination. His soon-to-be-vacated Dupont Circle office is a study in good lighting and precision. There is chaos in Iraq, but his working space exudes maximum control: a sleek computer screen, a yellow pad, Mont Blanc pens in a wooden case, rows of rulers, cellphones.

"It is a tiny part of what I do here," he said last week, looking up from design plans spread over a desk buffed to gleaming perfection. "Bear with me, I have to watch this," he said as he watched President Bush, on a vast television screen, speak about the importance of success in Iraq.

Asked about spending oil revenue on embassy buildings while Iraq is in the throes of war, Sumaidaie turned off the television's sound. "Rebuilding is part of our recovery, regaining normalcy is part of our recovery," he replied. "It is building, not destroying."

Sumaidaie is the first Iraqi ambassador to the United States since Mohamed al-Mashat fled to Canada in January 1991 before the start of the Persian Gulf War. His hands are full, with requests for media interviews, meetings with U.S. officials and lobbying a newly critical Congress, in addition to the minutiae of sifting through plans submitted by five local companies vying for the embassy's renovation project. The embassy also tends to the local Iraqi community and is developing consular offices in other major American cities.

"I believe every person in charge of something should do his best," Sumaidaie said. "I am doing the best for Iraq from where I am sitting."

Sumaidaie has even bigger real estate expansion plans, once peace descends on Iraq: a new facility in a prime location in Washington that would be designed by one of Iraq's internationally renowned architects, such as Iraq-born, Britain-based Zaha Hadid. The Dupont Circle embassy would then become an Iraqi museum.

On this day, however, the daily reports of casualties, both Iraqi and American, are topmost in this thoughts.

After a recent visit to Walter Reed Army Medical Center, he said, "These great young men and women are heroes, yet their lives will never be the same. Each one of their sacrifices is a personal tragedy. This has been a joint effort, like a baptism of fire. We will get to the other side of this war, hopefully."

In the meantime, he wants to repair Iraq's image in Washington -- or at least its public facade. After 15 years of neglect, the red-brick embassy off Dupont Circle is in disrepair, with corroding pipes, peeling gold-leaf ceilings and rusty wiring.

To repair the Dupont Circle building will take millions. Sumaidaie is currently soliciting bids. Once the renovation is underway, the Iraqi mission will decamp to the posh new quarters at Observatory Circle.

The new facility sits amid some of the city's major religious centers: across Massachusetts Avenue from St. Sophia Greek Orthodox Cathedral, next to a construction site for a Buddhist temple, and five blocks from the Islamic Center of Washington. The towers of Washington National Cathedral can be seen nearby.

But the colorful history of 3421 seems more earthly than divine.

The building became the embassy of Sudan in 1961, during the Kennedy administration. When Bangladesh gained independence from Pakistan in 1971, the mansion became its embassy. In the mid-1980s, at the peak of demonstrations against apartheid, South Africa moved part of its embassy there. In the early 1990s, Kazakhstan launched its U.S. diplomatic mission there after gaining independence from the former Soviet Union.

The most recent previous occupant was the diplomatic mission of Ivory Coast, which has since moved to a new building. During its years at the address, Ivory Coast endured a bloody civil war. In February 2004, days after the Ivorians moved out, the building was damaged by an electrical fire.

In addition to his other duties, Sumaidaie is collecting works by Iraqi artists to exhibit in the embassy's buildings, wise investments for the future, he said.

"It will take a long time for us to heal," he said. "I do believe that giving helps healing, doing something positive. It is the antidote to destruction. In the teeth of the most horrendous violence, there are people out there doing their jobs. This is the best way to deal with fear, a constructive way out. It is one of the ways of healing."

U.S. Used Bases In Ethiopia To Hunt Al Qaeda In Africa (NYT)

By Michael R. Gordon And Mark Mazzetti

The New York Times, February 23, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 22 — The American military quietly waged a campaign from Ethiopia last month to capture or kill top leaders of Al Qaeda in the Horn of Africa, including the use of an airstrip in eastern Ethiopia to mount airstrikes against Islamic militants in neighboring Somalia, according to American officials.

The close and largely clandestine relationship with Ethiopia also included significant sharing of intelligence on the Islamic militants' positions and information from American spy satellites with the Ethiopian military. Members of a secret American Special Operations unit, Task Force 88, were deployed in Ethiopia and Kenya, and ventured into Somalia, the officials said.

The counterterrorism effort was described by American officials as a qualified success that disrupted terrorist networks in Somalia, led to the death or capture of several Islamic militants and involved a collaborative relationship with Ethiopia that had been developing for years.

But the tally of the dead and captured does not as yet include some Qaeda leaders — including Fazul Abdullah Mohammed and Fahid Mohammed Ally Msalam — whom the United States has hunted for their suspected roles in the attacks on American Embassies in Kenya and Tanzania in 1998. With Somalia still in a chaotic state, and American and African officials struggling to cobble together a peacekeeping force for the war-ravaged country, the long-term effects of recent American operations remain unclear.

DOJ_NMG_0135815

It has been known for several weeks that American Special Operations troops have operated inside Somalia and that the United States carried out two strikes on Qaeda suspects using AC-130 gunships. But the extent of American cooperation with the recent Ethiopian invasion into Somalia and the fact that the Pentagon secretly used an airstrip in Ethiopia to carry out attacks have not been previously reported. The secret campaign in the Horn of Africa is an example of a more aggressive approach the Pentagon has taken in recent years to dispatch Special Operations troops globally to hunt high-level terrorism suspects. President Bush gave the Pentagon powers after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks to carry out these missions, which historically had been reserved for intelligence operatives.

When Ethiopian troops first began a large-scale military offensive in Somalia late last year, officials in Washington denied that the Bush administration had given its tacit approval to the Ethiopian government. In interviews over the past several weeks, however, officials from several American agencies with a hand in Somalia policy have described a close alliance between Washington and the Ethiopian government that was developed with a common purpose: rooting out Islamic radicalism inside Somalia.

Indeed, the Pentagon for several years has been training Ethiopian troops for counterterrorism operations in camps near the Somalia border, including Ethiopian special forces called the Agazi Commandos, which were part of the Ethiopian offensive in Somalia.

Bryan Whitman, a Pentagon spokesman, declined to discuss details of the American operation, but some officials agreed to provide specifics because they saw it as a relative success story. They said that the close relationship had included the sharing of battlefield intelligence on the Islamists' positions — a result of an Ethiopian request to Gen. John P. Abizaid, then the commander of the United States Central Command. John D. Negroponte, the director of national intelligence at the time, then authorized spy satellites to be diverted to provide information for Ethiopian troops, the officials said.

The deepening American alliance with Ethiopia is the latest twist in the United States' on-and-off intervention in Somalia, beginning with an effort in 1992 to distribute food to starving Somalis and evolving into deadly confrontation in 1993 between American troops and fighters loyal to a Somali warlord, Mohammed Farah Aidid. The latest chapter began last June when the Council of Islamic Courts, an armed fundamentalist movement, defeated a coalition of warlords backed by the Central Intelligence Agency and took power in Mogadishu, the capital. The Islamists were believed to be sheltering Qaeda militants involved in the embassy bombings, as well as in a 2002 hotel bombing in Kenya.

After a failed C.I.A. effort to arm and finance Somali warlords, the Bush administration decided on a policy to bolster Somalia's weak transitional government. This decision brought the American policy in line with Ethiopia's.

As the Islamists' grip on power grew stronger, their militias began to encircle Baidoa, where the transitional government was operating in virtual exile. Ethiopian officials pledged that if the Islamists attacked Baidoa, they would respond with a full-scale assault.

While Washington resisted officially endorsing an Ethiopian invasion, American officials from several government agencies said that the Bush administration decided last year that an incursion was the best option to dislodge the Islamists from power.

When the Ethiopian offensive began on Dec. 24, it soon turned into a rout, somewhat to the Americans' surprise. Armed with American intelligence, the Ethiopians' tank columns, artillery batteries and military jets made quick work of the poorly trained and ill-equipped Islamist militia.

"The Ethiopians just wiped out entire grid squares; it was a blitzkrieg," said one official in Washington who had helped develop the strategy toward Somalia.

As the Islamists retreated, the Qaeda operatives and their close aides fled south toward a swampy region. Using information provided by Ethiopian forces in Somalia as well as American intelligence, a task force from the Pentagon's Joint Special Operations Command began planning direct strikes.

On Dec. 31, the largely impotent transitional government of Somalia submitted a formal request to the American ambassador in Kenya asking for the United States to take action against the militants.

General Abizaid called Defense Secretary Robert M. Gates and informed him that the Central Command was sending additional Special Operations forces to the region. The deployment was carried out under the terms of an earlier, classified directive that gave the military the authority to kill or capture senior Qaeda operatives if it was determined that the failure to act expeditiously meant the United States would lose a "fleeting opportunity" to neutralize the enemy, American officials said.

On Jan. 6, two Air Force AC-130 gunships, aircraft with devastating firepower, arrived at a small airport in eastern Ethiopia. American Special Operations troops operating in Kenya, working with the Kenyan military, also set up positions along the southern border to capture militants trying to flee the country.

A Navy flotilla began to search for ships that might be carrying fleeing Qaeda operatives. Support planes were deployed in Djibouti. F-15Es from Al Udeid air base in Qatar also flew missions. Intelligence was shared with Ethiopia and Kenya through C.I.A. operatives in each country. American military planners also worked directly with Ethiopian and Kenyan military officials.

DOJ_NMG_0135816

On Jan. 7, one day after the AC-130s arrived in Ethiopia, the airstrike was carried our near Ras Kamboni, an isolated fishing village on the Kenyan border.

According to American officials, the primary target of the strike was Aden Hashi Ayro, a young military commander trained in Afghanistan who was one of the senior leaders of the Council of Islamic Courts.

Several hours after the strike, Ethiopian troops and one member of the American Special Operations team arrived at the site and confirmed that eight people had been killed and three wounded, all of whom were described as being armed. After sifting through the debris, they found a bloodied passport and other items that led them to believe Mr. Ayro was injured in the strike and probably died. Several members of the Special Operations team were also in Somalia at the time of the strike, one official said.

The second AC-130 strike, on Jan. 23, had another of the Islamic council's senior leaders, Sheik Ahmed Madobe, as its target. Mr. Madobe survived and was later captured by the Ethiopians, Americans say.

American officials said that Fazul Abdullah Mohammed, the mastermind of the 1998 embassy bombings in Kenya and Tanzania and the alleged ringleader of Al Qaeda's East African cell, remains at large. Some officials caution that while the Ethiopians have said additional "high-priority targets," including Abu Talha al-Sudani, a leading member of the cell, were killed in their own airstrikes, American intelligence officials have yet to confirm this.

In late January, American officials played a role in securing the safe passage of Sheik Sharif Sheik Ahmed, the second-highest-ranking Islamist leader, from southern Somalia to Nairobi, Kenya. The exact role of American involvement is still not clear, but some American officials consider him to be a moderate Islamist.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

US Judge Denies Motion To Delay Enron Lawsuit (AP)

By JUAN A. LOZANO, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 23, 2007

(AP) - HOUSTON-A $40 billion (â,¬30.5 billion) lawsuit filed by former Enron Corp. shareholders and investors alleging investment firms and banks played key roles in the company's collapse will go to trial in April despite a pending appeals court decision on the case, a judge has ruled.

U.S. District Judge Melinda Harmon denied efforts by Merrill Lynch & Co., Credit Suisse First Boston and Barclays PLC to delay the trial while the 5th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals rules on whether the case can proceed as a class-action suit.

She said in her ruling Wednesday that there should be no postponement, because of the uncertainty of when the appeals court would rule. Jury selection was set for April 9.

Attorneys for the shareholders and investors accused the banks and investment firms of trying to delay the case for several years. The trial has been rescheduled three times.

"There is no reason to wait indefinitely for a decision from the Fifth Circuit that likely will not impact the trial," attorneys for investors wrote in a motion last week. "Any delay simply benefits the banks and harms class members who have waited patiently for over five years for their day in court."

In their motion to delay the trial, the banks and investment firms argued the 5th Circuit's decision could significantly alter the definition of the lawsuit's class status as well as the claims and defenses to be presented at trial.

The banks and firms, which have denied any wrongdoing, also said they do not want to delay the trial for several more years.

"There is nothing sinister about the suggestion that since the Fifth Circuit will be ruling on that appeal, the court and the parties should take the time to apply the Fifth Circuit's guidance to the class definition, the parties, the claims and the defenses before sending class notice and embarking on a jury trial estimated to last many months," attorneys for Merrill Lynch, Credit Suisse and Barclays wrote in a motion.

Spokesmen for Merrill Lynch and Credit Suisse both declined to comment Thursday, and an attorney for Barclays did not immediately return a call seeking comment.

Some former Enron officials have been dropped as defendants in the case, but a few remain, including former Chief Executive Jeffrey Skilling, who is serving a 24-year prison sentence.

So far plaintiffs have recouped $7.3 billion (â,¬5.57 billion), mostly from such financial institutions as Bank of America, JPMorgan Chase & Co., Citigroup and Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce.

Enron, once the seventh-largest U.S. company, entered bankruptcy proceedings in December 2001 after years of accounting tricks could no longer hide billions in debt or make failing ventures appear profitable. The collapse wiped out

DOJ_NMG_0135817

thousands of jobs, more than $60 billion (â,¬45.78 billion) in market value and more than $2 billion (â,¬1.53 billion) in pension plans. 2007-02-22T19:36:20Z

Former Sadia CFO To Pay $364,000 In SEC Insider-trading Case (AP)

AP, February 23, 2007

(AP) - WASHINGTON-The former chief financial officer of Sadia SA, a Brazilian chicken and pork producer, and a former employee of Brazil's Banco ABN AMRO Real SA have agreed to pay almost half a million dollars (â,¬381,500) combined to settle charges that they traded on inside information about the meat company's 2006 attempt to take over its largest local rival, Perdigao SA.

The Securities and Exchange Commission on Thursday announced the settlement with Luiz Gonzaga Murat Junior, the former chief financial officer at Sadia, and Alexandre Ponzio De Azevedo, the former banker. The two settled without admitting or denying wrongdoing. Their attorneys could not immediately be identified.

Murat agreed to give up $184,028 (â,¬140,415) and to pay a $180,404 (â,¬137,650) civil penalty. He also agreed to a five-year ban on serving as an officer or director of a public company. Azevedo agreed to give up $68,215 (â,¬52,049) and to pay a $67,165 (â,¬51,248).

Murat "is relieved to resolve this matter, and he is anxious to put this behind him and turn his attention to the future," said his attorney, Juan Marcelino. An attorney for Azevedo could not immediately be reached for comment.

The SEC accused Murat of buying Perdigao securities that are listed in the United States after an April 7, 2006, meeting with investment bankers who proposed that Sadia make an offer for Perdigao. Murat's holdings rose in value after Sadia announced its offer on July 2006, when the price of Perdigao's American depositary shares rose 21 percent to $24.50, the SEC said.

The SEC said that Azevedo learned of the possible offer on April 11, 2006, when he was assigned to the ABN AMRO tender offer financing team. He then bought 14,000 American depositary shares in June, and sold 10,500 of the securities shortly after Sadia announced its offer, the SEC said.

Sadia withdrew its hostile bid to take over Perdigao days after announcing its offer. Pension funds and investors holding 55 percent of Perdigao's voting stock chose not to accept a second offer.

The settlement agreements still face court approval.

Siobhan Hughes is a Dow Jones Newswires correspondent.

Panel Sets Voluntary Guides For Hedge Funds (USAT)

By Adam Shell

USA Today, February 23, 2007

A presidential group charged with devising ways to improve oversight of the secretive $1.2 trillion hedge fund world issued a list of self-policing guidelines Thursday that it asserts will be more effective in protecting investors than more stringent laws would be.

Favoring a market-based solution over government regulation, the President's Working Group on Financial Markets (PWGFM) opted for a "principles-based approach" for dealing with the issues surrounding the fast-growing industry that now includes roughly 9,000 funds, uses exotic investment strategies and has a history of scandalous fund meltdowns.

"These guidelines should serve as a foundation to enhance vigilance and market discipline further, which will strengthen investor protection and guard against systemic risk," Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson, a member of the PWGFM, said in a statement.

Hedge funds are lightly regulated private investment pools geared toward wealthy and sophisticated investors.

They have been under the microscope amid a massive influx of cash and high-profile fund implosions, such as the $6 billion loss suffered by Amaranth Advisors last fall.

The guidelines released by the presidential group encourages:

·Hedge funds to enhance the amount of timely information they provide to investors.

·Investors to consider the suitability of these investments in light of their risk tolerance and investment objectives.

·Creditors (i.e., banks who lend money to hedge funds) to set aside enough reserves to minimize risks if big losses occur at a fund.

·Regulators to work together to maintain market integrity.

Critics say the guidelines don't go far enough.

DOJ_NMG_0135818

"These vague recommendations lack substance and specifics, making them unenforceable," Connecticut Attorney General Richard Blumenthal said in a statement. Blumenthal said states may respond to the federal inaction with their own initiatives.

Micah Green, of the Securities Industry and Financial Markets Association, backed the group's plan: "Too often, regulators reach for new laws which can … stifle innovation and smother markets."

In an effort to keep not-so-savvy investors away from hedge funds, the Securities and Exchange Commission has proposed boosting the minimum net worth for investors to get into such funds to $2.5 million from $1 million.

Call For More Oversight Of Hedge Funds Is Rejected (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, February 23, 2007

Financial regulators yesterday rejected calls for more direct oversight of hedge funds and said that the current system for preventing market collapse and widespread investor losses is "working well" in their first policy statement on the issue in eight years.

Hedge funds are loosely regulated pools of private investment designed for wealthy individuals and institutions. Nearly 9,000 of the rapidly growing funds control more than $1 trillion in assets. On a given day, the funds may account for a third of the trading volume in major U.S. stock exchanges, according to industry estimates.

The funds' outsized returns are drawing interest from pension funds and less-well-heeled investors -- and concern from investor advocates and analysts who fear that excessive borrowing and risky trading bets by the funds could induce instability in the market.

The unanimous policy directive by the President's Working Group on Financial Markets comes weeks after pressure from allies in Europe and elsewhere to pay heightened attention to the hedge fund sector. Led by Germany, the Group of Seven nations pressed for more vigilance in policing the funds earlier this month. On Tuesday, Canadian authorities proposed forcing hedge fund managers in that country to register with regulators.

The approach in the United States has been far less direct. The Securities and Exchange Commission tried to impose a similar registration requirement in 2004, only to see it struck down by a federal appeals court as overreaching. The SEC is considering a separate proposal to raise the minimum net worth that would allow an individual to invest in a hedge fund to $2.5 million from $1 million.

The strategy set out by the working group, made up of the heads of the SEC, Treasury Department, Federal Reserve and the Commodity Futures Trading Commission, places the greatest onus not on hedge fund managers but on sophisticated investors, banks that lend vast streams of money to the funds and brokers who process their trades.

To protect themselves, wealthy investors should evaluate a fund manager's experience, disciplinary history and potential conflicts of interest, the six-page policy statement said. Managers of pension funds should perform due diligence and ensure that their portfolios are properly diversified before investing in the funds. Investors including pension funds lost more than $6 billion in last year's collapse of hedge fund Amaranth Advisors.

Since June 1999, the SEC has filed more than 100 enforcement cases against hedge funds or their advisers over securities-law violations, according to public records.

Still, Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr., chairman of the working group, expressed reluctance to tamper with an innovative industry that has created billions of dollars in wealth and liquidity. In an interview with Bloomberg television yesterday, Paulson said that regulators do not have the ability or the desire to shield all investors from suffering losses, preferring to let the market operate without undue meddling from overseers.

In a separate interview, SEC Chairman Christopher Cox stressed that lenders and brokers, who are regularly policed by the Federal Reserve and the SEC, should monitor their tolerance for risks and losses.

The report stopped far short of creating any new rules, such as the imposition of limits on lending to hedge funds or barring their fast-moving trading strategies.

The Managed Funds Association and the Coalition of Private Investment Companies, the hedge fund industry's chief trade groups, said regulators had achieved an appropriate balance between oversight and preserving the funds' entrepreneurial benefits.

But former SEC commissioner Harvey J. Goldschmid, who had supported the agency's thwarted bid to register fund managers, expressed concern that regulators lack the authority to perform random inspections of fund operations.

In Connecticut, home to scores of hedge funds, Attorney General Richard Blumenthal criticized the recommendations as vague, insubstantial and "unenforceable."

DOJ_NMG_0135819

"Opaque is the operative word for these investment pools . . . and these guidelines will do virtually nothing to make them more transparent," said Blumenthal, who created a unit last year to police the funds. "Federal inaction and inertia will invite -- indeed, fuel -- state initiatives."

House Financial Services Committee Chairman Barney Frank (D-Mass.) issued a statement calling the report "a first step" and pledged to invite the group's leaders to testify at a hearing this spring.

Officials Reject More Oversight Of Hedge Funds (NYT)

By Stephen Labaton

The New York Times, February 23, 2007

WASHINGTON, Feb. 22 — The Bush administration said Thursday that there was no need for greater government oversight of the rapidly growing hedge fund industry and other private investment groups to protect the nation's financial system.

Instead, the administration, in an agreement it reached with the independent regulatory agencies, announced that investors, hedge fund companies and their lenders could adequately take care of themselves by adhering to a set of nonbinding principles.

The principles, many already being followed by the sharpest investors and best-run companies, say that investors should not take risks they cannot tolerate and should carefully evaluate the strategies and management skills of hedge funds. They also call for funds to make clear and meaningful disclosures to investors.

The decision came after months of study by a presidential working group of top officials and regulators. They looked at both the hedge fund industry, which has more than $1 trillion in assets, and the management of private equity firms, which take direct control and ownership of companies rather than relying on large numbers of outside stockholders.

The group's conclusions reflected both the strong antiregulatory ideology of the administration and the formidable influence of Wall Street and the increasingly wealthy hedge fund industry among both Democrats and Republicans in Washington.

Three of the administration's most senior economic policy makers — Treasury Secretary Henry M. Paulson Jr., his top deputy, Robert K. Steel, and White House chief of staff Joshua Bolten — are alumni of Goldman Sachs, which in the last decade has evolved into one of the most important players in the private equity market.

As hedge funds have grown both in the United States and globally, and as periodic collapses have shaken the markets and caused investors to lose money, pressures have increased to impose greater regulation on them. But supporters say that the hedge fund industry had grown more sophisticated in recent years, is well equipped to manage risks, and that none of the failures have harmed the nation's financial system.

The explosive growth in recent years of private equity investment and hedge funds has made their managers symbols of new wealth, a huge source of philanthropy to the nation's museums, hospitals and orchestras, and a major new force in political campaigns.

Millions of Americans do not qualify to make investments in hedge funds, which are pools of largely unregulated assets, but they are exposed to the risks associated with hedge funds through their pensions and personal retirement accounts.

The decision to avoid demanding more openness from private funds represents a starkly different approach to that undertaken by Washington for publicly traded companies, which in the last five years have faced a battery of new governance, auditing and disclosure rules following the scandals at Enron and other large companies.

The working group rejected any proposal that would give the government the ability to inspect the books and records of hedge funds or force the funds to make regular reports about their activities. Both banks and brokerage firms must adhere to stringent rules that give regulators great leeway in supervising them.

While the working group never considered anything as strict, many hedge funds oppose even minimal oversight because they say it could slow their ability to make lightning-fast investment decisions or reveal trading strategies to rivals.

A previous effort by the Securities and Exchange Commission to protect investors by requiring hedge funds to register with the government failed last summer. In June, a federal appeals court ruled that the agency did not have the authority to regulate them.

In leading a deeply divided commission to adopt those rules in the first place, its then chairman, William H. Donaldson, said that hedge funds had been central figures in a variety of market trading abuses and that registration was a modest and essential way for regulators to begin to understand them. Although he had the support of two of the four other commissioners for his efforts on hedge funds, Mr. Donaldson came under heavy criticism from Republican lawmakers and top administration officials for suggesting that regulators shine a light on what he called "a dark corner" of the market.

Under its new chairman, Christopher Cox, the commission decided not to appeal the court decision that struck down the rules. Instead the agency is preparing to write a new regulation that would require investors in such funds to have greater personal wealth. That proposed regulation is not affected by today's announcement.

DOJ_NMG_0135820

On Thursday, the president's working group, led by Mr. Paulson, proposed a series of nonbinding principles that put the onus primarily on companies, investors and the buyers and sellers of their complex securities to impose a "market discipline" that should be adequate to protect investors and the marketplace. Officials said those principles would make the hedge fund companies more transparent and their investors and creditors more vigilant to shady operators and excessive risk-takers.

At a briefing Thursday, a senior Treasury Department official involved in drafting the principles suggested that any new regulations would discourage innovation and risk-taking. The official said he would only speak on condition that he not be identified because the new guidelines were the product of a group of agencies.

Officials acknowledged that many of the principles that were advanced by the administration and the regulators would seem obvious to smart investors and properly managed hedge funds.

"Private pools of capital can be an appropriate investment vehicle for more sophisticated investors," read one of the main principles that the officials and agencies agreed upon. "Because these pools can involve complex, illiquid or opaque investments and investment strategies that are not fully disclosed, the risk associated with direct investment in these pools are most appropriately borne by investors with the sophistication to identify, analyze and bear these risks."

The report said that the concerns of less sophisticated investors in pension and retirement vehicles could best be addressed "through sound practices on the part of the fiduciaries that manage such vehicles."

The announcement was hailed by several trade groups for the hedge funds and other companies involved in trading complex financial instruments.

"The President's Working Group has taken a thoughtful and judicious approach to many of the investor protection and systemic risk issues which surround hedge funds," said Micah S. Green, co-chief executive of the Securities Industry and Financial Markets Association, which represents hundreds of Wall Street firms.

"Too often, regulators reach immediately for new laws or rules which can have the unintended consequence of stifling innovation or smothering markets," Mr. Green said. "By instead providing principles and guidelines, the President's Working Group has recognized the importance of flexibility and efficiency in a healthy marketplace."

But other experts said the guidelines would have limited effect.

"They are regulating around the peripheries," said Jay G. Baris, a securities lawyer with Kramer Levin Naftalis & Frankel in New York. "They are turning up the heat on disclosures, on fiduciaries to determine suitability, and on risk management. But they are going to stop short of substantive regulation of hedge funds or of unregistered hedge fund advisers."

The reaction in Congress, which is in recess this week, was largely muted.

Representative Barney Frank, the Massachusetts Democrats who heads the House Financial Services Committee, called the announcement "a first step in addressing questions presented by the significant growth of hedge funds."

"Steps are being taken to increase investor protection," Mr. Frank added, "and I believe the appropriate committee in the House and the Senate should be working with the Presidential Working Group and others for the further study and monitoring of both issues."

A similar statement was issued by Senator Christopher J. Dodd, the Connecticut Democrat who heads the Senate Banking Committee.

There is no expectation that Congress will adopt legislation on the subject any time soon.

CRIMINAL LAW:

Jury To Continue Deliberations In Scooter Libby CIA-Leak Case (WSJ)

By Evan Perez And Jay Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, February 23, 2007

WASHINGTON -- Jurors reached no verdict Thursday on whether former White House aide I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby obstructed the investigation into who leaked the identity of a CIA operative married to a prominent Iraq war critic.

The jury went home until Friday.

In a day and a half of deliberations, the jurors have issued only two brief written notes, which suggested they are methodically reviewing the evidence against Mr. Libby. They requested a large flip chart, masking tape, Post-it notes and a document with pictures of the witnesses.

The trial, which focused on efforts to leak classified information to the press, comes amid revived debate over intelligence in the newly Democratic Congress.

Already, the Senate Intelligence Committee has requested documents and interview transcripts from the Inspector General's office, while the Senate Armed Services Committee seeks further interviews with Mr. Libby, the former chief of staff for

DOJ_NMG_0135821

Vice President Dick Cheney, and National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley. "The bottom line is that the intelligence relating to the Iraq-al Qaeda relationship was manipulated by high-ranking officials in the Department of Defense to support the administration's decision to invade Iraq," committee Chairman Carl Levin (D., Mich.) said at recent hearing.

The Libby trial put an especially bright spotlight on the debate. A jury of eight women and four men began were weighing a month of testimony from 19 witnesses in a case that began as a probe into the outing of former Central Intelligence Agency operative Valerie Plame and three years later ended up focusing on the trustworthiness of recall and the semantics of lying.

In court, Special Prosecutor Patrick Fitzgerald told jurors that Mr. Libby deliberately lied to Federal Bureau of Investigation agents and a grand jury to try to cover up the administration's efforts to respond to criticism of the Iraq war.

In response, Mr. Libby's attorneys highlighted "mis-recollections" by a number of prosecution witness, including several reporters, to bolster their argument that Mr. Libby didn't lie but simply had faulty memory when he made erroneous statements to investigators.

The roots of the Libby case lie in a debate over use of intelligence in the buildup to the Iraq war. It began when Ms. Plame's husband, former U.S. Ambassador Joseph Wilson, complained publicly that the Bush administration had misused or ignored intelligence he gathered that cast doubt on Iraq's alleged efforts to obtain weapons of mass destruction.

Mr. Wilson in July 2003 went public with his story of taking a CIA sponsored trip to Africa to check out claims of connections to Iraq's weapons program. In interviews and in an opinion article, he called into question Mr. Bush's use of since-discredited intelligence that alleged Iraq sought weapons materials in the African nation of Niger. In retaliation, prosecutors say, Mr. Libby and other officials sought to disclose Ms. Plame's identity to reporters, making the argument that her intelligence job was the only reason Mr. Wilson looked into Iraq's weapons efforts in the first place.

The administration subsequently backed off the Niger claim. However, Mr. Libby told the grand jury in the case that he continued trying to leak selective portions of intelligence reports to journalists in order to portray the Niger-Iraq link as true, under orders from Mr. Cheney. Administration officials complain that Mr. Wilson was the one misusing his role in the intelligence process by talking publicly about his findings.

Mr. Libby is charged with two counts of perjury, two counts of making false statements and one count of obstruction of justice. He faces up to 30 years in prison and $1.25 million in fines if found guilty.

Still No Verdict In CIA Leak Trial (NSDY/AP)

By Associated Press, February 22, 2007, 9:42 Pm Est

Long Island Newsday, February 23, 2007

The jury went home until Friday.

In a day and a half of deliberations, the eight women and four men have issued only two brief written notes, which suggested they are methodically reviewing the evidence against the former chief of staff to Vice President Dick Cheney.

They requested a large flip chart, masking tape, Post-it notes and a document with pictures of the witnesses.

In addition to obstruction of the leak investigation, Libby is charged with lying to the FBI and a grand jury about how he learned and who he told about CIA operative Valerie Plame.

Prosecutors say he concocted a story to avoid losing his job for disclosing classified information to reporters without authorization. Libby said he gave investigators his best recollection of what happened and any errors in that resulted from memory flaws.

Leak Trial Reveals Flaws In Note-taking (AP)

By Matt Apuzzo, ASSOCIATED PRESS WRITER

AP, February 23, 2007

I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby leaves Federal Court at the conclusion of the day's jury deliberations in Washington, Thursday, Feb. 22, 2007. Jurors reached no verdict Thursday on whether former White House aide I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby obstructed the investigation into who leaked the identity of a CIA operative married to a prominent Iraq war critic. (AP Photo/Gerald Herbert)

WASHINGTON -- Write this down: Your notes aren't as reliable as you think. That's true whether they're scrawled in the margins of a business meeting agenda, typed on a secretary's laptop, scribbled on a patient's chart or carefully recorded from a lecture hall blackboard.

And, as the monthlong trial of former White House aide I. Lewis "Scooter" Libby has shown, they're no more reliable if the notes belong to FBI agents, journalists or White House aides.

That's a somewhat disconcerting thought. People are charged, front-page articles are written and public policies are decided in part based on those notes. If they are flawed, whose can be believed?

DOJ_NMG_0135822

"Based on what I've heard in this trial, I don't know if notes are the best evidence of anything," U.S. District Judge Reggie B. Walton commented midway through the trial.

Jurors, who are due to begin their third day of deliberations in Libby's perjury and obstruction case Friday, must decide how much weight to put on notes that were sometimes sloppy and often inconsistent.

Researchers who have studied note-taking have known its flaws for years. Take college students, for example. Their memories are at their peak, their success depends largely on their note-taking abilities and they practice every day.

Yet only about 30 percent of important classroom information makes it into a typical student's notebook, said Kenneth A. Kiewra, a University of Nebraska educational psychology professor who studies note-taking.

Part of the problem, Kiewra said, is that words are filtered before they make it onto the page. Things we already know often don't get written, he said, nor do things we don't totally understand. And impressions can skew our notes. In that way, notes can become personal snapshots, useful for jogging memory, more than an official record.

Historians have reviewed multiple sets of notes from the same Middle Ages sermon and found that different people created different written records, said Harvard historian Ann Blair. Notes on early inquisitions similarly appear to be skewed by the inquisitor's impressions, she said.

In Libby's case, FBI agent Deborah Bond wrote a report saying Libby "adamantly denied" discussing CIA operative Valerie Plame. The original FBI notes, however, contain no record of that denial. Rather, they say he may have discussed Plame but couldn't recall.

"Adamantly might not be the perfect word," Bond acknowledged at trial.

Prosecutors say Libby told New York Times reporter Judith Miller that Plame, the wife of prominent war critic Joseph Wilson, worked for the CIA. As evidence, they point to Miller's note, set off by parentheses, that said, "Wife works for bureau?"

Miller testified that she believed Libby told her Plame worked for a bureau of the CIA. But she said she sometimes sets things off in parentheses when she already knows information and wants to ask about it. That's how Libby's attorneys want jurors to read those notes.

That's also how Libby handled his own notes as he scrambled from one high-level White House meeting to the next. Sometimes he made to-do lists. Other times his lists were things he'd just learned. And when he crossed things off, sometimes it meant he'd discussed them with the vice president. Other times it meant he decided not to. Only Libby knew for sure.

"Your notes are not X-rays. Your notes are a guide for you," said Roger W. Shuy, a Georgetown University linguistics expert who reviews documents and notes for court cases. "Notes are inherently not complete."

Former Time magazine reporter Matt Cooper testified that Libby confirmed for him that Plame worked at the CIA. That confirmation did not appear in Cooper's notes. Libby says he told Cooper only that he'd heard something like that but didn't know for sure.

Cooper could not explain a line in his typewritten notes that read: "had somethine about the wilson thing and not sure if it's ever."

Libby's lawyers believe that was supposed to read: "Heard something about the Wilson thing, but not sure if it's even true."

When it comes to the credibility of notes, however, Libby's attorneys sought to have it both ways. They told jurors that another FBI agent's notes, which seemed to contradict NBC reporter and government witness Tim Russert, should be believed. And attorneys made it a point to tell jurors that Libby had only one note mentioning Plame.

Ronald P. Fisher, a memory expert at Florida International University, said FBI agents and reporters have similar problems: Journalism schools and criminal justice classes focus heavily on interview techniques and investigative tactics but offer little in the way of actual note-taking instruction.

"I have a feeling people believe they take better notes than they do," Fisher said.

One of the few reporters whose notes were not dissected in the Libby trial was Washington Post reporter Bob Woodward. He spoke confidently about what he learned about Plame and when he learned it.

Fumo Trial Likely To Start Early '08 (PHI)

By Michael Hinkelman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, February 23, 2007

The trial for state Sen. Vince Fumo and three co-defendants likely won't start before early next year, prosecutors and defense lawyers said at a federal court hearing yesterday.

U.S. Senior District Judge William H. Yohn Jr. did not set a trial date.

Prosecutors also said Fumo's trial could last three to four months. They plan to call at least 100 witnesses to testify for the government.

Defense attorneys said they couldn't reliably estimate how long a trial might take until they see what evidence the feds have.

The feds hit Fumo, 63, with a 139-count, 267-page indictment on Feb. 6 charging him with conspiracy, fraud, obstruction and tax felonies.

Also indicted were Ruth Arnao, 50, a former top aide to Fumo, and two ex-computer aides of Fumo. Arnao was charged with conspiracy, fraud and obstruction, and with filing a false tax return.

Earlier yesterday, the two ex-computer aides for Fumo, Leonard Luchko, 50, and Mark Eister, 37, were arraigned before U.S. Magistrate L. Felipe Restrepo on conspiracy and obstruction charges. They pleaded not guilty.

Luchko and Eister had been indicted on obstruction counts in June but were charged anew when Fumo and Arnao were charged in a superseding indictment.

Fumo and Arnao pleaded not guilty to all charges on Feb. 7.

All defendants are free on $100,000 bail, and their freedom to travel has been restricted.

During yesterday's hearing before Yohn, prosecutors agreed to turn over all their discovery in the case to defense attorneys within 45 days.

The feds have plenty to hand over: At least 100,000 documents, including e-mails, grand-jury transcripts, summaries of FBI interviews with witnesses, bills, bank-account statements and store receipts.

Prosecutors declined to say whether any of the discovery included wiretaps or video surveillance.

Defense attorneys asked Yohn for 45 days to review the discovery materials once all have been received.

Then Yohn is expected to hold another hearing, probably in late spring, when he may set dates by which all pretrial motions need to be filed and also set a trial start date.

In the meantime, both sides appear ready to rumble.

Prosecutors said they plan to file court papers soon asking Yohn to hold a hearing to determine whether lawyers for Fumo and Arnao should be disqualified because of potential conflicts of interest.

Fumo is being represented by the firm of Sprague & Sprague, and Arnao is being represented by Edwin J. Jacobs Jr., William H. Lamb and Joel L. Frank.

Yohn, directing a question to Sprague, said he understood Sprague might be filing court papers alleging prosecutorial misconduct.

Sprague said he wasn't in a position to comment on that yesterday.

One other thing left unresolved yesterday is whether the trial would be conducted four days a week or five days.

Sprague, 81, said courtroom proceedings move along more "efficiently" if lawyers and the jury have Fridays off.

Yohn said he preferred five days a week, 9 to 5, but would defer a decision.

Meeting Offers Sneak Preview Of Fumo Trial (PHI)

By John Shiffman

The Philadelphia Inquirer, February 23, 2007

Long before the government puts State Sen. Vincent J. Fumo on trial - an event that isn't likely to happen for a year - the senator's lawyers intend to put the government on trial.

Defense lawyers appear likely to accuse the government of illegally leaking grand jury material to the media or unduly pressuring witnesses, it was disclosed during a court hearing yesterday in U.S. District Court.

And the government, it would appear, hopes to win the right to tell jurors about 30-year-old allegations that Fumo put ghost employees on the Senate payroll and that he spied on rivals.

These were among the details that emerged during a pretrial meeting before District Judge William H. Yohn yesterday.

The South Philadelphia Democrat is charged with defrauding a multimillion-dollar charity, using Senate staff for personal and political errands, and engaging in a cover-up after the FBI and IRS began to investigate him.

The 139 charges against Fumo include mail fraud, conspiracy to defraud the United States, obstruction of justice, and aiding and abetting the filing of a false tax return.

Fumo and his three codefendants - former aides Ruth Arnao, Mark C. Eister and Leonard P. Luchko - did not attend yesterday's meeting. But 11 lawyers - two prosecutors and nine defense attorneys - participated.

Yohn convened the session to try to get a sense of what pretrial motions might be filed, and what the trial will look like.

For the most part, lawyers were reluctant to reveal strategies and did their best to keep their intentions vague.

One thing became clear yesterday: The case the FBI and IRS investigated for four years won't go to trial for a long time.

Yohn told lawyers that they would have at least six months to file pretrial motions. Prosecutors said they would be ready to go to trial by January. Fumo's lawyer, Richard A. Sprague, said he would probably need a few more months than that.

"I've never seen an indictment that is 267 pages," Sprague said.

The trial will probably last three to four months, prosecutors said. The government intends to call 100 witness, said Assistant U.S. Attorney John J. Pease. One potential witness has suffered a stroke, and her testimony may be videotaped soon, he said.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Robert A. Zauzmer said that the government intends to seek permission to tell jurors about Fumo's conduct in the 1970s - presumably, allegations about ghost employees and spying that are not part of the current indictment. Under the rules of evidence, prosecutors might be allowed to do this to try to show Fumo's motives or intents, or to try to demonstrate a long pattern of bad behavior.

Yohn indicated that Sprague may ask for the case to be split into two trials. Sprague didn't offer details, though he may be seeking to separate the fraud charges from the obstruction-of-justice charges.

Sprague also did not elaborate on his expected motion alleging government misconduct during the investigation. But at a recent news conference, Sprague accused the government of leaking to the press. In at least one pre-indictment motion, defense lawyers made similar accusations, and a judge rejected them.

Since the indictment, Fumo has resigned from several public posts, including ranking Democrat on the Senate Appropriations Committee and the Delaware River Port Authority board. He also has temporarily quit his $1 million-a-year post at Dilworth Paxson L.L.P.

Independence Blue Cross chairman M. Walter D'Alessio said yesterday that Fumo has stepped down from that board, too.

"Because of the press of other matters and the time needed to defend myself against federal charges," Fumo said in a letter, "I would not be able to devote sufficient time to my duties at IBC. It is my intention to resume these duties after my vindication in federal court."

As Fumo's lawyers appeared in court yesterday, Fumo spoke at ceremonies marking the 100th anniversary of the beginning of construction of the Benjamin Franklin Parkway.

"I intend to continue to do my job as a senator," Fumo told the crowd. "And I will be in Harrisburg on Monday, for those of you who care, working on the budget to make sure Philadelphia gets more than its fair share."

Inside The Ring (WT)

By Bill Gertz

The Washington Times, February 23, 2007

Spy release

Former Defense Intelligence Agency (DIA) analyst Ronald Montaperto, convicted last year on espionage-related charges that involved passing secrets to China, is scheduled to get out of federal prison Sunday. Prosecutors say he will be barred from meeting any Chinese intelligence personnel as a condition of his release.

Montaperto pleaded guilty in June to improperly storing classified intelligence documents and admitted as part of a plea deal that he verbally passed both "secret" and "top secret" intelligence to two Chinese military intelligence officers during 60 meetings over a number of years.

He spent three months at the minimum-security prison at Fort Dix, N.J.

The court order in the case states that Montaperto "shall have no contact with any foreign government or agents thereof, except with the express permission of [Department of Defense], and shall not seek or accept, personally or through another person or entity, any benefit from such foreign government or agent thereof."

If Montaperto is paid or receives benefits from the Chinese or their agents, he will have to turn them over to the U.S. government.

"There's also a provision in the plea agreement that prohibits him from disclosing classified information," one law-enforcement official close to the case said.

Montaperto's conviction was a major blow to a network of politically powerful pro-China intelligence officials and academics who share his views of China.

U.S. intelligence officials have said that Montaperto's disclosures to Chinese intelligence coincided with the loss of a major electronic eavesdropping program against China that had helped track Beijing's illicit arms exports.

Before sentencing, Montaperto received letters of support from several current and former intelligence officials, including DIA analyst and friend Lonnie Henley, who ultimately was reprimanded by the Office of the Director of National Intelligence for his defense of Montaperto.

Mr. Henley also had criticized the FBI for investigating Montaperto in an e-mail to a group of China specialists. The e-mail defended Montaperto as someone who only wanted to improve U.S.-Chinese relations and who was persecuted by the FBI as a result.

Despite the letter of reprimand, Mr. Henley recently was promoted to acting national intelligence officer for East Asia.

Montaperto was sentenced to three months in prison by federal Judge Gerald Bruce Lee, who said the light sentence was the result of the letters of support he received from current and former intelligence and military officials, despite what he called a "very serious charge."

Montaperto claimed the passing of intelligence to China was unintentional and the result of being tricked by two Chinese officers.

Quds in Iraq

Army Lt. Gen. Ray Odierno, commander of multinational forces in Iraq, yesterday added his voice to the chorus of officials who identified the Iranian Quds force as working against U.S. and allied forces by helping insurgents in Iraq.

"The bottom line is we believe that the Quds force has been involved in training and possibly providing funding and potentially weapons to some groups within Iraq," Gen. Odierno said, noting that "we watch that extremely carefully."

Gen. Odierno warned the Iranians that "we will take action" against the Quds force supporters helping insurgents.

"Their goal is to destabilize this government. So our goal is we want a stable government and we'll do whatever we can to keep them from destabilizing what's going on in Iraq here," he said.

The three-star general stopped short of saying the Iranian agents are playing a vital role in backing Shi'ite insurgents but that they are assisting with weapons, training and "some money."

Gen. Odierno declined to answer directly when asked whether a recent attack in Karbala included Iranian involvement, but said "we are looking at it extremely hard, and when appropriate, we will take the necessary action to bring those who were involved in it into custody."

China ASAT program

China's recent test of an anti-satellite missile warhead was part of a long-term space weapons program by Beijing's military that has been under way in secret for years, the head of the Pentagon's Missile Defense Agency (MDA) said yesterday.

"The Chinese launch represented years and years of work on their part in terms of what they demonstrated, even though their success in doing that was obviously a surprise, I think, around the world," Air Force Lt. Gen. Henry Obering told reporters.

Gen. Obering said the Chinese space weapons system currently does not threaten U.S. missile defenses against North Korea or a future defense against Iranian missiles, but "it may do so in the future ... based on what we have seen them ... demonstrate."

He also said the MDA has a development program that will be able to deal with China's anti-satellite program but there are no current plans to deploy weapons against it.

In a provocative space weapons test, China fired a missile Jan. 11 that entered space, then released a nonexplosive warhead that tracked and destroyed a Chinese weather satellite. The test, the fourth attempt at destroying a satellite, contradicted the Chinese government's public advocacy of reaching an international treaty banning space weapons.

Moseley on China

Air Force Chief of Staff Gen. Michael Moseley told reporters in New York this week that the United States is not looking to make China a new enemy but must be prepared for the challenge of China in the future.

"I would not be looking for bad guys, I would be looking for ways to partner. I would be looking for ways to minimize uncertainty and to minimize miscalculations, I would be looking for ways to do that, as opposed for ways to find potential competitors," Gen. Moseley said when asked about earlier comments that the Air Force will have a major role in countering China's aggressive military buildup, including its space weapons.

While countering terrorism currently is a key priority, Gen. Moseley also suggested that China must be watched carefully as it could emerge as a threat.

"We're also dealing in a very uncertain global context," he said. "My job is to provide global intelligence, surveillance and reconnaissance. My job is to provide global mobility. My job is to provide global strike, and so it's not just about China, it is about an uncertain global setting."

The Air Force has been given a key role in the Pentagon's new "hedge" strategy against China, which calls for developing forces that can conduct very rapid strikes throughout China in any future conflict.

Air Force weapons being developed for the new strategy include a new long-range bomber and possibly new space-based missile systems that can strike China on very short notice.

· Bill Gertz covers the Pentagon. He can be reached at 202/636-3274 or at bgertz@wash ingtontimes.com.

Investigation Won't Stop Rep. Miller From California Dealmaking (AP)

By Erica Werner, The Associated Press

AP, February 23, 2007

WASHINGTON - Rep. Gary Miller grew up poor. Even though he's now worth more than $13 million, he says he's still worried about his family's financial security.

So, while federal authorities investigate some of his real estate transactions, he says he'll keep on making deals.

Miller, a fifth-term Republican representing conservative inland Southern California, said in an interview that he had put his real estate investment activities on hold upon entering politics, only to find that "I was worth less money every year."

"Some people are arguing I shouldn't have the opportunity to make an investment that every other American citizen has an opportunity to make," he said. "I've got kids, I've got grandkids, and it'd be nice, when I get ready to go, when they're older, if I can help them."

Miller, 58, who makes $165,200 as a congressman, is being scrutinized for the millions he made selling properties to two Southern California communities outside his district. FBI agents have interviewed officials in both towns.

Miller also faces accusations of using his staff for personal errands and pursuing federal funding for projects beneficial to properties that he and his campaign contributors owned.

He's denied any wrongdoing, and calls media reports about his activities "lies" and "trash." He said he has turned over documentation of his deals to the House Ethics Committee, and he defended himself at a meeting of House Republicans earlier this month.

An FBI spokeswoman declined on Thursday to confirm or deny if there's an investigation or to make any further comment.

At the heart of the Miller probe is the 2002 sale of 165 acres to Monrovia, a town of 40,000 northeast of Los Angeles. Miller contended he was forced to sell the property when the city threatened to take it by eminent domain.

Under IRS code, that allowed Miller to defer capital gains taxes on his profit if he reinvested it in other property within two years. With a tax rate of more than 20 percent on a profit of at least $10 million, the deferment involved more than $2 million.

Miller used the proceeds from the Monrovia sale to purchase properties in Fontana from a campaign contributor in December 2004. He then sold the land to the city at a profit of $12,400, he said. He filed tax forms with the city describing the sales as forced, which gave him the right to again delay paying taxes.

Miller's spokesman, Scott Toussaint, said the congressman did not take advantage of the tax deferment on the Fontana deal and has now completed paying taxes on the transactions. Miller will not say how much he paid or release tax returns that would prove it, Toussaint said, because that goes beyond what he should have to disclose.

To Miller's defenders, the whole controversy amounts to a bum rap.

"Any good businessman's going to push the envelope from time to time," said Frank Williams, executive officer of the Baldy View Chapter of the Building Industry Association in California. "That's part of dealmaking. It's not illegal."

Miller is one of three California Republicans being investigated by the Justice Department. Rep. John Doolittle has drawn attention in the corruption investigation centered on jailed GOP lobbyist Jack Abramoff, and Rep. Jerry Lewis is being investigated over his ties to a different lobbyist.

After the Los Angeles Times and others published reports on the Monrovia deal and quoted city officials saying Miller was a willing seller, the congressman made public two letters from Monrovia officials describing the transaction as "eminent domain" and "friendly condemnation." His attorney sent a letter to city officials warning of "damages for which the city could be held accountable" if they did not stop making "misstatements."

Monrovia officials subsequently posted a detailed narrative on the city Web site explaining that eminent domain was never used in the sale but the threat did exist.

Miller's business dealings have drawn scrutiny before.

In the early 1990s, as a member of the Diamond Bar City Council, Miller faced a recall drive. Critics alleged that he lied about owning a company with business before the council and opposed a subdivision because the developer refused to hold a fundraiser for a council ally.

Miller denied the accusations and filed a libel lawsuit. The recall fell short of getting on the ballot, and Miller's suit was dismissed.

Hard feelings linger in Diamond Bar, the town 30 miles east of Los Angeles where Miller still lives. Eileen Ansari, a Democrat and former city councilwoman who challenged Miller in his first race for Congress, contends that Miller clocks little time in Washington and can claim few legislative accomplishments.

"It looks like he's in there for his own benefit. That's my disappointment in him," Ansari said.

Miller said being a congressman has hurt his business rather than helped, because of the time spent in Washington and the glare of public life. He said he'd rather be home in his district, where he said he can help constituents, and routinely takes the first plane home each weekend when House votes are over.

"I'm not a Washington politician," he said.

Miller, tall with thick, neatly combed red hair, has a consistently conservative voting record. He served three years in the California Assembly before running for Congress in 1998. He replaced GOP incumbent Jay Kim, who had pleaded guilty to taking illegal campaign contributions.

Miller got into politics, he said, because he wanted to do something about government regulation on businesses. He founded G. Miller Development Co. in his early 20s and now runs it with his wife, Cathleen.

Rep. Barney Frank of Massachusetts, one of Congress' most liberal members, praised Miller for his work on affordable housing on the Financial Services Committee that Frank chairs.

"I think he would personally like to stamp out every endangered species known to man," Frank said. "But he does care a lot about housing and helping build housing."

The accomplishment of which Miller is most proud has nothing to do with business. A Civil War buff who made a cameo appearance as a Confederate general in the movie "Gods and Generals," he sponsored legislation to preserve Civil War battle sites that was ultimately signed into law by President Bush.

Prosecutor Urges Public To Help Fight Corruption (NYT)

By Laura Rivera

The New York Times, February 23, 2007

HACKENSACK, N.J., Feb. 22 — Christopher J. Christie, the federal prosecutor who has aggressively pursued New Jersey politicians believed to be corrupt, said in a speech here on Thursday that the public should help stem the tide of corruption by voting out officials who break the law.

Mr. Christie, the United States attorney for New Jersey, said that after domestic terrorism, his office's main priority was to hold the county and state leadership accountable.

He asked, "Wouldn't it be a shame to spend all this money" and endanger so many lives to protect a way of life from outside attack, "only to give away our way of life from the rot from within? And that's what political corruption is."

Mr. Christie, a Republican, said that his investigations had resulted in the arrest of more than 100 officials across the state, but he declined to discuss his latest high-profile move: the issuance of subpoenas last week to the leaders of the State Legislature. The subpoenas are for documents related to possible wrongdoing involving "Christmas-tree items" that lawmakers have added to budgets over the past three years.

The subpoenas have prompted speculation that a federal investigation into the activities of State Senator Wayne Bryant, a Camden Democrat who was chairman of the budget committee until last fall, may be expanding.

In a speech before 200 people at Fairleigh Dickinson University here, Mr. Christie refused to discuss the progress of negotiations between his office and the Office of Legislative Services, which provides research and legal counsel to the Legislature. He said that the federal judge handling the case had ordered him not to discuss it.

"I've made no public comment at all on Senator Bryant," Mr. Christie said. "What I will say is I just hope the issue will be resolved soon."

Monitors of a federal investigation said that Mr. Bryant, who announced last week that he would not seek re-election, was the subject of a federal investigation into the possibility that he routed $12.5 million in state funds to the University of Medicine and Dentistry of New Jersey in exchange for a job in which he was paid $38,000 a year but did little work.

In his speech, Mr. Christie said that 75 percent of his cases involved bribery of public officials. "It is a rogue's gallery," he said, "and I fear that we are just becoming numb."

As Mr. Christie's appointment, made by President Bush more than five years ago, nears completion, the prosecutor's increasingly public stance on issues like domestic terrorism and immigration has raised speculation that he may be considering a run for office. Many think he may challenge Gov. Jon S. Corzine in 2009.

"Do I think about it? Of course," he said. "My only focus right now is to do this job for as long as the president allows me to do it. But it's coming to an end. So at some point I'm going to have to do something else."

FBI: Sex Fugitive Captured In Livingston Parish (AP)

AP, February 23, 2007

LIVINGSTON, La. (AP) — A fugitive child molester, on the run for nearly a year, was captured Thursday at an auto auction business where he'd been working for most of the month, federal authorities said.

David John Sprong Jr., 47, a convicted felon and registered sex offender, is wanted in California on a variety of molestation charges involving young girls.

Authorities previously thought Sprong was living under an alias near Houston. Then his last known vehicle, a 1997 sport utility vehicle, was found at a bar on Monday in Hammond, said Brian Fair, a spokesman for the U.S. Marshals Service.

DOJ_NMG_0135828

Last spring, Sprong skipped a $1 million bond in Sacramento, where he was charged with molesting girls. He could have been sentenced to life in prison if found guilty of being a habitual sex offender with multiple victims.

The marshals' Crescent Star Fugitive Task Force, with help from the FBI and the Livingston Parish Sheriff's Office arrested Sprong at A to Z Auto Auction L.L.C in Holden, La., without incident, Fair said.

Sprong was working as a mechanic there under the alias of Thomas Turner and had been employed for about three weeks. He was booked into the Livingston Parish jail and will await extradition back to Sacramento, Fair said.

"When he's not molesting people, he's working on cars," said Mike Raifield, an agent with the FBI's Sacramento field office which was coordinating the search.

The FBI was also looking to Sprong's longtime girlfriend Lynn Rodaer and 10-year-old daughter Justine. Authorities said Sprong led them to his family after his capture.

On Saturday, Sprong was featured on the TV show "America's Most Wanted" for the third time.

"When he leaves, he disappears completely," Raifield said. "He never re-contacted anyone he knew in Sacramento. And, everybody we talked to disliked him. All his contacts, he owed money to. He burned every bridge.

"We do all the angles and find nothing for a long time. Then after the America's Most Wanted segment profiled him in January, we got a tip he was running an auto shop in Humble, Texas, but it came two days too late. Apparently he saw the same program and he disappeared."

Oprah Winfrey included Sprong on her list of child sexual predators. She said she would give a $100,000 reward for information leading to their arrests.

In addition to the charges in California, Raifield said Sprong may face charges of attempted molestation of two teen-aged girls who worked for him in Houston.

Man Pleads Guilty In Child Pornography Case (MH)

The Miami Herald, February 23, 2007

A 59-year-old man pleaded guilty Thursday in federal court in Fort Lauderdale to preying on children, according to the U.S. Attorney's Office.

Raymond George Bohning, of Hollywood, faces five to 30 years in prison for production of child pornography, enticing a minor to engage in illegal sexual activity, distributing child pornography to a minor to induce her to engage in sexual activity and possessing more than 600 images of child pornography.

Bohning also could face a fine of up to $250,000 for each count and a possible lifetime period of supervised release, according to the office of South Florida's U.S. attorney, R. Alexander Acosta.

A sentencing hearing is scheduled for May 11.

In November 2003, Bohning was arrested in the United Kingdom and charged with various offenses including possessing and distributing lewd images of minors.

Bohning pleaded guilty in the U.K. to possessing and distributing indecent images and publishing an indecent article and was sentenced to 30 months in prison. He was then extradited to the United States for prosecution.

An FBI investigation found that Bohning had an extensive collection of child pornography images depicting minors being sexually abused, including babies and toddlers.

Authorities say the defendant convinced a 15-year-old girl to engage in sexually explicit conduct to produce pictures, gave pictures to a minor in an effort to persuade her to engage in sexual activity with him, and created a list of 374 individuals' Internet screen or user names -- mostly minors whom he cataloged by physical attributes, state or country of residence and the nature of their sexual experiences.

The FBI in Miami and the West Midlands Police Department in the United Kingdom handled the investigation.

-- ANI MARTINEZ

Man Sought In W.Va., Ohio Sex Attack (PPG)

By Cindi Lash, Pittsburgh Post-gazette

Pittsburgh Post-Gazette, February 23, 2007

Police say same man accosted young woman in Martins Ferry before N. Wheeling abduction

WHEELING, W.Va. -- Investigators believe a partially naked man who accosted a woman Sunday night in Martins Ferry, Ohio, was the same man who kidnapped and sexually assaulted a Wheeling girl two days later.

That man has not been identified, but FBI agents and police from the Ohio Valley have mounted a "significant" investigation to locate him, said Gary Wheeler, the FBI's supervisory agent for northern West Virginia. Police have increased patrols in Wheeling, Martins Ferry and other Ohio Valley communities and have pulled over and examined several vehicles that resembled the dark pickup truck the suspect drove during both incidents

An FBI artist also was summoned from Quantico, Va., to develop a composite sketch of the man and possibly a drawing of his truck. Investigators said they also are reviewing computer databases of sex offenders and may consult FBI profilers in an effort to identify the man.

Investigators yesterday said the circumstances of the 12-year-old girl's abduction Tuesday night from a street in North Wheeling were very similar to an incident Sunday night that may have been an abduction attempt. They warned parents in West Virginia, Ohio and Pennsylvania to be particularly cautious about allowing children to walk alone, saying they believe the incidents were rare examples of victims targeted by a brazen stranger.

"Stranger abductions are very rare occurrences," said Agent Wheeler, adding that kidnappings more often are committed by someone who knows the victim. "He struck twice in the same area that we know of. He is aggressive, and a little extra prudence on the part of parents [is warranted]."

Wheeling police said the man snatched the 12-year-old girl between 8:30 and 9 p.m. after parking his truck near a ramshackle garage near the intersection of North Fifth and Kenney Streets, barely a block from busy Main Street. The man, who was naked, walked up behind the girl and a friend who were walking together and asked for directions, Wheeling Lt. Gary Gaus said.

The girls "did what they've been told to do" and tried to run, but the man grabbed one of them and carried her a half-block to his truck, then drove away, Lt. Gaus said. The other girl ran to her home and her family called police.

The man sexually assaulted the girl before dropping her off about 40 minutes later at the Kirkwood Presbyterian Church in Bridgeport, Ohio, across the Ohio River from Wheeling. She walked to a nearby house and begged for help.

Investigators believe her attacker also sought directions from an 18-year-old woman around 9 p.m. Sunday in a residential neighborhood of Martins Ferry, about two miles from Wheeling. The woman was walking on Hughes Avenue when the man spoke to her while kneeling beside a parked vehicle, Martins Ferry Police Chief Barry Carpenter said.

When the woman replied that she didn't know how to get to the location he sought, the man opened his jacket and revealed that he was not wearing pants, Chief Carpenter said. The man began to masturbate and the woman screamed and ran to a porch.

The man chased her briefly before driving away in a dark pickup truck, Chief Carpenter said. He is described as white, between 5 feet 8 and 5 feet 10 inches tall, with short brown hair and a pudgy build.

The dark pickup truck he drove is possibly brown, with an extended cab and a 4-inch-wide white or light-colored stripe on the side that may fade as it reaches the back of the truck.

People who live and work in the North Wheeling neighborhood where the girl was abducted said they recall a truck like that parked near a Convenient Food Mart at North Fifth and Main streets and on adjacent streets.

"I have seen that truck up there. I have seen it in our neighborhood, in our parking lot," said Hattie Tamburin, who works at the Main Street Depot, a casino housed in the same building as the convenience store.

"The police haven't let up since day one on this, and hopefully they'll find him," said Ms. Tamburin, whose granddaughter attends school with the victim. "We're all afraid. I'm sure nobody will let the little girls out now."

Workers at those businesses said the victim of the abduction is a frequent customer at the convenience store and they were terrified by the attack.

"[The store] used to be full of children," said food mart cashier Robin Blum. "But it struck me when I worked [Wednesday night] that there were no kids in here unless they were with a parent or guardian."

Anyone with information about the man or his truck is asked to call the FBI in Pittsburgh at 412-432-4000, Wheeling police at 304-234-3661, Martins Ferry police at 740-633-2121 or their local police or sheriff's department.

Police Probe Ferry Offense (WHEELINT)

By Gabe Wells

Wheeling Intelligencer, February 23, 2007

WHEELING — Police believe the man responsible for the abduction and sexual assault of a Wheeling girl is the same man who exposed himself Sunday to a Martins Ferry woman.

Martins Ferry Police Chief Barry Carpenter made the announcement Thursday at a news conference in Wheeling City Council Chambers. Wheeling police are seeking a suspect in Tuesday's abduction of a city girl, whose 12th birthday was Wednesday. Carpenter said a man matching the description of the suspect was involved in what may have been an abduction attempt at about 9 p.m. Sunday on Hughes Avenue in the south end of his city.

According to Carpenter, the man approached an 18-year-old woman as she returned to her home. He then asked her for directions, exposed himself to the woman and then began to masturbate, Carpenter said.

The woman turned and ran, and the suspect chased her for a distance before he got into a nearby truck and left the scene.

The truck also is similar in description to the vehicle used in Tuesday's abduction in Wheeling.

Wheeling Police Department Lt. Gary Gaus and FBI Supervisory Senior Resident Agent Mark Wheeler said the techniques are the same in both crimes.

In both cases, the suspect asked the victims for directions to an area location and then chased them after posing the question.

Also at the news conference, Gauss confirmed the young girl in Tuesday's abduction was sexually assaulted.

Wheeler then added that an FBI sketch artist currently is working with that victim to develop and release a rendering of the suspect.

That rendering may be released today, and an improved description of the vehicle is anticipated.

Wheeler, Gaus and Carpenter said the police presence already has been greatly increased in both cities.

And Wheeler is asking area parents to pay close attention to the whereabouts of their children.

"There's no need for hysteria," Wheeler said. "There is a need for extra prudence."

The suspect is a heavyset or "chubby" white male who is believed to be in his mid-20s. He is about 5 feet 10 inches tall.

The suspected vehicle is full-size pickup truck that is medium-brown in color. It has a stripe on its side that gets darker in color down the length of the body. The truck may have an extended cab.

Anyone with information regarding the alleged abduction or the vehicle believed to have been involved is asked to contact the Wheeling Police Department at (304) 234-3664.

Three Indicted In Las Vegas In Katrina Relief Fund Fraud Case (BSH)

Biloxi Sun Herald, February 23, 2007

LAS VEGAS - Two Nevada residents were arrested Thursday and a third person was named as a fugitive on charges they fraudulently obtained federal funds designated for victims of Hurricane Katrina, a prosecutor said.

Wilbert J. Bennett Jr., 31, of Henderson, and Sheila Ritter, 47, of Las Vegas, pleaded not guilty in initial appearances before a U.S. District Court magistrate judge following their arrests on charges of theft of government funds, U.S. Attorney Daniel Bogden said in a statement.

Renee Bellinger, 42, was indicted on charges of theft of government funds, identity theft and misuse of a Social Security number. She remained a fugitive, Bogden said.

Bellinger, who also used the name Renee McLoughlin, was identified in the statement as a secretary with the International Alliance of Theatrical Stage Employees. Union officials at the Las Vegas local and at international offices in New York City did not immediately confirm that account.

The indictment handed up Feb. 14 accuses Bennett of obtaining about $15,000 in Federal Emergency Management Agency disaster relief funds and Ritter of obtaining almost $21,000 in FEMA funds following Hurricane Katrina in August 2005, although both lived in Nevada.

Ritter and Bennett were released Thursday on personal recognizance bonds. They had not yet been assigned public defenders.

Each faces up to five years in prison and a $250,000 fine if convicted, Bogden said.

Bellinger was accused of using her mother's identification as part of a scheme to obtain more than $23,000 in FEMA disaster relief money. If convicted, Bellinger faces up to 25 years in prison and $750,000 in fines, Bogden said.

Oklahoma City Man Accused Of Falsely Claiming Katrina Funds (AP)

AP, February 23, 2007

OKLAHOMA CITY (AP) — An Oklahoma City man was indicted in federal court on Thursday on charges of making false claims for Hurricane Katrina disaster relief funds.

A federal grand jury indicted Darryl Eugene Hayes, 31, on three counts of mail fraud and two counts of making false statements, U.S. Attorney John C. Richter said.

The mail fraud counts each carry a penalty of up to 20 years in prison plus restitution and a fine of up to $250,000. The other two counts are punishable by up to five years in prison and a fine of up to $250,000.

The indictment claims that Hayes defrauded the Federal Emergency Management Agency and the Louisiana Department of Labor of more than $10,000 by claiming unemployment benefits for supposed Hurricane Katrina evacuees under three false names, Richter said.

DOJ_NMG_0135831

It also alleges that Hayes submitted a fraudulent application to FEMA, claiming that his home in New Orleans was damaged by the August 2005 storm and that he was living in a "mass shelter," and later faxed a letter to FEMA claiming he had sustained losses "from the hurricane" and had relocated to Oklahoma City, Richter said.

N.C. Man Convicted In Oregon In Multicountry Silver Scheme (AP)

By Tim Fought, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 23, 2007

PORTLAND, Ore. - A North Carolina man who bought one-ounce silver ingots for $10.50 and resold them to investors for $98 each and the promise of huge commission payments was convicted of federal charges in what a prosecutor called a classic "too-good-to-be-true" pyramid scheme.

About 5,000 victims lost more than $4 million in total, said Assistant U.S. Attorney Chris Cardani.

He said Richard Dompier of Vale, N.C., was convicted Wednesday of 29 counts in federal court in Eugene after a seven-day trial. He was accused of mail and tax fraud and money laundering.

Dompier, 48, faces a sentence of about 20 years under federal guidelines, Cardani said, and is free pending sentencing, likely in June.

Dompier used some of his gains to sponsor a NASCAR driver and start a motorcycle company, according to the indictment handed up in 2005.

He operated first out of Roseburg, Ore., and then later in Lincolnton, N.C., and the operation had offices in Park Rapids, Minn., and England, where Dompier hired a salesman, Cardani said.

Between 1998 and 2000, Dompier's New Millennium Group sold nearly 76,000 of the ingots, representing a promised payoff to investors of more than $1 billion, the U.S. attorney's office said in a press release.

The indictment said he bought the bars from the Franklin Mint and sold them through the mail and over the Internet, delivering the ingots along with promises of commission checks totaling $15,853.50 in 14 months.

A few customers lost as much as $20,000, buying up to 200 bars, but typically an investor would buy five or fewer, Cardani said.

As is typical in pyramid schemes, "he made a few payments early on as a way to lull investors into the program," using the payments of later investors to pay the earlier investors, Cardani said. The company had no legitimate business operation, Cardani said.

Often, Cardani said, pyramid schemes guarantee high returns, a tip-off to those who might be tempted: "If it sounds too good to be true, stay away."

"This one was pretty good because he actually gave out the ingot bars," Cardani said.

After investors complained that they weren't getting payments they were promised, the Internal Revenue Service and FBI began an investigation in 2000, joined by British and Oregon authorities.

The bulk of the victims were in the United States, Canada and England, but the scheme also reached to Europe, Africa and Australia and was promoted in a total of 41 countries, the U.S. attorney's office said.

Study Fails To Stem Gangs Debate (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, February 23, 2007

L.A.'s biggest prevention and intervention program finds hope in data on participants' performance. Others say the effort is not effective.

Under pressure to show that the L.A. Bridges program actually works, the operators of the city's largest gang prevention effort released results of a study Thursday that sparked new debate about whether the city needs to rethink its anti-gang strategy.

The data from the city Community Development Department shows that although some middle school students targeted by L.A. Bridges have boosted or maintained their grades and attendance, most last year did not improve.

L.A. Bridges officials said they consider the findings encouraging given the types of students they are trying to help. But some city leaders said they were more skeptical, especially considering that gang membership and gang-related crime in Los Angeles are on the rise.

Amid new doubts about the program, which costs about $14 million annually, the city has replaced John Chavez as director of L.A. Bridges.

In addition, City Controller Laura Chick plans to audit the program, and Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa has put its operators on notice that he is providing funding only through September, by which time he expects that a new comprehensive gang strategy will be developed.

DOJ_NMG_0135832

"I don't think it has been effective," said Alex Alonso, a scholar on gang issues who has taught at USC. "For all the millions of dollars we've spent, I haven't seen results."

The debate comes as Police Chief William J. Bratton has launched a new assault on gang activity in the city, a campaign criticized by some for not also including a more aggressive effort to keep kids out of gangs. The crackdown has involved the shift of resources by the Los Angeles Police Department and other agencies to focus on 11 specific street gangs that officials say cause the most problems.

But although there has been much focus on L.A.'s law enforcement push, the effort to keep youths from joining gangs has received less attention.

The report released Thursday indicates that of the 1,786 "at risk" kids in L.A. Bridges who turned in at least two report cards last year, about 45% improved their grades. Grades stayed the same for 23% and declined for the rest.

Among that same group, only 21% improved their attendance.

"Those numbers are not satisfactory," said Councilman Tony Cardenas, who heads a council committee considering an overhaul of L.A. Bridges. "If we got coordination and accountability, we could really get those numbers up dramatically."

Cardenas' committee is scheduled to receive the report from the Community Development Department, which oversees L.A. Bridges' contracts, and discuss it at a special meeting today at 8:15 a.m. at City Hall.

Even though the majority of students did not improve grades or attendance, Sharon Morris, an assistant general manager of the department, defended the results.

"For the number of kids we are serving, we are very satisfied," she said. "These are kids in low-income communities, and they have been identified as needing this program."

The city's premier gang prevention and intervention effort is being reevaluated because gang crime increased 15.7% in 2006 compared with the year before, including a 4% increase in gang-related homicides, with 272 killings, according to LAPD statistics.

Gang membership had been dropping but ended 2006 with an increase to 39,315 from 38,974 a year earlier. That means there were 341 more gang members.

The original L.A. Bridges program, aimed at keeping kids out of gangs, funds centers serving 27 of the Los Angeles Unified School District's 73 middle schools.

L.A. Bridges targets middle school students ages 10 to 14 and is aimed at reducing their involvement in gangs. Goals include improving student performance and involving the community in helping the students.

Each caseworker is assigned 10 to 20 middle school students who are judged to be at risk, and the adults help the kids with homework, supervise them in after-school recreation, counsel their families and monitor their attendance at school.

L.A. Bridges II is an intervention program aimed at current and former gang members ages 14 to 25. The program has 64 gang intervention workers, who mentor 1,437 young people in gangs.

The results for Bridges II also sparked debate Thursday.

The Community Development Department reported that it managed 661 cases last year, including those of 175 people who were referred to city WorkSource job centers and 362 referred to other job training or placement.

Critics said the report fails to provide information that would better show whether the program is working — that is, how many gang members have quit gangs and how many middle school students have been kept from joining.

"How can you tell if you are reducing the gang problem unless you can tell how many young people you got out of gangs?" asked Connie Rice, director of Advancement Project Los Angeles, which last month released a city-financed study strongly criticizing L.A. Bridges and other city anti-gang programs as lacking focus, coordination and accountability.

The head of the department said his agency is improving its management and evaluation of L.A. Bridges. But General Manager Richard Benbow argued in the report to the City Council that as long as young people are being mentored and tutored after school, and referred to job training, they are less likely to be involved in a street gang.

"Any client connected to a departmental program represents a 'success,' because the alternatives — disconnection from social services and/or institutions — can lead to truancy, delinquency and criminal activity," he wrote.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

EXCLUSIVE: Gonzales Talks On Civil Liberties (CBN)

By Melissa Charbonneau

Christian Broadcasting Network, February 23, 2007

NASHVILLE, Tenn. - It's a day in the life of the U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales as he boards a plane to launch the first Freedom Initiative to protect religious liberties.

Along for the ride, we ask about a report that says discrimination against Muslims after 9/11 in part prompted this new program.

"It's something we worry about, naturally, when people see images on the television screen that these are the enemies of America, they may naturally assume anyone who looks like these people, or have the same religious belief - that, in fact, they constitute enemies of the United States. And that's just not true," Gonzales said.

Excerpts from Gonzales "The President sent a very clear message in the days following following the attacks of 9/11, going to a Muslim center, and expressing to the American people his clear belief in our country, we have many people of the Muslim faith that do not represent a danger to America and we need to be tolerant of the views of the people of the Muslim faith."

We asked Gonzales about "The Breach," the just-released film about the worst intelligence failure in the FBIs history - when it turned out an American was spying for the Russians.

Charbonneau: That was before your watch, but what has been done since that incident at the Justice Department to make sure spies like Robert Hanssen aren't still at the FBI?

Gonzales: Well, I can't tell you everything, otherwise I'd be tipping off someone about our efforts to ensure something like that doesn't happen.I think we're in much better shape today than we were just a few years ago.

Gonzales is at the center of the debate over much-publicized case of two imprisoned border patrol agents who were tried and found guilty for shooting an alleged illegal drug smuggler. He didn't say whether he will recommend a presidential pardon. He did say the facts in the case are not getting out.

"I've heard people complain about how could these people be convicted for doing their jobs," he said. "It's not part of their job to shoot an unarmed man from behind. It's not part of their job to conspire to conceal what they did. It's not part of their job to lie about what they did, to hide it from their superiors. So all that occurred in this particular case. And that's why these individuals were convicted."

Now Gonzales himself may become one of the political targets in a string of investigations from the new Democratic majority in Congress.

Charbonneau: Are you concerned that in the last couple of years of the Administration that your efforts will be bogged down by endless hearings and investigations by Democrats?

Gonzales: I think that the American people lose if I spend all my time worrying about congressional requests for information, if I spend all my time responding to subpoenas, to things of that nature. We will work with Congress, and we will do the very best we can to reach an accommodation with Congress, to give them the information, the appropriate information, they need for oversight. But that's an important part of my job. But I also believe that the American people expect me to do my job as Attorney General to protect their kids and make their neighborhood safer.

DOJ Report Touts Bush Record On Rights (UPI)

UPI, February 22, 2007

In a 43-page document released by the U.S. Department of Justice Feb. 20, Attorney General Alberto Gonzales says the department takes seriously the protection of religious freedom and has worked vigorously during the Bush administration to protect them.

"Many came to America precisely because of the recognition of religious liberty and the protection of this most basic of human rights," the report, released in conjunction with the attorney general's visit to the Southern Baptist Convention Building in Nashville, Tenn., says. The document was labeled, "Report on Enforcement of Laws Protecting Religious Freedom: Fiscal Years 2001-2006," Baptist Press reported Wednesday.

The Civil Rights Division of the justice department was established in 1957 and is best known for its work toward ending racial discrimination. Early in the Bush administration, the department established a Special Counsel for Religious Discrimination to monitor the enforcement of religious freedom laws.

"Prior to 2001, except for prosecution of religious bias crimes and employment cases, the Civil Rights Division exercised its jurisdiction to enforce civil rights laws with respect to religion sparingly, and had never had an attorney charged with ensuring that these laws were comprehensively enforced," the report says.

Religious discrimination is a growing problem in the United States as the country is now home to more than 2,000 different faiths and denominations, the report says. From 1992 to 2005, complaints of religious discrimination in employment filed with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission increased 69 percent, compared to single-digit increases in complaints about sex discrimination and racial discrimination during that period.

Education discrimination cases involving religion increased from one case reviewed and no investigations during the period of 1995-2000 to 82 cases reviewed and 40 investigations from 2001-2006, according to the report.

In March 2005, the Civil Rights Division reached a settlement with a Delaware school district after a fourth-grade Muslim student was harassed by her teacher about her faith in front of her class, the report says. The student was ridiculed because her mother wore a headscarf, and other students joined in the criticism, causing the Muslim girl to miss several weeks of school because of emotional distress, according to the report. The settlement required religious tolerance classes for students and teachers, and the girl's teacher was monitored closely.

Regarding religious discrimination in the area of employment, the Civil Rights Division filed a lawsuit against the Los Angles County Metropolitan Transit Authority after it refused to accept bus driver applications unless the applicant was available to work 24 hours per day, seven days a week. The suit alleged that the transit authority's policy discriminated against Sabbath-observing Jews and Christians and others who must miss work for religious reasons. An agreement now allows drivers to swap assignments or take temporary leaves of absence for religious purposes, the report says.

Another case the justice department took up involved an investigation of the city of Balch Springs, Texas, after the city-run senior center told senior adults they could no longer pray before meals, sing gospel songs or hold Bible studies, according to the report. All of the activities were initiated by the seniors themselves, but the city mistakenly believed that the separation of church and state required a ban, the report says. The city settled with the seniors in January 2004, and they won the right to continue their religious activities.

Religious freedom regarding land use is a growing issue in the United States, and in 2000 Congress passed the Religious Land Use and Institutionalized Persons Act (RLUIPA), citing widespread discrimination against religious institutions by state and local officials in land-use decisions.

Since 2001, the Civil Rights Division has reviewed 118 RLUIPA matters, opening 26 investigations resulting in 16 favorable resolutions before a lawsuit was necessary, the report says. The division has also filed four lawsuits.

In United States v. Maui County, the division sued the city of Maui, Hawaii, after it denied a permit for a nondenominational Christian church that has held services on Maui since 1960 to build a church on 5.85 acres of land in an agricultural district. The county allowed secular assemblies such as rodeo facilities, petting zoos and sports fields, but the church was denied, the report says. After the justice department intervened, the church was allowed to build in the Maui agricultural district, and the county paid it damages and attorney's fees.

A case brought by the Department of Justice in the area of crimes against persons and property based on religion was United States v. Bryant and Martin in 2004. Two men pleaded guilty to vandalizing a historic black church by breaking windows in the sanctuary and smashing items throughout the church, the report says, resulting in sentences of 27 and 21 months in prison.

"Experience in enforcing civil rights over the past 50 years has taught that a key to success is developing good working relationships with civil rights and community organizations," the report says. "It is such groups on the ground that bring many cases to the Department of Justice's attention, help identify trends and issues, and help spread the word about people's rights."

To facilitate that goal, the attorney general sought the help of the Southern Baptist Convention when he addressed its Executive Committee members Feb. 20 in Nashville. There he unveiled the "First Freedom Project," which is aimed at educating Americans about their religious freedoms and encouraging them to help identify and report abuses of those freedoms.

"We have seen too many churches burned, too many rocks thrown through stained-glass windows, too many swastikas painted on sanctuary walls, too many lives taken," Gonzales told Executive Committee members. "There are fewer of these attacks today, but still too many. And when faced with that kind of assault, the Department of Justice has responded, and will always respond, with force and conviction."

Teel Avoids Death Penalty (BSH)

By Robin Fitzgerald

Biloxi Sun Herald, February 23, 2007

GULFPORT - U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzalez decided against seeking the death penalty in the prosecution of Ryan Teel after an extensive review of the criminal case, according to U.S. Attorney Dunn Lampton for the Southern District of Mississippi.

Teel, a former Harrison County jailer, remains in custody pending trial in the Feb. 4, 2006, fatal beating of inmate Jessie Lee Williams Jr. A motion filed in court Thursday asks for a bond review so Teel could await his May 28 trial out of jail, as first reported on sunherald.com.

DOJ_NMG_0135835

Teel was in charge of the booking room the night of the beating. He has been held at an undisclosed location since his arrest Aug. 28, 2006. Teel, 30, pleaded not guilty to charges of deprivation of civil rights under color of law and of falsifying records to obstruct a federal investigation.

Gonzalez decided against the death penalty after Teel's attorneys and federal prosecutors met with a U.S. Justice Department review panel in Washington.

"No reason was given," Lampton said.

"There's all kinds of arguments for it, but it was his call. I've tried a number of death cases and in this case, I think it's the right decision. It's better to start the case off without the jury or the judge having to deal with the death-penalty issue."

Lampton called the review "a very serious, involved procedure. They look at all the possible factors like a jury would. With 94 (federal court) districts, I think that's the wise approach in fairness and consistency across the board. When a case goes through, you want the law to be enforced the same in Mississippi that it is in Minnesota and Montana."

The decision means Teel faces life in prison if convicted on the civil-rights charge.

Teel is relieved over the decision, said Jim Davis, lead defense attorney.

U.S. Chief Magistrate Judge John M. Roper denied bond for Teel after his arrest, saying Teel was a possible flight risk and danger to others.

Davis' motion for a bond review says Teel's detention was ordered before the death-penalty issue was decided.

The family of the 40-year-old Williams, who had been taken to jail on misdemeanors, has been informed, said Michael W. Crosby, lead attorney for Williams' estate.

"We continue to monitor developments in the criminal proceedings, but we don't want to say anything that could jeopardize the prosecution or the venue," Crosby said.

A change of venue would move the trial to another region of the state.

A wrongful-death civil lawsuit for Williams' estate has been placed on hold.

The scope of the criminal investigation broadened in public view three weeks before Teel's arrest when ex-jailer Regina Rhodes admitted she helped beat Williams. Rhodes and four other former jailers have entered plea agreements, admitting a conspiracy to deprive hundreds of inmates of their rights.

Rhodes awaits sentencing, as do former jailers Morgan Thompson, Dedri Caldwell, Preston Wills and William Jeffery Priest.

Urban League Chief Wants Justice Probe Of Katrina Shootings (AP)

By Mary Foster, Associated Press Writer

AP, February 23, 2007

NEW ORLEANS (AP) -- Police shootings that left two people dead at a bridge in New Orleans in the chaotic days after Hurricane Katrina should be investigated by the U.S. Justice Department, the president of the National Urban League said Thursday.

In a letter to the chairwoman of the Congressional Black Caucus, Marc Morial - a former New Orleans mayor - asked that the caucus support a federal civil rights investigation into the "circumstances surrounding the police killing of two unarmed African American men and the wounding of four others."

Six current and one former police officer have been charged in the case.

Sgts. Kenneth Bowen and Robert Gisevius Jr., Officer Anthony Villavaso II, and former officer Robert Faulcon Jr. were indicted in December on first-degree murder charges and attempted murder charges in the Sept. 4, 2005, shootings on the Danziger Bridge.

Conviction on a first-degree murder charge would mean mandatory life in prison. District Attorney Eddie Jordan said he would not seek the death penalty for the four.

Two other officers - Robert Barrios and Mike Hunter Jr. - were charged with attempted first-degree murder, and Officer Ignatius Hills was charged with attempted second-degree murder in the case.

Ronald Madison, a 40-year-old mentally retarded man, and James Brissette, 19, were shot and killed at the bridge.

"What's the matter he doesn't have faith in Eddie Jordan?" said attorney Frank DeSalvo, who represents Bowen. "I don't know what motivates these people to do what they do. I assume there is a political reason for it."

The New Orleans NAACP asked the U.S. Attorney and the civil rights division of the Justice Department to investigate the shootings after those charged were allowed to return to work in non-sensitive jobs away from the public. Danatus King, president of the New Orleans branch of the NAACP said the move smacked of favoritism.

U.S. Attorney Jim Letten at that time said his office, the Justice Department and the FBI have been monitoring the investigation. He described that as routine.

DOJ_NMG_0135836

"I think we have a suitable number of investigations under way," said Police Association on New Orleans President Michael Glasser. "The feds have had every opportunity to conduct an investigation from the day it happened to the present."

The officers have drawn strong support from the union and other police. When the men turned themselves in after being indicted, supporters lined the street, stepping forward to embrace the seven men and shake their hands. One sign in the crowd read "Support the Danziger 7." Another read "Thanks for protecting our city."

"I am especially calling for congressional oversight into the subsequent handling of this case by the New Orleans Police Department and the court," Morial's letter to Carolyn Kilpatrick, chair of the Black Caucus, said.

"I would certainly concur," said Nathan Fisher, who represents Ronald Madison's brother Lance Madison. "I certainly think the police department did a terrible job investigating."

Illinois Gay Marriage Bill Introduced (CHIT)

By Crystal Yednak, Tribune Staff Reporter

Chicago Tribune, February 23, 2007

A state lawmaker fired up the gay marriage debate in Illinois Thursday by introducing a bill that would legalize marriage between same-sex couples.

"Illinois is a heartland state but has always been a leader in civil rights and social justice issues," said the bill's sponsor, state Rep. Greg Harris (D-Chicago). "It's the right thing to do."The proposal would eliminate wording in state law that marriage is between "a man and a woman" and substitute the phrase "two persons."

Massachusetts is the only state that recognizes same-sex marriages. Just this week, New Jersey became the third state to offer gay couples civil unions, joining Connecticut and Vermont.

Last year, opponents of gay marriage tried to head off just this sort of action in Illinois. They tried to put a question on the ballot asking voters whether marriage should be defined as a union between "one man and one woman." But the Illinois State Board of Elections ruled the group hadn't collected enough valid signatures.

David E. Smith, executive director of the Illinois Family Institute, which helped organize the drive, said the group is considering another ballot drive this year.

The proposed legislation could be the thing that mobilizes the group again, Smith said.

"We believe that government doesn't have a responsibility to promote or protect the homosexual lifestyle," he added.

Harris, who is openly gay, said a significant education effort would be necessary to get his bill passed, as was the case in 2005 when a gay rights bill passed in Illinois.

The gay rights bill was first introduced in the mid-1970s but it took decades to build legislative support, said Rick Garcia, director of public policy for Equality Illinois.

Garcia said the gay marriage bill is necessary to protect gay couples and their families so partners can make health decisions, qualify for pensions and benefits and have a say in the disposition of remains, among other things.

Still, advocates know the word "marriage" complicates the issue.

"When we use the word marriage, what people are really thinking of is the sacrament of matrimony. We're talking about civil marriage," Garcia said.

Harris said the title of the bill—the "Religious Freedom and Marriage Fairness Act"—is intended to calm the concerns of religious groups who worry they would be forced to recognize same-sex marriages as well.

"We wanted to reaffirm in this bill that there is no religion, no church, no temple, no mosque that we are trying to compel to consecrate marriages," Harris said.

Harris said supporters talked about the idea of pushing for civil unions instead. Civil unions offer many of the same protections of marriage, but not the title. But it was "decided that marriage is the fully equal term and that's where we want to begin," he said.

Garcia said advocates will have an uphill battle getting it passed.

"I cautioned people—don't start planning a June wedding in Illinois, it's going to take awhile for us to get the support legislatively," he said.

cyednak@tribune.com

Nonprofit Litigates Largest Employment Discrimination Class Action Ever To Go To Trial (LAW)

By Sandhya Bathija, The National Law Journal

National Law Journal, February 23, 2007

Attorney Brad Seligman was on a hunt to find out whatever he could about Wal-Mart Stores Inc. after hearing about a potential claim of alleged sex discrimination against the retailer in 1999.

DOJ_NMG_0135837

"I called up my friend, another attorney, and he immediately said, 'evil empire,' " said Seligman, executive director and founder of a nonprofit group called The Impact Fund, located in Berkeley, Calif. "Then I called another friend, who is an economist, and he also indicated the same."

Based on the advice of his friends and some statistical research of his own, the litigation began. On Feb. 6, the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals upheld a lower court decision making the case the largest employment discrimination class action to go to trial. Dukes v. Wal-Mart Stores Inc., No. 3:01-CV-02252 (N.D. Calif.).

The Impact Fund filed the lawsuit against Wal-Mart. The organization aims to provide funding, training and advice to lawyers who want to bring public interest impact lawsuits in civil rights, poverty and environmental justice. And its Equal Justice Litigation Program works as co-counsel on select cases, including the Wal-Mart case.

The Impact Fund has three attorneys: Seligman, Jocelyn Larkin and Julia Campins. The entire organization runs with 12 employees, said Larkin, and their workspace is a typical nonprofit office, full of "hand-me-down furniture." But their work, as the organization's name suggests, is anything but little.

The Impact Fund is currently involved in litigating six cases, including another gender discrimination class action against Costco stores. Ellis v. Costco Wholesale Corp., No. 3:04-CV-03341 (N.D. Calif.).

Wal-Mart will appeal the decision, said Theodore J. Boutrous, the company's chief counsel on appeal and a partner at Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher in Los Angeles.

"We feel we have excellent arguments for en banc review in the 9th Circuit and to the Supreme Court," Boutrous said, arguing that this ruling conflicts with class action certification laws in other jurisdictions.

"We do not feel it is fair for the plaintiffs to act that the court has made a decision on the merits," he said. "This ruling does not speak to the merits of the plaintiffs' claim."

A LIFE CHANGE

Seligman founded The Impact Fund after working 11 years as a plaintiffs class action lawyer in a small Oakland, Calif., firm, Saperstein, Seligman, Mayeda & Larkin. He became managing partner of the firm, and then realized his career was becoming too demanding.

"I was 40 and I was a single parent, and I realized it just wouldn't be as much fun for me, so I resigned," he said. "Then I realized I made more money than I planned to make and I wanted to find a way to give it away."

He thought of creating a fund from which he could give grants to attorneys who have clients and cases, but do not have enough money to go through litigation. He quickly learned that it wasn't just money that other attorneys sought. They also wanted to learn from his experience and expertise as a class action attorney.

"I started to spend much more time talking to people than giving away money," Seligman said.

And so he started a training program and working as co-counsel on certain cases. Seligman became interested in Wal-Mart when Stephen Tinkler, now an attorney with Tinkler & Firth in Santa Fe, N.M., called him for information on how he should best carry out a gender discrimination class action against the retailer.

Seligman's idea was to put together a unique team made up of a mix of nonprofit organizations and private firms to represent the class against Wal-Mart. The nonprofit groups, in addition to The Impact Fund, are Equal Rights Advocates in San Francisco, which specializes in sex discrimination cases, and Public Justice Center, a Baltimore nonprofit firm. The firms are Cohen, Milstein, Hausfeld & Toll in Washington; Davis Cowell & Bowe in San Francisco; and Tinkler & Firth and Merit Bennett P.C. in Santa Fe.

Together, 18 attorneys worked through discovery, Seligman said.

Irma Herrera, executive director of Equal Rights Advocates, said the attorneys reviewed more than one million documents. "We were criss-crossing the country taking depositions of Wal-Mart employers and preparing the employees," she said.

Bark And Hold (WP)

The Washington Post, February 23, 2007

THE POLICE of Prince George's County deserve a pat on the back for mending their canine unit's ways. What for too many years had been a barrage of grisly brutality reports has given way to dramatically fewer injuries to suspects and other people. As reported last week by The Post's Ruben Castaneda, the canine unit, which had been operating under a Justice Department consent decree because of allegations of excessive force and lack of accountability, is being freed of federal oversight.

The statistics -- and the views of citizen groups that used to complain constantly about snarly, excessively ferocious dogs -- indicate significant improvement. During a seven-year period from the mid-1980s to the early 1990s, county police dogs were involved in nearly 800 biting incidents, according to an internal police report included in a federal civil lawsuit against a canine handler. Last year, county police dogs apprehended 55 suspects without biting them, a result of steady training of the dogs to "bark and hold," not bark and sink their teeth.

DOJ_NMG_0135838

Police Chief Melvin C. High says his leaders and the rank and file have "worked really hard to get to this place." Better still, he acknowledges that "this is just the first step in what we're about," which he calls "constitutional policing." We call it encouraging news for all county residents.

ANTITRUST:

$1.75M Fine Ends Probe Of Concrete Price-fixing (INDYSTAR)

By Kevin Corcoran

The Indianapolis Star, February 23, 2007

Noblesville company, 1 of 4 fined a total of $35.2M in penalties, will pay over 5 years

A probe into concrete price-fixing in the Indianapolis area, which sent nine current or former executives to prison, ended after more than three years Thursday with yet another corporate fine.

The $1.75 million penalty levied against MA-RI-AL Corp. during a U.S. District Court sentencing completed a sweeping antitrust investigation into agreements among more than a half-dozen companies to limit discounts on bid work from July 2000 through May 25, 2004

MA-RI-AL, a Noblesville company doing business as Beaver Materials, agreed Thursday to settle its November conviction by paying the fine in installments over five years.

The company's co-owners, Allyn M. and R. Gary Beaver, who were not charged in the investigation, agreed to the settlement with representatives of the U.S. Department of Justice.

Chief U.S. District Judge Larry J. McKinney accepted the negotiated fine as a fair punishment that would send a message to other corporations about the risks of fixing prices without putting Beaver Materials out of business. The company also got five years' probation.

Companies involved in the conspiracy, including those whose executives cooperated with the Justice Department Antitrust Division and FBI, also face civil suits from customers to recover any overcharges.

Beaver's defense attorney, James Voyles, said an agreement was possible because the Justice Department's accountants and the company's experts were relatively close in assessments of the firm's ability to pay a fine.

Going into the sentencing hearing, Beaver Materials asserted it could afford no more than $1.1 million. Federal prosecutors were seeking a $2.5 million fine.

Beaver sells about $15 million a year of ready-mix concrete, mostly to homebuilders in fast-growing suburbs north and south of Marion County, and employs nearly 90 people.

In all, four Indianapolis-area companies paid $35.2 million in fines stemming from the case.

The price-fixing scandal became public in June 2005, when federal prosecutors announced a $29.2 million fine against Greenfield-based Irving Materials Inc., the largest fine ever paid in a domestic price-fixing conspiracy.

Company operations manager Christopher A. Beaver, 42, Noblesville, who was convicted at the same November trial as his firm, filed notice Tuesday that he will appeal his 27-month federal sentence imposed Feb. 9 for price fixing and lying to the FBI.

He and his cousin, Ricky J. Beaver, 43, Noblesville, the company's sales manager, received stiffer prison terms than the leaders of the conspiracy, who pleaded guilty and cooperated with the government.

Ricky Beaver chose not to appeal his 27-month prison term. Both men have acknowledged lying to the FBI during surprise interviews, but said they did not participate in price-fixing.

Federal antitrust officials won't say whether more charges could result from alleged price-fixing schemes in Bloomington, Marion and Muncie, where Irving Materials officials have acknowledged participating in additional price fixing.

Plea Deal In Bid-rig Scheme (NSDY)

By Robert E. Kessler, Robert.kessler@newsday.com

Long Island Newsday, February 23, 2007

Pennsylvania execs admit they conspired with LI company in $200G contract to sell slings to Navy carriers

Two executives of a Pennsylvania defense contractor pleaded guilty yesterday in federal court in Central Islip to charges of bid-rigging in connection with a contract to sell the Navy slings that are used to move bombs and other munitions on aircraft carriers, officials said.

DOJ_NMG_0135839

Thomas Cunningham, 61, the vice president of Total Industrial & Packaging Inc., of McKee's Rocks, Pa. - a Pittsburgh suburb - and Richard Barko, 44, the company's general manager, admitted they conspired with a Long Island company to criminally violate antitrust laws. The Long Island company involved in the $200,000 contract was not identified in court papers. The contract was to provide slings known as metal sling hoist assemblies, officials said.

According to officials, Barko and Cunningham, along with other unnamed conspirators, met between August 2003 and January 2004 and agreed on who would win the bid on the slings and that they all would submit non-competitive bids, officials said.

As part of a plea bargain, Cunningham and Barko agreed to cooperate with an ongoing investigation into bid-rigging by the Antitrust Division of the Justice Department and the Defense Criminal Investigative Service, officials said.

Neither their attorney nor the company could be reached for comment.

Thomas Barnett, the assistant attorney general in charge of the antitrust division, said in a written statement: "We will continue to seek out and prosecute those who subvert the competitive bidding process."

Barko and Cunningham each face up to 6 months in prison and a fine of $10,000 when they are sentenced.

Sirius-XM Merger Faces Major Hurdle Over Antitrust Issues, Experts Say (BLOOM)

Bloomberg, February 23, 2007

Sirius Satellite Radio Inc. and XM Satellite Holdings Inc. will have trouble persuading the U.S. Justice Department to approve their $4.84 billion merger because the combination appears to threaten competition, antitrust experts say.

Antitrust enforcers won't readily accept assertions by Sirius and XM that satellite radio competes for listeners with broadcast radio, iPods and music downloads by cell-phone users, said Herbert Hovenkamp, who teaches antitrust at the University of Iowa law school. The Justice Department probably won't agree with that "fairly common error," he said.

Satellite radio can be viewed as "a unique technology" controlled by "two firms that have been duking it out," Hovenkamp said. "Since they have the whole thing, that would make this a merger to monopoly."

The test for the Justice Department, he said, will be whether Sirius and XM could impose a price increase without losing customers.

How the Justice Department defines the market is crucial to the outcome of its merger review. The agency's guidelines say that determination hinges on whether the merging companies can impose a "small but significant and nontransitory" price increase on customers without forcing them to shift to other products.

If enough customers switch products and thus cancel out any profit from a price increase, the market must include these other products, the guidelines say.

"XM and Sirius are competing for consumers' attention and entertainment dollars from multiple products and services in the highly competitive and rapidly evolving audio entertainment marketplace," Gary M. Parsons, XM's chairman, told investors in a Tuesday conference call. "Satellite radio is still a small player."

Parsons also sought to dispel fears the combined company would raise prices.

The merged company can't continue to grow unless it meets "consumer expectations on both price and programming," he said.

Sirius and XM declined to comment beyond citing public statements by Parsons and Mel Karmazin, chief executive officer for Sirius. Karmazin echoed Parsons' analysis on the conference call.

In recent government reviews of media mergers, antitrust officials have narrowly defined the markets in which the combining companies compete, said David Balto, a former Federal Trade Commission official.

Sirius-XM Merger Would Send Wrong Signal (WP)

By Steven Pearlstein

The Washington Post, February 23, 2007

Here's what to expect if the Justice Department and the Federal Communications Commission allow Sirius and XM to merge, creating a monopoly in the satellite radio business:

Clear Channel will start buying every radio station in America that it doesn't already own.

Apple will be able to buy any company that begins to challenge its dominance in the market for portable music players.

Comcast will begin merger talks with Time Warner Cable.

And there will be nothing standing in the way of a marriage of NBC and CBS.

All that will be possible because the government will have declared that there is so much competition between the different technologies in the market for digital material -- and the outcome of that competition is so uncertain -- that there is no reason to worry about consolidation of companies using the same technology.

DOJ_NMG_0135840

This is the Powell Doctrine -- not the one about overwhelming force enunciated by Gen. Colin Powell when he was chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, but the one promulgated by his son, Michael Powell, while he was chairman of the FCC. The younger Powell was guided by this doctrine in giving the green light to consolidation in almost every corner of the telecommunications sector. In the one instance he deviated from that position -- blocking the merger of EchoStar and DirecTV -- it was narrowly, on the ground that there weren't enough broadband competitors in many rural areas.

There is something to the idea that antitrust regulators should use a lighter touch, and exercise greater humility in predicting what might happen, during periods of rapid technological change. But even discounting for that, there are plenty of reasons for the government to block an XM-Sirius merger, which would create a monopoly.

Let's start with the obvious, which is that that while there are now multiple sources for digital music, they aren't perfect substitutes for each other.

I like radio, my wife will listen only to CDs, my daughter prefers her iPod, and my son will enjoy the convenience of getting music on his cellphone when that service finally takes off. Any of us could switch if the other channels offered lower prices or superior quality, but the differences would have to be pretty significant to overcome habit and personal preference.

Moreover, people are somewhat locked into their current choice by the investment they've made in equipment or contracts with companies. In that way, too, customers are "sticky."

The different technologies also have different business models, complicating the terms of competition. Old-fashioned radio makes its money from advertising, so it is hard to see how it could discipline the XM-Sirius monopoly for raising prices. Nor could Apple, which makes its money selling devices and downloaded songs. And we don't even know yet what the business models will be for Internet radio or music over cellphones.

In fact, XM and Sirius really offer two services. One is music programming. The other is the delivery of that programming via satellites and ground stations. Most of their customers buy the package, but not all. I get limited XM service as part of my DirecTV subscription, and in the future one can imagine cellphone operators and cable companies and maybe even old-fashioned radio stations contracting with XM or Sirius for programming. A merger would reduce their choice of suppliers.

In the same way, XM and Sirius are engaged in furious bidding wars to get different auto companies to install their systems as standard features and options. Obviously, that kind of competition will disappear after a merger -- in fact, the companies say explicitly that would be a benefit of the merger. At the same time, it works to the detriment of car buyers.

As for consumer choice, the companies argue that by eliminating duplicative folk channels and '80s rock channels, the merger will give them the money and bandwidth to launch even more specialty channels. Of course, we have no assurances of that. And as anyone with 500 channels of cable knows, there is a diminishing return to that kind of "variety." My hunch is that music lovers would be better off if XM and Sirius continued to compete by providing the best and most innovative jazz channels, for example, than offering me only one jazz channel along with another specializing in East European folk dances.

Moreover, you can bet your Gilbert Arenas game jersey that XM-Sirius would try to use its new clout and financial resources to outbid competitors for the exclusive audio rights to major sporting events, including those of your local teams.

XM and Sirius are correct when they argue that we are about to enjoy a competitive free-for-all among various companies and technologies to determine which is the most effective in bringing digital music to consumers. It is a process that will foster innovation and greatly benefit consumers. But for precisely that reason, this is the wrong time to give one technology a leg up in that competition by allowing it to become a monopoly, while other companies are forced to compete on two fronts -- against other companies using the same technology, and against companies using different technologies. By approving the XM-Sirius merger, the government would be stacking the deck in favor of satellite radio.

Moreover, history suggests that one or two of the technologies will eventually prevail by proving itself more effective and efficient. And if one of the survivors is satellite radio, consumers will find themselves worse off because the government had allowed a monopoly.

What we have here, folks, is a case of two money-losing companies locked in what has become ruinous competition, from which they hope to escape by merging. It may be that, given the economics of the business, there is room for only one to survive and prosper. But if satellite radio is such a "natural monopoly," consumers will be better off if the companies are forced to duke it out until one prevails and the other dies. The antitrust laws were designed to foster competition, not to foreclose it by bailing out competitors that overpaid for talent, over-invested in plant and equipment or over-promised results to their investors.

Steven Pearlstein can be reached atpearlsteins@washpost.com.

Reject Their Request (USAT)

By Jimmy Schaeffler

USA Today, February 23, 2007

DOJ_NMG_0135841

When the Federal Communications Commission approved the creation of satellite radio in 1997, it had an option: Provide an exclusive license to one company, or authorize competing licenses that ensured consumer choice and lower marketplace prices. It wisely opted for the latter, saying: "One licensee will not be permitted to acquire control of the other remaining satellite licensee. This prohibition on transfer of control will help assure continuing competition."

This wording stemmed from the commission's core DNA, which prompts it to act on behalf of consumers by embracing competition, localism and diversity deemed to be "in the public interest." Now, after XM and Sirius have fought ferociously for 10 years, they come on bended knee before policymakers, begging for a government-sanctioned monopoly.

Their request should be rejected, as was a similar monopoly merger proposed by satellite television providers DirecTV and DISH Network in 2001.

Let's review facts: Combined, XM and Sirius have about 14 million subscribers. They compete in a finite industry: satellite radio. Moreover, it is disingenuous, if not ludicrous, to suggest that XM and Sirius face financial woes because of threats from Internet radio, iPods or alternative music platforms.

XM and Sirius have no one to blame but themselves for their alleged financial worries. Now they seek a government bailout for their shockingly bad business decisions.

Paying individual talent hundreds of millions of dollars may make sense in the NBA or NFL, both established businesses. To pay it for individual talent in a fledgling entertainment start-up is preposterous. Yet that has been the XM-Sirius business model. Now they ask the government — and consumers — to cover the tab. And they ask consumers to settle for considerably less choice, which is what monopolies do.

It took DirecTV and DISH Network well over a decade to gain their financial legs in the satellite TV business. XM and Sirius have sustainable businesses that can operate quite well in satellite radio — right now — as separate entities. They don't need a monopoly; all they need is a class in Business 101 and a little common sense.

Jimmy Schaeffler is a senior analyst at The Carmel Group, a telecommunications and media consulting organization.

Sirius And XM Together Makes Sense For Listeners (USAT)

USA Today, February 23, 2007

